In 1950, Lansdale, now a lieutenant colonel, returned to the Philippines, ostensibly as a military adviser. In fact, his mission was to help Ramon Magsaysay, the Philippine defense minister, establish a popular base. Lansdale helped Magsaysay defeat the communist-led insurgents known as the Huks. Convinced that the guerrilla war could not be won through the use of conventional military force alone, Lansdale counseled Magsaysay on counterinsurgency techniques. In addition to psychological warfare, Lansdale advocated the development of social, economic, and political programs to win the allegiance of the rural population. By the time Lansdale left the Philippines, the Philippine government had defeated the Huks, and Magsaysay had won the presidency by an overwhelming majority in 1953. His work in the Philippines earned Lansdale a reputation as an expert in counterinsurgency.

Lansdale's success in the Philippines prompted Eisenhower to send him to Vietnam in 1954 to prevent a communist takeover of that country. Lansdale's mission was to help the Vietnamese resist the communists, but not to help the French restore their colonial rule. An idealistic advocate of democracy, he undertook the mission with zeal. Lansdale arrived in South Vietnam in June, just as the Geneva accords divided the country into the communist-controlled North and non-communist South. A month after he arrived, Ngo Dinh Diem became prime minister of South Vietnam. Lansdale befriended the new prime minister and became Diem's close personal adviser. Lansdale organized the Saigon Military Mission, which operated independently of the CIA station in Saigon and of the U.S. embassy, and engaged in undercover operations against the North. He helped to organize the mass movement of refugees, the majority of whom were Catholics, from the North to the South. In addition, Lansdale developed a number of programs designed to prevent the expansion of the communist Viet Minh and broaden Diem's political base. He helped the new government set up plans for the quick integration of refugees from the North and aided in the development of programs to train governmental administrators for provinces vacated by the Viet Minh. Lansdale also trained the South Vietnamese Army in intelligence operations and psychological warfare. Perhaps most difficult of all, he attempted to temper Diem's autocratic impulses and educate him in the techniques of electoral politics.

Lansdale went to great lengths to assure the survival and success of Diem's government. He disbursed considerable sums of money to help neutralize Diem's political opponents and helped to prevent a coup against Diem by disgruntled army officers in 1954. Lansdale also sought to undermine the power of local warlords and gangsters, known as sect leaders. His advice helped Diem prevail in an armed confrontation with the sects in the spring of 1955. In the spring of 1955, Lansdale also defended Diem against the assessment by Eisenhower's personal representative, Gen. J. LAWTON COLLINS, that Diem could not win the necessary backing of the army or make the governmental reforms necessary to establish a broad political base. In addition, Lansdale defended Diem against the French, who hated the premier because of his anti-French attitude. With the backing of the French, the head of state, Bao Dai, ordered Diem to leave office in April 1955. Diem, however, refused, and contemplated a coup against Bao Dai. Lansdale dissuaded him, and convinced the premier to hold a plebiscite in which voters could effectively choose between Bao Dai and Diem. In a referendum held on October 23, 1955, voters cast 98 percent of ballots to oust Bao Dai and replace him with Diem as chief of state. Three days later, Diem proclaimed the Republic of South Vietnam, with himself as its first president.

For all his efforts, Lansdale never enjoyed the success with Diem that he had with Magsaysay. Lansdale insisted that Diem permit a loyal opposition and warned Diem against forming his own political party, urging him instead to function as a nonpartisan national leader. Instead, the South Vietnamese leader placed family members in key positions, failed to broaden his base of support, and alienated much of South Vietnam with oppressive policies.

Lansdale left Vietnam in 1956 and went to the Pentagon as an assistant to the secretary of defense for covert operations. Whatever Diem's shortcomings, he remained in power, and that added to Lansdale's reputation. In 1960, Lansdale, then a brigadier general, returned to Vietnam for an inspection mission. His report criticized the Diem regime for not instituting needed political, economic, and social reforms. He reserved some of his harshest criticism for the United States for failing to support Diem with a full range of programs to solidify his support. The report impressed the new president, JOHN F. KENNEDY, who authorized an expanded counterinsurgency program and increased aid to the government in Saigon. Kennedy considered appointing Lansdale ambassador to South Vietnam, but officials in the departments of State and Defense insisted that the general was too controversial and independent. Kennedy used Lansdale as an adviser throughout his administration. After the failure of the invasion at the Bay of Pigs, Kennedy assigned Lansdale to undertake a reexamination of policy toward Cuba. Lansdale became part of Operation Mongoose, an effort to destabilize the Cuban government and to assassinate Fidel Castro. Military and diplomatic officials, always uncomfortable with Lansdale's unorthodox and freewheeling approach, arranged for his promotion to major general in 1963 and his retirement from active duty on October 31. At the urging of Vice President HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, President LYNDON JOHNSON sent Lansdale back to Vietnam in 1965 as a special assistant to the American ambassador. His assignment was to work on broadening the political base of the government, but he had little influence on policy-making decisions. Lansdale left Vietnam in 1968 and published his memoirs, In the Midst of Wars: An American's Mission to Southeast Asia, in 1972. He died at his home in McLean, Va., on February 23, 1987.

Throughout his career, Lansdale remained a controversial figure. To some, he exemplified the best kind of American military adviser, interested not only in warfare but in helping the nation on whose behalf he fought. William J. Lederer and Eugene Burdick represented him as such in their novel The Ugly American (1958). They based one of their characters, Col. Edwin B. Hillandale, on Lansdale. To others, however, Lansdale represented something else, the naive foreigner who did not understand the complexities of a foreign culture and whose well-intended efforts could have catastrophic consequences. With that idea in mind, Graham Greene apparently used Lansdale as a model for Alden Pyle, a character in The Quiet American (1955).

—MSM

Larson, Arthur L(ewis)

(1910–1993) undersecretary of labor; director, United States Information Agency; special assistant to the president

The son of a judge, Arthur Larson was born in Sioux Falls, S.Dak., on July 4, 1910. He graduated magna cum laude from Augustana College in 1931. The following year, he received a Rhodes scholarship and in 1935 earned a B.A. at Oxford in jurisprudence. Larson then returned to the United States and began practicing law in Milwaukee in 1935. Two years later, he accepted an appointment as assistant professor at the University of Tennessee Law School, where he specialized in labor law. During World War II, he worked as a counsel for the Office of Price Administration and for the Foreign Economic Administration. Larson joined the faculty of Cornell University Law School in 1948. Over the next four years, he served as a consultant on the law of corporations to the New York Law Revision Commission and published an 11-volume treatise, The Law of Workmen's Compensation (1952), which became the standard work in its field. In 1953, Larson became dean of the University of Pittsburgh Law School.

Eisenhower appointed Larson undersecretary of labor in March 1954. In that capacity, Larson emerged as one of the administration's leading liberals. Over the next two years, he lobbied for an extension of unemployment insurance benefits, an increase in disability payments under workers' compensation, and meaningful attempts to employ the elderly.

In 1956, Larson published A Republican Looks at His Party, which maintained that Eisenhower Republicanism represented the true center of American politics and urged the party to adopt its principles. Republicans, he argued, should accept a modified role for government in modern industrial society and should aim to appeal to urban voters, young people, and minorities. According to Larson, "New Republicanism" combined a commitment to free enterprise and an endorsement of social welfare legislation. The book so impressed Eisenhower that he asked Larson to help write his acceptance speech for the Republican National Convention in 1956. In addition, the book established Larson as the leading theorist of modern Republicanism. Larson later expanded on those ideas in What We Are For (1959).

In February 1957, Larson became head of the U.S. Information Agency (USIA). Eisenhower asked Congress for a substantial increase in funding for the agency, but the Democratic Congress proposed cuts in spending for the agency. Larson appeared before Congress in an unsuccessful effort to request a restoration of funding at least to the previous year's level. He continued at the USIA until October 1957, when Eisenhower appointed him a special assistant. Larson's primary responsibility was as a speechwriter, in particular on issues relating to science and national security. He resigned from the government in 1958 to become Swearing-in of Arthur Larson as special assistant to the president, October 28, 1957 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

James B. Duke professor of law and director of the Rule of Law Center at Duke University. Even after he left the government, he remained in contact with Eisenhower, served as a special consultant to the president until the end of the administration, and assisted with some of Eisenhower's speeches.

During the 1960s and 1970s, Larson served on a number of advisory commissions involving both economic and foreign policy. He was a consultant to President LYNDON B. JOHNSON, the State Department, and the United Nations. In addition, he published several books on economic and foreign policy. When the Republican party turned away from his New Republicanism and nominated BARRY GOLDWATER for the presidency in 1964, Larson refused to support the party's nominee. In 1968, he wrote Eisenhower: The President Nobody Knew, in which he generally praised Eisenhower's leadership as well as his approach to both foreign and domestic policy. He described Eisenhower as an active, engaged president, who was firmly in control of his administration. The book made headlines for Larson's assertion that Eisenhower had told him that he disagreed with the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education. In the first volume of his memoirs, published in 1963, Eisenhower had asserted that "there can be no question that the judgment of the Court was right." In the second volume of Eisenhower's memoirs, published in 1965, the former president more explicitly stated that "I definitely agreed with the unanimous decision." Larson retired in 1980, but continued to be active until his death in Durham, N.C., on May 28, 1993. At the time he died, he was working on a volume of memoirs, which his son, Lex Larson, completed and published in 1997.

—MSM

Lausche, Frank J(ohn)

(1895–1990) governor of Ohio, U.S. senator

The son of Slovenian immigrants, Frank Lausche was born on November 14, 1895, in Cleveland, Ohio, and grew up in that city. His father died while Lausche was in his early teens, and the boy helped support his family by lighting streetlamps and selling newspapers. After attending Central Institute Prep School in 1915 and 1916, he played baseball in the minor leagues. He joined the army as a private in 1918 and earned a commission, serving as a second lieutenant during World War I. After his discharge from the army, Lausche attended Cleveland's John Marshall School of Law at night and earned his degree in 1920. The same year, he was admitted to the bar and began to practice law in Cleveland. He became active in Democratic party politics and twice failed to win election to the state legislature. In 1932 he was appointed to fill a vacancy on Cleveland's Municipal Court. He subsequently won election in his own right and served until 1937. He was elected to a seat on the city's Common Pleas Court in 1936 and served from 1937 to 1941. Lausche won election as mayor of Cleveland in 1941 with 71 percent of the vote. His reputation for honesty, independence, and fiscal restraint made him a popular figure, and he won reelection in 1943 by an even greater margin. He ran for governor of Ohio in 1944 and won easily. After his first term, he narrowly lost his bid for reelection in the Republican landslide of 1946 but then won four more terms, serving from 1949 to 1956.

Lausche's political independence allowed him to remain popular in a traditionally Republican state. Moreover, although the Republicans dominated the state legislature for most of Lausche's administration, he proved successful in gaining passage of much of his program, including legislation providing for conservation and restoration of the state's natural resources, expansion of the state's welfare program, increased funding for higher education, and construction of hospitals and penal institutions. He neutralized potential criticism from fiscally conservative Republicans by limiting state expenditures, even as he supported popular projects like the state turnpike. During his campaigns for governor, he ignored regular Democratic city organizations and organized labor while campaigning heavily in normally Republican areas. Since he owed the party machines and the unions nothing for his political success, he largely ignored them. His conservative positions on many issues did nothing to endear him to liberals and unions. For example, he favored "right-to-work" legislation, which unions bitterly opposed. At the same time, he supported civil rights and fair employment legislation.

Lausche's position as an independent contributed to his defeat of the incumbent, Sen. George H. Bender (R-Ohio), in 1956. Bender had the advantage of strong Republican candidates at the top of the state and national tickets, but Lausche outmaneuvered him by telling audiences that, if elected, he might vote with Republicans to organize the Senate in 1957. Bender indignantly accused him of "trying to grab Ike's coattails." Apparently Lausche succeeded; he won 52.9 percent of the vote, even as Eisenhower swept the state. When Congress convened in January 1957, Lausche voted with Senate Democrats, which denied Republicans control of the upper house.

Nonetheless, in the Senate, Lausche proved a strong supporter of Eisenhower. According to Congressional Quarterly, Lausche supported the administration more frequently than any other Democrat in the 85th Congress. His independence infuriated some in his own party. During the second session of the 85th Congress, Lausche voted 69 percent of the time against the majority of his fellow Democrats. He refused to endorse Sen. JOHN BRICKER's (R-Ohio) Democratic opponent in 1958. At the same time, Lausche enjoyed a close personal relationship with the majority leader, Sen. LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) and sometimes switched positions to save a piece of Democratic legislation. True to his record of support for civil rights, Lausche voted for the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960.

Lausche easily won reelection in 1962. His conservative positions frequently put him at odds with his party. He voted against federal aid to education, the creation of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and federal aid to urban mass transportation. His skepticism of Democratic spending programs offended powerful elements within Ohio's Democratic party. Organized labor, in particular, sought to defeat him. Lausche's refusal to endorse Carl Stokes in the latter's run for mayor of Cleveland alienated black voters. As a result, the State Democratic Central Committee endorsed John J. Gilligan for Lausche's seat in 1968. That May, Lausche lost the primary to Gilligan, who then lost in the general election to the Republican candidate, William B. Saxbe. Estranged from his party, Lausche endorsed RICHARD M. NIXON for the presidency in 1968 and again in 1972. In the latter race, he dismissed Nixon's opponent, Sen. George McGovern (D-S.Dak.), as "indecisive and inconsistent." Lausche never again held public office. He died in Cleveland on April 20, 1990.

—MSM

Leader, George M(ichael)

(1918–) governor of Pennsylvania

Leader was born in York, Pa., on January 17, 1918. His family had farmed in York Co. for several generations, and his father was active in Democratic politics. He grew up on his parents' poultry farm and went to York High School before attending Gettysburg College and the University of Pennsylvania, where he earned a B.S. degree in education in 1939. When his father fell ill, Leader went to work for Guy A. Leader & Sons, the family farming business. He also followed his father into politics; he became a member of the York County Democratic Committee in 1940 and secretary of that body two years later. During World War II, Leader served in the navy as an ensign aboard the aircraft carrier USS Randolph in the Pacific theater. After the war, he returned to York Co. and purchased Willow Brook Farm, where he operated a successful chicken hatchery. He also embarked on a political career. In 1946 he became a justice of the peace and succeeded his father as chair of the county Democratic committee. At the time, his father was a state senator. When his father chose not to run for reelection in 1950, Leader ran for and won his father's seat in the state senate. He ran for state treasurer in 1952 but lost to his Republican opponent, Weldon Heyburn. Leader nonetheless proved himself a good campaigner and gained statewide recognition.

Leader ran for governor in 1954. He had the backing of the Democratic organizations in Pittsburgh and Philadelphia and was among the earliest candidates to make extensive use of media advertising and professional pollsters. He promised state aid for the creation of new jobs and attacked the 1 percent sales tax enacted under the administration of the incumbent Republican, Gov. John S. Fine. Running against Fine's lieutenant governor, Lloyd H. Wood, Leader focused his attack on the unpopular sales tax and won in a major upset.

Upon taking office on January 18, 1955, Leader inherited a budget deficit of $75 million from Fine. The public disliked Fine's sales tax, and Leader had campaigned against it. In April 1955, Leader called for a 1 percent state income tax and a tax on investments. Both parties opposed the levies, and after an impasse that lasted 17 months, Leader had to abandon his proposal. He then reluctantly asked for and got an increase in the sales tax to 3 percent. Given that he had campaigned against the sales tax, many voters felt betrayed, and Leader's popularity plummeted.

In spite of the setback on the issue of the budget and taxation, Leader pursued an ambitious agenda. Making good on his campaign pledge to involve the state in the creation of jobs, he oversaw the enactment in 1956 of the Pennsylvania Industrial Development Authority, which offered state financing to private enterprises as an incentive to locate in distressed areas. Leader also removed over 10,000 jobs from the civil service system, provided state support for the education of children with disabilities, expanded the state park system, increased payments for workers' compensation and unemployment compensation, and opened a vocational rehabilitation center in Johnstown. The cold war and, in particular, the launch of Sputnik, generated concern over education. Leader responded by expanding state aid to school districts and increasing teachers' salaries by 20 percent. In addition, he increased support for the state's 14 colleges.

In addition, Leader established a record in support of civil rights. He signed legislation creating a Fair Employment Practices Council, established to police discrimination in employment. When a black family moved into the Levittown in Bucks Co. and encountered hostility, threats, and violence, Leader sent the state police to keep peace and ordered the state's attorney general to prosecute those who violated the rights of the black family.

In September 1955, Leader began speaking out on national issues. He became one of the first Democrats publicly to urge his party to criticize President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. The following month, he announced that he would support ADLAI E. STEVENSON for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1956. It seemed that Leader was positioning himself for a dark-horse candidacy for the vice presidential nomination, but he withdrew himself from consideration. He nevertheless campaigned energetically for Stevenson and attacked Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON. For all of Leader's efforts, Stevenson failed to carry Pennsylvania in the election, and Republicans won control of both houses of the state's legislature.

Pennsylvania's constitution limited governors to a single term, and Leader decided to run for the U.S. Senate in 1958. He had not, however, handled patronage to the satisfaction of the Democratic machine, and alienated himself from its leadership. In his bid for a Senate seat, he abandoned the city machines that had elected him and sought to identify himself with reformers in the party. He fired ward leaders in Philadelphia and announced his support for the candidacy of a reformer, RICHARDSON DILWORTH, the mayor of Philadelphia, for governor. Dilworth, however, declined to run. Leader won the Democratic primary but, in spite of a sweeping Democratic victory that year, lost in the general election to Rep. HUGH SCOTT (R-Pa.). Organization workers deserted Leader in large numbers. In Philadelphia, the successful Democratic candidate for governor, David L. Lawrence, ran 40,000 votes ahead of Leader. Scott defeated Leader by 113,000 votes, while Lawrence won the governorship by 80,000 votes. Leader failed to carry even York Co.

Following his defeat, Leader returned to Willow Brook Farm. He became a mortgage banker and founded Leader Nursing Homes, Inc. In the 1980s and 1990s, he and his family established retirement communities. He resides in Hummelstown, Pa.

—MSM

Lee, J(oseph) Bracken

(1899–1996) governor of Utah

Lee was born in Price, Utah, on January 7, 1899. Although ancestors on both sides of his family were active in the Mormon Church, his father was not, and Lee never belonged to the church. At the age of five, Lee moved with his family to Colorado but returned to Price, where he attended Carbon County High School. In April 1917, two months before his scheduled graduation, the United States entered World War I, and Lee enlisted in the army. Assigned to train troops in the United States, he rose to the rank of sergeant and served until March 1919. Immediately after leaving the service, he worked briefly as a postal clerk and then joined his father in the insurance and real estate business. Eventually, he became manager and owner of the agency. Lee also became active in Republican politics. After running unsuccessfully for mayor of Price in 1931, he ran again in 1935 and won by two votes. He was reelected five times and served from 1935 to 1947. In 1940, he unsuccessfully ran for the Republican gubernatorial nomination. Two years after that, he tried and failed to gain the Republican nomination for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives. He won the gubernatorial nomination in 1944 but lost in the general election to Herbert B. Maw. Four years later, in a rematch against Maw, Lee promised to run the state on a conservative, businesslike basis and distanced himself from the Republican presidential nominee, New York's governor, THOMAS E. DEWEY. Lee defeated Maw and was the only Republican to win statewide office that year. A strict fiscal conservative, he cut a variety of state agencies and programs. His primary target for spending cuts, however, was education, and that earned him the opposition of virtually every educator in the state. Lee also made headlines with his opposition to the income tax, foreign aid, and the United Nations. A charismatic figure and a talented speaker, he had a penchant for personal and political invective that made him many enemies. His constituents admired Lee's willingness to speak his mind. He summed up his approach to politics with the slogan, "Do it honestly, do the best you know how, and let 'em holler."

Lee backed the conservative ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio) for the Republican presidential nomination in 1952. Lee, however, became enmeshed in the maneuvering over the seating of the rival Taft and Eisenhower delegations at the Republican National Convention. In May, Eisenhower's forces put together a two-page statement proposing that contested delegates be kept from voting on the right of others to be seated, a position that would serve to Eisenhower's advantage. They hoped to have the statement signed jointly by supporters of both Eisenhower and Taft. At the annual conference of governors, which took place just before the Republican convention, Gov. Dan Thornton of Colorado and Dewey of New York urged the 23 Republicans attending the annual conference of governors to sign a manifesto declaring that contested delegates should not vote on the seating of other delegates. Every Republican governor at the conference, including those who supported Taft, felt obliged to sign. The governors issued the manifesto on July 2, five days before the convention; Thornton, representing Eisenhower's supporters, read one page of the statement, and Lee, representing Taft's backers, read the other. In the general election, Lee backed Eisenhower, and, in November, Lee won reelection and Eisenhower carried Utah.

Throughout Eisenhower's presidency, Lee was one of his sharpest critics on the Republican right. During the first half of the decade, Lee was an outspoken supporter of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) and opposed the Senate resolution to censure McCarthy in December 1954. Lee accused Eisenhower of steering America leftward and recommended the formation of a third, conservative party in 1956. As the presidential election year got under way, the governor continued to attack Eisenhower. He challenged the constitutionality of foreign aid and refused to pay federal income tax until Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY successfully brought an action to compel the governor to pay. Lee's antics cost him dearly. He lost the Republican gubernatorial primary in 1956 to George Clyde, who ran as an Eisenhower Republican. Lee then entered the race as an independent and finished third in the general election.

Lee challenged Sen. ARTHUR V. WATKINS (R-Utah) for the Republican senatorial nomination in 1958. Watkins had chaired the committee investigating the charges that resulted in McCarthy's censure. After losing the primary, Lee entered the general election as an independent. His candidacy split the Republican vote and resulted in a victory for the Democratic candidate, Frank Moss. From 1960 to 1972, Lee served as mayor of Salt Lake City. In that capacity, he may have made his most significant contribution. While not deviating from his hard-line conservative positions, he matured as a politician and adopted a somewhat more temperate approach. As a result, he was more effective, and his tenure was marked by fiscal stability and capital improvements. Lee made unsuccessful bids for the U.S. Senate in 1962 and for governor in 1964. He died in Salt Lake City on October 20, 1996.

—MSM

Lee, Richard C(harles)

(1916–2003) mayor of New Haven, Conn.

Lee was born in New Haven, Conn., on March 12, 1916 and raised in a working-class section of the city. Following his graduation from high school in 1935, he worked as a city hall reporter for the New Haven Journal-Courier. Running as a Democrat, Lee won election to the board of aldermen in 1939. He served for a short time in the army during World War II before receiving a medical discharge. He then returned to New Haven to resume his position as alderman. Lee went to work for the Yale News Digest in 1943 and the following year was appointed director of Yale's public relations service. During the 1940s, he became prominent in local Democratic politics. In 1949 and 1951, he campaigned for mayor, losing by narrow margins both times.

Lee ran for mayor again in 1953. Realizing he would need a dramatic issue to galvanize support for his race, he focused his attention on urban renewal. He assembled a campaign staff of highly motivated young urban planners who drew up his proposal for "the rebirth of New Haven." Campaigning on that issue, Lee managed to win the general election in November by a narrow margin.

Lee began his program by enlisting the aid of noted French urban designer Maurice Rovital to help him draw up a master redevelopment plan. Rovital based his plans on the belief that the city would have to attract well-to-do suburbanites to its stores and recreational facilities to develop a viable economic base. Revitalization, therefore, depended on the growing interstate highway system that spanned southern Connecticut. Lee won authorization for the construction of a superhighway linking the Connecticut Turnpike to the heart of downtown New Haven. Working closely with Edward J. Logue, a young attorney he named as supervisor of the program, he then initiated massive slum clearance projects to permit the widening of local streets and the construction of new offices, department stores, middle-income apartments, and parking garages. He also began a program for developing low-income housing. To finance these projects, the mayor applied for federal assistance under the Federal Housing Act of 1954, which provided grants and loans for cities to purchase rundown property. After upgrading it, the city could sell the property to private developers.

In pursuit of his goals, Lee sought to gain control of the city bureaucracy. He had inherited a government made up of numerous independent departments. These agencies were often more responsive to the desires of powerful advisory committees, led by business leaders indifferent to Lee's goals, than to the mayor's office. Lee gradually appointed individuals loyal to him to head and staff the city's departments. The mayor then arranged for his supporters to sit on the advisory committees. Realizing that a large portion of his political strength lay in the Democratic organization, Lee maintained good relations with the local machine. He often appointed political regulars to city jobs, mingling them with the urban specialists he had brought in to reconstruct the city. By 1956, Lee controlled the city bureaucracy.

During the last half of the decade, Lee won massive electoral victories over his Republican rivals. His dependence on the Democratic machine thus ended, though he always had cordial relations with the party regulars. Lee, however, endeavored to keep politics out of urban renewal. He also tried to enlist the help of Yale and attempted to gain the support of the business community. When the city's chamber of commerce proved skeptical of his dream, Lee created an alternate business group to advise him.

By the end of the decade, New Haven was receiving more federal aid per capita than any other city in the country, and Lee had gained a reputation as one of the most imaginative mayors in the nation. Many pointed to his city as perhaps the most promising example of urban renewal. During the presidential campaign of 1960, Lee was an adviser to the Democratic candidate, JOHN F. KENNEDY. Lee continued to serve as mayor until 1970. Throughout the 1960s, New Haven continued to draw national attention for its urban renewal projects and its job-training programs for the poor. The city was the first to receive a grant from the newly created Office of Economic Opportunity. In addition, New Haven received grants from private foundations and corporations for various projects. Nevertheless, the city continued to lose industrial jobs and therefore its economic base. At the same time, an influx of African Americans from the South expanded its inner city. For all of Lee's programs, the city continued to suffer from disproportionate poverty and unemployment. A major race riot in 1967 tarnished the mayor's image as a visionary of urban renewal. After leaving public office in 1970, Lee taught political science at Yale and the University of Connecticut. He died in New Haven on February 2, 2003.

—MSM

Lehman, Herbert H(enry)

(1878–1963) U.S. senator

The son of wealthy German-Jewish immigrants, Lehman was born in New York City on March 28, 1878. His father was a founding partner of Lehman Brothers, a company that began as a cotton-trading concern and developed into a leading investment banking firm. After earning a B.A. from Williams College in 1899, Lehman went to work for J. Spencer Turner, a textile firm in New York, rising to become vice president and treasurer of the company in 1906. Two years later, he joined Lehman Brothers as a partner. Having established himself in business, Lehman increasingly devoted himself to various philanthropic activities. Although he donated substantial sums to a variety of religious groups (Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish) as well as civic organizations (including the Boy Scouts and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), his primary philanthropic interest was the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), organized by American Jews during World War I primarily to aid Jews in Eastern Europe. Lehman joined the army as a captain during World War I and served with the General Staff Corps in Washington, D.C. Upon leaving the service as a colonel, he returned to Lehman Brothers. In the 1920s, Lehman became vice chairman of the JDC and oversaw aid to reconstruct Jewish communities in Eastern Europe. He also acted as a mediator in the garment industry and forged close ties to labor groups, particularly the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union (ILGWU) and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. These unions subsequently provided enthusiastic support when Lehman entered politics.

Lehman became active in state Democratic politics in the 1920s. He served as treasurer to Gov. Alfred E. Smith's reelection campaign in 1924, headed Smith's campaign committee in 1926, and was director of the finance committee for Smith's presidential campaign in 1928. In 1928, Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected governor, and Lehman won election as lieutenant governor. Lehman and Roosevelt won reelection in 1930. In 1932, Roosevelt ran for the presidency, and Lehman, after gaining the Democratic nomination over the opposition of party bosses, was elected governor in a landslide. He won reelection in 1934 and 1936. A change in New York's constitution extended the governor's term to four years, and Lehman won a four-year term in 1938.

As governor, Lehman maintained close political ties to Roosevelt and oversaw New York's "Little New Deal," a set of state programs designed to promote relief and reform that resembled Roosevelt's New Deal. These state measures offered benefits to groups excluded from federal programs. In December 1942, Lehman resigned as governor a month before his term ended in order to accept an appointment as head of the newly established Office of Foreign Relief and Rehabilitation Operations; the following year, he became director general of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA). Lehman resigned his post in March 1946 and ran for the Senate from New York. In addition to capturing the Democratic nomination, he also gained the endorsements of New York's Liberal Party and the American Labor Party. Nevertheless, dissatisfaction with the Truman administration led to a Republican tide that year, which swept the party into control of both houses of Congress. Lehman suffered what was to be the only electoral defeat of his career.

In 1949, Lehman defeated the Republican nominee, JOHN FOSTER DULLES, in a special election to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Sen. ROBERT F. WAGNER (D-N.Y.). Lehman won election to a full term in 1950. In the Senate, Lehman quickly established himself as one of the leading liberals of the upper house. In general, he supported President HARRY S. TRUMAN's foreign policy and domestic policies. Lehman supported civil liberties, the rights of aliens, liberal immigration regulations, civil rights for African Americans, and the development of public power. Along those lines, he unsuccessfully opposed the Internal Security Act in 1950 and the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act in 1952.

Lehman consistently opposed the Eisenhower administration's policy of encouraging private, rather than public, development of power and resources. In April 1953, he participated in a 28-day filibuster against an administration-backed proposal to grant oil-rich submerged coastal lands to the states. The following year, he joined a filibuster against the Dixon-Yates contract, under which private companies were to provide power to the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) to make up for the power the TVA supplied to the Atomic Energy Commission. Eisenhower ultimately cancelled the Dixon-Yates contract. Lehman won another victory for public power when, in 1956, he sponsored a successful measure authorizing the New York State Power Authority to build and operate a $405 million project at Niagra Falls.

From the time Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) drew national attention with his sensational accusations of Communists in government, Lehman was among his most outspoken critics. On the Senate floor, he repeatedly confronted McCarthy and demanded proof for the senator's reckless charges. Lehman and McCarthy traded accusations in 1953, after McCarthy alleged that criticism of two of his aides, ROY M. COHN and G. DAVID SCHINE, were motivated by anti-Semitism. Soon after that, McCarthy read to the Senate a letter in which Lehman had expressed "complete confidence" in the loyalty of Alger Hiss. Lehman replied that the letter had been written months before any "real evidence" of Hiss's guilt had emerged and before Hiss's indictment and conviction for perjury. McCarthy also accused Lehman of hiring Communists and Communist sympathizers when he was director of the UNRRA. In June 1954, Lehman endorsed Sen. RALPH FLANDERS's (R-Vt.) resolution to censure McCarthy. Two months later, Lehman cosponsored a bill with Sen. WAYNE MORSE (I-Oreg.), clearly aimed at McCarthy, that would have required a code of procedure for all congressional committees. Morse and Lehman joined other senators as cosponsors of Sen. ESTES KEFAUVER's (D-Tenn.) proposed "Code of Conduct for Congressional Committees." The Senate did not adopt either proposal. In September 1954, Lehman supported the recommendation of the Watkins Committee that McCarthy be censured. On the final vote, Lehman voted for censure.

Even as he opposed McCarthy's anticommunist activities, Lehman supported the Communist Control Bill of 1954, one of the most repressive measures proposed during the cold war. Sponsored by a group of Democratic liberals in the Senate led by HUBERT H. HUMPHREY (D-Minn.), the bill declared the American Communist Party an "agency of a hostile foreign power" and therefore not entitled to the rights claimed by legal bodies. Lehman voted for the bill, which passed in August 1954.

In 1955 and 1956, Lehman increasingly turned his attention to civil rights for African Americans. In March 1956, he protested when the Democrats in the Senate gave the chair of the Judiciary Committee to a segregationist senator, JAMES O. EASTLAND (D-Miss.), on the traditional basis of seniority. In June, Lehman announced that he would sponsor an antisegregation amendment to a proposed appropriation of $1.6 billion for the construction of schools. The bill went down to defeat in the House the next month.

In July 1956, the House passed the administration's civil rights bill, which established a Civil Rights Commission and elevated the Civil Right Section of the Justice Department to the status of a division. When the bill came to the Senate, Lehman and others attempted to rescue it from Eastland's Judiciary Committee, but their effort failed by a vote of 76 to 6. The Judiciary Committee failed to report the bill, and Lehman blamed the administration for submitting its recommendations late in the session. He neglected to mention the role of Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) in burying the bill in Eastland's committee.

Lehman did not, however, exempt members of his own party from criticism for failing to support civil rights. In early 1956, he wrote to ADLAI STEVENSON "expressing [his] sense of disquietude" about Stevenson's cautious position on civil rights. Lehman continued his advocacy of civil rights at the Democratic National Convention in August 1956. He called for a floor fight on civil rights, but the convention instead accepted a draft from the platform committee that attempted to reconcile southern segregationists and northern liberals within the party. The Democratic platform stated simply that the Brown decision "brought consequences of vast importance to our nation as a whole and especially to communities directly affected."

Lehman declined to run for reelection in 1956. After leaving office, he returned to some of the issues with which he had been involved earlier in his career. In March 1958, he mediated a general strike by the ILGWU. Later that year, ELEANOR ROOSEVELT and Lehman formed the National Council for Industrial Peace to promote harmonious relations between labor and management and to oppose right-to-work laws. In January 1959, with the support of New York's mayor, ROBERT F. WAGNER, JR., Roosevelt and Lehman formed the New York Committee for Democratic Voters. The group aimed to wrest control of the state party from the "hands of the old-style party professional," specifically CARMINE DESAPPIO, the leader of Tammany Hall. The reformers achieved their goal in 1961, when they won several municipal offices and defeated DeSapio for his position as district leader. Because only district leaders could serve as county leaders, DeSapio also lost his post as leader of Manhattan Co. Lehman remained active in reform politics until his death at his home in New York City on December 5, 1963.

—MSM

LeMay, Curtis E(merson)

(1906–1990) air force vice chief of staff

The son of an ironworker, LeMay was born in Columbus, Ohio, on November 15, 1906. He wanted a military career but failed to secure an appointment to West Point, so he enrolled at the school of engineering at Ohio State University, where he joined the Reserve Officers Training Corps. LeMay left without graduating to take up a commission as second lieutenant in the reserve field artillery in 1928. He volunteered for the army air corps and received his wings in October 1929. While serving in the army air corps, he completed his degree in civil engineering at Ohio State in 1934. After receiving a promotion to first lieutenant in 1935, he transferred to Second Bomb Group in 1937 and became one of the first pilots to qualify on the new B-17 heavy bomber. Promoted to captain in 1940 and to major in 1941, he received the Distinguished Flying Cross for flying experimental missions.

Like many other officers, LeMay's career took off with the advent of World War II. He became a lieutenant colonel in January 1942 and a colonel in March of that year. An innovator in the use of strategic bombers, he led a raid that took off from England and bombed Regensburg, Germany. He received promotion to brigadier general in September 1943 and to major general in March 1944. In August 1944, he was ordered to the China-Burma-India theater and later to the Pacific, where he planned the B-29 raids on Tokyo and other Japanese cities. LeMay was transferred to the staff of Gen. Carl A. Spaatz, head of the U.S. Strategic Air Forces, in August 1945, where he helped plan the atomic bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. In December 1945, LeMay became deputy chief of air staff for research and development. In that capacity, he supported research on supersonic aircraft and missiles. He also helped oversee the introduction of jet bombers. When the air force became a separate branch of the service in 1947, LeMay was named to command of air forces in Europe and received a temporary promotion to lieutenant general. He directed the Berlin airlift of 1948 to 1949. While the airlift continued, LeMay returned to the United States in October 1948 to assume command of the Strategic Air Command (SAC). He modernized SAC and imposed a regimen of strict discipline and intense training. Under his command, SAC became a highly motivated, extremely efficient, and powerful fighting force.

LeMay strenuously advocated the position that strategic bombers should serve as the primary deterrent to Soviet aggression. He repeatedly warned that the Soviet Union was cutting into the American lead in strategic air power and opposed efforts by the Eisenhower administration to limit SAC's budget. Eisenhower's chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS, credited LeMay's testimony before STEWART SYMINGTON's (D-Mo.) subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee with persuading Congress to appropriate an additional $900 million for additional B-52 bombers, which, according to Adams, the air force "did not need."

The Eisenhower administration's attempt to limit the production of guided missiles and military jet aircraft in 1956 produced a firestorm of criticism. LeMay supported Gen. NATHAN TWINING's contention that a "bomber gap" existed between the United States and the USSR. Symington and Sen. HENRY JACKSON (D-Wash.) repeatedly charged that the United States was seriously behind the Soviet Union in the production and development of missiles. Symington's subcommittee held hearings on American military air strength in April 1956. In testimony during those hearings, LeMay maintained that the USSR would surpass the United States in striking power of long-range bombers between 1958 and 1960.

LeMay became vice chief of staff of the air force in April 1957. He also retained command of SAC. After the Soviet Union launched its satellite, Sputnik, in the fall of 1957, the military pressed the administration to increase defense spending. Once again, LeMay was in the forefront. In testimony before the Senate Preparedness Subcommittee in December 1957, he repeated his demand for rapid expansion of the manned bomber fleet. He said that his previous requests for larger appropriations had "fallen on deaf ears" at the White House and that, even when Congress had appropriated such funds, the administration had impounded them. LeMay reiterated his warning that failure to provide planes, bases, and intercontinental ballistic missiles would result in the United States falling behind the Soviet Union in striking power. On this occasion, he set mid-1959 as the date when the United States would lose its lead in air power. That, he predicted, would "invite a cataclysmic preemptive strike by the superior communist intercontinental ballistic missile force at some future date." In response to earlier testimony by the army's chief of staff, Gen. MAXWELL D. TAYLOR, LeMay forcefully opposed the idea that funds be diverted from the air force to increase conventional forces and derided the army's preoccupation with conventional war. Air power, he argued, provided a wide variety of military capabilities. To those who questioned the effectiveness of bombers in a guerrilla war, he responded, "I do not understand why a force that will deter a big war will not deter a small war too, if we want it to and say it will."

In 1961, President JOHN F. KENNEDY promoted LeMay to air force chief of staff. LeMay continued to champion the production of manned bombers in opposition to Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara's belief that, in an age of missiles, the manned bomber was becoming obsolete. High officials in the administrations of both Kennedy and LYNDON B. JOHNSON feared that LeMay might become a formidable political threat upon his retirement and therefore repeatedly extended his tour of duty at the Pentagon. After LeMay did retire in 1965, he joined the board of Network Electronics Corporation and became an outspoken critic of the Johnson administration's restrictions on bombing raids in both North and South Vietnam. LeMay advocated massive air strikes against North Vietnam's ports, depots, and supply lines. In 1968, George C. Wallace chose LeMay to be his vice presidential running mate on the American Independent Party ticket. During the campaign, LeMay denounced Johnson's decision to halt the bombing of North Vietnam and promised that, if elected, he and Wallace would resume the air war and, if necessary, use nuclear weapons to defeat the North. The ticket won 13.4 percent of the popular vote. LeMay died of a heart attack at March Air Force Base in California on October 1, 1990.

—MSM

Lewis, John L(llewellyn)

(1880–1969) president, United Mine Workers of America

The son of a coal miner and policeman, John L. Lewis was born in Lucas Co., Iowa, on February 12, 1880. In his early teens, he moved with his family to Des Moines, and returned with them to Lucas Co. in the late 1890s. He left school to go to work in the mines and in 1901 became a charter member of a local of the United Mine Workers of America (UMW). After working at mining sites in the West, he returned to Lucas in 1905. Two years later, he ran unsuccessfully for mayor and entered business as a feed and grain distributor. The business failed, and soon after, in 1909, the entire Lewis family moved to the coal mining town of Panama, Ill. In 1910, Lewis won election as president of Local 1475 of the UMW. He launched a successful campaign for state workers' compensation laws and state laws regulating safety in the mines. A dynamic orator and a skillful organizer, he rose quickly in the labor movement. His activities drew the attention of Samuel Gompers, the head of the American Federation of Labor (AFL), and Lewis became a field representative for the AFL in 1911. The job enabled him to travel widely through mining areas and to build a strong personal following within the miners' union. Lewis became vice president of the UMW in 1917 and took over many of the duties of the ailing president, Frank Hayes. At the beginning of 1920, Hayes resigned, and Lewis became acting president. Later that year, Lewis won election as president of what was then the largest union in the AFL. He held that position for the next 40 years.

An active Republican, Lewis backed Warren Harding, Calvin Coolidge, and HERBERT HOOVER during the 1920s. That decade, however, saw a rapid decline of the UMW. Despite Lewis's insistence that labor and capital shared common interests, the UMW encountered fierce opposition from coal mining companies. Bituminous coal companies drove the UMW from mines in the Appalachian region. Operators in Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania insisted that competition from southern mines required reductions in wages and tonnage. Things were little better in the anthracite mines of northeastern Pennsylvania. Faced with difficult conditions and declining membership, Lewis became convinced that the union could not afford internal divisions and consolidated his control. He used armed force and election fraud to crush left-wing opposition in the union.

The coming of the Great Depression exacerbated Lewis's problems and those of the UMW. Membership continued to decline, and the union's financial condition grew worse. Lewis responded by ruthlessly suppressing his opponents in the union. On the other hand, the coming of the New Deal presented opportunities. Taking advantage of provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, Lewis launched a massive and successful organizing campaign in the coalfields. Through National Recovery Administration codes and collective bargaining, the UMW gained better wages and union security provisions. These successes enabled the union to compile an enormous treasury and thrust Lewis into a prominent role in the larger union movement.

Lewis believed that mass-production industries should be organized on an industry-wide, rather than a craft, basis. In 1935, Lewis joined with other AFL leaders interested in industry-wide organizing to form the Committee for Industrial Organizations (CIO). The CIO succeeded in establishing unions in the automobile, rubber, steel, and electrical appliance industries. The recession of 1937 to 1939 made further gains difficult, and jurisdictional conflicts with the craft unions of the AFL further impeded the success of the CIO. Moreover, Lewis's critics charged that he had allowed communists to gain influence in the CIO. The AFL expelled the CIO in 1938, and the CIO reconstituted itself as the Congress of Industrial Organizations. As president of the CIO, Lewis quickly found himself in conflict with other leaders of the organization who hoped to quickly repair the rift with the AFL.

Lewis was also at odds with other leaders of the CIO over national politics. Lewis aggressively supported Roosevelt in 1936; indeed, he created Labor's Non-Partisan League, which poured more than $500,000 into Roosevelt's campaign that year. During the late 1930s, however, Lewis came into increasing conflict with the administration, particularly over matters of foreign policy. When World War II broke out in Europe, Lewis opposed American intervention and charged that Roosevelt's support for Great Britain and his program of increased defense production threatened to involve the United States in a war to save the British Empire. While other leaders of the CIO remained fervently loyal to Roosevelt, Lewis endorsed Wendell Wilkie for the presidency in 1940. On October 25, Lewis gave a radio address in which he vowed to step down as president of the CIO if Roosevelt were elected. After the election, Lewis kept that promise.

Lewis made an unsuccessful bid to regain control of the CIO, and then pulled the UMW out of the organization in 1942. After the American entry into the war, Lewis and the UMW supported the war effort and endorsed the No Strike Pledge made by the AFL and CIO in December 1941. Lewis, however, came to regard Roosevelt and the War Labor Board as duplicitous in dealing with what Lewis regarded as legitimate demands for increased wages to make up for wartime inflation. In 1943, Lewis repudiated the no-strike pledge and led a series of strikes that brought a torrent of public criticism. Lewis also earned the resentment of other labor leaders who adhered to the pledge in the face of dissatisfaction from their rank-and-file membership.

After the war, Lewis continued his confrontational approach toward mine operators and the federal government. In 1946, he demanded a royalty on each ton of coal mined, which would be used to finance union health and welfare benefits. After a series of strikes that led the government to seize control of the mines, Lewis reached a settlement with federal administrators that became the basis for a permanent royalty agreement with the coal industry that funded health care and pension benefits for miners. On the other hand, his defiance of a federal court injunction cost him and his union enormous fines.

The UMW briefly rejoined the AFL in 1946 and 1947, but the UMW remained isolated from the rest of the labor movement during the 1940s and 1950s. Lewis nonetheless hoped to reunite the AFL and CIO under his leadership. Alternatively, he sought to bring together union heads dissatisfied with the leadership of the two major federations. None of these schemes came to fruition, and Lewis focused his attention almost exclusively on the affairs of his own union. The coal miners, however, no longer commanded the public attention they once did, and Lewis faded from national prominence.

Further, he and the UMW faced new challenges in the 1950s. Faced with competition from oil, natural gas, and hydroelectricity, the demand for bituminous coal diminished, and coal operators sought to cut labor costs. Large operators did this by increasing productivity through mechanization. In addition, the emergence of the Tennessee Valley Authority as a major consumer of coal fostered hundreds of small, nonunion mines in Kentucky and Tennessee that remained competitive by not having to pay royalty payments to the UMW's welfare and retirement fund. These developments weakened Lewis's union by reducing both the size of the workforce under its jurisdiction and its employed membership.

In response to these developments, Lewis took a more collaborative approach to relations with the owners. He sanctioned deals with employers in financial difficulties that undercut standard UMW contracts. Since the UMW's pension and health care programs depended on the royalty for each ton of coal produced, the union cooperated in mechanization programs that resulted in the elimination of jobs. In order to insure the prevention of work stoppages, he tightened his control of the UMW.

In addition, Lewis acted as an industry spokesman in Washington, where he argued for government promotion of coal exports and stricter mine-safety laws. This position had the covert aim of forcing small companies out of business by imposing on them the same expensive safety standards required of larger producers. The big coal companies also urged Lewis to organize the growing number of nonunion mines, since the larger mechanized enterprises could benefit from lower labor costs only if other producers could not achieve the same advantage by simply operating on a non-union basis. With Lewis's tacit approval, his aide

W. A. “Tony” Boyle, initiated virtual guerrilla war in the unorganized areas. Bands of UMW agents converged on nonunion operations. They marched the miners out of the pits at gunpoint and in many cases coerced them into joining the union.

In return for Lewis’s assistance, the industry accorded major concessions on wages and benefits to the UMW. Although the number of working miners fell by three-fifths between 1947 and 1960, creating extensive and chronic unemployment in the coal-producing regions, those UMW members who remained employed earned the highest hourly wage in American industry by 1959. During the same period, moreover, the union’s income actually grew despite declining membership, since it was based on a per ton royalty rather than a payroll tax. As a result, the UMW became a wealthy institution. Its assets in 1960 totaled some $110 million—almost as much as the Teamsters, auto, steel, and machinists unions combined. With an industrialist from Cleveland, CYRUS EATON, serving as his informal adviser, Lewis used the health and welfare fund to build a partially concealed financial empire for the union. Eventually the union acquired major stock holdings in several coal companies and a controlling interest in the National Bank of Washington, the capital’s second largest bank. In 1960, Lewis resigned as UMW president and became president emeritus. He died in Washington, D.C., on June 11, 1969.

—MSM

Liebman, Marvin

(1923–1997) secretary, Committee for One Million against the Admission of Communist China to the United Nations

Born in Brooklyn, New York, on July 21, 1923, Liebman attended New York University. A member of the Young Communist League and the American Communist Party during the 1930s and 1940s, Liebman resigned in protest against the purging of Earl Browder. Drafted into the army during World War II, Liebman served until 1944, when he was dismissed after his homosexuality was discovered. He worked for various Zionist groups and then became involved in the right-wing Israeli terrorist organization, the Irgun Zvai Leumi. While working for the International Rescue Committee, which aided refugees from the Iron Curtain, Liebman came to view the USSR as a threat to world peace. In 1952, he helped start Aid to Refugee Chinese Intellectuals. During the 1950s, Liebman became a public relations specialist, working first for Harold L. Oram, Inc. In 1957, he founded his own firm, Marvin Liebman Associates Inc., which represented conservative organizations. Richard Dudman, a journalist, called him “the best single-action group organizer on the Far Right.”

Liebman was one of the principal organizers of the Committee for One Million against the Admission of Communist China to the United Nations, created in 1953. On October 22, 1953, Liebman and other supporters of Nationalist China presented President Eisenhower with a petition signed by 210 prominent Americans calling for the United States to oppose the admission of Communist China to the UN. The event was the first step in a massive drive to get 1 million American signatures on the document and thus throw the weight of public opinion against the possibility that the administration might support the admission of Communist China. Liebman handled the publicity and fund-raising for the committee. The 1-millionth American signed the petition on July 6, 1954. The committee planned the conclusion of the campaign to coincide with the Geneva Conference on Indochina as an indication of public displeasure with the possibility of the United States negotiating with the Communists at the conference.

Liebman then set out to turn the committee into a permanent lobbying organization designed to be a watchdog over the administration’s China policy. In 1955, the Committee for One Million became the Committee of One Million, with Marvin Liebman as its secretary. Although the group contained individuals from both political parties, most members were conservative Republicans. The committee had three goals: creation of a bipartisan foreign policy; opposition to “appeasement” of communists by the West, especially the United States; and resistance to “indirect” communist aggression in Southeast Asia. Liebman kept the committee members informed of the progress of Americans and neutralist nations who lobbied for China’s entry into the UN. In addition, he publicly opposed any trade with mainland China and lobbied extensively against the relaxation of the American economic boycott of the communist regime. Both administration officials and Democratic leaders reiterated their support for the organization's positions.

During the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, the Committee of One Million continued to function as an effective lobby influencing American policy toward China. Liebman worked for the presidential campaign of BARRY GOLDWATER in 1964. In 1968, he closed Marvin Liebman Associates. Between 1969 and 1975, he was managing director of Sedgemoor Productions in London. During his time there, he produced or coproduced nine West End theater productions as well as touring and out-of-town productions, two television films, and three feature films. Liebman returned to the United States in 1975 and organized Marvin Liebman, Inc., a firm that performed the same functions as the earlier Marvin Liebman Associates. His client list included Friends of Free China, Friends of Jim Buckley, the Committee of Single Taxpayers, the American-Chilean Council, Firing Line, and Covenant House.

Liebman worked on the presidential campaign of Ronald Reagan in 1980. After Reagan's victory, Liebman became consultant to the Office of Policy and Planning for Action (June through October 1981), consultant to the Office of Public Affairs for the U.S. Department of Education (October 1981 to February 1982), and director of the Office of Public Affairs and director of Special Projects for the National Endowment of the Arts (February 1982 to July 1987).

In 1990, while serving as director of special projects at the Federal Trade Commission, Liebman published an open letter to his long-time friend, WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY, in Buckley's National Review. The letter announced Liebman's homosexuality and condemned what he believed to be rampant homophobia in conservative Republican circles. From then on, he devoted himself to gay activism. He became founding chairman of the Log Cabin Republicans and in 1992 published his memoirs, Coming Out Conservative. In an article published that same year, he wrote: "To be gay, conservative and Republican is not a contradiction. I'm proud to be all three." In addition to his activities on behalf of single-issue groups, Liebman was a founding member of three of the most significant institutions of modern conservatism: The National Review, Young Americans for Freedom, and the Conservative Union. He died of heart failure in Washington, D.C., on March 31, 1997.

—MSM

Lindsay, John V(liet)

(1921–2000) executive assistant to the attorney general, U.S. congressman, mayor of New York

The son of an investment banker, Lindsay was born in Manhattan, N.Y., on November 24, 1921. He grew up in homes on Riverside Drive and Park Avenue, summered on Long Island, and attended the Buckley School for Boys in New York and Saint Paul's preparatory school in Concord, N.H. Upon his graduation from Yale University in 1943, he enlisted in the U.S. Naval Reserve. Rising from ensign to lieutenant while serving as a gunnery officer, he participated in the invasion of Sicily and served aboard destroyers in the South Pacific. After receiving his discharge in 1946, Lindsay returned to Yale, where he earned his law degree in 1948. While in law school, Lindsay met HERBERT BROWNELL JR., a prominent lawyer and political operative, who became Lindsay's mentor. Brownell helped Lindsay get a job with the firm of Webster, Sheffield & Chrystie. Brownell also guided Lindsay's entry into liberal Republican politics. Lindsay became head of the New York Young Republican Club and, in 1952, founded the Youth for Eisenhower organization. Lindsay's work at the Republican convention that year further impressed Brownell, who, after Eisenhower's inauguration, became attorney general. In 1955, Lindsay became Brownell's executive assistant and served as liaison to the White House, the cabinet, and Congress. While working for Brownell, Lindsay played a significant role in shaping and working for passage of legislation affecting civil rights and immigration.

In 1958, Lindsay ran for Congress from New York's 17th District, which included Harlem, Greenwich Village, the East Side, and the affluent neighborhoods along Fifth and Park avenues where Lindsay had been raised. Lindsay won the election and served the Silk Stocking District for four terms.

In Congress, he was an outspoken supporter of civil rights and voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1964. He also involved himself with issues relating to immigration and refugees. On a number of issues, such as housing, school construction, and foreign aid, he voted more frequently with the Democrats than with his own party. In addition, he was one of the first members of Congress to oppose the war in Vietnam.

Lindsay's independent Republicanism played well in his district, but it had the effect of isolating him in Congress. He turned to local politics and in 1965 ran for mayor of New York as a fusion candidate (nominated by both the Republican and Liberal parties). When he won the election, he became the first Republican to hold that office since 1941; he was also one of the youngest mayors in the city's history.

Lindsay's tenure would be marked by strife and controversy. Historians disagree over whether Lindsay contributed significantly to the collapse of New York City or merely presided over it. Only hours after his inauguration, the city's transportation workers went out on a strike that lasted 13 days. The strike cost the city some $1.5 billion, and Lindsay capitulated, granting the union twice the benefits it initially demanded. The generous settlement set a precedent for New York's other municipal unions. Throughout his administration, Lindsay and New York faced a series of strikes by public service workers, including nationally publicized strikes by teachers and sanitation workers.

A strong advocate of civil rights for African Americans, Lindsay initiated a number of programs designed to aid African-American communities. After the assassination of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., he walked through the streets of Harlem, with his jacket off and his tie loosened, talking to people in an effort to calm an angry community. Compared to cities such as Detroit, Newark, and Los Angeles, New York experienced relatively little violence and property damage.

Even as Lindsay won a national reputation as a groundbreaking innovator in urban civil rights programs, however, in his own city, Lindsay's efforts on behalf of poor blacks and Hispanics encountered opposition from politicians and middle-class constituents. One reform that Lindsay initiated in education had disastrous results. He gave control of some schools, including those in the Ocean Hill-Brownsville district of Brooklyn, to black community activists. When the administrator of the Ocean Hill-Brownsville district dismissed a group of largely Jewish teachers, the United Federation of Teachers called a strike that closed 85 percent of the city's schools for 55 days. The bitter, racially divisive strike tainted relations between African Americans and Jews for years to come. Similarly, a proposal to build low-income housing in the middle-class, largely Jewish, area of Forest Hills, Queens, ignited a firestorm of racial and class animosities.

During Lindsay's tenure, New York quadrupled welfare benefits, doubled its welfare roles, and initiated a variety of costly social programs. To pay for these, he created new taxes, raised existing ones, borrowed money, and engaged in "creative book-keeping." Higher taxes accelerated the exodus of businesses and the middle class from the city and further alienated the white working and middle classes. These resentments came to a head in 1969, when a huge snowstorm hit the city. While major arteries were quickly cleared, the streets of Queens remained unplowed. For many, the incident came to symbolize the Lindsay administration, which they saw as favoring minority groups and the affluent in Manhattan, while ignoring the needs of the white working and middle classes.

Running for reelection in 1969, Lindsay lost the Republican nomination but won the general election as a Liberal-Fusion candidate, in spite of garnering only 42 percent of the vote. His second term was marred by disclosures of police corruption, prison riots, racial animosities, and the deteriorating financial condition of the city. Under Lindsay, the city's debt grew from $2.5 billion to $9 billion. The year after Lindsay left office, the city nearly went into bankruptcy.

In the mid and late 1960s, Lindsay and NELSON ROCKEFELLER jockeyed for the leadership of the liberal wing of the Republican party. Their rivalry degenerated into a bitter personal feud. Moreover, Lindsay's relationship with the administration of RICHARD M. NIXON grew increasingly confrontational. Lindsay announced his switch to the Democratic party in August 1971. Spurred on by his aides, Lindsay made a bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1972. His short-lived presidential campaign was a disaster. With many of his programs in shambles and without a base of support in any party, Lindsay chose not to run for reelection in 1973 and returned to his old law firm. He also served as an occasional host on ABC's television program, AM America, a predecessor of Good Morning America, and published two volumes of memoirs as well as a novel. In his one attempted political comeback, he failed to gain the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate in 1980.

Poor health and financial difficulties plagued his later years. He failed to qualify for a New York City pension by several years. When Webster, Sheffield folded in 1991, Lindsay joined Mudge Rose Guthrie Alexander & Ferdon. When that firm, too, went out of business in 1995, he was left without health insurance or retirement benefits. Lindsay, who suffered from Parkinson's disease, faced financial ruin. Friends came to his rescue and in 1997 secured for him a position as consul to the New York City Commission for the United Nations, which gave him a salary and health benefits. After a period of time, it also made him eligible for a city pension. Nevertheless, his health continued to deteriorate. After suffering two heart attacks and two strokes, as well as collapsing in public on two occasions, he retired to a senior community on Hilton Head Island in South Carolina in 1999. He died there of complications from pneumonia and Parkinson's disease on December 19, 2000.

—MSM

Lippmann, Walter (1889–1974) journalist

The son of a well-to-do Jewish family, Lippmann was born in New York City on September 23, 1889. He attended private schools and Harvard University, which he left in May 1910, just weeks before receiving his master's degree in philosophy, to become a reporter for a socialist newspaper, the Boston Common. Lippmann then worked briefly for Lincoln Steffens's Everybody's Magazine before becoming secretary to the socialist mayor of Schenectady, N.Y., in 1912. That experience imbued him with a distrust for reformers and political machinery. In 1913, he published his first book, A Preface to Politics. In it, he criticized American progressives for concentrating on abstract goals, for their moralism, and for their confidence in reason. He urged progressives to draw on the ideas of Sigmund Freud, whose psychoanalytic theories had just begun to draw attention in America. The book brought him to the attention of Theodore Roosevelt, and also Herbert Croly, who was about to launch a magazine to promote Roosevelt's New Nationalism. Croly brought Lippmann on board as an editor. Before the first issue of that journal, The New Republic, came out in November 1914, Lippmann published his second book, Drift and Mastery. By this time, Lippmann rejected socialism and modified the ideas he had espoused in A Preface to Politics. He advocated a scientifically managed society run by a public-minded elite. By 1916, Lippmann had become convinced that the United States could not permit the defeat of Great Britain in the world war, and wrote a series of editorials intended to bring the United States into the war on the side of Great Britain and France. After the United States entered the war in 1917, Lippmann took a job with the government and played a role in the drafting of President Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points.

After the war, Lippmann wrote a series of articles on the role of the press, which he then published as a book, Liberty and the News (1920). He expanded his ideas in Public Opinion (1922), in which he questioned the foundation of democracy. The average person's perceptions, he argued, were the product of propaganda, prejudice, and a failure to engage the issues. Such a person seemed incapable of making informed, rational decisions; yet the theory of democracy depended on the ability of the average person to make intelligent decisions. Lippmann offered an answer to this problem by proposing that trained, unbiased experts be given the task of sorting out the news and presenting it to the public. Lippmann went still further in The Phantom Public (1925), in which he suggested that the public be removed from the substance of decision making. Experts, he maintained, should left to make the decisions, and the public's role would be to ratify or reject the decisions by removing experts whose decisions with which it disagreed.

Lippmann left The New Republic in 1922 to take a job as head of the editorial page at the New York World, a liberal newspaper. When the World closed its doors in 1931, Lippmann went to work for the New York Herald Tribune, a conservative newspaper, as a syndicated columnist. His column, Today and Tomorrow, brought him a national audience. He became known for his ability to analyze current controversies and both relate them to larger issues and place them in a historical context.

By the 1930s, the one-time socialist and Wilsonian interventionist had become an advocate of maintaining a degree of distance from the affairs of Europe and Asia and a critic of the New Deal. While he supported the recovery programs of the early New Deal, he became increasingly hostile to what he regarded as Franklin Roosevelt's drift toward socialism. In 1937, he published The Good Society, an attempt to find a middle ground between laissez-faire capitalism and tyrannical collectivism. Lippmann early on recognized the threat posed by the fascist powers in Europe and advocated a policy of armed neutrality for the United States. After the Munich Conference in 1938, however, he worried that France and Great Britain could not contain Nazi Germany. With the German invasion of Poland in 1939, Lippmann shifted his position and urged lifting the arms embargo to Great Britain and France. He supported Roosevelt's destroyers-for-bases deal and lend-lease. Hitler's aggression destroyed Lippmann's faith in neutrality and international organizations. The erstwhile Wilsonian idealist emerged as a convinced realist. In U.S. Foreign Policy: Shield of the Republic (1943), Lippmann argued that isolation was impossible for the United States and that idealistic schemes could not substitute for military power and alliances. Therefore, the maintenance of peace in the postwar world demanded the continued alliance of the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union.

By the end of World War II, Lippmann had emerged as one of America's most respected and influential political critics. His opinions on foreign affairs, in particular, carried great weight. He believed strongly in the necessity of continuing cooperation among the allied powers, which led him to view the emergence of the cold war with alarm. Lippmann blamed the United States and Great Britain as well as the Soviet Union for the collapse of great power comity and urged keeping the lines of communication with the Soviets open. In 1947 he wrote a series of articles which he later published as a book, The Cold War (1947). In it, he sought a middle ground between GEORGE F. KENNAN's policy of containment and Henry Wallace's dream of a unified and cooperative world based on the United Nations. Lippmann believed that America should base its policy on the "realities of the balance of power." While he recognized the need to counter Soviet expansion, he thought that Kennan's approach would commit the United States to unlimited intervention. He rejected the idea that the Soviets sought expansion for ideological reasons and stressed that Soviet interest in eastern Europe had its origins in history rather than communist doctrine. For Lippmann, the primary focus of the cold war was Europe, and particularly Germany. He recommended the neutralization of Germany and the withdrawal of both Soviet and American troops from the continent.

As the cold war took shape, Lippmann supported the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan. At the same time, he objected to their presentation in terms of an ideological crusade. Even as he joined the broad consensus in support of the cold war, he remained a perceptive analyst of it.

Lippmann supported DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the presidency in 1952, in part because he believed that a Republican president was needed to check the excesses of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). After Eisenhower's victory, however, Lippmann became a frequent critic of the new president. In 1953, he accused Eisenhower of abdicating the power of the presidency and held Eisenhower responsible for allowing McCarthy to continue his rampage.

In 1955, Lippmann published Essays in the Public Philosophy, which continued his uncomfortable engagement with democracy. He viewed with alarm and disdain politicians who allowed themselves to be led by public opinion. While skeptical of mass democracy, he remained unwilling to turn to undemocratic methods. He asserted that democracy should be based on natural law and that natural law should confine the currents of public opinion.

An obdurate critic of Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, Lippmann denounced Dulles's failure to define clearly the administration's "New Look” (the reliance on air power, technology, and nuclear weapons as the primary deterrent against Soviet expansion or an attack by the Soviet Union) or to elaborate on the consequences of “massive retaliation.”

When the Communist Chinese began shelling the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu in the fall of 1954, Lippmann opposed an American intervention. He contended that the islands had no strategic importance for Taiwan (Formosa) and advocated that the Nationalist Chinese withdraw from them. Moreover, Lippmann regarded the alliance with Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) as a liability that could draw the United States into an unnecessary war.

With respect to Germany, Lippmann continued to support a gradual movement toward a unified, demilitarized, and neutral Germany. When it became apparent that this was unrealistic, he advocated a mutual reduction of foreign troops in Germany and efforts to normalize relations between the East and West German governments.

After a trip to the USSR, Lippmann published an analysis of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. The Communist World and Ours, published in 1957, criticized American reliance on military pacts to contain Soviet expansion. The only way to prevent communism’s expansion, he wrote, was for the United States to demonstrate to developing countries that the American system could match communist achievements and do so in a more humane way. Lippmann also contended that without Soviet troops in Eastern Europe, communist regimes would find it difficult to survive. Therefore, he argued that the United States should support an end to the military occupation of Europe.

Disillusioned with Eisenhower, Lippmann enthusiastically supported JOHN F. KENNEDY for the presidency in 1960. He regarded Kennedy as the first presidential candidate since Roosevelt who could stir and unite the American people. Once Kennedy assumed the presidency, however, Lippmann became increasingly critical of the president’s foreign and domestic policies. After Kennedy was assassinated, Lippmann initially threw his fervent support to LYNDON JOHNSON, whom he called “a man for this season,” but broke with the Johnson administration over the war in Vietnam. Between 1960 and 1965, the CBS network did seven one-hour interviews with Lippmann, an indication of his status as an observer of the American political scene. Beginning in 1965, Lippmann began to criticize the administration’s policy in Vietnam. The columnist turned not only against Johnson’s policy in Vietnam but against Johnson himself. In 1967, Lippmann stopped writing his newspaper column, although he continued to write a column for Newsweek (which he began in 1963) for another year. He returned to New York, where he lived until his death there on December 14, 1974.

—MSM

Lipset, Seymour Martin

(1922–2006) sociologist

The son of a Russian-Jewish immigrant who worked as a printer, Lipset was born in New York City on March 18, 1922. Through his father, he was introduced to the politics of the printer’s union, which would later become the subject of one of his major studies. He became involved in the Young People’s Socialist League during his high school years. The degeneration of socialism in the Soviet Union into a totalitarian form of government profoundly influenced Lipset. By the time he graduated from the City College of New York in 1943, he was a Social Democrat. After completing his B.A., Lipset enrolled in the Ph.D. program in sociology at Columbia University, where he studied under Robert K. Merton. He taught at the University of Toronto from 1946 to 1948 and was an assistant professor at the University of California at Berkeley from 1948 to 1950.

Lipset’s first book, Agrarian Socialism (1950), was a revised version of his doctoral dissertation on the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, a mass socialist party that had arisen in Canada during World War II. The study intended to force a revision of conventional explanations for the weakness of socialist movements in North America.

Lipset left Berkeley in 1950 to take a position at Columbia, where he taught until 1956. In 1955, he published an important article on the origins of what he called “the radical right.” According to Lipset, this group deserved the term radical because “it desire[d] to make far-reaching changes in American institutions.” The radical right rejected the New Deal, or, as Lipset put it, “refuse[d] to accept the recent past,” and viewed “our entire foreign policy” since the recognition of the Soviet Union as “appeasement, treason, and treachery.” Lipset argued that the origins of the radical right lay in “status politics,” which he described as “political movements whose appeal is to the not uncommon resentments of individuals or groups who desire to maintain or improve their social status.” Like Theodor Adorno’s The Authoritarian Personality (1950), on which Lipset drew heavily, Lipset regarded the Right as a form of political deviancy.

In 1956, in collaboration with other members of the Bureau of Applied Social Research, Lipset published Union Democracy. The book won him a reputation as one of the nation’s leading sociologists. In it, he and his associates countered the widespread notion in sociology that organizations necessarily developed an elite governing body. The scholars did this by describing the democratic practices maintained within the International Typographical Union (ITU), one of America’s oldest and most powerful labor organizations. They showed how a healthy level of disagreement was generated most easily among people who regard themselves as social equals. Equality and conflict then combined to provide the framework for two-party democracy. The book conceded the uniqueness of the ITU and that most labor unions were in fact dominated by only a very small minority. Lipset nonetheless implied that under conditions of equality and conflict, democracy would work.

In 1960, Lipset published Political Man, which won wide recognition as a classic of contemporary sociology. In it Lipset identified himself as “a man of the left” who made common cause with those who sought to “extend democracy” and reduce social stratification. Further, he associated those values with Americanism; despite its status as the world’s “wealthiest capitalist nation,” he argued, the United States was also committed to the broad extension of economic and cultural opportunities. Moreover, this contributed to the stability of American society. Labor unions had abandoned attempts to nationalize private property and concentrated on higher wages, benefits, and political reforms, which did not “require or precipitate” the sort of “extremism” on the part of labor leaders or corporate executives that typified the conflicts of the 1930s. The book also presented the concept of “working-class authoritarianism.” By that, Lipset meant that “the less sophisticated and more economically insecure a group” was, the more likely its members were to accept a simplistic ideology or political program. Thus, he maintained, authoritarian movements of the left and right often found a social base in such groups. Making a distinction between “economic” and “noneconomic liberalism,” Lipset argued that support for economic liberalism correlated inversely with higher social and economic standing, but support for noneconomic liberalism was associated with higher educational attainment and a greater level of sophistication. He concluded, therefore, that movements propounding both antielitism (economic liberalism) and intolerance of groups or ideas identified as different (“noneconomic illiberalism”) would appeal to the less privileged. He located a powerful base of support for Sen. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) among just such groups. The “lower a person is in socio-economic status or educational attainment,” wrote Lipset, “the more likely he is to support McCarthy, favor restrictions on civil liberties, and back a ‘get tough’ policy with the communist states.”

Lipset returned to Berkeley in 1956. From 1962 to 1966, he also headed the Institute of International Studies at the University of California. In The First New Nation (1963), Lipset returned to several of the themes he first discussed in his essay on the radical right in 1955. He maintained that the emphasis on competition and success among non-elite Americans led to pressure to violate the “rules of the game” in politics or other areas of life. After the disturbances at Berkeley in 1964, he turned his attention to an analysis of student unrest. Lipset accepted a position as George D. Markham professor of government and sociology at Harvard University in 1966. His views had moved to the right, and, the following year, he published Student Politics. Lipset returned to his examination of the radical right in The Politics of Unreason (1970), a book he coauthored with Earl Rabb that “traced the connections and similarities (as well as the major differences) among right-wing extremist tendencies in American history.” As had Lipset in much of his earlier work, The Politics of Unreason once again characterized the extreme right as a social aberration. Although he and his work were attacked by the New Left, Lipset remained an influential voice within the academic community. He moved to Stanford University as Caroline S. G. Munro professor of political science and sociology in 1975 and remained there until he accepted a position as the Hazel professor of public policy at George Mason University in 1990. He also held a position as a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution. His recent works included Continental Divide: The Values and Institutions of the United States and Canada (1990), American Exceptionalism: A Double-Edged Sword (1996), and, with Earl Rabb, Jews and the New American Scene (1996). Lipset died in Arlington, Va., on December 31, 2006.

Lodge, Henry Cabot

(1902–1985) ambassador to the United Nations

The product of a distinguished New England family that traced its ancestry in America back to the colonial period, Henry Cabot Lodge was born in Nahant, Mass., on July 5, 1902. After the death of his father in 1909, Lodge was raised by his grandfather and namesake, Sen. Henry Cabot Lodge, Sr. (R-Mass.). The younger Lodge was educated in Paris and at Harvard, from which he graduated cum laude in 1924. Upon graduating from Harvard, he went to work as a journalist, first with the Boston Transcript (1924 to 1927) and then with the New York Herald-Tribune (1927 to 1933). He also became an officer in the army reserve.

In 1933, Lodge won election as a Republican to the Massachusetts House of Representatives. Three years later, he defeated James M. Curley, a veteran Democratic politician, for a seat in the U.S. Senate. Lodge entered politics as a conservative Republican, but the international crisis of the late 1930s and the political success of the New Deal convinced him that, to remain viable, the Republican party needed to embrace internationalism and abandon its hostility to the basic structures of the New Deal. With the American entry into World War II, he took temporary leave from the Senate and served with an American tank unit in Libya. After winning reelection to the Senate in 1942, he resigned from the Senate in 1944 to serve with the army in Europe. He rose from captain to lieutenant colonel and won a Bronze Star.

Lodge returned to the Senate in 1947 after defeating the Democratic incumbent, David I. Walsh, for his seat in 1946. In the Senate, Lodge supported the United Nations and aid for European reconstruction. In domestic matters, while critical of the New Deal's massive bureaucracies and what he regarded as its excessive interference with the private sector, Lodge supported a variety of social programs. These positions brought him into conflict with the conservative wing of his party and its leader, ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio). Republican losses in the election of 1948 persuaded Lodge that, unless the party moved toward the center, it faced extinction. Nevertheless, the party's conservative wing dominated the Republican membership in Congress, and Lodge voted against the majority of his party in the Senate over 40 percent of the time between 1949 and 1952.

By the early 1950s, Lodge came to the conclusion that, if it were to survive, the Republican party needed to find a presidential candidate who could defeat Taft for the nomination and win the general election. He became convinced that DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER was such a candidate. Lodge first met with Eisenhower in June 1950 and failed to persuade the general to commit himself to a campaign. Eisenhower did agree, however, that if he thought that his candidacy was necessary to save the two-party system, he would answer the call of “public duty.”

Lodge visited Eisenhower in Paris in July 1951 and thought that he had made some progress in persuading Eisenhower to run. At another meeting, on September 4, 1951, Lodge warned Eisenhower that gaining the nomination would be more difficult than winning the general election and insisted that Eisenhower permit the use of his name in Republican primaries. He also urged that political professionals be allowed to take over the Citizens for Eisenhower organization. Unless Eisenhower acted quickly, warned Lodge, Taft would lock up the nomination. In November, a group of political leaders, including THOMAS E. DEWEY and some of his key advisers from his presidential bid in 1948, met and named Lodge as Eisenhower's campaign manager. Among other things, Lodge had the advantage of not being identified with Dewey, who was anathema to the right wing of the party.

Lodge spent the last days of 1951 and the early days of 1952 attempting to persuade a reluctant Eisenhower to become a candidate. On December 8, 1951, Lodge told Eisenhower that if he did not return to the United States and make a positive announcement, the nomination would go to Taft. A parade of liberal or Eastern Republicans came to Paris urging Eisenhower to run. The attempt to enlist Eisenhower ran into difficulties when doubts arose regarding the general's party affiliation. In early January 1952, Lodge sent a letter to SHERMAN ADAMS indicating that the general's "voting record was that of a Republican." In fact, Eisenhower had dictated the content of the letter.

On January 6, 1952, Lodge called a press conference to announce that he would enter Eisenhower's name on the Republican ballot in the New Hampshire primary. At the conference, he read the letter he had sent to Adams maintaining that Eisenhower was a Republican. When reporters asked for verification, Lodge suggested that they ask the general himself. Although irritated at Lodge's presumption, Eisenhower released a statement indicating that "Lodge's announcement . . .

Henry Cabot Lodge at a press conference at the White House, July 23, 1953 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum) gives an accurate account of the general tenor of my political convictions and of my Republican voting record.”

On February 10, Lodge staged a rally at Madison Square Garden, attended by 33,000 wildly enthusiastic, cheering partisans, in support of the general's candidacy. The demonstration of his popularity helped convince Eisenhower to run, but he did not yet become an active candidate. Despite his absence, Eisenhower won the New Hampshire primary. Encouraged by the showing, Lodge visited the general yet again in April and solicited his promise to return to the United States in June to campaign. During the ensuing months, Lodge stumped the country making speeches for Eisenhower.

By late spring and early summer, the Eisenhower campaign seemed likely to be derailed by Taft's popularity with party regulars, particularly in the Midwest and South. By late June, the contest appeared very close. In selecting the delegation from Texas, Taft's supporters in that state had arbitrarily ignored substantial support for Eisenhower expressed at precinct-level meetings held by the party. Lodge and the Eisenhower organization turned the dispute into a moral issue. Taft's lieutenants responded ineffectively. At the Republican convention, delegates voted to seat a pro-Eisenhower delegation from Texas in place of Taft's slate. Delegates also voted to seat pro-Eisenhower delegates from Georgia and Louisiana, although the issues in those states appeared less clear-cut than in Texas. The successful challenges to Taft delegations from these states provided Eisenhower with the votes necessary for a victory on the first ballot.

His preoccupation with Eisenhower's campaign led Lodge to neglect his own race for reelection against Rep. JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). Backed by his family's wealth and influence, Kennedy ran an innovative and lavishly funded campaign. Moreover, Lodge encountered fierce opposition from Taft Republicans in Massachusetts, many of whom voted for Kennedy. In the end, Lodge lost by 70,000 votes out of 2.3 million votes cast.

After winning the election, Eisenhower made Lodge his liaison to the Truman administration to effect a smooth transition of power. Eisenhower also appointed Lodge to be ambassador to the United Nations and elevated the position to cabinet rank.

In addition, Eisenhower made the new ambassador a member of the National Security Council.

Lodge viewed himself not as the head of an embassy who was obliged to take direction from the State Department but rather as one of Eisenhower's senior policy advisers. Lodge had authority to speak at UN debates without prior clearance from Washington. The president often remarked that his ambassador had articulated the position he would have taken had he been consulted.

At the UN, Lodge presented a hard line with respect with the Soviet Union and responded to its positions in debates swiftly and aggressively. At the same time, he sought to keep lines of communication with them open and maintained cordial relations with Soviet diplomats in private. Lodge's patrician manner, his facility with languages, and his sense of humor made him an effective representative at the UN. He needed all the skills he could muster as he dealt with a series of difficult matters, including the coup in Guatemala in 1954, the Suez Crisis and the Hungarian uprising in 1956, and the American intervention in Lebanon in 1958. He also had to manage relations with the newly independent states in Asia and Africa and the neutralist bloc led by India. Lodge responded to the challenge of newly independent and developing countries by becoming the leading advocate of international development initiatives within the administration. Lodge functioned as Eisenhower's official representative and accompanied the Soviet premier, Nikita Khrushchev, on his 12-day tour through the United States in 1959. Lodge also was present at the talks between Khrushchev and Eisenhower at Camp David.

In 1960, Lodge resigned his post to accept the Republican party's vice presidential nomination on a ticket headed by Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON. A highly visible and popular figure as ambassador to the UN and an important link to the liberal wing of the party, Lodge brought a lot to the ticket. Nevertheless, Nixon and Lodge lost to the Democratic ticket of Kennedy and LYNDON B. JOHNSON that November.

Kennedy appointed Lodge ambassador to Vietnam in 1963. Lodge resigned as the post in 1964 because of his wife's ill health. At the request of President Lyndon Johnson, Lodge made a tour of countries belonging to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in August and September 1964 in order to brief their leaders regarding American policy in Vietnam. In February 1965, he became a presidential "consultant" on Vietnam and took part in the deliberations that led to the decision to launch an air war. In July 1965, Johnson asked Lodge to return to Vietnam as ambassador. Back in Vietnam, Lodge continued to advocate social reforms to raise the living standards of the rural population. He remained steadfast in his belief that the United States should not permit the communists to take over South Vietnam. In November 1966, he opened secret negotiations with North Vietnam designed to explore the North's reaction to a possible halt of the bombing. Encouraged by what he regarded as a favorable response from Hanoi, Lodge attempted to persuade policy makers in Washington to halt the bombing temporarily. He ultimately proved unsuccessful, and the talks collapsed. Lodge resigned his post in April 1967. In March 1968, Johnson asked Lodge to become a member of the Senior Advisory Group on Vietnam. Lodge served as ambassador to Germany from April 1968 to January 1969. When Richard Nixon became president in January 1969, he appointed Lodge chief U.S. negotiator at the Paris peace talks with North Vietnam. The talks proved unsuccessful, and Lodge resigned in December 1969. Between 1970 and 1977, Lodge served as envoy to the Vatican for Presidents Nixon and GERALD R. FORD, after which he retired to Beverly, Mass. He died there on February 27, 1985. Lodge wrote two volumes of memoirs, The Storm Has Many Eyes: A Personal Narrative (1973) and As It Was: An Inside View of Politics and Power in the '50s and '60s (1976).

Long, Earl K(emp)

(1895–1960) governor of Louisiana

Long was born in Winnfield, La., on August 26, 1895. He grew up in the shadow of his older brother, Huey, and would remain in that shadow even after Huey's death. Unlike his brother, Earl Long was an indifferent student. Following Huey's example, he dropped out of school after finishing the 11th grade and began a successful career as a traveling salesman. Earl attended Loyola University and was admitted to the Louisiana bar in 1926. Earl played a crucial role in helping Huey win election to the Louisiana Railroad Commission in 1918; Earl gave him money and drove all over the district campaigning for Huey. Earl also proved effective in persuading local political leaders to support Huey. Earl provided similar assistance when Huey ran unsuccessfully for governor in 1923. Four years later, Earl helped Huey win the governorship; once again, he provided financial support and stumped the state for Huey. Huey named Earl attorney for the inheritance tax collector, one of the most lucrative state jobs, although not an influential one. Earl served as Huey's legislative liaison and organized Long machines in parishes. Although Huey was brighter and quicker than Earl, Earl was better with people. When the lower house of the state legislature impeached Huey in 1929, Earl played a key role in helping to avoid a trial in the state senate.

In the election of 1931, Earl wanted to run for lieutenant governor on Huey's ticket, but Huey, who had already been elected to the U.S. Senate, would not allow it. Earl defiantly ran as an independent but finished a distant third. The episode resulted in a split between the brothers that lasted for three years, during which time Earl publicly campaigned for Huey's opponents and testified against his brother at a Senate hearing investigating voting fraud in Louisiana. The brothers reconciled in 1934, the year before Huey was assassinated.

Earl Long ran for lieutenant governor on the Long machine's ticket in 1936. The gubernatorial candidate was Richard W. Leche. Leche and Long won, and Earl once again functioned as the administration's legislative liaison. Long also helped mend relations with the administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt; these relations had ruptured under the stress of Huey's aspirations for the presidency and his demagogic attacks on Roosevelt. Although Earl engaged in bribery and took graft, he managed to keep a distance from the wholesale corruption of Leche's administration. Revelations about the corruption of the administration led to the governor's resignation in June 1939, and Long served as governor for the remaining 11 months of Leche's term. Long ran for the governor's office in his own right in 1940, but the scandals associated with the Long machine led to his defeat by Sam H. Jones, an anti-Long reformer. Four years later, Earl ran for lieutenant governor and lost, a defeat that seemed to end his political career.

In 1948, however, Long again squared off against Jones for the governorship. He pledged to “share the wealth” without raising taxes, to increase welfare benefits, to provide hot lunches for schoolchildren, and to raise teachers’ salaries. He won the support of organized labor and defeated Jones in a runoff primary. As governor, he raised taxes for rich and poor alike. He used the revenue to pay for large increases in state spending for old-age pensions, schools, hospitals, roads, bridges, mental asylums, and other benefits. He also equalized pay for black and white schoolteachers and, under the threat of lawsuits by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), expanded black voter registration. Although his programs were popular, Long’s reversion to the machine-style politics of his brother cost him public support. He abolished the state civil service and fired hundreds of state employees. He attempted to gain control over the state universities and to reduce the municipal independence of the city of New Orleans. Under Long, mobsters like FRANK COSTELLO and Carlos Marcello expanded their illegal enterprises, including gambling and vice, all over southern Louisiana. Unable constitutionally to succeed himself as governor, Long supported a district judge, Carlos Spaht, for governor in 1952. Public revulsion at the excesses of the Long administration, however, led to the election of an anti-Long reform candidate, ROBERT F. KENNON.

Long had always taken a moderate position (at least for a southern governor) on racial issues. After the Supreme Court declared segregated public schools unconstitutional in May 1954, however, Long publicly proclaimed himself “1,000 percent” for segregation. Nevertheless, he ran for the governor’s office in 1956 as a racial moderate. His campaign emphasized economic issues, and he denounced politicians who used race to avoid or confuse other matters. After winning the first primary outright against four opponents and then the general election, he once again assumed the governor’s office.

Long accomplished less in his second administration than he had in his first. He did force a tax increase through the legislature in 1958, and the legislature repealed the state’s right-to-work-law for nonagricultural workers. Race, however, dominated Long’s second term as governor.

Long attempted to avoid taking a firm stand on desegregation. He recommended no legislation to enforce white supremacy and warned against passing “a lot of segregation bills—even though I would favor them” on the ground that the Supreme Court would strike them down. On the other hand, he signed the anti-integration bills sent to him by the legislature. Like Gov. JAMES E. FOLSOM of Alabama, Long refused to join other southern governors in denouncing the Supreme Court’s ruling. Unlike Folsom, however, Long did not oppose massive resistance.

A little-known state senator named William E. Rainach emerged as the leader of massive resistance in Louisiana. The president of the segregationist Citizens’ Councils, Rainach became chair of the Joint Legislative Committee to Maintain Segregation. The Citizens’ Councils made use of a provision in Louisiana’s constitution that permitted citizens to challenge “illegally” registered voters and purged 31,000 black voters from the voting rolls. Long had not opposed Rainach, the Committee to Maintain Segregation, or the Citizens’ Councils so long as they confined their activities to passing segregation laws. Long drew the line, however, at disfranchising voters who normally cast their ballots for the Longs. “If those colored people helped build this country, if they could fight in its army, then I’m for giving them the vote,” stated Long. Further, he asserted that “a candidate should go after every vote he can get.” In September 1958, Rainach attempted to purge black voters from the registration rolls in Long’s home parish, an action the governor denounced as partisan. When the legislature met in 1959, Rainach and the Committee to Maintain Segregation supported legislation to further restrict voting rolls; Long countered with a bill to protect registered voters.

At the height of this confrontation, in May 1959, Long suffered a breakdown. Long and his wife of 26 years separated in late 1958, and Long went on a series of sprees during the first five months of 1959. He drank excessively and conducted highly publicized affairs with Blaze Starr and other strippers. In May 1959, Long put forward a scheme that would have allowed him to retain power, despite the prohibition against a governor serving two consecutive terms. He proposed to resign in favor of the lieutenant governor while he ran for reelection. This came at the same time the state senate rejected his measure to protect registered voters from purges. In a televised address to a joint legislative session, he lost control. He denounced the legislature in the most abusive language; he cursed and shouted. Long entered the John Sealy Clinic in Galveston, Tex., and then Southeast Louisiana Hospital in Mandeville, where he was treated for paranoid schizophrenia. More likely, he suffered from manic depression. After his release from the hospital, he took off on a wild vacation that took him to several western states and to Mexico.

By 1960, the race issue cut into Long's base of support in northern Louisiana. He ran for lieutenant governor on a ticket headed by James A. Noe, a former governor. Noe and Long lost the primary in December 1959. At the same time, however, Long finished ahead of the incumbent, Harold McSween, in a primary race for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives. In spite of his continuing erratic behavior (in April 1960, for example, he walked out of a luncheon given for the president of France, Charles de Gaulle, in New Orleans), Long defeated McSween in a runoff primary in August 1960. On the day of his victory, Long suffered a massive heart attack. He died in Alexandria, La., on September 5, 1960.

—MSM

Long, Russell B(illiu) (1918–2003) U.S. senator

The eldest son of Huey Long, the governor of Louisiana and U.S. senator whose political machine dominated Louisiana from the late 1920s to the mid-1930s, Russell Long was born in Shreveport, La., on November 3, 1918. He received a B.A. from Louisiana State University in 1941 and an LL.B. from its law school in 1942. The same year he graduated from law school, he was admitted to the bar. He served in the U.S. naval reserve from June 1942 until his discharge as a lieutenant in December 1945. Upon his discharge from the service, he began to practice law in Baton Rouge. In 1948, Long helped his uncle, EARL LONG win the Democratic gubernatorial nomination. Later that year, he ran for a seat in the U.S. Senate left vacant by the death of John H. Overton and narrowly defeated an anti-Long candidate, ROBERT F. KENNON, in the Democratic primary. In November, he won the general election to fill the last two years of Overton's unexpired term. Long won election to a full term in 1950. He would go on to win reelection in 1956, 1962, 1968, 1974, and 1980.

A moderate southern senator, Long exercised his greatest influence as a member of the Senate Finance Committee, on which he began serving in 1953. He consistently sought to expand Social Security. In 1954, he unsuccessfully proposed, against the wishes of the Eisenhower administration, an amendment that would have increased Old Age and Survivors Insurance benefits without cutting the public assistance checks of beneficiaries. Two years later, Long criticized the Finance Committee for eliminating disability payments to workers who became disabled after age 50. In 1958, Long made an unsuccessful attempt to increase public assistance payments to the aged, blind, and disabled.

In 1954, Long unsuccessfully opposed Eisenhower's proposed cut in dividend income taxes. Instead, he supported an amendment by Sen. WALTER F. GEORGE (D-Ga.) that would have replaced it with an increased personal exemption. The next year, Long supported a Democratic effort to grant a $20 tax credit to all persons. That, too, failed to pass.

While greatly admiring his father, Long acknowledged some differences in their approach to politics. "He wanted to tax it away from those who had it," Long once said of his father, but the younger Long maintained that "I wouldn't keep anybody rich from getting richer." Long generally supported tax cuts for business, and he staunchly supported the natural gas, oil, sulfur, and sugar interests that loomed so large in Louisiana's economy. In 1955, he unsuccessfully attempted to persuade the Senate to give domestic sugar producers a larger share of the expanding American market at the expense of Cuban producers. He obtained passage of a similar measure the following year.

In 1956, Long supported a controversial measure to exempt independent producers of natural gas from federal rate controls. Although Eisenhower was favorably inclined toward the bill, he vetoed the measure after the revelation of improper lobbying activities by representatives of the natural gas industry. Two years later, Long cosponsored a compromise proposal that would have exempted only smaller independent producers from federal regulation, but it did not reach the Senate floor.

In 1957, Long opposed an attempt to reduce the 27.5 percent oil depletion allowance for large oil companies while retaining the rate for smaller operators. He argued that the measure would give advantages to small, but personally wealthy, independent producers while harming the small, low-income investor in the larger companies.

A critic of foreign aid, Long annually attempted to cut funds for foreign-assistance programs. In 1955, he asked, "Why do we insist on treating foreigners better than we treat Americans?" He believed that any treaty entered into by the United States should exact equal obligations from the other countries. On that basis, Long voted against the Korean Mutual Defense Treaty of 1954 and the renegotiated Japanese Mutual Defense Treaty of 1960.

When HUBERT H. HUMPHREY became vice president in January 1965, Long was chosen majority whip. The following year, he assumed the chair of the Finance Committee, which he held until Republicans took control of the Senate in 1981. Long mastered the rules of the Senate and, in spite of a halting manner of speech, was an effective debater. However, his heavy drinking in the 1950s and 1960s made him less than dependable, and he annoyed many of his colleagues with his willingness to delay the business of the Senate. In the 1960s, he opposed what he called "forced integration" and voted against the Civil Rights Act of 1964. He later claimed that he voted with the southern bloc only because it would have cost him his seat not to do so. In 1969, he lost his post as whip to Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Long tended to adopt an aggressive approach to foreign policy. When Brazil seized a subsidiary of International Telephone and Telegraph in 1962, Long sponsored legislation halting aid to any country that seized American property. He opposed the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty and strongly supported the landing of American troops in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, in 1965 and the American involvement in Vietnam.

Long did not seek reelection in 1986 and took up the practice of law in Washington, D.C., and Baton Rouge. He resided primarily in Washington, where he died of an apparent heart attack on May 9, 2003.

—MSM

Lovestone, Jay

(1898–1990) director, Free Trade Union Committee

Born to Jewish parents in Lithuania on December 24, 1898, Jacob Liebstien immigrated to the United States with his parents in 1907. The family settled in New York, and Liebstien changed his name to Jay Lovestone. He attended City College, from which he graduated in 1918. While there, he became active in the Socialist Party. After graduating from college, he was a delegate to the founding convention of the American Communist Party, which split from the Socialist Party in 1919, and quickly emerged as a major figure in the new party. He edited the party's theoretical journal, The Communist, in 1921 and worked in the party's underground apparatus during the early 1920s. Upon the death of the party's general secretary, Charles Ruthenberg, in 1927, Lovestone succeeded him. During the struggle for succession in the Soviet Union after Lenin's death, factions emerged within the Communist Party USA (CPUSA) loyal to competing Soviet leaders. Lovestone led a faction that supported Nikolay Bukharin and, on orders from Moscow, led a purge of the American followers of Leon Trotsky. At that time, Lovestone also argued for a revision of Marxist-Leninist theory regarding the United States. He predicted that capitalism in the United States was securely ensconced and would continue to expand for a long period. Because of this special circumstance, he maintained, the struggle against capitalism could not successfully follow traditional Marxist-Leninist strategies. Rather, he concluded, communists in the United States should advocate nonrevolutionary policies. This doctrine would later become known as "American exceptionalism."

After Bukharin fell from power, a delegation from the Comintern asked Lovestone to step down as party secretary in favor of William Z. Foster, a supporter of Joseph Stalin. Lovestone declined to surrender his leadership and went to Moscow to argue his case. After a confrontational meeting with Stalin, he returned to the United States, only to be expelled from the party. Lovestone and a small group of followers established a new party that they somewhat optimistically named Communist Party (Majority). Given that the party never numbered more than a few hundred members, it soon changed its name to Communist Party (Opposition). Later, the CP(O) became the Independent Communist Labor League and, in 1938, the Independent Labor League of America. The party published a journal, Revolutionary Age, which later became Workers' Age. The group was popularly known as the Lovestoneites.

After his expulsion, Lovestone formed an alliance with DAVID DUBINSKY, the anticommunist president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union (ILGWU). Following an unsuccessful attempt to take over the United Auto Workers in 1938, Lovestone's politics began to change. Outraged at the execution of Bukharin, he moved away from communism and worked more closely with Dubinsky in the American Federation of Labor (AFL). Lovestone disbanded the Independent Labor League in 1940. When World War II broke out in Europe, he supported American intervention and became head of the Committee to Defend America, which sought to mobilize support for Great Britain and its allies. He also worked for an effort by the ILGWU's international affairs program to help labor leaders escape from countries occupied by the Axis powers.

Dubinsky appointed Lovestone director of the ILGWU's International Affairs Department in 1943. The following year, Lovestone became director of the AFL's Free Trade Union Committee (FTUC), which attempted to rebuild labor movements in Europe and Japan. The FTUC worked with noncommunist labor unions in other countries to prevent communists from gaining influence in labor movements. His activities brought him into contact with James Jesus Angleton, the counterintelligence chief of the CIA.

After the war, Lovestone used money from American trade unions and the CIA to build anti-communist labor organizations throughout the world. He worked behind the scenes to help create the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), which was established to counter the influence of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), in which both communist and noncommunist unions, including the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), cooperated. Lovestone served as director of the ICFTU from its inception in 1949 until 1963.

During the 1950s, Lovestone shifted his attention from Western Europe to Latin America. With continued assistance from the CIA, the FTUC worked through the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) to train pro-U.S. labor leaders in Central and South America. Lovestone later admitted that many of these engaged in intelligence work for Washington. Unionists trained by ORIT took part in the "liberation army" of Col. Carlos Castillo Armas, which overthrew Guatemala's president, Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, in June 1954. After the overthrow of Arbenz, Serafino Romualdi, head of the AFL's Latin America committee, went to Guatemala to help reorganize the country's labor movement and eliminate communist influence from it.

Lovestone's policy toward Cuba was more ambivalent. He protested Fulgencio Batista's coup d'état in 1952 but refrained from criticizing the regime too harshly so long as Batista allowed the Cuban Confederation of Labor (CTC) to function legally. When the collapse of Batista's government seemed inevitable, however, the AFL's FTUC approached Fidel Castro, offering support in exchange for a guarantee that the CTC would be permitted to operate in the event Castro took power. Castro rejected the offer, and, after he seized power, the AFL-CIO denounced him for turning Cuba into an outpost of Soviet communism.

Lovestone's intransigent anticommunism and his ties with the government aroused increasing controversy within the American labor movement. Although the FTUC supported North African unionists fighting French colonialism and denounced apartheid in South Africa, Lovestone generally subordinated questions of democracy and national independence to what he regarded as the overriding need to oppose communist expansion. A member of the Committee of One Million against the Admission of Communist China to the UN and of the Council against Communist Aggression (both of which supported Chiang Kai-shek [Jiang Jieshi]), Lovestone opposed any steps towards an accord with the communist world. As a result, AFL representatives in the ICFTU found themselves increasingly at odds during the 1950s with Western European socialist labor leaders, who favored a relaxation of cold war tensions. WALTER REUTHER and other leaders of the CIO grew increasingly critical of Lovestone. At their insistence, the FTUC was officially disaffiliated from the merged AFL-CIO in 1955. With GEORGE MEANY's support, however, Lovestone maintained control of foreign labor operations, and Lovestone continued as Meany's chief adviser on foreign affairs.

Lovestone played a leading role in the creation of the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) in 1961. The organization was designed to counter communist influence in Latin America, particularly in the aftermath of the Cuban revolution. It sponsored various programs to train Latin American labor leaders and to plan union housing projects, banks, and other projects.

In 1963, Lovestone became director of the AFL-CIO's International Affairs Department, through which millions of dollars from the CIA were channeled to anticommunist activities internationally, particularly in Latin America. Lovestone used his position to build regional anticommunist labor federations. He attempted to rally support within the AFL-CIO for the war in Vietnam and against President RICHARD NIXON's policy of détente in the 1970s. In addition, he brought the leadership of the AFL-CIO together with military, corporate, and political figures to form the Committee on the Present Danger in the mid-1970s to advocate increased military spending. Lovestone continued as director of the International Affairs Department until his retirement in 1974, after which he continued to work as a consultant to the AFL-CIO and to the garment workers. He died in New York City on March 8, 1990.

—MSM

Luce, Clare Boothe

(1903–1987) ambassador to Italy

The daughter of a pit-orchestra violinist (and sometime businessman) and a dancer, Ann Clare Boothe was born in New York City on April 10, 1903. Her parents separated when she was eight, and she lived with her mother in genteel poverty. Raised in Chicago and Memphis, she attended several private schools, including Miss Mason's School in Tarrytown, N.Y., from which she graduated in 1919. Boothe then became a student at Clare Tree Major's School of the Theatre in Manhattan. In 1923, she married George T. Brokaw, a millionaire son of a clothing manufacturer. The marriage ended in divorce six years later, and Boothe resumed her maiden name. Boothe joined the staff of Vogue as an editorial assistant in 1930. A year later, she became an associate editor of the magazine. In addition to her editorial duties, she contributed satirical sketches, which were collected and published as Stuffed Shirts in 1931. She was promoted to managing editor of Vanity Fair in 1933. The following year she resigned from the magazine to write a newspaper column and to work on her first play.

Her debut as a playwright, Abide with Me, opened on Broadway in November 1935 to overwhelmingly negative reviews. That same month, she married HENRY R. LUCE, an editor and publisher who had founded Time and Fortune. He would go on to create Life (which was rumored to be his wife's suggestion) and Sports Illustrated. The Broadway production of Clare Luce's second play, The Women, opened in December 1936. Although critics panned this effort, too, audiences loved it. The play ran for 657 performances, went on tour, and was made into a motion picture. This satire about wealthy, idle wives and divorcees, which the New York Times would later describe as "the apotheosis of feminine bitchiness," involved a devoted wife whose husband had been lured away by a saleswoman. Luce's next play, Kiss the Boys Goodbye (1938), which she characterized as a political allegory about American fascism, was a satire on the widely publicized search for an actress to play Scarlett O'Hara in the film version of Gone with the Wind. Her next play, Margin for Error (1939), concerned the murder of a Nazi agent and was a combination of comedy and melodrama.

With the outbreak of World War II in Europe, Luce turned her attention to public affairs. In the spring of 1940, she traveled around Europe as a correspondent for Life; her observations were published as a book, Europe in the Spring (1940). In the summer of 1940, she became active in Republican politics and supported Wendell Wilkie for the presidency. Campaigning for Wilkie in the general election, she criticized President Franklin D. Roosevelt for failing to prepare the country for war. In 1941 she toured China with her husband and reported for Life on that country's war with Japan. After the United States entered the war, Luce toured Africa, India, China, and Burma for Life in early 1942.

Dwight D. Eisenhower talks with Clare Boothe Luce. (Library of Congress)

Luce ran for a seat in the House of Representatives from Connecticut's fourth district in 1942. Campaigning on the claim that Roosevelt led the nation into war unprepared, she defeated six opponents in the Republican primary and the Democratic candidate in the general election. Her initial speech in the House attacked Vice President Henry Wallace's proposal for postwar freedom of the air, which Luce described as "globaloney." The speech was warmly received by conservatives and isolationists, and she received an appointment to the Military Affairs Committee. Throughout her two terms, Luce was a consistent and forceful advocate for American servicemen and raised important issues regarding their eventual return to civilian life. Although she frequently attacked the Roosevelt administration's foreign policy, she generally voted to support it. In 1944, she gave the keynote address at the Republican National Convention and won a second term in Congress. After visiting American troops in Italy over Christmas 1944, she returned to Congress urging aid for Italian war victims. Despite her own flirtation with communism in the 1930s, she warned early on against what she perceived to be a communist threat. In 1945, she began speaking about the danger of communism, particularly the threat it posed to China, and what she regarded as the weak position Roosevelt and HARRY S. TRUMAN had taken with respect to that threat. She warned that the failure of the United States to be "firm, precise, and clear in our foreign policy . . . will result in an increasing drift towards world catastrophe." After the death of her 19-year-old daughter in an automobile accident in 1944, Luce found solace in discussions with the Rev. FULTON SHEEN, which led to her conversion to Catholicism in 1946. Not long after her widely publicized conversion, she announced that she would not seek reelection.

In 1947, Luce wrote a series of articles on her conversion for McCall's magazine. Her screenplay for Come to the Stable was nominated for an Academy Award in 1949, and two years later, she wrote another play, Child of the Morning. She also edited a collection of essays about saints, titled Saints for Now published in 1952.

In the spring of 1952, Luce declared her support of the candidacy of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. She also made an unsuccessful bid for the Republican nomination for a seat in the U.S. Senate from Connecticut. Luce campaigned hard for Eisenhower in the general election; she made almost 50 speeches on radio and television.

In February 1953, Eisenhower named her ambassador to Italy. After confirmation by the Senate in March, she moved to Rome. Luce arrived in Italy during a period of strained relations between the two countries.

In the postwar years, the United States had exerted economic and political pressure to prevent Italy's communist party from gaining control of the government. In 1953, the U.S.-backed government of Premier Alcide de Gaspari faced an election in which it appeared that his Christian Democratic Party would lose its majority. Believing that the only way to save Italy from a communist takeover was to maintain de Gaspari, Luce did everything in her power to ensure his victory. Just before the election, she saw to it that de Gaspari appeared on Time's cover. The accompanying article extolled him as a bulwark of Italian religion and morality and denounced Italian communists as wolves slashing at "the shaky legged colt of Italian democracy." Luce also made a speech suggesting that, if de Gaspari lost, it would have grave consequences for Italian-American relations. Despite her efforts, which some Italian politicians denounced as open meddling, de Gaspari's government fell two months after the election.

Luce's concern over communist influence in the Italian labor movement prompted her in 1954 to protest the American decision to purchase material for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's defense needs from foreign suppliers. The policy was designed to help restore the industrial capacity of America's allies, but Luce warned that it had the effect of aiding communist unions. She threatened to resign unless the United States canceled such contracts with plants at which communist unions were in control. Eisenhower and Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES gave her substantial latitude in dealing with the matter. Luce threatened to cut off U.S. government contracts with Fiat, Italy's largest manufacturer, and, as a result, the communists lost control of the company's union in the spring of 1955.

One of her most significant contributions as ambassador was the role she played in resolving the dispute, dating back to the end of World War II, between Italy and Yugoslavia over control of Trieste. Luce pressed for a resolution of the dispute, arguing that it provided the strongest issue for the Italian communist party, and supported the idea that a conference between Italy and Yugoslavia be held in a neutral country. Negotiations took place in London in 1953 and recommenced in the spring of 1954. By August, however, they had bogged down; Yugoslavia's Marshal Josip Tito insisted on more than the Italians, backed by the British and American representatives, were prepared to grant. The Eisenhower administration became convinced that Tito's hard line was motivated, at least in part, by a desire to draw domestic attention away from his country's poor harvest. Thus, the United States offered Yugoslavia wheat, but not directly as a quid pro quo in exchange for concessions at the negotiating table. The strategy contributed to a settlement, and the dispute over Trieste was formally settled in October 1954. Italy got the city of Trieste and the surrounding territory, in exchange for which Yugoslavia received territorial concessions.

Luce resigned her post in 1956, citing ill health. She had been afflicted with a mysterious illness that turned out to be arsenic poisoning caused by flakes of paint falling from the ceiling of her residence.

Eisenhower nominated Luce to be ambassador to Brazil in February 1959, but the nomination ran into fierce opposition from Sen. WAYNE MORSE (D-Oreg.), who objected to her views on Roosevelt's policies during World War II and to what he regarded as her meddling in Italian domestic politics. Luce nonetheless won the approval of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and overwhelming confirmation by the full Senate, but Morse continued his attacks. Luce retaliated with the observation that her difficulties with Morse went "back some years," to when the senator "was kicked in the head by a horse." In fact, Morse had been kicked by a horse, but not in the head. Her comments created a furor, during which Eisenhower defended her but her husband publicly urged her to resign because the conflict had made it impossible for her to function effectively. Heeding her husband's wishes, she resigned three days after her confirmation.

Luce then resumed her career as a writer and continued to play an active role in Republican politics. In the early 1960s, she moved more towards the conservative wing of the party. She supported Sen. BARRY GOLDWATER of Arizona for the top spot on the Republican ticket in 1964 and seconded his nomination at the Republican National Convention. Later that summer, she declared her own candidacy for a seat in the U.S. Senate from New York on the Conservative Party ticket. On the eve of the Conservative Party's convention, at the urging of both liberal Republicans and Goldwater, she withdrew from the contest. Her husband retired that same year, and they withdrew to a home they owned in Phoenix, where she devoted herself largely to social life. After her husband's death in 1967, she moved to Honolulu, where she lived until 1983. There, she continued to write articles and went back to writing plays. However, her return to the theater, Slam the Door Softly (1970), attracted little attention. She served as a member of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board from 1973 to 1977 and again from 1982 to 1987. She moved to Washington, taking an apartment at the Watergate complex, in 1983. She lived there until she died at home on October 9, 1987.

—MSM

Luce, Henry R(obinson)

(1898–1967) journalist

The son of a Presbyterian missionary, Luce was born in Tengchow (Dengzhou), China, on April 3, 1898. Raised in China, where he learned to speak Chinese before he spoke English, he was educated in Chefoo (a British public school), the Hotchkiss School, and Yale University. At Yale, he helped to edit the Daily News and was an enthusiastic supporter of U.S. entry into World War I. He served in the Reserve Officers Training Corps at Yale, went to boot camp near Columbia, S.C., and received his commission as a second lieutenant in the army late in 1918. The armistice was signed before he could get to Europe, so he returned to Yale, where he graduated in 1920. He studied briefly at Oxford and, upon his return to the United States, took a job as a reporter for the Chicago Daily News. In 1923, with Briton Hadden, a friend from Hotchkiss, Yale, and the army, Luce launched a weekly news magazine they called Time. As the enterprise got underway, Luce ran the business affairs and Hadden handled editorial matters. After a somewhat rocky start, the magazine attracted a growing readership. Part of the new magazine's success was that it offered straightforward (some said simplistic) explanations of events in a fast-paced, complicated, and increasingly interconnected world. The magazine was irreverent, clever, and, above all, readable. Moreover, Time shared the values of its largely educated, middle-class readership.

When Hadden died in 1929, Luce took over the editorial duties as well. In 1930, Luce launched a new magazine, Fortune, aimed at businesspeople. It, too, was a success. Luce and his first wife got a divorce in 1935, and, that same year, he married CLARE BOOTHE, an editor and playwright. Time Inc., as Luce named his expanding business ventures, began producing newsreels called "The March of Time" in 1935. Innovative and well-produced, the series was an instant success. In late 1936, Luce bought out the first issue of a new picture magazine, Life, which was also an immediate success.

Luce rejected journalistic objectivity, and his magazines intended to persuade, as well as to inform, their readers. During the 1930s, Luce's publications attacked the New Deal for its spending and its restrictions on free enterprise. Luce threw himself and his magazines behind China's attempts to resist the Japanese invasion. In addition to using his media empire to publicize Japanese atrocities, Luce organized United China Relief (1941–46), which raised millions of dollars for the government of Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi). Although China held a special interest for him, Luce, as the 1930s went on, became increasingly concerned about the rise of Hitler's Germany. As much as he disliked and distrusted Roosevelt, Luce supported the president's moves to aid the Allies and to rearm the United States. In domestic matters, Luce played a central role in promoting the presidential candidacy of Wendell L. Wilkie, who became the Republican nominee in 1940.

In February 1941, Luce published an editorial in Life titled "The American Century," in which he argued that the United States should assume its rightful place as the dominant power in the world. The country already exercised enormous economic and cultural influence; it should face up to the reality of its place in world politics. With that power, he argued, came the responsibility to "exert upon the world the full impact of our influence, for such purposes as we see fit and by such means as we see fit." Luce urged that the United States enter the war and, upon an Allied victory, use its power to build a free, peaceful, and orderly world.

The threat of communism and the need to meet that threat aggressively, particularly in Asia, emerged as a central concern for Luce. As World War II progressed, Luce became an increasingly strident advocate of Chiang; the publisher also evinced growing concerns about the America's wartime ally, the Soviet Union. During the postwar years, Luce and his publications continued to promote Chiang and to urge the containment of communism in both Europe and Asia. He refused to blame the failures of the Nationalist Chinese on Chiang and instead charged that liberals and communist sympathizers had given bad advice to the American government. Luce and Time were early critics of Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), but both the publisher and his publications made charges similar to those put forward by the junior senator from Wisconsin against many of McCarthy's targets in the Truman administration.

Luce backed DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the Republican presidential nomination in 1952 and used his magazines to advance the general's candidacy, first for the nomination and then for the presidency. When Eisenhower defeated Sen. ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio) for the nomination, some of Taft's supporters blamed Luce and his publications. In its coverage of the general election, Time presented Eisenhower as a smiling, earnest candidate and portrayed his opponent, ADLAI STEVENSON, in a much less favorable light. Similarly, Stevenson's running mate, JOHN SPARKMAN, received hostile treatment, while the Republican vice presidential nominee, RICHARD M. NIXON, got favorable coverage, even after the revelation of his private political fund.

After Eisenhower won the election, Luce had high hopes in particular for the new secretary of state, JOHN FOSTER DULLES, whom he had promoted through his media empire since the mid-1940s. The publisher expected Dulles to initiate a policy of rolling back communism in eastern Europe and Asia. Instead, Luce was disappointed when the new administration continued the policy of containment. He nevertheless muted his public criticism of Eisenhower and Dulles.

Luce worried about the expansion of communism everywhere, but his greatest concern lay in Asia. Thus, he urged that the United States take a strong stand in Indochina, where communist insurgents threatened French colonial rule. During the siege of the French garrison at Dien Bien Phu, Luce advocated direct American intervention. After the administration did not intervene, Luce supported the decision to prevent Vietnamese elections, which would likely have brought the communists into power, and an expanded American role in the region.

Luce also supported the administration's "New Look" defense policy, which relied on air power, technology, and the nuclear deterrent to contain the Soviet Union. On the other hand, he remained suspicious of Eisenhower's attempts to reach some sort of accord with the Soviets. The publisher opposed any thaw in the cold war. When the Soviet premier, Nikita Khrushchev, visited the United States in 1959, Luce's publications took every opportunity to remind the public of Khrushchev's phrase, "We will bury you."

In 1959, rioting broke out in Bolivia after an incendiary article in Time quoted an official at the U.S. embassy in that country to the effect that the United States had spent $129 million without notable results. Further, according to the story, the official stated that the only way to solve Bolivia's problems was to abolish the country and divide it and its problems among its neighbors.

Luce's publishing empire flourished in the 1950s. He had a remarkable eye for editorial talent and paid well enough to attract it. By the end of the decade, Life sold 6 million copies a week and Time sold 2 million copies. In addition, Luce launched a new publication, Sports Illustrated, in 1954, and the weekly sports magazine was an immediate success. He exercised enormous influence. Foreign leaders sought him out and, in his many travels abroad, Luce received treatment usually accorded only to a visiting statesman.

Despite his earlier support for Richard Nixon, Luce and his publications initially declined to back either candidate during the election of 1960, at least in part because of Luce's friendship with Joseph P. Kennedy, the father of the Democratic candidate, JOHN F. KENNEDY. Luce announced that he would carefully examine each candidate's stand against communism as a primary factor in considering an endorsement. In October, Life came out for Nixon, but the publications of Time Inc. covered the elections in an uncharacteristically balanced manner.

In the 1960s, Luce continued to campaign against communism. He praised Kennedy's handling of the Cuban missile crisis and advocated American support for South Vietnam and the regime of Ngo Dinh Diem. Luce retired as editor in chief at Time in April 1964, but continued to exercise editorial control over his magazines as editorial chairman. Luce supported LYNDON B. JOHNSON for the presidency in 1964 and remained firm in his support for the American effort in Vietnam, even after it became apparent that Johnson's escalation of the conflict was not winning the war. Television and its nightly news reports weakened the appeal of Life; visual images of news events and far away places became more common. Nevertheless, Luce's publishing empire remained highly profitable. He died in Phoenix, Ariz., on February 28, 1967.

—MSM

Lucy, Autherine J(uanita)

(1929–) school desegregation figure

The youngest of nine children, Lucy was born on October 5, 1929, on her parents' farm near Shiloh, Ala. She attended public schools in Shiloh and graduated from Linden Academy in 1947. She attended Selma University in Selma, Ala., and Miles College, a church-supported black school in Fairfield, Ala., from which she graduated with a B.A. in English in 1952. She then decided to go to graduate school at the University of Alabama to get a degree in library science. After initially accepting her, the university denied her admission and urged her to seek admission to Alabama State College (for Negroes) in Montgomery. She turned to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) for help. The NAACP legal team, led by THURGOOD MARSHALL, filed suit in July 1953. On June 29, 1955, a federal district court ruled in Lucy's favor. The judge, H. Hobart Grooms, found that Lucy had been "denied admission to the University of Alabama solely on account of [her] race and color." The court issued an injunction against officials at the university from denying her the right to enroll based on her color.

Officials of the University of Alabama appealed Grooms's decision, not so much because they believed that they would win, but to demonstrate that they were doing everything possible to keep the university segregated. On October 10, 1955, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld Grooms's decision, calling it "well considered."

Although it admitted her as a student beginning with the second semester, the university prohibited Lucy from staying in the dormitories or using any of the dining facilities. On February 2, 1956, the night before classes began, students held protest rallies, and a cross was burned on the front lawn of the dean of students. The following day, Lucy attended her first classes, where she sat in a row occupied by no other students. On February 6, a mob of perhaps 1,000 people, composed of students, townspeople, and even people from outside the state, pelted Lucy with eggs and tried to block her way. Two deans escorted her, but by noon the crowd was out of control. University officials arranged for a highway patrol car to remove her from the campus and asked

Gov. JAMES E. FOLSOM to send the National Guard. Folsom declined and observed that "it is normal for all races not to be overly fond of each other." "We are not," he reassured the public, "excited." That evening, the university suspended Lucy, ostensibly for her own safety. Leonard Wilson, a leader of the mob, was expelled. The university took no other action against the rioters.

On February 9, lawyers for the NAACP filed a contempt of court action against the university, in which they accused administrators of failing to prevent the mob and conspiring with the mob to defy the court's injunction. The president of the university denounced the charge as "untrue, unwarranted, and outrageous." At a court hearing later in the month, Marshall withdrew the conspiracy charge, stating that a careful investigation had failed to substantiate it. On February 29, Judge Grooms dismissed the contempt action but ruled that the university had to reinstate Lucy. That evening, the board of trustees expelled Lucy on disciplinary grounds for having made "false and baseless" accusations against officials of the university.

Throughout the crisis, Lucy stayed with relatives in Birmingham, where she received numerous threatening phone calls. On March 1, she flew to New York City for rest and medical attention. Eight days later, her attorneys went to court to challenge the university's expulsion order. On January 18, 1957, Judge Grooms refused to overturn the trustees' action in expelling Lucy. That decision, he held, was based on disciplinary grounds and not on her race. In the meantime, Lucy had married a college sweetheart, the Reverend Hugh Foster, and moved to Texas. She ended her fight to gain admission to the University of Alabama.

The crisis at the University of Alabama attracted national publicity, and the outcome was generally perceived as a victory for pro-segregation forces. Neither state nor local officials made a serious effort to disperse or control the rioters. At a press conference on February 8, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER resisted the idea that the federal government should intervene. While publicly deploring the "defiance of law," he reminded reporters that local authorities and university officials had "not yet had an opportunity . . . to settle this thing." He said that he hoped to avoid federal action "as long as that State, from its governor on down, will do its best to straighten it out."

The Fosters lived in Texas for 17 years, where they had five children and Autherine Lucy Foster worked as a teacher. In 1974, the family moved back to Alabama, and Autherine Lucy Foster worked as a substitute teacher. Two professors at the University of Alabama invited her to speak to a class in 1988, after which several faculty members worked to get her expulsion overturned. The university's trustees officially reversed her expulsion in April 1988, and the next year she enrolled in the University of Alabama as a master's student in elementary education. She received her degree in the spring of 1992, at the same commencement ceremony in which her daughter received an undergraduate degree in corporate finance.

—MSM

MacArthur, Douglas, II

(1909–1997) counselor of the State Department; ambassador to Japan, Belgium, Austria, and Iran

The nephew of General Douglas MacArthur, Douglas MacArthur was born in Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania, on July 5, 1909. His father was a captain in the navy; his maternal grandfather was a rear admiral; and his paternal grandfather, General Arthur MacArthur, retired as the army's senior officer. Douglas MacArthur attended Milton Academy and graduated from Yale University, where he majored in history and economics, in 1932. After spending a few months in the merchant marine and more than two years as a first lieutenant in the Officers' Reserve Corps, he joined the foreign service in 1935. His first overseas assignment was vice-consul in Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada. Later in the 1930s, he held posts in Italy and France. At the outbreak of World War II, he was serving as a diplomatic secretary in Vichy, France. After France surrendered in 1940, the Germans occupied most of the country. The remnant came under control of a puppet government, headed by Marshal Philippe Pétain, that ruled from Vichy. MacArthur became third secretary to the U.S. embassy in Vichy. When the Germans occupied Vichy France in 1942, they interned MacArthur and the rest of the embassy staff until they were exchanged in 1944. MacArthur returned to the United States in March 1944 and later that year became assistant political adviser to General Dwight D. Eisenhower, the Supreme Commander of the Allied forces in Europe. After the liberation of Paris, MacArthur became head of the political section of the U.S. embassy in Paris, a post he held until 1948. After serving as first secretary in Brussels for a year, he returned to Washington in 1949 as chief of the State Department's Division of Western European Affairs. He then became deputy director of the Office of Regional Affairs. From 1951 to 1953, he was a political adviser to Eisenhower, who had become supreme commander of NATO forces.

When Eisenhower became president in January 1953, he appointed MacArthur counselor of the State Department. MacArthur attended the conference that led to the signing, in September 1954, of the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty, which created the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO). The signatories (the United States, Great Britain, France, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan, the Philippines, and Thailand) agreed to develop military capabilities adequate for their own defense and for collective security; they further agreed to consult in the event of common danger and to expand trade and technical programs. The Geneva Accords prevented the formal participation of Laos, Cambodia, and South Vietnam in SEATO, but a separate protocol stated that the allies would consider any threat to those countries as a danger to their own "peace and security." MacArthur also worked on the peace treaty with Austria.

MacArthur became ambassador to Japan in 1957. A major issue he had to deal with involved the security pact signed by Japan and the United States in 1952, which had subsequently proved unsatisfactory to both parties. To many Japanese, the pact's provision for the maintenance of American troops in Japan amounted to a virtual occupation. To some Americans, including JOHN FOSTER DULLES, the treaty, which obligated the United States to participate in the defense of Japan, seemed to downplay the need for the rearmament of Japan. Particularly in the aftermath of the Korean War, Dulles thought it urgent to rearm Japan against the threat of Communist expansion in Asia. MacArthur negotiated a new security pact, signed in January 1960. It committed both the United States and Japan to resist "the armed attack against either party in territories under the administration of Japan." It also removed specific limitations on Japanese sovereignty in the earlier treaty and provided that the United States would consult the Japanese government before making major changes in the use of American troops or bases in Japan.

Even though it redressed some Japanese grievances, the new treaty ran into opposition in Japan. Socialists and Communists vigorously opposed the treaty. Leftist-led demonstrations against the treaty in May and June 1960 led to the cancellation of a visit by President Eisenhower scheduled for the day the treaty would take effect. Initially, Prime Minister Kishi Nobusuke refused to ask Eisenhower to cancel the trip, and MacArthur urged the president to make the trip as scheduled unless Kishi asked him not to come. On June 10, TOM STEPHENS and JAMES HAGERTY, acting as an advance party for Eisenhower's trip, arrived at the airport in Tokyo, where they were met by MacArthur. On the way to the embassy, their car was surrounded by demonstrators and held for 15 minutes. The American officials had to be rescued by helicopter. Amid continuing rioting, Kishi "postponed" the invitation to Eisenhower, and, one week later, resigned as prime minister. Nevertheless, the Diet approved the treaty, and Kishi's party was returned to power in the next elections, in which the far left lost seats.

As ambassador to Belgium from 1961 to 1965, MacArthur helped to coordinate efforts to rescue foreign hostages held in the former Belgian Congo. He served as assistant secretary of state for congressional relations from 1965 to 1967 and, in 1966, was named career ambassador, the highest rank in the foreign service. MacArthur was ambassador to Austria from 1967 to 1969 and to Iran from 1969 to 1972. During his service in the latter post, Iranian extremists attempted to kidnap him.

After retiring from the State Department in 1972, MacArthur became a business consultant in the United States and Europe. He died on November 15, 1997, in Washington, D.C.

—MSM

Macdonald, Dwight

(1906–1982) writer, editor

The son of an attorney, Dwight Macdonald was born in New York City on March 24, 1906. After graduating from Phillips Exeter Academy in 1924 and Yale University in 1928, his first job was in the executive training program at Macy's. He soon got a job at Time magazine, where he wrote stories about business and finance. This led, in 1929, to a job as an associate editor of Henry Luce's new business magazine, Fortune. Macdonald would later claim that his experience on the magazine increased his revulsion with capitalism and moved his politics farther to the left. He resigned from Fortune in 1936 after editors toned down his savage attack on U.S. Steel in an article about the company. The following year, he became an editor of the Partisan Review, which Philip Rahv and William Phillips had recently moved out of the Stalinist camp. In its new incarnation, the magazine was committed to modernism in the arts and radical, but anti-Stalinist, politics. Although it had a small circulation, the magazine exercised considerable influence among intellectuals. Macdonald emerged as perhaps the most politicized of the magazine's editors. The Moscow Trials moved his politics to staunch anti-Stalinism. He became a Trotskyist and joined the Socialist Workers Party in 1938. With the Nazi-Soviet Pact and the Soviet Union's invasion of Finland, Macdonald joined a group, led by Max Schachtman, that split from the Socialist Workers Party and formed the Workers Party, which condemned the invasion of Finland. He remained with the Workers Party until 1941.

Macdonald's Marxist perspective and his growing commitment to pacifism led him to oppose World War II. This ultimately caused him, in 1943, to break with the Partisan Review, which maintained what it described as “critical support” of the Allied cause. In 1944, Macdonald founded Politics, a monthly magazine, as an outlet for his anti-Stalinist, antifascist, and anti-New Deal views. Macdonald was its owner, publisher, editor, proof-reader, and most frequent contributor. Over the years he put out Politics, Macdonald’s own politics moved toward anarchism and pacifism. He became critical of Marxist thought and rejected knee-jerk allegiance to the working class (which he found not just conservative but “rabidly nationalistic”) and to trade unions (which, he maintained, had “quite lost touch with the humane and democratic ideals” in which they had once believed). Macdonald turned his attention increasingly to questions of depersonalization in modern society and the resulting apathy of its citizenry. At the same time, he began to turn away from literary criticism and to focus his attention on popular culture. Contributions from Albert Camus, Simone Weil, Bruno Bettelheim, Marianne Moore, Mary McCarthy, C. WRIGHT MILLS, and Paul Goodman (not to mention Macdonald’s own wry and stylish pieces) made Politics, which became a quarterly in 1947, one of the best journals on the left. Money troubles, the desire to devote more time to his own writing, and the cold war (which made it difficult even for so bumptious a radical as Macdonald to withhold his allegiance from the West) all contributed to Macdonald’s decision to close down Politics in 1949.

Macdonald threw in with the West only reluctantly. He pointed out similarities between the United States and the Soviet Union: both pursued imperialist foreign policies in the name of which they suppressed indigenous revolutionary movements, and both created societies “where the few have too much and the many too little.” For Macdonald, however, there were distinctions. The United States may have used its economic might to dominate western Europe, but the Soviets took the Baltic states by brute force. If Americans failed to appreciate their civil liberties, Soviet citizens had none. Macdonald, therefore, gave his “critical” support to the “imperfect” West as the “lesser evil.” Despite his reservations about the West, at some point in the 1950s, he moved from anti-Stalinism to anticommunism.

By the early 1950s, Macdonald had abandoned sectarian politics and turned to cultural criticism. His main objection to totalitarianism was its “censorship . . . [and use of] exile and imprisonment to punish dissident thought.” The result, he concluded, was a culture more tasteless and sterile than the worst of Hollywood, television, or pulp fiction. Yet he warned that the pressures of the cold war had transformed the United States and other Western countries into more rigidly managed and hierarchical societies. Alarmed by the dominance of “vast superstates” that managed their societies through elaborate bureaucracies, Macdonald found an antidote in individuals and the idea that individuals must, at least at times, deny the state their cooperation. Therefore, his writing turned to what he described as the “small” questions: “What is a good life? How do people really live and feel and think in their everyday lives? What are the most important human needs? How can they be satisfied best here and now? Who am I? How can I live lovingly, truthfully, pleasurably?” The true calling of a radical intellectual should therefore, according to Macdonald, involve an analysis of matters relating to work, family, sex, and art.

For Macdonald, the decline of a traditional elite that dominated not just politics but culture and the arts and the parallel rise of an urban bourgeoisie with its own conception of cultural entertainment, while “desirable politically,” brought “unfortunate results culturally.” This combined with technological developments that made possible the inexpensive production and distribution of cultural products (books, magazines, reproductions of images, phonographs, movies, radio, television) to create mass culture. A consequence was the emergence of “middlebrow” culture, which Macdonald campaigned against unceasingly. Culture, he argued, had become another form of ostentatious consumption and display. He railed against pretensions of coffee table books, the Book-of-the-Month Club, Thornton Wilder’s play Our Town, magazines such as Harper’s and the Saturday Review of Literature, the Revised Standard Version of the Bible (which replaced the “poetic intensity” of the King James Version with “tepid expository prose”), and the “folk fakery” of the popular musical Oklahoma!. For Macdonald, the “simple vulgarity” of the tabloid press or pulp fiction was preferable to the insufferable good intentions and pretensions of middlebrow culture.

Macdonald unleashed a stream of invective against kitsch, a term he used for superficial, commercialized art. He described kitsch as a "homogenization process that distributes the globules of cream evenly throughout the milk instead of allowing them to float separately on the top. It thus destroys all values, since value judgements imply discrimination." For Macdonald, the real threat to high culture was not honest trash. Rather it was the poetry and fiction of the Atlantic Monthly or the social message films of Stanley Kramer. These self-conscious, devitalized versions of the fine arts brought art down to the level of mass appeal and presented themselves as high culture. In doing so, they placed a cap on culture.

From 1951 to 1971, Macdonald wrote on cultural and literary topics for the New Yorker. He was special editor for Encounter from 1956 to 1957. For all his commitments to Marxism, Trotskyism, anarchism, and pacifism, Macdonald was essentially a skeptic. Moreover, he was first and foremost a critic. He was at his best when subjecting other people's ideas, ideologies, and language to his incisive scrutiny and pointing out their flaws with his own witty and scathing prose. Take, for example, his comparison of reading the Revised Standard Version to "walking through an old city that has just been given, if not a saturation bombing, a thorough going-over."

He was film critic for Esquire from 1960 through 1966. The American involvement in Vietnam rekindled his interest in politics. In 1967, he changed his column in Esquire from film criticism to politics and used it to express his unqualified opposition to the war between 1967 and 1969. Macdonald also lent his support to Students for a Democratic Society and the student revolt at Columbia University in 1968. Between 1956 and 1977, he was a visiting professor at several American universities, including Northwestern, the University of Texas, Yale, and the University of California at San Diego.

Although a highly influential intellectual, Macdonald never wrote a scholarly book or even one devoted to a sustained argument. He was, in the tradition of H. L. Mencken, a learned journalist devoted to serious issues. His best form was the essay, and his books all appeared originally as magazine articles. Henry Wallace: The Man and the Myth (1948) appeared first in Politics, as did The Root Is Man (1953). Memoirs of a Revolutionist (1957), which recounted his political journey, was a collection of reprinted pieces. Perhaps his most influential works, Against the American Grain (1962) and Discriminations (1974), were collections of essays that elaborated his critique of American culture and politics. The lengthy lead essay in Against the American Grain, "Masscult and Midcult," gave the greatest exposition to his assertion that mass entertainment was "an instrument of domination" and that the middlebrow "instead of being transitional—the price of progress"—would "become a debased, permanent standard." To make his point, he cited the popularity of Herman Wouk and Pearl Buck.

For all his intelligence and insight, Macdonald was capable of monumentally foolish statements: "Europe has its Hitlers, but we have our Rotarians." Further, as Delmore Schwartz once observed about Macdonald, "none of his political predictions come true." No less a figure than Leon Trotsky once remarked that "Every man has a natural right to be stupid; but Dwight Macdonald abuses the privilege."

Macdonald spent his final years in New York City, where he died on December 19, 1982.

—MSM

Mack, Richard A(Ifred)

(1909–1963) commissioner, Federal Communications Commission

Born in Miami, Florida, on October 2, 1909, Richard Mack graduated from the University of Florida in 1932 and for the next nine years worked as an insurance salesman, credit manager, and executive in a farm supply company. He served as an infantry officer during World War II, rising to the rank of colonel. In 1947, he returned to Florida and was appointed to the state Railroad and Public Utilities Commission. In that capacity, he assumed a leading role in requiring utilities to undergo a detailed financial examination when requesting rate increases. For two years, he chaired the commission. Many observers in Florida predicted that he would eventually become the state's governor or U.S. senator. In May 1955, President Dwight D. Eisenhower appointed Mack to a seven-year term on the Federal Communications Commission (FCC).

During the early months of 1958, the House Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight conducted an investigation of six regulatory agencies, including the FCC. As a result of the probe, the subcommittee's chief counsel, BERNARD SCHWARTZ, charged Mack with plotting to fix the granting of a license to Miami's television channel 10. In February 1957, Mack had joined three other members of the FCC in voting to allocate the lucrative Miami channel to Public Service, Inc., a subsidiary of National Airlines. In doing so, they overruled the opinion of an FCC examiner, Herbert Scharfman, who had recommended that the license be awarded to A. Frank Katzentine, the owner-operator of WKAT, an AM radio station in Miami. Scharfman regarded National Airlines as the "least qualified" of the four applicants.

Well-publicized hearings held by the subcommittee during February 1958 revealed that National Airlines had contacted Thurman Whiteside, an attorney from Miami with a reputation as a political "fixer" and a close friend of Mack. Moreover, Whiteside had lent the commissioner $7,830, interest free, since 1950. Of this, Mack had received $2,650 after joining the FCC. Further, Mack had "no specific recollection" of having repaid the money and thought that some portion of it had been "forgiven." In addition, Whiteside had secured Mack an interest in two companies. Mack acknowledged both his friendship with Whiteside and having borrowed money from the lawyer but denied that he committed his vote to "anybody." The loans, Mack argued, were "small amounts." He further pointed out that he had known Whiteside since grammar school and that his had not been a deciding vote. For his part, Whiteside, who apparently accepted no money from National Airlines, freely admitted to having approached Mack on behalf of the airline "several" times. Whiteside also testified that he had forgiven none of the loans and that the balance due was only $250. Both National Airlines and WKAT had made efforts to exert political influence on the process. However, the extensive, complicated, and confusing financial transactions between Mack and Whiteside did not withstand scrutiny.

Although Mack and Whiteside maintained that they did nothing wrong, it became apparent to everyone else that, at the very least, Mack had been hopelessly compromised. The chair of the subcommittee, OREN HARRIS (D-Ark.), told Mack that, while it was possible that he had been used as a "tool" in the affair, the best service the commissioner could render at that point would be to submit his resignation. Clearly shaken, Mack said that he would "seriously consider [the chairman's] remarks." Newsweek reported that his appearance before the subcommittee "had reduced Mack from an urbane, self-confident, 'bright young man' of Florida Democratic politics to a broken and weary man." Although the administration maintained an official silence with respect to the affair, reporters believed that Eisenhower's chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS, and the White House counsel, GERALD MORGAN, told Mack to resign or face immediate dismissal. Mack submitted his letter of resignation on March 3, 1958. In it, he declared that "I feel in my heart that I have done no wrong and my conscience is clear." He complained that his "character and good name had been sacrificed to political expediency" but acknowledged that his usefulness as a commissioner "had been brought into question." The president accepted Mack's resignation within an hour. "Without attempting to pass judgment upon the question you have raised in your letter," replied Eisenhower, "I, nevertheless, agree with you that your usefulness as a member of the commission is so seriously impaired that you are wise to tender your resignation."

A grand jury indicted both Mack and Whiteside for conspiracy in September 1958. The subsequent trial lasted 14 weeks and resulted in a hung jury in July 1959. A second trial, scheduled for early 1960, was postponed several times because of the defendants' poor health. Mack descended into alcoholism and on several occasions spent time in psychiatric institutions. His wife divorced him for desertion. Whiteside stood trial alone and was acquitted in October 1960. In 1961, after Mack was held "temporarily incompetent," the prosecution dropped plans for a second trial. On November 26, 1963, the Miami police found Mack dead, apparently of natural causes, in a rooming house. He had been dead for four or five days.

—MSM

Magnuson, Warren G(rant)

(1905–1989) U.S. senator

Born in Moorhead, Minnesota, on April 12, 1905, Magnuson was orphaned at three weeks and adopted by a family of Swedish immigrants, whose name he took. He moved with his new family to North Dakota, where he attended public schools, the University of North Dakota at Grand Forks, and North Dakota State College. At the age of 19, he rode the freight trains west to Seattle, where he worked at several jobs while completing his education. Magnuson graduated from the University of Washington in 1926 and earned his law degree there in 1929. He practiced law in Seattle until he won election as a Democrat to the state legislature in 1932. In the legislature, Magnuson helped secure passage of legislation providing unemployment compensation and old age pensions. He worked in the office of the prosecuting attorney of King County, Washington (which encompassed Seattle), and became an assistant U.S. district attorney in 1933. After serving as the prosecuting attorney of King County from 1934 to 1936, he won election in 1936 to a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives that had been vacated by the suicide of Representative Marion Zioncheck (D-Wash.). A staunch supporter of the New Deal, Magnuson aggressively backed public works projects to provide employment and revive his state's economy, which had been hit particularly hard by the depression. An officer in the naval reserve, he spent eight months on active duty during World War II.

Magnuson won election to the U.S. Senate in 1944. He resigned his House seat in early December 1944, when he received a gubernatorial appointment to fill the last few weeks of the unexpired term of the senator he was elected to succeed, Homer T. Bone (D-Wash.), who had resigned to accept an appointment as a federal judge. In the postwar years, Magnuson succeeded in channeling large amounts of federal aid to Washington for dams, the timber industry, fisheries, and the maritime industry. He also voted for federal aid to state unemployment compensation funds in 1945 and for the retention of price controls in 1946. A strong supporter of organized labor, Magnuson fought against the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947 and introduced a bill in 1950 that restored the maritime union hiring hall. He cosponsored the bill that created the National Institutes of Health in 1948. In foreign policy, Magnuson supported the Truman administration's policy of containment. Magnuson won reelection in 1950 and subsequently in 1956, 1962, 1968, and 1974.

During the Eisenhower administration, Magnuson's seniority on key committees enhanced his ability to deliver federal defense contracts and resource development projects to his state. In 1952, he became chair of the powerful Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee (later renamed the Commerce Committee). He also served on the Appropriations Committee and the Aeronautics and Space Sciences Committee. Washington's economic boom in the 1950s, which was based on large federal expenditures on aircraft, atomic installations, and naval yards located in the state, owed much to Magnuson's efforts. As a result, despite his liberal, pro-labor voting record in the Senate, Magnuson gained the support of business interests in the state.

Magnuson opposed the Republican "partnership" policy, which encouraged private business, rather than the federal government, to develop natural resources. He denounced it as a "give-away" to "favored corporations." In 1954, when the administration endorsed a bill to permit a local public utility to build and operate a $360 million hydroelectric dam on the Columbia River at Priest Rapids, Washington, he condemned the measure as a first step in ceding public water sites to private interests. Magnuson eventually dropped his opposition, however, and declared that even a nonfederal project was better than no project at all.

Beginning in the late 1950s, Magnuson became a leading advocate of government-sponsored research in oceanography as an aid to national defense. Citing the nuclear submarine program's need for information about ocean tides, currents, and weather, he urged the creation of a federal office funded long-range (rather than an annual budgetary basis) to coordinate the oceanographic activities of different government agencies. In 1960, Magnuson sponsored legislation to establish a new division of marine sciences in the National Science Foundation, but the bill failed to pass the House.

During the Kennedy administration, Magnuson's activity on the Commerce Committee began to shift from the advocacy of local interests to issues of broader national significance. He figured prominently in the passage of the controversial public accommodations section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. During the Johnson and Nixon years, Magnuson played a leading role in consumer and environmental legislation. He contributed to the passage of laws dealing with automobile safety, flammable fabrics, truth in packaging, and warning labels on cigarette packages. Magnuson's seniority and his seats on key committees enabled him to look after the economic interests of his home state and Seattle. He chaired the Commerce Committee from 1955 to 1979 and the Appropriations Committee from 1977 to 1981. During the Ninety-sixth Congress (1979–81), he served as president pro tempore of the Senate. After losing his bid for reelection in 1980 to the Republican nominee, Slade Gorton, Magnuson returned to the practice of law. He died in Seattle on May 20, 1989.

—MSM

Mahon, George H(erman)

(1900–1985) U.S. congressman; chairman, Department of Defense Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee

George Mahon was born on a cotton farm in the village of Mahon, near Haynesville, Louisiana, on September 22, 1900. He migrated with his family to rural west Texas in 1908. The family settled on a farm in Mitchell County, where Mahon attended public schools, graduating in 1918. He earned a B.A. from Simmons University (now Hardin-Simmons) in Abilene, Texas, in 1924 and an LL.B. from the University of Texas in 1925. After gaining admission to the bar in 1925, he practiced law in Colorado (now Colorado City), Texas. Before long, he entered politics, winning election as county attorney for Mitchell County in 1926. He served as district attorney for the 32nd judicial district from 1927 to 1933 and won election as a Democrat to a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives from the newly created 19th congressional district in 1934. Subsequently, he was reelected to that seat 21 consecutive times.

Mahon effectively promoted the economic interests of his district. As he gained seniority, he brought cotton subsidies and federal facilities to the 19th district. During the 1930s, he supported the agricultural programs of the New Deal and began to acquire the seniority that would make him a power in the House. He gained a seat on the powerful House Appropriations Committee in 1939 and also served on its War Department Subcommittee, which later became the Defense Department Subcommittee. In foreign affairs, he strongly supported the policies of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations.

Mahon consistently opposed civil rights legislation and generally opposed the interests of organized labor. He supported the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947. When the Democrats regained control of the House in 1949, he became chair of the Defense Department Subcommittee.

Although a fiscal conservative, Mahon generally opposed the Eisenhower administration's efforts to cut the military budget. As the ranking Democrat on the Defense Department Subcommittee in 1953, he led the panel's minority members in opposing a proposed $5 billion cut in appropriations for the air force. Mahon insisted that the air force would need 143 wings by 1955, rather than the 120 wings requested by the president. As it turned out, the Republican-controlled Congress reduced funding for the air force even more than the administration had requested.

The Democrats regained control of Congress in the elections of 1954, and Mahon once again became chair of the Defense Department Subcommittee. He warned that the Soviet Union was gaining on the United States in nuclear capability, and he therefore urged steady yearly increases in the rate of military spending in order to maintain American superiority. Confronted with the administration's proposed increase of $3 billion in 1957, however, Mahon called for economy, and his committee cut the president's requests by almost $2.6

billion. The Senate subsequently restored $972 million of the funds cut by the House. In July, as conferees sought to find an acceptable compromise between the House and Senate versions of the bill, Eisenhower announced that he was reducing the armed forces by 100,000 men. This weakened the argument for the Senate version, and the conference report in July added $199 million to the House bill. Following the Soviet Union's launch of Sputnik, the first artificial satellite, in October 1957, Mahon abruptly ended his efforts to cut military budgets. He and his panel began urging larger defense appropriations than the administration thought wise.

With the death of Representative Clarence Cannon (D-Mo.) in 1964, Mahon assumed the chair of the full Appropriations Committee and thus became one of the most influential members of the House. Long a friend and ally of LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Mahon supported President Johnson's policy in Vietnam but joined his southern Democratic colleagues in opposing the president's proposals for civil rights, Medicare, regional development, and the war on poverty. In the second half of the 1960s, Mahon became increasingly concerned about high levels of government spending and the growing deficit. Despite his concerns about spending, Mahon supported increased defense expenditures during the 1960s and, in the later part of the decade, backed the development of a "China-oriented" antiballistic missile defense system. Although he differed with Johnson over domestic policy, he and Johnson remained on good terms.

His seniority and important committee chairmanships made Mahon a powerful figure during the administrations of RICHARD M. NIXON and GERALD FORD. By the time Mahon retired, he had set a record for the longest tenure as chair of the House Appropriations Committee. Despite his enormous influence, he was largely unknown outside of Washington. By his own admission, Mahon was not a "headline man"; he made few speeches and earned a reputation as a hardworking and effective legislator. He did not stand for reelection in 1978 and retired to Colorado City, where he lived until his death in San Angelo, Texas, on November 19, 1985.

—MSM

Mann, Thomas (Clifton)

(1912–1999) ambassador to El Salvador, assistant secretary of state for economic affairs, ambassador to Mexico, assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs

Thomas Clifton Mann was born on November 11, 1912, in Laredo, Texas, a town on the Mexican border. In high school, he excelled both in the classroom and at athletics. After earning a B.A. and an LL.B. from Baylor University in 1934, he practiced law with his father and brothers in his hometown until World War II. Unable to join the armed forces because of his poor eyesight, Mann joined the State Department in 1942, where, because of his fluency in Spanish, he specialized in Latin American affairs and international economics. During the war, he worked for the Office of Economic Warfare and was posted in Uruguay. He became a Foreign Service officer in 1947 at the request of the assistant secretary of state for American republic affairs, SPRUILLE BRADEN. After working as Braden's special assistant for a few months, Mann left for Caracas, Venezuela, in August 1947 to take charge of the embassy's political and petroleum affairs. He directed the State Department's Office of Middle American Affairs from January 1950 to the end of the year, when he was named deputy assistant secretary in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs. In August 1953, Mann became embassy counselor in Athens and assumed similar duties in Guatemala City in September 1954. From October 1955 to September 1957, he was ambassador to El Salvador.

In September 1957, Mann was appointed assistant secretary of state for economic affairs. As a function of this position, he represented the United States at many international trade conferences. In his dealings with foreign nations, he preferred to concentrate on immediate problems and to avoid long-term economic planning. In December 1958, for example, he criticized Brazil's president, Juscelino Kubitschek de Oliveira's call for "Operation Pan America," a massive and ambitious long-range development program. Kubitschek argued that economic development would raise living standards, encourage democracy, and undercut support for left-wing revolutionaries. At the same time, Kubitschek maintained that, given the poor infrastructure and political unrest in the region, economic development would require government action to encourage private economic development. He called on the United States to shoulder a large part of the cost. Mann argued that the United States was already doing its share to help Latin America and suggested that Latin American countries should focus on realistic short-term plans.

The hostile reception to Vice President RICHARD NIXON's visit to Latin America in the spring of 1958 and a fact-finding trip by the president's brother, MILTON EISENHOWER, prompted the administration to review its policy toward Latin America. The administration sought to encourage democratic governments, revised import restrictions on commodities from Latin America, and gave a more sympathetic hearing to Kubitschek's ideas.

Mann was particularly concerned about stabilizing prices of raw materials and increasing markets for Latin American goods. In 1958, he induced Latin American coffee-producing nations, perennially plagued by large surpluses and low prices, to institute controls on production to stabilize prices. A year later, he brought coffee-producing African nations into the agreement. In December 1958, Mann pledged U.S. cooperation with the Organization of American States's plan to develop common market areas in Latin America.

Mann was one of the first to argue that, in view of the communist threat, economic policy had to be designed with attention to its political ramifications. Despite his reservations, in 1959 Mann supported the administration's plan to create an Inter-American Development Bank, with an initial capitalization of $1 billion, of which the United States would subscribe $450 million. When Castro called for the United States to undertake a $30 billion aid program in Latin America, Mann, although he never directly responded to Castro's challenge in public, argued that the United States was already supporting all feasible projects, mainly through international bank loans.

After his appointment as assistant secretary of state of inter-American affairs in July 1960, Mann and C. DOUGLAS DILLON, undersecretary of state of economic affairs, attended the meeting of the Inter-American Economic Conference in Bogotá that September. With the notable exception of Cuba, the United States and all other Latin American nations agreed to the Act of Bogotá, a common policy for a "new and vigorous" attack on the sources of political unrest and economic underdevelopment. Emphasizing action on housing, agrarian reform, health, and education, the measure was an expanded version of President Eisenhower's social development plan, which pledged an initial fund of $550 million. In view of the increasingly leftist stance of the Castro regime, some in the United States criticized the program as an ill-timed attempt to ensure Latin American support for U.S. policies. Nonetheless, the Act of Bogotá, along with the Inter-American Development Bank and other policies, formed the basis for President JOHN F. KENNEDY's Alliance for Progress.

From March 1961 to December 1963, Mann served as ambassador to Mexico. On December 14, 1963, just three weeks after the assassination of John F. Kennedy, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON, named Mann assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs. Johnson also named Mann to head the Alliance for Progress and appointed him to be the president's special assistant to coordinate the Latin American policy of all departments. Observers credited Mann with the formulation of the Johnson administration's policy for Latin America. Critics regarded that policy as a shift away from the idealism of the Kennedy years and toward a policy that focused on the interests of American businesses. A self-styled pragmatist, Mann stressed economic development and protection of American investments over social and political reform. Further, Mann gave priority to supporting anticommunist governments, rather than opposing military regimes. In February 1965, Mann was named undersecretary of state for economic affairs, although he continued to advise Johnson on Latin American affairs. That same year, he played a minor role in Johnson's decision to send marines to the Dominican Republic to put down what Johnson and Mann regarded as a communist threat, a decision denounced by Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.). Mann left government for private life in April 1966 and served as president of the Automobile Manufacturers Association from 1967 to 1971. He died at his home in Austin, Texas, on January 23, 1999.

—MSM

Mansfield, Mike (Michael) (Joseph)(1903–2001) U.S. senator, majority leader

The son of Irish immigrants, Mansfield was born in New York City's Greenwich Village on March 16, 1903. After his mother died in 1906, he was sent to live with relatives in Great Falls, Montana. Mansfield left school in the eighth grade and, after lying about his age, joined the navy not long before the United States entered World War I. He served as a seaman during World War I, as a private in the army from 1919 to 1920, and as a private first class in the marine corps from 1920 to 1922. His service in the marine corps took him to the Philippines, Japan, and China, an experience that would have a substantial role in shaping his later career. He worked as a "mucker" (the job entailed using a shovel to clear away rocks and debris) in the copper mines of Butte, Montana, for the next eight years. While working in the mines, he enrolled as a special student at Montana School of Mines, where he took college courses and high school correspondence courses at the same time. In 1930, he entered Montana State University (now the University of Montana) in Missoula, where he earned a B.A. in 1933 and an M.A. in 1934. He began teaching there in 1933 as a professor of Latin American and Far Eastern history.

Mansfield made an inauspicious debut in public life when he ran last in a three-way race for the Democratic nomination for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives in 1940. Two years later, however, he won election to that same seat. He was reelected to the House four times. Because he had taught Asian and Latin American history and was interested in foreign policy, he was given a place on the Foreign Affairs Committee. His military service in Asia and his experience teaching about the region helped him establish himself as something of an expert in the region within the House. In 1944, President Franklin D. Roosevelt sent him to China on a fact-finding tour. Four years later, Mansfield was a delegate to the ninth Inter-American Conference in Colombia. In 1951 and 1952, he sat on the American delegation to the UN General Assembly.

While generally liberal, his voting record on domestic matters was uneven, particularly with respect to civil liberties. During the Truman administration, he supported the extension of price controls, an increase in the minimum wage, and a bill to abolish the poll tax. He opposed the creation of the House Un-American Activities Committee and the Taft-Hartley Act. On the other hand, Mansfield voted for the McCarran Internal Security Act and the Mundt-Nixon bill. In foreign policy, he backed the Marshall Plan but was less enthusiastic about aid to Greece and Turkey.

In 1952, Mansfield won the Democratic nomination to challenge Senator Zales N. Ecton (R-Mont.), who was up for reelection. Although the Republicans won the White House and control of both houses of Congress that year, Mansfield defeated the incumbent. He went on to win reelection in 1958, 1964, and 1970. His interest and experience in foreign affairs gained him an assignment on the Foreign Relations Committee. Mansfield quickly became a leading critic of the Eisenhower administration's foreign aid program, contending that it was too extensive and indiscriminate. He also thought it poorly administered. In June 1953, he attacked the president's mutual security bill, because, he alleged, it prepared for "never-ending foreign aid on a large scale." In July 1954, he called for an end to foreign economic aid except for technical assistance and a few other programs. Five years later, he unsuccessfully proposed that the administration be required to reduce all nonmilitary grant aid (as opposed to technical assistance and loans) to zero within three years. He also suggested, as efficiency measures, transferring the functions of the semiautonomous International Cooperation Administration to the State Department and shifting responsibility for military aid from the State Department to the Defense Department. The Senate rejected the former proposal, but the latter was incorporated into the Mutual Security Act of 1959.

Mansfield emerged as an important figure in formulating the Democratic congressional response to the Eisenhower administration's foreign policy. At joint hearings of the Foreign Affairs and Armed Services Committees in February 1957, Mansfield and Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY (D-Minn.) amended the administration's version of the Eisenhower Doctrine, which would have permitted the president to use American armed forces at his discretion to block communist expansion in the Middle East. The Humphrey-Mansfield amendment, which was incorporated into the final version, stated that the United States was prepared, if the president believed it necessary, to provide such assistance when requested by the nation attacked. Reflecting the bipartisanship of foreign policy during the cold war era, Eisenhower appointed Mansfield as a delegate to the Southeast Asia Conference of 1954 that drafted the SEATO pact (to which Mansfield was a signatory) and as a member of the U.S. delegation to the UN General Assembly in 1958.

In 1957, Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) selected Mansfield to replace Senator Earle Clements (D-Ky.) as majority whip. Many observers believed that Johnson chose Mansfield because he believed the Montanan unassertive and unlikely to challenge the majority leader's authority. As whip, Mansfield's tasks included helping persuade Senate Democrats to vote as the leadership wished and making sure that his Democratic colleagues were on the floor for roll calls. He preferred a low-key, conciliatory approach to arm-twisting.

Throughout the Eisenhower administration, Mansfield generally voted as a liberal on domestic legislation. In August 1959, he voted to override a presidential veto of a housing bill, and the following May he backed an attempt to override a veto of a bill providing for area redevelopment. Mansfield supported the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. As majority whip, however, he opposed amendments proposed by liberals that would have strengthened what became the Civil Rights Act of 1960.

Mansfield succeeded Johnson as majority leader in 1961. In contrast to Johnson, whose arm-twisting and deal-making made him the most powerful majority leader in the history of the Senate, Mansfield opted for a more low-key, collegial approach. Some of his Democratic colleagues criticized him for failing to exert leadership. Liberals, in particular, faulted him for working too closely with the minority leader, Senator EVERETT M. DIRKSEN (R-Ill.). An early supporter of Ngo Dinh Diem, Mansfield had a change of heart after a visit to Vietnam in 1962 and advised President JOHN F. KENNEDY that the United States should avoid further involvement in Vietnam. During the presidency of Lyndon Johnson, Mansfield was mildly critical of the administration's policy in Vietnam in public; in private, he attempted to persuade Johnson that military victory was impossible. After RICHARD M. NIXON became president, however, Mansfield emerged as a frequent and public critic of the war in Vietnam.

During Nixon's tenure, Mansfield sought to increase the Senate's influence over the conduct of foreign policy. In addition to supporting the Cooper-Church and McGovern-Hatfield amendments, he introduced his own amendment calling for the withdrawal of all U.S. military forces from Vietnam within nine months. Mansfield's measure passed the Senate but failed in the House. Further, he was a principal architect of the War Powers Act, which limited the president's ability to commit American troops abroad without the consent of Congress. Mansfield also repeatedly, and without success, proposed reducing American forces in Europe by half.

The controversial Mansfield amendment of 1973 expressly limited grants for defense research given by the Advanced Research Projects Agency (ARPA) to projects with direct military applications. Critics maintained that the amendment had a devastating impact on American science, since ARPA was a major funding source for basic research. In March 1976, Mansfield announced that he would not seek reelection. At that point, he had served as majority leader longer than anyone else. Mansfield served as ambassador to Japan from 1977 to 1988. From 1989 until his death from congestive heart failure on October 5, 2001, he lived in Washington, D.C., and served as senior adviser to Goldman Sachs. President George H. W. Bush awarded him the Presidential Medal of Freedom in January 1989.

—MSM

Mansure, Edmund F(orsman)

(1901–1992) administrator, General Services Administration

Born in Chicago, Illinois, on March 14, 1901, Mansure graduated from Dartmouth College in 1924 and Kent College of Law. He went to work for the E. L. Mansure Company, which manufactured textiles, and was promoted to vice president in 1925. Mansure gained admission to the Illinois bar in 1927. He became president of E. L. Mansure in 1935 and chairman of the board in 1952. During this time, he also served on numerous state commissions. When the Republicans captured the White House in 1952, William J. Balmer, an insurance broker from Chicago and vice chairman of the Cook County Executive Committee of the Republican Party, pushed for Mansure to receive an appointment to a position in the new administration. President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER chose Mansure to head the General Services Administration (GSA) in April 1953.

David Frier, a political scientist, maintained that Mansure was an inept administrator, immersed in trivia, incapable of overseeing his subordinates, and unable to withstand pressure from top officials to use the GSA to reward the party faithful. One of Mansure's neighbors described him as a man who "could easily get over his head in very shallow water."

In October 1955, Mansure became implicated in a scandal involving U.S. Commissioner of the Public Building Service PETER STROBEL, who was charged with using his post to further his private interests. Mansure acknowledged that he had allowed Strobel to retain a 90 percent interest in the engineering firm of Strobel and Salzman, although he told the commissioner that he had to give up "active management" of the firm. Mansure did not check the legality of this action with the attorney general or question Strobel when the latter took a year and a half to sign the government's code of ethics and was dilatory in providing the GSA with a list of his firm's clients. Although it was fairly clear that Strobel did not set out to use his office to enrich himself, several of Strobel's dealings did violate or skirt the edges of regulations relating to ethics and conflicts of interest. The Justice Department investigated and did not initiate criminal proceedings, but, at the very least, Strobel's activities gave the appearance of impropriety. Strobel resigned his post in November 1955.

In August 1955, Herbert Solow published an article in Fortune, in which he alleged that the GSA was "Washington's most durable mess" and was guilty of "favoritism, factionalism, sloppiness, and waste." According to Solow, Mansure, who had been appointed to clean up the mess, had only contributed to it. Solow further implied that outside political interests, Balmer in particular, exercised undue influence over Mansure. The article paid particular attention to the awarding of contracts for the expansion of a government-owned nickel refinery in Nicaro, Cuba.

The Frederick Snare Corporation had constructed the plant during World War II. After the war, the plant had been shut down, but the Korean War created sufficient demand that the plant was reactivated in 1952. The government authorized an expansion of the plant the following year. The contract went to a 50-50 partnership between Snare Corp. and Merritt-Chapman and Scott, a large construction company with little experience in Cuba. Snare accepted the partnership reluctantly. The GSA chose National Lead Company, which owned the majority of Nickel Processing Corporation (the company that had operated the nickel refinery in Nicaro for the U.S. government), as the supervisory contractor for the expansion. National Lead supported Merritt-Chapman and Scott, apparently at least in part because it had dealings with a subsidiary of Merritt.

As a result of the article, the House Special Government Activities Subcommittee began an inquiry into the expansion of the plant at Nicaro in January 1956. Its probe, although unable to determine for certain the reasons for granting the contract to National Lead, established that Mansure's decision to select National Lead came after his staff had advised him that having National Lead supervise the expansion would cost considerably more than having the Public Buildings Service supervise it. Moreover, the chair of the GSA's Nickel-Graphite Committee wrote a memorandum in which he urged that the contract be let to Snare, since it was the only American company that had demonstrated the ability to do major construction work in Cuba.

If unable to state positively what factors accounted for the arrangements for the expansion, the congressional subcommittee drew a strong inference that Mansure had been under heavy pressure from members of Congress, executive departments, and the Republican Party to reward the party faithful. At the subcommittee's hearings, Randall Cremer, executive vice president of Snare, testified that he had awarded two-thirds of the insurance brokerage contract to the firm of Balmer and Moore because Mansure had told him to do so. Following Cremer's testimony, Mansure held a news conference at which he denied that he had instructed Cremer to give the contract to a “specific firm” but acknowledged that he wanted to place the contract with a midwestern “firm friendly to the [Republican] Party.” Mansure said that he was “sick and tired” of the brokerage business going to Democratic firms from the East.

Testimony before the subcommittee established that the GSA had long been considered a “political” agency and that Mansure had been under heavy pressure from members of Congress and the Republican National Committee to place loyal Republicans in his agency and to award contracts accordingly. Mansure told an editor for Fortune that “half the Cabinet made recommendations for the [Nicaro] job.” LEONARD HALL, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, had opposed giving the contract to a firm that “had been at the Democratic trough for twenty years.” Apparently, some regarded Snare as a “New Deal” company, because it had repeatedly received contracts from Democratic administrations. Cremer attempted to persuade Hall that no Democrats held top positions at Snare. Moreover, although no proof emerged that Hall or any other Republican solicited support from companies seeking the contract for the expansion at Nicaro, the top seven officials at Snare substantially increased their contributions to Republicans in the elections of 1954. However embarrassing these revelations may have been, neither the Justice Department nor the subcommittee took action against Mansure.

Under heavy pressure from the administration, Mansure resigned in February 1956, citing “personal obligations,” and returned to head E. L. Mansure Company. He died in Menlo Park on January 25, 1992.

Marshall, Thurgood

(1908–1993) director-counsel, NAACP Legal

Defense and Educational Fund; Supreme Court justice
Marshall was born on July 2, 1908, in Baltimore, Maryland, and raised in that city. His father was head steward at the Gibson Island Club (a favorite of Washington’s power brokers) and his mother a teacher. After graduating from Lincoln University in 1930 and from Howard University School of Law, where he finished first in his class, in 1933, Marshall began to practice law in Baltimore. He became active in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and lobbied members of Maryland’s congressional delegation in support of a federal antilynching bill. He also handled legal matters for the local branch of the NAACP. Marshall worked with Charles Hamilton Houston, chief legal counsel for the NAACP, to gain the admission of a black student into the University of Maryland’ law school in Murray v. Pearson (1936). In May 1936, Marshall became assistant special counsel to the NAACP. Two years later, he succeeded Houston as special counsel for the NAACP. When the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund was established as a separate entity in 1939, he was appointed its director-counsel. As head of the NAACP’s legal program, Marshall led the organization’s legal assault on segregation. Gregarious and seemingly tireless, Marshall traveled throughout the South to represent black litigants in court as well as to promote and encourage local NAACP chapters.

In 1939, Marshall won a decision in federal district court striking down racial pay differentials for teachers in Anne Arundel County, Maryland. The following year, after suffering a defeat in district court, Marshall won a decision from the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals striking down racial pay differentials for teachers in Norfolk, Virginia. He also won a remarkable string of victories in the U.S. Supreme Court. In Smith v. Allwright (1944), his second appearance before the Supreme Court, Marshall persuaded the justices to strike down Texas’s all-white primary. Another victory came in 1948, when, in Shelley v. Kraemer, the Court ruled that restrictive covenants were legally unenforceable.

Education was a primary focus of the NAACP’s attack on segregation. In Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada (1938), which Houston had argued, the Supreme Court had struck down Missouri’s policy of providing for black applicants to its law school by paying for tuition at law schools in neighboring states that accepted African Americans. Marshall built on that decision in Sipuel v. Oklahoma State Board of Regents (1948), in which the Court ruled that Oklahoma could not require a black applicant to wait until there were enough black students to make a separate black law school practicable. Under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court declared, Oklahoma had to provide a qualified black applicant with a legal education “as soon as it [did] for applicants of any other group.” Marshall won two landmark victories in 1950. In Sweatt v. Painter, the Court held that Texas’s attempt to meet its obligation under the Fourteenth Amendment by creating a separate law school for black students fell short. Whether one looked at the faculty, student body, or library, the Court could not find “substantial equality.” Further, the Court found that “the University of Texas Law School possesses to a far greater degree those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school,” including the reputation of the faculty, the position and influence of the alumni, and the school’s prestige. In McLaurin v. Oklahoma, the justices ruled that, having admitted George McLaurin to its doctoral program in education (since it offered no such program for African Americans in the state), the state could not segregate him in the classroom, dining hall, or library. Once the state had met its constitutional requirement by admitting McLaurin to the University of Oklahoma, held the Court, he was entitled to “the same treatment at the hands of the state as students of other races.”

After Sweatt and McLaurin, Marshall turned his attention to segregated public schools. In addition to shifting from graduate and professional schools to primary and secondary schools, Marshall and his aides also turned their attack directly on segregation. Marshall supervised the preparation of five cases challenging the validity of racial segregation in public schools. He personally represented the plaintiffs from Clarendon County, South Carolina, in one of the suits. On May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court ruled unanimously, in Brown v. Board of Education, that segregated public schools were “inherently unequal” and therefore violated the equal protection of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court did not, however, order an immediate remedy. Conceding that the cases presented problems of “considerable complexity,” the justices ordered further argument on the question of implementation the following term. In the second round of arguments, Marshall urged the Court to order desegregation of public schools no later than the fall term of 1956. In May 1955, however, the Court remanded the cases to lower courts with instructions that the courts require that the local school districts make a “prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance” and enter orders to admit the plaintiffs to public schools “on a racially nondiscriminatory basis with all deliberate speed.” Over the next several years, Marshall and the NAACP undertook a massive program of litigation to enforce the Brown decision.

Along with several other lawyers from the NAACP, Marshall represented AUSTERINE LUCY in her suit to gain admission to the University of Alabama and won a Supreme Court ruling on her behalf in October 1955. Lucy enrolled on February 1 under the protection of campus police. Unruly crowds constantly harassed her, and, on February 6, 1956, Marshall was with her when an angry mob grew violent, which led university authorities to have her removed from campus in a highway patrol car. After the trustees suspended Lucy on the next day, ostensibly for her own safety, Marshall sought a contempt order against the university’s officials for failing to control the mob. He also overplayed his hand by alleging that the university’s administrators conspired with the mob, an allegation that he later withdrew. A federal district judge found that the officials of the university had not violated his earlier order but ordered that Lucy be reinstated. The trustees, however, expelled Lucy for making unfounded charges against the administration. When Marshall challenged that, the district judge ruled that Lucy had been expelled for disciplinary reasons, not on the basis of her race. At that point, Lucy was physically and emotionally exhausted, and she chose not to appeal the decision.

Marshall was also counsel for the black students who desegregated Central High School in Little Rock, Arkansas, in the fall of 1957. When Governor ORVAL FAUBUS used the National Guard to block the implementation of a court order mandating the admission of the students in September 1957, Marshall got an injunction barring the governor from further interference with the school’s desegregation plan. Later in the school year, the local school board sought to postpone its desegregation program for two-and-a-half years. In a special term of the Supreme Court, held in September 1958, Marshall argued against the delay and won a unanimous decision ordering continuation of the plan to desegregate.

Marshall also handled cases extending the principle established in Brown to areas such as public recreation and public transit. In 1955, he won decisions in the Supreme Court striking down racial segregation on beaches and in bathhouses maintained by the state of Maryland and the city of Baltimore (Dawson v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore [1955]) and in a municipal golf course in Atlanta (Holmes v. Atlanta, 1955). He participated in the suit, growing out of the bus boycott in Montgomery, Alabama, that resulted in the Court's decision, in November 1956, upholding a ruling by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals that segregation in local transportation violated the Fourteenth Amendment.

During the late 1950s, Marshall continued the NAACP's attack on legal segregation and defended the organization from attempts by southern states to close down its operations within their borders. A number of southern states enacted legislation effectively outlawing the NAACP, and Marshall won a series of decisions in the Supreme Court overturning such laws. In his last oral argument before the Supreme Court as an advocate for the NAACP, Marshall successfully contended that segregation in restaurants and other facilities at bus terminals involved in interstate travel violated federal law (Boynton v. Virginia [1960]).

During his final years with the NAACP, Marshall coordinated the legal defense of hundreds of students arrested during the sit-ins, the Freedom Rides, and similar nonviolent protests. He headed the team that wrote the brief for the case in which the Court reversed the convictions of blacks arrested for peaceful lunch counter sit-ins.

In September 1961, President JOHN F. KENNEDY appointed Marshall to a seat on the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. Opposition from southern senators held up his confirmation for a year. When President LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed him solicitor general in July 1965, Marshall became the first African American to hold that office. Johnson nominated him to the Supreme Court on June 13, 1967. The Senate confirmed the nomination that August, making Marshall the first African American to sit on the nation's highest court. On the Court, he was a liberal activist who voted most frequently with Chief Justice EARL WARREN and Justice WILLIAM BRENNAN. Never as great a jurist as he was an advocate, Marshall played a subordinate role in his early years on the Court; he wrote few majority opinions or dissents. As the Court moved to the right in the 1970s, he became more assertive and dissented in an increasing number of cases. Although he wrote opinions in a wide variety of fields, his most significant contributions came in constitutional law. He wrote for the majority in Stanley v. Georgia (1969), which held that individuals had a right to possess obscene materials in their own homes, and Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley (1972), which ruled that government may not constitutionally favor some types of speech over others. In two dissents, Dandridge v. Williams (1970) and San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez (1973), Marshall criticized the two-tiered equal protection analysis that regarded classification based on race and other suspect categories as subject to strict scrutiny while all other classifications had only to meet the test of rationality. Marshall proposed a more flexible "sliding scale." The Court never adopted his theory, but his consistent advocacy of this position did appear to move the Court in the direction of greater flexibility. Marshall supported affirmative action on the ground that the Constitution had not been color-blind in the past and remedial action was therefore necessary. He entered a vigorous dissent in City of Richmond v. Croson (1989), in which the majority struck down a municipal ordinance that set aside 30 percent of the money appropriated for public contracting for companies owned by African Americans or other minorities. Marshall supported abortion rights and strongly opposed the death penalty. In 1972, the Court struck down the death penalty as it was then practiced. After the Court upheld revised statutes providing for the death penalty in Gregg v. Georgia (1976), Marshall dissented in every death penalty case.

Unlike most other justices, Marshall's greatest contributions came before his elevation to the Court. His groundbreaking work for the NAACP made him a symbol of the black struggle for legal equality. He was one of the most successful advocates before the Supreme Court in American history. On the Court, however, he was neither an outstanding justice nor an especially creative one. In his last years as a justice, Marshall became increasingly alienated and embittered, prone to injudicious outbursts both on and off the bench. He retired from the Court in 1991 and died in Bethesda, Maryland, on January 24, 1993.

—MSM

Martin, Joseph W(illiam), Jr.

(1884–1968) U.S. congressman, Speaker of the House, minority leader

The son of a blacksmith, Martin was born in North Attleboro, Massachusetts, on November 3, 1884. Following the death of his father, Martin went to work at the age of six delivering newspapers to help support his family. After graduating from North Attleboro High School in 1902, he turned down a scholarship to Dartmouth College and became a reporter for the North Attleboro Leader and then for the North Attleboro Sun. In 1908, he and several associates purchased the local Republican paper, the Evening Chronicle. With Martin as editor and publisher, the paper quadrupled its circulation. He eventually bought out his partners, purchased an insurance agency in 1918, and, in 1944, added a weekly, the Franklin (Massachusetts) Sentinel, to his holdings. Martin retained ownership of both newspapers and the insurance agency until his death. His work as a journalist drew him toward politics, and in 1911 he ran successfully for a seat in the Massachusetts House of Representatives. After serving three one-year terms as a Republican in the state house (1912–14), he won election to the state senate, where he served three consecutive one-year terms (1915–17). Martin did not stand for reelection in 1917 but returned to politics in 1922 as executive secretary of the state Republican committee in an effort to help heal a split in the state party. In 1924, he won election to the U.S. House of Representatives.

In the House, he voted as an economic conservative. In many regards, he was typical of a small-town businessman who represented a district of small towns and modest-sized cities with many self-owned businesses. Martin rose quickly in the Republican ranks and in 1929 received an assignment to the powerful Rules Committee. Following the elections of 1930, in which Republicans lost control of the House, Martin served as assistant whip from 1931 to 1933.

After the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932, Martin established a cordial relationship with the new president, who rewarded him with federal projects and services for his home district. In the House, Martin was appointed to the unofficial position of assistant minority leader in 1933. He opposed most New Deal measures, but he was not an ideologue. He supported New Deal programs that brought benefits to New England and opposed those that had little to offer his constituents. In foreign policy, he was a moderate isolationist. He opposed Lend-Lease and the repeal of the Neutrality Acts. Martin's rise in his party derived less from ideology than from his reputation as a skillful legislative technician. In 1939, his colleagues elected him minority leader. Martin reached out to disaffected southern Democrats to build an effective anti-New Deal coalition.

After the Republicans won control of Congress in the elections of 1946, he became Speaker of the house. As Speaker, he preferred to lead through persuasion rather than coercion. At the same time, he used traditional methods to exert his authority when necessary. In his memoirs, Martin recalled that "no Republican went on an important committee without my approval." He helped pass President HARRY S. TRUMAN's proposal for aid to Greece and Turkey as well as the Marshall Plan. Domestically, however, he opposed most of the administration's Fair Deal and, as Speaker, successfully blocked many of Truman's proposals, including national health insurance and public housing. Under his leadership, the House passed the Taft-Hartley Act over Truman's veto and passed the Twenty-second Amendment, which limited presidents to two terms in office. After the Democratic victory in the elections of 1948, Martin once again became minority leader.

In April 1951, Martin became involved in the dispute between Truman and General Douglas MacArthur over the conduct of the Korean War. On April 5, Martin, a supporter of MacArthur, made public the contents of a letter he had received from the general criticizing the administration's conduct of the war and its decision not to use Nationalist Chinese troops in the conflict. The letter contributed to Truman's decision to recall MacArthur on April 11.

After Republicans won the presidency and both houses in the elections of 1952, Martin again became Speaker. He was disappointed in President Dwight D. Eisenhower's legislative agenda because he thought it too similar to those of Roosevelt and Truman. Martin also believed that Eisenhower's approach failed to reflect the views of most Republicans in the House. As the leader of his party in the lower chamber, however, he felt duty bound to support the president. For example, Martin personally favored Representative DANIEL REED's (R-N.Y.) tax cut bill in 1953 but bottled the measure up in the Rules Committee at the request of the administration. Eisenhower's proposed reciprocal trade bill of 1953 was similar to measures that Martin had opposed since the 1930s, but on this, too, the speaker backed the president.

One of the few issue on which Martin broke with the president was the bill for the St. Lawrence Seaway in 1954. There was widespread opposition to the measure in Martin's home district, where many worried that the seaway would divert traffic from the port of Boston. Despite pressure from the president, Martin persisted in opposing the bill. Ultimately, the bill passed without Martin's support.

In the elections of 1954, Democrats regained control of both houses of Congress, and Martin once again became minority leader. He blamed the party's electoral reverses in part on Eisenhower, whom he thought insufficiently partisan and unwilling to help build up local and state Republican organizations. Martin criticized Eisenhower in particular for failing to consult either members of Congress or party officials on matters of patronage. The Republican leader in the House contended that it was impossible to strengthen the party without rewarding the party faithful with jobs. He further faulted Eisenhower for failing to appoint "assistants who could solve political problems with professional skill." Martin also thought that Eisenhower made a big mistake by dealing with Congress primarily through subordinates and not having enough personal contact with members of the legislative branch.

Conservative by temperament rather than ideology, Martin had worked his way up through party ranks by pragmatically adjusting to the exigencies of politics rather than attempting to effect fundamental change in the political system. His approach made Martin acutely aware of the pressures his colleagues faced from constituents, and he generally did not press Republican representatives to vote for bills proposed by the administration that were unpopular in their home districts.

Martin's friendship with the Democratic leader in the House, SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.), which dated back to the 1930s, also mitigated the Republican leader's partisanship. On occasion, he helped Rayburn pass bills as a personal favor. During the 85th Congress (1957–58), for example, he used his influence with Republicans on the Rules Committee to aid Rayburn in bringing to the floor several bills favored by the liberal Democratic Study Group.

Ironically, just as Martin criticized Eisenhower for insufficient partisanship, Martin encountered similar criticism from Republicans both in and out of Congress. Many Republicans believed that he did not sufficiently stress the need for party discipline and unity. Others thought he made too much of an effort to accommodate Rayburn.

After Republicans lost the congressional elections in 1954 and again in 1956, Martin's deputy, Representative CHARLES HALLECK (R-Ind.), explored the possibility of challenging Martin for the party's leadership. On both occasions, Eisenhower, seeking to avoid internecine warfare, urged him not to, and Halleck decided not to run. After the Democratic landslide in the off-year elections of 1958, however, Halleck once again demonstrated an interest in challenging for the minority leadership. Many in the Republican caucus believed that they needed younger, more vigorous leadership and regarded Martin as too willing to cooperate with Rayburn. This time, moreover, Eisenhower, who attributed the electoral reverses in part to Martin's ineffective leadership, let it be known that he would not discourage Halleck. Many interpreted this as an indication of support for Halleck. Further, some of the president's aides reportedly actively supported Halleck. On January 6, 1959, Halleck defeated Martin in the Republican caucus by a vote of 74 to 70. In My First Fifty Years in Politics (1960), Martin bitterly blamed Eisenhower and Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON for his defeat. "I knew," he wrote, "that if either of them merely spoke a word for me any revolt would be quelled. This was little enough to expect in view of what I had done for them, sometimes to my own distinct political disadvantage."

Following his defeat, Martin's influence in Congress and the Republican party declined rapidly. In 1966, he was defeated in his district's Republican congressional primary. Martin died of peritonitis while vacationing in Hollywood, Florida, on March 6, 1968.

—MSM

Martin, William McChesney

(1906–1998) chairman, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System

The son of a prominent banker who helped draft the Federal Reserve Act of 1913 and served as president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, William McChesney Martin, Jr., was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on December 17, 1906. He graduated from Yale University, where he majored in English and Latin, in 1928. His first job was as a bank examiner in the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis. Martin then became head of the statistical department of A. G. Edwards & Sons, a brokerage firm based in St. Louis. He became the youngest partner in the firm's history and in 1931 acquired a seat on the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE).

He joined a group that pressed for reform of the structure of the New York Stock Exchange in the aftermath of the stock market crash of 1929. His activities on behalf of reform led to his election to the NYSE's board of governors in 1935 and to president of the exchange in 1938. At the age of 31, he was the youngest person ever to hold the position. Inducted into the army as a private in 1941, he was commissioned as an officer the following year. He served with the Munitions Allocation Board as well as the army liaison to Congress and eventually supervised the Lend-Lease program to the Soviet Union. At the end of the war, he was discharged as a colonel.

In February 1946, President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed him president and chairman of the board of the Export-Import Bank, formed to grant loans to foreign countries. Three years later, Martin became assistant secretary of the Treasury for monetary affairs. While serving in that post, he engineered the famous Accord between Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board. During World War II, the Federal Reserve supported the price of government securities, which enabled the government to borrow at low interest rates. After the war, the Federal Reserve became increasingly uneasy with this arrangement, because it made it impossible for the Federal Reserve to control the supply of money. Both Mariner Eccles and Thomas McCabe as chairmen of the Federal Reserve Board pushed to free the Federal Reserve Board from "pegging" bond prices. The secretary of the Treasury, John Snyder, wanted to keep the government's cost of borrowing low and opposed the move. Martin sided with the Federal Reserve; he considered a free capital market essential for the economy. The conflict became heated in August 1950, when the Federal Reserve raised short-term interest rates. This led to a series of conflicts between the Federal Reserve on one side and Snyder and Truman on the other. In February 1951, Martin negotiated an agreement, known as the Accord, that called for the restructuring of part of the federal government's long-term debt and freeing the Federal Reserve from "pegging" the bond market. McCabe, who had opposed the president, resigned soon after the Accord was reached, and Truman named Martin to chair the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

Although Martin had functioned mainly as a conciliator in the resolution of the conflict between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve, the Accord reflected his belief in the independence of the Federal Reserve and a free market in the buying and selling of domestic securities. Martin sternly defended these principles in his two decades as chair of the Federal Reserve. He also watched diligently for signs of inflation and used the power of the Federal Reserve to fight it.

During the presidency of Dwight D. Eisenhower, Martin's conservative attitude toward credit aroused controversy. As chief steward of the country's money supply, he was the most influential exponent of a policy of "tight money" (restricting credit to banks in order to moderate the pace of economic expansion and curtail inflation). He accomplished this chiefly by raising reserve requirements of banks belonging to the Federal Reserve System and by increasing the rediscount rate (the rate of interest charged by the Federal Reserve on loans to member banks).

In the spring of 1953, Martin tightened credit to reinforce the Eisenhower administration's effort to fight inflation. At about the same time, Martin made major speeches in which he asserted that the Federal Reserve's action must be held to a minimum. His statement that "use of the discount window is a privilege not a right" led many dealers in government securities to conclude that the Federal Reserve would be cutting off credit to member banks. According to Fortune, "the 'bond panic' of May 1953 followed. The Federal Reserve had to jump in with heavy open market purchases before apprehension subsided."

Over the decade, Martin steadily enforced a policy of tighter money. The rediscount rate rose from 1.5 percent in early 1954 to 3 percent by 1960. Democratic politicians and many economists denounced Martin's policy, charging that tight money was a major cause of the recessions of the 1950s. Martin persistently defended his actions. In December 1956, he argued that a proposed drop in interest rates would only increase the money supply and accelerate inflation. He insisted, moreover, that the credit crunch was due more to high demand for credit than to any action by the Federal Reserve. "Creating more money will not create more goods," he maintained. "It will only intensify demands for the current supply of labor and materials. That is outright inflation."

In addition to the direct impact he exerted on financial policy, Martin often added his prestigious counsel to public debates on other economic issues. Throughout the 1950s, he argued against Democratic proposals to stimulate the economy by cutting taxes. Opposing a congressional plan to lower personal income taxes, he said in February 1954: "If you increase the money consumers have . . . there is no guarantee that the consumer will spend the money. . . . Emphasis needs to be on the production side at this juncture." In June 1957, Martin argued that a proposed tax cut would make the Federal Reserve's effort to curb inflation "well-nigh impossible." During the recession of 1958, he again opposed a tax cut to stimulate the economy.

In 1955, during the Senate Banking and Currency Committee's probe into fluctuations in the stock market, Martin defended his free market principles. Criticizing proposals to ban buying stocks on credit, he said: "The stock market should not be denied access to credit unless you want to promote a lower standard of living." He insisted that higher margin requirements were not "cure-alls for all stock market excesses" and defended risk-taking and speculation as the "proper function" of a securities market.

In 1956, Eisenhower appointed Martin to a full 14-year term on the Federal Reserve's Board of Governors. In the late 1950s, in spite of criticism, Martin maintained restrictions on credit. During the campaign of 1960, his policies became a topic of debate. Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) attacked tight money, and his Republican opponent, Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, promised to uphold the "independence" of the Federal Reserve. After his defeat, however, Nixon blamed his loss in part on the Federal Reserve's slow response to the recession in 1960.

During the 1960s, Martin remained to many conservatives the symbol of a sound dollar. To populists like Representative WRIGHT PATMAN (D-Tex.), however, he represented policies that enriched big banks and Wall Street while choking small business. Martin got along well with Presidents Kennedy and Johnson and eased monetary policy for a time to accommodate their stimulative fiscal policies. During the Vietnam War, interest rates rose to their highest levels since the 1920s, and Martin once again became the focus of controversy. In December 1968, President-elect Nixon, who wanted to name ARTHUR BURNS to chair the Federal Reserve Board, offered Martin the position of secretary of the Treasury. Martin declined the offer and indicated that he intended to serve the remainder of his term on the Federal Reserve Board, which ran until January 1970. Several months before the expiration of Martin's term, Nixon announced that Burns would replace Martin when the latter's term ended. When Martin's term expired at the end of January 1970, he returned to private life. He held a variety of directorships of firms and nonprofit organizations. He died at his home in Washington, D.C., on July 27, 1998.

—MSM

Matthews, J(oseph) B(rown)

(1894–1966) staff director, Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Senate Government Operations Committee

Born in Hopkinsville, Kentucky, on June 28, 1894, J. B. Matthews attended Asbury College in Wilmore, Kentucky. In 1915, he went to Java in the Dutch East Indies (now Indonesia) as a Methodist missionary. He worked as treasurer for the mission and wrote a hymnal in the Malay language. Returning to the United States in 1921, he earned a D.B. and a M.A. from Drew University and then a S.T.M. from Union Theological Seminary in New York. At that time, he embraced the ideas of the Social Gospel movement. After preaching in Bound Brook, New Jersey, he got a job in 1924 at Scarritt College, a Methodist institution in Nashville, Tennessee, where he taught Hebrew and religious history. His activities on behalf of Robert LaFollette's 1924 presidential campaign, his pacifism, and his sermons opposing segregation and child labor led to his forced resignation in 1928. He then taught Hebrew at Fisk and Howard University, two black colleges. In 1929, Matthews became executive secretary of the pacifist Fellowship of Reconciliation. That same year, he joined the Socialist Party. The Fellowship of Reconciliation, an organization devoted to racial and religious toleration, fired him in 1933, after Matthews, speaking to a crowd of 15,000 at Madison Square Garden, advocated a dictatorship of the proletariat to stop Hitler. He became involved with a number of pro-Soviet organizations, as a result of which the Socialist Party suspended him in 1935.

In 1933, he went to work for Consumers' Research (CR), where he assisted with product testing, wrote articles, and gave lectures. He quickly rose to become vice president. With Ruth Shallcross, he coauthored Partners in Plunder (1935), which assailed the "business dictatorship in the U.S." Matthews later called it a "stinking, nasty book" and said "God forgive me for writing that." During the mid-1930s, Matthews turned sharply to the right. He was one of three managers who led the opposition to a strike against CR in 1935. His son, who was a replacement worker at CR during the strike, was dragged off a bus and beaten by strikers. The strike ended in a victory for management but resulted in Matthews's banishment from leftist circles.

In 1938, Matthews published an autobiography, Odyssey of a Fellow Traveler. That same year, he appeared as a star witness before the Special House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) and named 94 "Communist front groups" with which he had been associated. The chair of the committee, Martin Dies (D-Tex.), subsequently hired him as chief investigator. In that capacity, Matthews supervised the collection and indexing of a massive body of information on communist-inspired activity. He left HUAC in 1945, taking with him his voluminous files based on the committee's investigations, which included a private list of 22,000 alleged "fellow travelers" (a term he claimed to have introduced into the American language). Upon leaving HUAC, Matthews went to work for John A. Clements Associates and worked as a consultant to Hearst publications. He continued to maintain a network of connections with disillusioned former communists.

Matthews came to the aid of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) in 1950, after the senator's allegations that the State Department harbored communists led to a congressional investigation. Matthews provided much of the documentation for McCarthy's charges against the State Department and used his contacts with the powerful conservative publisher, William Randolph Hearst, Jr., to persuade the Hearst papers to support McCarthy. In 1953, McCarthy named Matthews staff director for the Senate Government Operations Committee's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which McCarthy chaired. Shortly after his appointment, an article by Matthews titled "Reds in Our Churches" appeared in the American Mercury. Its allegation that "the largest single group supporting the Communist apparatus in the United States is composed of Protestant clergymen" provoked a storm of protest. Democratic members of the subcommittee demanded that Matthews be fired. McCarthy at first refused but gave in after the White House released a statement condemning the article. The Republican majority on the subcommittee, however, responded with a face-saving motion giving the chair exclusive power to hire and fire staff. This led the Democratic minority to boycott the subcommittee.

After being fired from the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, Matthews wrote for several right-wing periodicals and gave lectures. In the 1960s, his name appeared on the masthead of American Opinion, the periodical of the extreme right-wing John Birch Society. Matthews died in New York City on July 16, 1966.

—MSM

McCarran, Patrick A(nthony)

(1876–1954) U.S. senator

The son of Irish Catholic immigrants, McCarran was born in Reno, Nevada, on August 8, 1876. He attended public schools and the University of Nevada at Reno. When his father suffered an injury, McCarran withdrew from college and went home to run the family's sheep ranch. He became involved in local politics and won election to the state legislature as a free silver Democrat in 1902. In addition to ranching and politics, he studied law, and, after losing a bid for the state senate in 1904, he passed the bar exam and was admitted to the bar in 1905. He moved to Tonopah, a mining boom town, and began to practice law. In 1906, he won election as district attorney for Nye County. A political maverick, McCarran soon made enemies within the state's Democratic Party. A failed attempt to unseat an incumbent member of the U.S. House of Representatives in the Democratic primary in 1908 further alienated him from the state's Democratic establishment. Nevertheless, he won election to the Nevada Supreme Court in 1912 and served from 1913 to 1918. In 1916, he made an unsuccessful bid to unseat an incumbent for the Democratic nomination to the U.S. Senate. That decision would come back to haunt him. Two years later, the opposition of powerful Democrats cost him his bid for reelection to the supreme court. After running unsuccessfully for a seat in the U.S. Senate again in 1926, he finally won election to that body in 1932.

Although he came into office with the Roosevelt landslide, he quickly emerged as an opponent of the New Deal. His outspoken and determined resistance to Franklin D. Roosevelt's court packing plan in 1937 earned him both national attention and Roosevelt's enmity. Because of his opposition to the New Deal, McCarran had to fight for the Democratic nomination in 1938 and again in 1944; he captured the nomination both times and went on to win the general election. During the Truman administration, McCarran played an important role in the resurgence of congressional conservatism. As chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, he also became a leading figure in the anticommunist crusade of the late 1940s and early 1950s. McCarran's attacks often focused on liberals, who, he charged, naively advanced the cause of communism. In 1950, he sponsored the Internal Security Act, known as the McCarran Act, which required that all "communist-action" and "communist front" organizations register with the Subversive Activities Control Board and disclose the names of their officers and members. Under provisions of the act, communists were denied passports and barred from working for the government or in the defense industry. The measure also provided that the Justice Department could deport subversive aliens or bar them from entering the United States. In addition, the act contained a provision, originally introduced by liberal Democrats, authorizing the president to declare an "internal security emergency," during which the attorney general had authority to detain anyone whom he had "reason to believe" might engage in subversive activities. Truman vetoed the measure, but Congress promptly overrode the veto.

McCarran was one of the few Democrats who endorsed Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) charges that communists had infiltrated the Roosevelt and Truman administrations. Like McCarthy, McCarran maintained that communist subversion had corrupted the State Department and American foreign policy. After appointing himself chair of the Judiciary Committee's newly established Internal Security Subcommittee in 1951, McCarran set up connections between his subcommittee and the FBI. He investigated communist influence in labor unions, the entertainment industry, and higher education. From mid-1951 to mid-1952, he conducted an investigation of the Institute of Pacific Relations (IPR), a left-leaning think tank devoted to the study of Asian affairs. McCarran blamed government officials associated with the IPR for the “loss” of China. The senator focused his attention on Owen Lattimore, a professor at Johns Hopkins and an expert on the Far East, who was editor of the IPR’s journal, Public Affairs. In 12 days of testimony, Lattimore belligerently responded to questions and allegations. Some of the professor’s responses to detailed, specific questions, however, were contradicted by documents seized in an earlier raid by agents of the McCarran committee. McCarran repeatedly pressed the Truman administration to indict Lattimore for perjury. Although the Justice Department got a grand jury to indict Lattimore, an appellate court threw out four of the seven counts and found the others doubtful.

McCarran’s concern about domestic subversion led him to sponsor legislation reforming immigration laws. In 1948, he helped draw up the Displaced Persons Act, which permitted the admission of roughly 200,000 refugees. Despite criticism that the measure discriminated against Jews and Catholics from Eastern Europe, the senator refused to budge. Congress passed new legislation in 1950 that permitted freer immigration. In 1952, McCarran and Representative Francis E. Walter (D-Pa.) introduced a complete overhaul of the immigration and naturalization laws. The McCarran-Walter Act repealed the nearly total ban on immigration from Asia. Although McCarran himself did not approve of immigration from non-European countries, he recognized the propaganda value of eliminating the racial bar. Reflecting McCarran’s views, the law set an annual quota of 100 people from each nation of Asia and the Pacific. Moreover, the measure retained the principle of national origins and the quota system established in the 1920s. In doing so, it favored immigration from Western Europe and continued to exclude most Eastern Europeans. Finally, the bill broadened the grounds for excluding and deporting aliens. Congress passed the bill over Truman’s veto in 1952.

After that, however, McCarran’s power began to slip. Both presidential candidates in 1952 disassociated themselves from the McCarran-Walter Act. Eisenhower repudiated the measure as a “blasphemy against democracy.” McCarran further alienated the Democratic Party establishment by disavowing the party’s nominee, ADLAI STEVENSON, who, sneered McCarran, “wouldn’t know a Democrat if he saw one.” Even in Nevada, the rapid growth of Las Vegas undermined the senator’s power. Further, his close connections with the state’s gambling interests became public. To make matters worse, the Republicans won control of both houses of Congress, which cost McCarran his committee chairmanships. Despite all this and his isolation from his party, he still remained influential in the Senate.

In his first State of the Union message, Eisenhower asked Congress to pass a new immigration bill. In April 1953, Eisenhower requested emergency legislation to admit 240,000 non-quota immigrants, most of them refugees from Eastern Europe. McCarran opposed the measure. The president met privately with the senator from Nevada but later admitted to Republican congressional leaders that “I made about as much impression on him as beating on a steel lid with a sponge.” McCarran successfully prevailed on the Senate to reduce substantially the number of immigrants eligible for admission and to provide screening procedures to ensure against “communist infiltration.”

McCarran supported efforts by conservatives to bring foreign policy under the control of Congress. In 1953, he joined several conservative Republican senators, led by McCarthy, in an effort to block the nomination of CHARLES E. BOHLEN as ambassador to the Soviet Union. Even though Bohlen had the firm support of Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, McCarran and other opponents of the nomination linked the career diplomat to what they termed Truman’s policy of appeasement toward the Soviet Union. Despite the opposition, the administration stood behind the nomination, and Bohlen was eventually confirmed. Throughout 1953 and into 1954, McCarran supported the Bricker Amendment, a series of proposed amendments to the U.S. Constitution that would have limited the president’s power to enter treaties. Eisenhower opposed the measure, and in February 1954 it narrowly failed to win the necessary two-thirds majority in the Senate.

Even though, as chair of the Internal Security Subcommittee, McCarran had come to resent McCarthy's encroachment on the subcommittee's mandate to investigate subversion, McCarran managed to impede efforts to censure McCarthy throughout the summer of 1954. On September 27, 1954, after the Watkins Committee recommended censure, McCarran gave a speech on the Senate floor attacking the committee and its recommendation. The next day, after addressing a political rally in Hawthorne, Nevada, McCarran collapsed and died of a heart attack.

—MSM

McCarthy, Eugene J(joseph)

(1916–2005) U.S. congressman and senator

Born in Watkins, Minnesota, on March 29, 1916, McCarthy attended public schools in Watkins and graduated from St. John's University in Minnesota in 1935. After college, he spent nine months as a novitiate in a Benedictine monastery. He then taught in public high schools until 1940. After receiving a master's degree in sociology and economics from the University of Minnesota in 1939, he taught at St. John's from 1940 to 1943. McCarthy worked as a civilian for the War Department's Military Intelligence Division during 1944. From 1946 to 1949, he was an instructor of sociology and economics at St. Thomas College in Minnesota. He served as acting head of the sociology department.

He entered politics in 1947 as a supporter of HUBERT HUMPHREY, who had been the principal figure in uniting the Minnesota Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party and was then struggling for control of the party with the communist-led left wing. McCarthy won election to the U.S. House of Representatives as a Democrat in 1948 and won reelection four times. In the House, McCarthy compiled a liberal, pro-labor voting record and generally supported the Eisenhower administration on foreign policy. In 1952, McCarthy engaged in a nationally televised debate (on NBC's American Forum of the Air) with the publicity-seeking anticommunist, Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.), when no senator was willing to confront the demagogue from Wisconsin. Eugene McCarthy began to express concern about the unsupervised activities of the Central Intelligence Agency in 1955 and introduced legislation to create a congressional watchdog committee. McCarthy organized an informal caucus of liberal House Democrats in 1956. Although the group achieved little in the way of legislation, it was formally reconstituted as the Democratic Study Group in 1959, and it played an important role in the battle to reform the House Rules Committee in 1961. This, in turn, helped pave the way for the enactment of liberal legislation in the 1960s.

He won election to the Senate in 1958 by defeating a two-term incumbent, EDWARD THYE (R-Minn.). Thye was hurt by his association with the farm policies of the Eisenhower administration, which were unpopular in Minnesota. Assigned to the Public Works Committee and the Finance Committee, McCarthy compiled a consistently liberal voting record, yet he managed to avoid alienating powerful conservatives in his party such as Senator HARRY BYRD (D-Va.) and Senator ROBERT KERR (D-Okla.). In 1959, McCarthy became one of the first senators to oppose Eisenhower's nominee for secretary of commerce, LEWIS STRAUSS. McCarthy charged that, as chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, Strauss had gone "beyond reasonable limits" in refusing to cooperate with Congress.

Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON (D-Tex.) named McCarthy to chair the newly created Special Senate Subcommittee on Unemployment Problems in 1959. Over the next six months, the committee held hearings in 12 states and heard 538 witnesses. Its report, published in March 1960, warned that the postwar baby boom would swell a workforce already afflicted with growing unemployment. In response to that situation, the report proposed a 12-point plan, including aid to distressed areas, stimulative economic policies, job retraining programs, higher unemployment benefits, longer eligibility for unemployment benefits, and expanded public works.

McCarthy drew national attention for his speech nominating ADLAI STEVENSON at the Democratic Convention in 1960. He pleaded with the convention, "Do not reject this man. Do not reject this man who made us all proud to be Democrats." His highly emotional speech had little impact on the outcome of the convention; Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) had more than enough delegates to secure the nomination. McCarthy won reelection to the Senate in 1964 by the largest popular majority of any Democratic candidate in the history of Minnesota. With his dry wit and aloof demeanor, McCarthy stood apart from his Senate colleagues. He often seemed bored by the Senate and was frequently absent. Not surprisingly, he failed to attain substantial influence within that body.

McCarthy's greatest impact on American politics came in 1968, when, based on his opposition to the war in Vietnam, he challenged President Lyndon Johnson for the Democratic nomination. McCarthy's strong showing in the New Hampshire primary that March revealed a strong undercurrent of antiwar sentiment and contributed to Johnson's decision later that month not to seek reelection. McCarthy and Senator ROBERT F. KENNEDY (D-N.Y.) bitterly contested the primaries until Kennedy was assassinated in June. Although McCarthy had won victories in Wisconsin and Oregon, the Democratic Convention nominated Vice President Hubert Humphrey. After the convention, McCarthy went to the French Riviera and then covered the World Series for Life magazine (McCarthy had played semiprofessional baseball as a young man). He did not endorse Humphrey until the last week of the campaign—and then managed only a pallid endorsement. The Republican candidate, RICHARD M. NIXON, narrowly defeated Humphrey in the November election.

After the election, McCarthy continued to behave in a manner many regarded as erratic. He gave up his seat on the Foreign Relations Committee, knowing full well that his replacement would be Gale McGee (D-Wyo.), a hawk on the war in Vietnam. McCarthy did not stand for reelection to the Senate in 1970. He ran marginal campaigns for the presidency in 1972, 1976, 1988, and 1992. In 1980, he endorsed Ronald Reagan, the Republican nominee, for the presidency. McCarthy made a bid for a Senate seat from Minnesota in 1982, but failed to gain his party's nomination. He was a prolific author, whose books included Frontiers in American Democracy (1960), A Liberal Answer to the Conservative Challenge (1964), The Limits of Power (1967), The Year of the People (1969), and Up 'Til Now (1987), a political memoir. He also published a volume of poetry, Other Things and the Aardvark (1970). His last book, published in January 2005, was a collection of essays and poems, titled Parting Shots from My Brittle Bow: Reflections on American Politics and Life. After retiring from the Senate, he moved to Rappahannock County, Virginia, where he lived alone for nearly 20 years in the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains. McCarthy died of Parkinson's disease on December 10, 2005, in an assisted living facility in Georgetown.

McCarthy, Joseph R(aymond)

(1908–1957) U.S. senator; chairman, Government Operations Committee; chairman, Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Government Operations Committee

The fifth of seven children, McCarthy was born on his father's farm near Grand Chute, Wisconsin, on November 14, 1908. Upon completing eighth grade, McCarthy left school and raised chickens on land rented from his father. After a bout with influenza contributed to the failure of his poultry business, McCarthy took a job as a clerk in a Cash-Way store. The hardworking and popular young man soon became a manager. Shortly after that, he was transferred to manage a new store at Manawa, Wisconsin. He returned to high school in 1929 and completed four years of work in one year, while holding a job as an usher in a movie theater.

McCarthy entered the school of engineering at Marquette University in Milwaukee but shifted to law after two years. At Marquette, McCarthy was known as an intensely competitive and talkative young man. He received his LL.B. in 1935 and was admitted to the Wisconsin bar the same year. He opened a private legal practice in Manawa but attracted little business. McCarthy occupied his time by joining a number of civic and fraternal organizations, including the Young Democratic Club. He attracted the attention of Mike G. Eberlein, an established lawyer from the nearby town of Shawano, who offered him a job. In 1936, he ran unsuccessfully as the Democratic candidate for district attorney of Shawano County, Wisconsin. Three years later, he ran for judge of the tenth circuit court (a nonpartisan office) and, conducting a tireless campaign, upset an incumbent who had held the position for 24 years. On the bench, McCarthy disposed of a huge backlog of cases within a matter of months.

Waiving his judicial deferment, McCarthy volunteered for service in the Marine Corps in 1942 and was assigned to the South Pacific as an intelligence officer, whose job was to debrief combat pilots returning from their missions. Although in subsequent political campaigns he called himself "Tail-Gunner Joe," he did not fly in combat. McCarthy had not resigned his judgeship, and Wisconsin law barred judges from running for any other public office during the term for which they were elected. In addition, military regulations forbade servicemen from speaking on political issues. Despite these prohibitions, he entered the Wisconsin Republican senatorial primary in 1944 against the incumbent, Senator ALEXANDER WILEY (R-Wis.). McCarthy obtained a leave to go home and campaign. He skirted the ban on servicemen speaking on political issues with subterfuges such as "if I weren't in uniform, I would say . . ." McCarthy ran a vigorous campaign but ultimately lost to Wiley. McCarthy asked to be relieved from active duty in February 1945 and resigned his commission the following month. He won reelection to his judgeship in 1945.

In 1946, McCarthy entered the Republican primary for the state's other seat in the Senate, held by Robert M. La Follette, Jr., the leader of Wisconsin's Progressive Party. That year, however, La Follette disbanded the Progressive Party and entered the Republican primary. McCarthy benefited from the state Republican leadership's dislike for La Follette and from the senator's record of pursuing national issues to the neglect of state interests. In addition, many trade unionists refused to follow La Follette into the Republican Party and cast their votes in the Democratic primary. McCarthy campaigned indefatigably and defeated the incumbent by 5,000 votes. He went on to defeat his Democratic opponent, Howard McMurray, in the general election by a landslide, garnering 620,000 votes to his opponent's 279,000.

During his first three years in the Senate, McCarthy compiled an undistinguished record. While his voting record on domestic matters was generally conservative, he did not vote consistently against New Deal types of programs. On foreign policy, he leaned toward moderate internationalism. McCarthy became known as the "Pepsi-Cola Kid" for his efforts on behalf of that company to decontrol sugar (it should be noted that beet producers in Wisconsin also wanted decontrol). In 1947 and 1948, he played a role in blocking public housing legislation sponsored by Senator ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio). His opposition to public housing derived, at least in part, from favors he received from the Lustron Corporation, a manufacturer of prefabricated housing. In 1949, McCarthy, whose district had a large German population, questioned whether 73 Nazi SS troopers, 43 of whom received the death penalty, had been fairly convicted by an American war crimes tribunal. The charges against the German defendants grew out of their involvement in the Malmédy Massacre, in which the SS mowed down American prisoners of war with machine guns during the Battle of the Bulge. The convictions had undergone scrutiny by the War Crimes Review Board and the office of the Judge Advocate, which found some procedural irregularities but concluded that the trials were "essentially fair."

During the late 1940s, internal subversion became a major national issue. Many Republicans charged that communist supporters had infiltrated the administrations of Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and HARRY S. TRUMAN. While rejecting the accusation, Truman established a Loyalty Program in 1947, which provided for the review of all government employees and applicants for government employment. The program denied those under review basic procedural safeguards, and, under it, thousands of government workers lost their jobs. Moreover, Truman and other Democrats accused conservative Republicans, who did not support large defense budgets, multilateral defense pacts, universal military training, and conscription, of being dupes of communists.

Senator Joseph McCarthy testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations committee, March 14, 1950 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Competing charges of disloyalty and insufficient vigilance against communism increased in intensity in 1949, with the communist victory in China, the detonation of a Soviet atomic device, and the conviction under the Smith Act of American leaders of the Communist Party for conspiring to advocate the violent overthrow of the U.S. government. The conviction of Alger Hiss for perjury in 1950 further agitated the public. While a member of the State Department, Hiss had passed documents to WHITTAKER CHAMBERS in the 1930s and subsequently lied about it before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The same month as Hiss's conviction, Klaus Fuchs, a British scientist who worked on the Manhattan Project, confessed to passing atomic secrets to the Soviets.

McCarthy initially paid little attention to the issue of internal communist subversion. Early in 1950, however, he was looking for an issue to elevate his profile in preparation for his bid for reelection in 1952. At a Lincoln Day speech to a Republican women's group in Wheeling, West Virginia, on February 9, 1950, McCarthy charged that there were 205 or 57 Communists in the State Department. He did not speak from a prepared text, and accounts of his charges differed. Later, on the Senate floor, he claimed to have 108 documented cases. The charges were not original; much of the speech was a verbatim repetition of charges made over several years by conservatives in both parties. Moreover, several other Republicans speaking on Lincoln Day made similar remarks. McCarthy's spectacular and exaggerated claims, however, attracted headlines.

The Senate established a special subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in late February to investigate McCarthy's claims. The leadership chose Senator Millard Tydings, a conservative Democrat from Maryland, to head the subcommittee. In July the Democratic majority on the panel issued a report denouncing McCarthy's charges as false and condemning him for unethical tactics. The Republican minority on the committee defended McCarthy and called the report a whitewash of the State Department. The hearings attracted considerable publicity and did nothing to diminish the attention McCarthy got.

In June 1950, Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH (R-Maine) and six other liberal Republican senators issued a "Declaration of Conscience" criticizing McCarthy for making irresponsible charges. Many Republicans who believed McCarthy's accusations reckless did not criticize the junior senator from Wisconsin because the issue of internal subversion had proved to be an effective political weapon, and they did not want to vitiate the issue or to risk a reaction that would discredit the entire party.

Many Democrats feared that, if they attacked McCarthy, it would appear to confirm that they were soft on communism. Moreover, in the campaign of 1950, McCarthy campaigned against a number of leading Democrats who lost their seats in the November elections, including Scott Lucas (D-Ill.), the majority leader, and, most notably, Millard Tydings. In fact, all of the candidates against whom McCarthy campaigned ran ahead of their state party tickets. Tydings, in particular, lost for a variety of reasons unrelated to McCarthy or concerns about communists in government. The results, however, seemed to demonstrate not only McCarthy's popularity but his ability to defeat political enemies. Members of both parties refrained from criticizing McCarthy for fear that he would turn his attacks on them and cost them their seats. Moreover, anticommunism was a bipartisan doctrine. Conservative Democrats, such as Senator PAT McCARRAN of Nevada, Representative John E. Rankin of Mississippi, and Representative Martin Dies, Jr., of Texas, had warned of communists in government (often conflating liberals with communists) and conducted investigations long before McCarthy had taken up the issue. The strident anticommunist rhetoric of the Truman administration and of cold war liberals as well as the Truman administration's response to McCarthy's charges gave credence to the allegations.

McCarthy was not the first of the vocal anti-communists; neither was he the most effective. He was, however, the loudest and most reckless. His success depended only in part on postwar concerns about communism abroad and at home. McCarthy's attacks were calculated to take advantage of resentments caused by social strains in American society. He focused much of his vituperation against an educated, eastern elite that would later be called the Establishment. McCarthy heaped scorn on "dilettante diplomats" and those who were "born with silver spoons in their mouths." The Ivy League and Anglophile affectations of DEAN ACHESON, Truman's secretary of state, made irresistible targets for McCarthy's invective. McCarthy's own skills as a demagogue also contributed to his rapid rise. Unlike most demagogues, McCarthy did not give stem-winding, highly emotional speeches. Rather, he spoke in a monotone, even as he made his most outrageous charges. The delivery lent credence to his accusations, in that they seemed to be unemotional and therefore "factual." When criticized, he charged his accuser with being pro-communist or soft on communism. McCarthy also employed a technique that one commentator called the "multiple untruth"; he threw out a series of charges, and, before they could be checked or disproved, he had moved on to other charges. The disclaimers never caught up to the allegations. Finally, McCarthy made effective use of the press. He issued sensational accusations just before deadlines. What were reporters to do? If a reporter held the story until the facts could be checked, other papers would beat his paper to the story. Further, if the accusations turned out to be true, the reporter who did not go with the story would likely be out of a job. Moreover, reporters could console themselves with the thought that it was news that a U.S. senator had made such allegations.

McCarthy's charges became more sensational and increasingly outlandish. Speaking on the floor of the Senate, he denounced Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall as a traitor. Marshall had served as army chief of staff during World War II and later as secretary of state. He was one of the most respected figures in America, but it was an indication of McCarthy's power of intimidation that no one in the Senate objected when McCarthy charged Marshall with participating in a "great conspiracy" that accounted for the series of setbacks America had suffered at the hands of the communists since the end of World War II. McCarthy taunted the secretary of state, Dean Acheson, calling him the "Red Dean of Fashion."

In August 1951, Senator WILLIAM BENTON (D-Conn.) introduced a resolution calling on the Rules Committee to examine McCarthy's conduct to determine if he should be expelled from the Senate. The resolution was referred to the committee's Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, which had only recently issued a report critical of McCarthy's unethical actions in the Maryland senatorial election of 1950. After an investigation that dragged on for over a year, the subcommittee issued a report, written largely by Senator THOMAS HENNINGS (D-Mo.), that raised questions about McCarthy's finances but did not call for action against him.

McCarthy's notoriety made him made him both a prominent figure and an issue in the elections of 1952. Curiously, though, the senator played no role in the campaign for the Republican presidential nomination in 1952. The Republican nominee, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, detested McCarthy. Moreover, Eisenhower was a personal friend of Marshall, to whom he owed his rapid advancement during World War II. JOSEPH ALSOP and STEWART ALSOP published a report that Eisenhower would not campaign in Wisconsin on behalf of McCarthy or in Indiana on behalf of Senator WILLIAM JENNER (R-Ind.), another critic of Marshall. In fact, Eisenhower had told his staff not to make plans to visit Wisconsin. At a press conference in August, an irate Eisenhower declared that he had "no patience with anyone who can find in his [Marshall's] record of service for this country anything to criticize." Eisenhower went on to call his former superior a patriot and to proclaim that there was "nothing of disloyalty in General Marshall's soul." When aides pressed on the candidate the need to campaign in Wisconsin, Eisenhower reluctantly agreed. He asked a speechwriter, EMMET JOHN HUGHES, to include a tribute to Marshall in the speech scheduled for October 3 in McCarthy's home state. At an appearance in Indiana, Eisenhower endorsed the Republican ticket in the state but pointedly did not mention Jenner's name, even though the senator had introduced him and remained on the platform. As Eisenhower's campaign headed into Wisconsin, the state's Republican governor, WALTER KOHLER, begged the candidate not to attack McCarthy in Wisconsin, because it would split the Republican Party in the state. The Republican nominee also met with McCarthy and told the senator in no uncertain terms what he thought of him. Eisenhower defended Marshall and, over McCarthy's objections, indicated his intent to make a laudatory reference to Marshall. Ultimately, however, Kohler's repeated entreaties, supported by several of Eisenhower's senior aides, persuaded the candidate to cut the statement regarding Marshall from the speech. The press had an advance copy of the speech and interpreted the deletion as a surrender to McCarthy.

McCarthy campaigned for conservative Republicans in several states and famously referred to the Democratic presidential nominee, ADLAI STEVENSON, as "Alger . . . I mean Adlai." At first glance, the outcome of the elections seemed to confirm McCarthy's power. Three of the four Democratic senatorial incumbents he campaigned against lost, including William Benton of Connecticut and the majority leader, Ernest W. McFarland of Arizona. McCarthy himself won reelection by a comfortable margin, although he ran well behind Eisenhower. McCarthy ran even farther behind Fred Zimmerman, the anti-McCarthy Republican candidate for secretary of state. Indeed, McCarthy ran behind all other Republican candidates for statewide office. Further, all of the defeated Democrats against whom McCarthy campaigned ran ahead of the national ticket in their states. McCarthy's power was more apparent than real, but the appearance counted.

Republicans won control of both houses of Congress in 1952, and McCarthy became chair of the Senate Committee on Government Operations and its subcommittee on investigations. For the committee's chief counsel, he chose ROY MARCUS COHN, an ambitious and caustic attorney from Manhattan, who had served as prosecutor in the trial of JULIUS AND ETHEL ROSENBERG for passing secrets to the Soviets. Although it was not the brief of his committee, McCarthy launched a series of investigations into "communist influence" in the federal government.

Immediately after the elections of 1952, McCarthy announced his intention to cooperate with the new Republican administration. Beginning in January 1953, however, he joined Republican conservatives who objected to Eisenhower's nominations of General WALTER BEDELL SMITH as undersecretary of state and JAMES B. CONANT as U.S. high commissioner to Germany. In March, McCarthy joined the far more serious conservative opposition, led by Senator STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.) and Senator PAT McCARRAN (D-Nev.), to Eisenhower's nominee for ambassador to the Soviet Union, CHARLES E. BOHLEN. McCarthy questioned the loyalty of Bohlen, who had served in the State Department under Roosevelt and Truman. When Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES said that there was "no substantial evidence" for doubting Bohlen's patriotism, McCarthy called Dulles a liar. Bohlen was ultimately confirmed, but not without a protracted and nasty dispute.

Several of Eisenhower's advisers wanted him to denounce McCarthy publicly. Others hoped to avoid confrontation with the junior senator from Wisconsin, fearing that an open break would cause a rift in the Republican Party that would threaten the president's legislative program. Eisenhower repeatedly expressed in private both his disgust for McCarthy and his unwillingness to "get down in the gutter with that guy."

McCarthy announced in late March 1953 that he had negotiated an agreement with a group of Greek shipowners, in which they had promised to cease trade with Communist China and North Korea. The State Department dismissed McCarthy's claims as "phony," and HAROLD STASSEN, the director of the U.S. Foreign Operations Administration, denounced McCarthy for "undermining" the administration's conduct of foreign affairs. Subsequently, Dulles issued a conciliatory statement, and, at a press conference, Eisenhower suggested that Stassen might have meant "infringed on" rather than "undermined." Stassen dutifully accepted Eisenhower's interpretation.

Meanwhile, McCarthy launched a series of investigations that attracted headlines but failed to expose any communists. In February 1953, he began an investigation of the Voice of America. He insinuated that the cancellation of some broadcasts and the improper location of transmitters had been done to further the communist cause. McCarthy also investigated the Government Printing Office. In April, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations looked into the overseas libraries operated by the State Department. McCarthy sent Cohn and the panel's chief consultant, G. DAVID SCHINE, on a tour of the libraries in Europe. At home, McCarthy called before his subcommittee allegedly leftist writers whose works appeared in those libraries. Alarmed by McCarthy's attacks, officials in the State Department ordered the libraries to remove material written by "Communists, fellow travelers, et cetera." Some books were burned. This proved too much for Eisenhower, who, speaking without notes at the commencement exercises of Dartmouth College in June, admonished students, "Don't join the book burners. Don't think you are going to conceal faults by concealing evidence that they ever existed. Don't be afraid to go in your library and read every book." When asked at a press conference to link those comments to McCarthy, Eisenhower refused, citing his policy "never [to] talk personalities."

McCarthy suffered an embarrassment after he hired J. B. MATTHEWS as executive director of the staff for the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations in June 1953. A conservative Methodist minister in the 1920s and early 1930s, Matthews became a Marxist and an atheist in 1935. Three years later, he again reversed course and became a right-wing anticommunist. Just before he joined the subcommittee's staff, an article by Matthews appeared in the July issue of American Mercury charging that "the largest single group supporting the Communist apparatus in the United States today is composed of Protestant clergymen." The subcommittee's ranking minority member, Senator JOHN MCCLELLAN (D-Ark.), and the other Democratic members of the panel demanded that Matthews be dismissed. McCarthy refused, but the article generated a storm of protest. McCarthy understood that Matthews would have to go. While Vice President Richard Nixon stalled McCarthy, the administration arranged for the National Conference of Christians and Jews to send a telegram protesting Matthews's article and for Eisenhower to issue a sympathetic response that stated, "Generalized and irresponsible attacks that sweepingly condemn the whole of any group of citizens are alien to America." Matthews resigned and McCarthy accepted the resignation "very reluctantly." The sequence of events made it seem that McCarthy had decided to let Matthews go only under pressure from the administration.

Democrats on the subcommittee challenged McCarthy's right to hire staff unilaterally. In a straight party line vote, however, the subcommittee confirmed McCarthy's authority to hire and fire staff. The Democrats on the subcommittee walked out.

McCarthy rebounded from the Matthews fiasco by announcing, the day after Matthews's resignation, that he intended to investigate the Central Intelligence Agency. While he never carried through on that investigation, the announcement alone diverted attention from his problems with Matthews. The senator's next investigation brought him into a head-on collision with the administration.

McCarthy began an investigation of the army and the Defense Department in September 1953. He investigated civilian personnel and army intelligence before turning his attention, in October, to civilian scientists working at the Army Signal Corps Engineering Laboratories at Fort Monmouth, New Jersey. In November, McCarthy briefly pursued allegations of subversion and espionage in defense plants, but in December he returned to Fort Monmouth.

Another issue in late 1953 brought McCarthy's dissatisfaction with the administration into public view. In November, Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL made public documents indicating that former president Truman had proceeded with the nomination of Harry Dexter White to be executive director of the International Monetary Fund after information revealing that White had engaged in espionage for the Soviet Union had been passed to top officials in the Truman administration. Truman initially denied having seen the reports on White and charged Brownell with McCarthyism (a term first used by the Washington Post's cartoonist, Herbert L. Block). Truman later changed his story when documents revealed that the reports had, indeed, come to his attention. In any case, McCarthy, furious with Truman's use of his name, demanded equal time on television to respond. In his reply to Truman, however, McCarthy focused his attack on the Eisenhower administration, which he criticized for allowing American allies to continue to trade with Communist China and for failing to dismiss JOHN PATON DAVIES, a foreign service officer and one of McCarthy's favorite targets. The junior senator from Wisconsin also took issue with the president's recently expressed hope that the problem of internal subversion would have been dealt with so efficiently that it would play no role in the congressional elections of 1954.

In December 1953, McCarthy discovered the case of IRVING PERESS, an army dentist stationed at Camp Kilmer, New Jersey, whom the army had commissioned as a captain in October 1952. At the time he began active duty in January 1953, Peress, a member of the left-wing American Labor Party, had responded to a form concerning membership in subversive organizations by writing "federal constitutional privilege." Military intelligence investigated Peress and found "sufficient evidence" to "warrant his removal." In August, Peress responded to an interrogatory by filling in his name, address, date of birth, and the names of his parents. In answer to the remaining questions, he again wrote "federal constitutional privilege." Through a series of bureaucratic slipups, Peress was not dismissed, despite repeated recommendations to that effect, and was promoted to the rank of major in November 1953 under the provisions of the Doctor's Draft. The army did not get around to removing Peress until mid-January 1954, when it relieved the dentist from active duty and allowed him to choose a date for his discharge within 90 days. Peress chose March 31. In the meantime, McCarthy called Peress to testify before the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. The dentist appeared at an executive session on January 30, 1954, and claimed immunity under the Fifth Amendment in response to questions about the Communist Party. On February 1, Peress asked for immediate release from the army; that same day, McCarthy wrote a letter to ROBERT STEVENS, secretary of the army, demanding that Peress be court-martialed. Stevens acknowledged that the system had broken down in the Peress case but maintained that the army did not have sufficient evidence to court-martial Peress.

McCarthy called the commanding officer of Camp Kilmer, General RALPH ZWICKER, a West Point graduate who had served with distinction under Eisenhower's command in World War II, to testify before the subcommittee on February 18. As Zwicker testified, McCarthy became increasingly frustrated and abusive. The senator questioned whether Zwicker had "the brains of a five-year-old child" and told the general that "any man . . . who protects communists is not fit to wear that uniform." Stevens announced that he would not permit Zwicker to appear before the subcommittee again. "I cannot," he explained, "permit loyal officers of our Armed Forces to be subjected to such unwarranted treatment." McCarthy ordered Stevens to appear before the subcommittee.

In an effort to make peace, Stevens met with McCarthy and other Republicans on the subcommittee over lunch on February 24. Stevens agreed to permit further testimony and release the names of those responsible for the promotion and honorable discharge of Peress; perhaps he received some assurances that the committee would accord decent treatment to witnesses. When the supposedly secret lunch ended, a group of reporters and photographers was waiting. Senator KARL MUNDT (R-S. Dak.) read a "memorandum of understanding," indicating that the secretary of the army had agreed to release the "names of everyone involved in the promotion and honorable discharge of Peress" and make them available to testify before the subcommittee. The statement did not include a word about the treatment of witnesses. A startled Stevens refused to comment and left, after which McCarthy bragged that the secretary had abjectly surrendered.

Eisenhower was infuriated by McCarthy's treatment of Zwicker, by the role that EVERETT DIRKSEN (R-Ill.) and Mundt played in the lunch meeting, and by Stevens's seeming ineptitude. Still, the president had no intention of engaging McCarthy publicly. He thought that if a president attacked a senator, the Senate would rally around one of its own. Further, he believed that McCarthy wanted publicity above all and that a frontal assault by the president would provide him with the publicity he craved. Instead, Eisenhower worked behind the scenes to isolate and embarrass the senator. He had his staff draft a revised memorandum of understanding that guaranteed respectful treatment for army officers called before the subcommittee. The president summoned Dirksen to the White House and told him that he wanted the new agreement released that day in the name of Stevens and the Republicans on the committee. That effort failed when McCarthy, angry at the implication that officers had been mistreated in the past, refused to sign off on the new agreement. The president attempted to make the best of the situation by having Stevens issue a statement to reporters from the office of JAMES HAGERTY, the White House press secretary. The statement reiterated Stevens's position that Zwicker had been mistreated and claimed that he had received promises at the lunch meeting that, in the future, witnesses would not be browbeaten or humiliated.

Eisenhower followed up with a series of statements supporting the secretary of the army. In his first press conference after Zwicker's appearance before McCarthy's committee, Eisenhower acknowledged that the army had made "serious errors" in its handling of the Peress case, but he went on to praise Zwicker for his patriotism and noted that the general had been "decorated for gallantry in the field." The president also said that he expected that members of the executive branch be accorded "respect and courtesy" when they appeared before congressional panels and made it clear that the "primary responsibility" in that regard lay with the Republican members of Congress. In an indirect comment on McCarthy, he observed, "I regard it as unfortunate when we are diverted from grave problems—one of which is vigilance against any kind of internal subversion—through disregard of the standards of fair play recognized by the American people." McCarthy responded with an intemperate and, given the restrained nature of Eisenhower's remarks, disproportionate attack on Eisenhower.

By early March, opposition to McCarthy became apparent within Republican ranks. Republican congressional leaders considered various "fair play" guidelines for investigating committees. In a radio broadcast on March 9, Senator RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.) ridiculed the disparity between McCarthy's exaggerated claims and his modest achievements: "He dons his war paint. He goes into his war dance. He emits war whoops. He goes forth into battle and proudly returns with the scalp of a pink dentist." Later that day, Eisenhower wrote Flanders a letter praising his remarks. That evening, EDWARD R. MURROW devoted his entire television program, See It Now, to a denunciation of McCarthy and his methods. On March 12, Nixon gave the administration's formal response to a nationally broadcast speech by Adlai Stevenson, in which the Democratic presidential aspirant attacked the Republican administration and focused on its inability to deal with McCarthy. Nixon called for "fair and proper" procedures in the hunt for communists in government. "Men who have in the past done effective work exposing Communists in this country," said the vice president, "have, by reckless talk and questionable methods, made themselves the issue, rather than the cause they believe in so deeply."

McCarthy suffered a major blow on March 11, when Annie Lee Moss testified before his subcommittee. In February, McCarthy, most likely acting on a tip from someone in the FBI, had alleged that Moss, a civilian employee of the Army Signal Corps, had been a communist. Moss had worked at the Pentagon since World War II, starting out as a cafeteria worker and rising to the position of communications clerk. By the time she appeared before the subcommittee, she had been suspended from her job and was unemployed. She certainly did not look like a major security risk. An African-American woman in her 40s, Mrs. Moss arrived bundled in an overcoat and wearing frayed white gloves. Inarticulate, poorly educated, and seemingly baffled by the charges she was facing, she evoked considerable sympathy. The Democrats on the subcommittee made the most of what seemed to be a cruel assault on an innocent and helpless victim. The fact that three A. L. Mosses were listed in the Washington phone book added to the appearance of charges levied with careless disregard for the facts. However disastrous the Moss case proved for McCarthy, another event later that day overshadowed it.

On the afternoon of March 11, the army alleged that McCarthy and Cohn had sought preferential treatment for Schine, who had been drafted the previous year. McCarthy responded the following day by accusing the army of holding the former aide hostage in an effort to blackmail him into ending his investigation of the armed forces. Amid a flurry of charges and countercharges, an investigation was clearly in order. Over the objection of its Democratic members, McCarthy's own subcommittee voted to look into the matter. After considerable haggling, in which the administration played a role behind the scenes, McCarthy temporarily gave up his seat on the panel for the investigation. Mundt assumed the chair for the hearings, and Senator HENRY DWORSHAK (R-Idaho) filled McCarthy's seat. McCarthy won the right to cross-examine witnesses, a right also accorded to the army. Since the charges also involved Cohn, Ray Jenkins would serve as counsel to the subcommittee. The army chose JOSEPH WELCH, a distinguished trial lawyer from Boston, as its attorney.

Guided by the minority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), Democrats in the Senate demanded that the hearings be televised. At Eisenhower's insistence, Republican leaders agreed. The president believed that, given a chance to see McCarthy in action, the public would be repulsed. The hearings commenced on April 22 and lasted 36 days. ABC and the Dumont network carried the entire proceedings live, and they attracted an audience of millions.

From the opening of the Army-McCarthy hearings, the junior senator from Wisconsin dominated the proceedings. He made extensive use of his right to cross-examine and constantly interrupted the proceedings with points of order. McCarthy bullied witnesses, behaved rudely, at one point or another attacked every member of the committee, and made personally abusive comments to one of the Democrats on the subcommittee, Senator STUART SYMINGTON (D-Mo.). Moreover, McCarthy and his staff lost considerable credibility when Jenkins introduced a doctored photograph of Schine and Stevens. The photo was apparently intended to suggest that Stevens had befriended Schine in an effort to head off McCarthy's investigation of the army. Welch demonstrated that the photo had been cropped, and he traced the alteration of the photo to McCarthy's staff.

The highlight of the hearings came on June 9, when Welch badgered Cohn to give him the name of a single communist in government. McCarthy interrupted to charge that Welch had tried to introduce one into the hearings. The senator observed that Frederick Fisher, a member of Welch's law firm originally slated to participate in the hearings, had been a member of the National Lawyers Guild, which McCarthy described as "an organization which was named, oh, years and years ago, as the legal bulwark of the Communist Party." Addressing McCarthy directly, Welch said, "Until this moment, I think I never really gauged your cruelty or your recklessness." Welch, who appeared close to tears, explained that Fisher had left the Lawyers Guild years before. As Welch told it, when he brought his team to Washington, he asked if there were anything in their backgrounds that "would hurt anybody." When Fisher disclosed his past membership in the Lawyers Guild, Welch said that he decided to send him back to Boston. (In fact, Welch had met with members of the administration, who urged him not to use Fisher.) "Little did I dream," Welch continued, "you could be so reckless and so cruel as to do an injury to that lad." When McCarthy persisted, Welch asked, "Have you no sense of decency, sir, at long last? Have you left no sense of decency?"

The hearings produced no clear-cut winners, but, by the time they ground to a close on June 17, McCarthy's methods had turned many against him. An increasing number of newspapers came out against the senator. Under intense pressure from Republicans, Roy Cohn resigned as counsel to the subcommittee on July 19. Several other aides to McCarthy resigned under fire. Efforts to craft a bipartisan report failed, and, on September 1, the subcommittee released a majority report, mildly critical of McCarthy, a more harshly critical minority report, and supplementary statements by Dirksen and CHARLES POTTER (R-Mich.). All of them agreed that McCarthy bore responsibility for permitting Cohn to attempt improperly to influence the army on behalf of Schine, that Stevens and JOHN ADAMS (the army's general counsel) had to some degree attempted to influence McCarthy's investigation of Fort Monmouth, and that neither Stevens nor Adams was soft on communism.

By this time, however, the political ground had begun to shift. Back on June 11, Flanders handed McCarthy a message indicting his intention to take the floor and make a speech critical of McCarthy. He then introduced a resolution calling for McCarthy's removal from the chair of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations and its parent committee until the senator from Wisconsin answered questions raised about his finances in the Hennings report of January 1953. By threatening to take the unprecedented step of stripping McCarthy of his committee chairs, Flanders aroused the opposition of traditionalists in the Senate and, most especially, that of southerners who saw it as a threat to the seniority system. In July, he withdrew his resolution and in its place offered one that called for censure of McCarthy. Soon after that, Flanders, Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.), and Senator WAYNE MORSE (I-Oreg.) introduced amendments that listed specific charges. On August 2, the resolution was referred to a six-member committee to be selected by the vice president. Working closely with Johnson and the Republican leader, WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.), Nixon named six moderate conservatives from the South or West who had not taken a strong stand either for or against McCarthy. The committee had no liberals, no presidential contenders, and no media hounds. The chair was Senator ARTHUR WATKINS (R-Utah), who was determined to run dignified, orderly proceedings.

The committee adopted a set of rules designed to minimize McCarthy's potential for disruption. They allowed either McCarthy or his lawyer, but not both, to conduct cross-examinations. This put pressure on McCarthy, who was not the most skilled lawyer, to allow his attorney to handle the cross-examinations and therefore muzzle himself. The committee also barred television cameras from the hearing room. From the beginning of the hearings on August 31, 1954, Watkins exercised firm control over the proceedings. When McCarthy attempted to interject himself in defiance of the panel's rules of procedure, Watkins gavelled him to order.

The rules of the Senate did not define censure or prescribe a specific punishment for it. Moreover, the Senate had resorted to the step only infrequently. The committee therefore needed to define what McCarthy had done that warranted censure without weakening the legitimate senatorial power and prerogatives that McCarthy had abused. On September 27, the committee released a unanimous report recommending censure on two counts. One involved McCarthy's refusal to appear before the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections in 1952 and his abuse of Hennings. The other related to his treatment of General Zwicker, which the committee described as "reprehensible."

Although the subcommittee's report made some sort of condemnation of McCarthy virtually inevitable, neither party wanted to deal with the matter until after the elections. In the meantime, the political landscape was shifting. Unlike in 1950 or 1952, McCarthy played almost no role in the elections of 1954. The senator's office issued a statement explaining that he had turned down hundreds of invitations to speak in order to devote himself to his committee work, but virtually no one wanted his support. He had become an embarrassment and a liability to his party. The election brought bad news for McCarthy. Democrats regained control of both houses, and liberal Democratic incumbents did well, while a number of right-wing Republican incumbents went down to defeat. The results added to the impression that the senator's power had waned.

The Watkins Committee filed its report with the Senate on November 8. Two days later, McCarthy responded to the charges read by Watkins with a speech in which he asserted that the Communist Party had "made a Committee of the Senate its unwitting handmaiden." The attack on the Watkins Committee served only to convince the uncommitted to vote for censure. Several attempts to broker a compromise that involved an apology by McCarthy failed. Johnson carefully kept his Democrats in check to avoid any appearance of partisanship. Just before the vote, Johnson told Watkins that at least a dozen Democrats intended to vote against the charge relating to McCarthy's abuse of Zwicker. Watkins and the other members of his committee quickly agreed to drop the charge involving Zwicker and substitute one that condemned McCarthy for his abuse of the Watkins Committee. The resolution for censure carried by a vote of 67 to 22. Johnson kept the Democrats in line, which accounted for 44 votes. The Republicans divided evenly, 22 to 22. The Eastern, or liberal, Republicans voted for the resolution; the Midwestern conservatives voted against it. Wayne Morse of Oregon, the Senate's lone independent, also voted yea. Two senators were absent and unrecorded, Alexander Wiley and, in a profile of something other than courage, JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). McCarthy voted "present."

Eisenhower invited Watkins to the White House on December 3 and congratulated him for a job well done. On December 7, an infuriated McCarthy lashed out at the president. He said that he had been "mistaken" to believe that Eisenhower would vigorously seek to remove communists from government and apologized for having supported the general in 1952. The attack on Eisenhower appalled even McCarthy's staunchest supporters. He became a political pariah.

McCarthy spent his remaining two-and-a-half years in the Senate in obscurity. The Democratic victory in 1954 stripped him of his committee chairs, which deprived him of control of the committee's staff and budget. Further, he could no longer control what matters the committee would investigate. McCarthy occasionally attempted to attract attention with sensational charges of internal subversion. In March 1955, for instance, he charged that Dulles had hired 150 men to censor the records of the Yalta Conference. In 1955 and 1956, he attacked the Supreme Court for decisions limiting the investigating power of Congress. By this time, however, no one was listening. His friends deserted him, and he suffered another public humiliation when the Eisenhowers announced that McCarthy and his wife were not on the guest list for events at the White House. In 1956, McCarthy urged Republicans to repudiate Eisenhower and nominate the director of the FBI, J. Edgar Hoover, for the presidency.

Always a heavy drinker, McCarthy's drinking got out of hand during the Army-McCarthy hearings. After several stays in Bethesda Naval Hospital to dry out, he began drinking heavily again when the Senate took up the resolution to censure him. If not in the year before, certainly after the vote to condemn him, he became a full-fledged alcoholic. He lost interest in his duties as a senator and fretted obsessively about those who had "betrayed" him. As he proceeded to drink himself into oblivion, his health deteriorated, and his visits to Bethesda Naval Hospital became more frequent. The ailments for which he was treated included cirrhosis, hepatitis, and delirium tremens. Among the few friends who continued to visit him was ROBERT F. KENNEDY. McCarthy entered Bethesda Naval Hospital for the last time on April 28, 1957. He died there on May 2, 1957.

The concern with internal subversion did not end with McCarthy's disgrace or with his death. The Senate condemned McCarthy for exceeding the bounds of decency and for violating the Senate's code of ethics. It did not repudiate his crusade against communism. With the easing of cold war tensions in the second half of the 1950s, however, the political climate began to change. By the 1960s, McCarthy had few defenders, and the term McCarthyism had become common usage for the levying of reckless and unfounded allegations.

—MSM

McClellan, John L(ittle)

(1896–1977) U.S. senator; chairman, Government Operations Committee; chairman, Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field

The son of a country lawyer and teacher, John McClellan was born in Sheridan, Arkansas, on February 25, 1896. Although he never attended college, McClellan studied law in his father's office and was admitted to the bar in 1913 at the age of 17. He commenced the practice of law in Sheridan. During World War I, he enlisted in the army and served as a first lieutenant in the aviation section of the Army Signal Corps from 1917 to 1919. Upon leaving the service, he moved to Malvern, Arkansas, where he served as city attorney from 1920 to 1926 and as prosecuting attorney for the state's seventh judicial district from 1927 to 1930. McClellan won election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1934 and reelection in 1936. As a member of Congress, he supported most of the New Deal, although he opposed Roosevelt's plan to pack the Supreme Court and a federal antilynching bill. After running unsuccessfully in the Democratic senatorial primary in 1938, he returned to the practice of law in Camden, Arkansas, until he won election to the Senate in 1942. He held that seat in the Senate until his death.

During his first decade or so in the Senate, his voting record was typical for a southern Democrat. He voted consistently against civil rights and against most Fair Deal programs, although he did back some conservation and social welfare measures. In 1947, he supported the Taft-Hartley Act, which placed restrictions on organized labor. With respect to foreign policy, he balanced his belief in fiscal restraint with his commitment to anticommunism, internationalism, and a strong military. McClellan supported both aid to Greece and Turkey and the Marshall Plan. He was appointed to the powerful Appropriations Committee in 1949 and assumed the chair of the Executive Departments Committee, which became the Government Operations Committee in 1952.

After the Republicans won control of the Senate in the elections of 1952, Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) became chair of the Government Operations Committee. As the ranking minority member of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, also chaired by McCarthy, McClellan did not oppose the panel's investigations of alleged communist infiltration of government agencies, but he did occasionally take exception, sometimes vigorously, to what he regarded as McCarthy's undemocratic methods.

In July 1953, a controversy erupted over a magazine article, written by the subcommittee's newly appointed staff director, J. B. MATTHEWS, that alleged "the largest single group supporting the Communist apparatus in the United States today is composed of Protestant clergymen." McClellan demanded that Matthews be dismissed. McCarthy initially refused but eventually had to accept Matthews's resignation. After the committee adopted a motion to give the chair sole power to hire and fire staff on a straight party-line vote, McClellan led the panel's Democrats in an unprecedented walkout. He also threatened to oppose renewal of the subcommittee's funding for the following year. In January 1954, after McCarthy agreed to relinquish exclusive authority over staff appointments and to allow the minority to hire its own counsel, the Democrats returned to the panel. In March, McClellan urged that the Army-McCarthy hearings be televised, but did not play a major part in the hearings themselves. Still his sober, lawyerly questions and, as the Saturday Evening Post put it, his "dour visage" and "funereal aspect" brought him to national attention.

When the Democrats won control of the Senate in the elections of 1954, McClellan regained the chair of the Government Operations Committee and named ROBERT F. KENNEDY chief counsel of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. Under McClellan's direction, the panel launched a series of probes into charges of graft and corruption in the handling of government contracts for military supplies. Hearings held in July 1955 on the business connections of Air Force Secretary HAROLD E. TALBOTT and other officials in the Defense Department revealed that Talbott, after taking his post at the Pentagon, had continued to hold 50 percent of the stock in an industrial engineering firm that did business with the military. As a result of the investigation, Talbott resigned in August.

McClellan was appointed to chair the Special Committee to Investigate Political Activities, Lobbying, and Campaign Contributions in March 1956. The Senate established the panel after Senator Francis Case (R-S. Dak.) disclosed that he had rejected a $2,500 campaign contribution from a lobbyist interested in the natural gas bill. After hearings in May, in which lobbyists for various businesses and labor unions testified about their efforts to influence senators, the committee recommended legislation to regulate lobbying and campaign financing. It required that all political committees report expenditures and limit individual campaign contributions to $15,000 a year. McClellan sponsored a bill that incorporated those proposals, but strong opposition from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, and other business groups prevented the measure from reaching the floor of the Senate.

The subcommittee's continuing investigation of procurement policies in the Defense Department led in 1956 to the exposure of the involvement of leading East Coast gangsters in the manufacturing and trucking of military uniforms. The panel released its findings in January 1957, and the report prompted demands for a major investigation of corruption in labor-management relations. Two Senate committees, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations and the Labor Subcommittee of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, claimed jurisdiction. Management groups did not want the Labor Subcommittee, which liberals dominated, to conduct the inquiry. Unions objected to McClellan's panel undertaking it. On January 30, the Senate established a Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, made up of four members from each party and from both subcommittees. McClellan chaired the select panel and chose Robert F. Kennedy as its chief counsel.

The McClellan Committee held hearings in several cities over two-and-a-half years. It exposed abuses of power by labor leaders, including theft, embezzlement, and misuse of union funds; rigging of union elections; "sweetheart" contracts unfavorable to workers, for which management rewarded union officials; ties with organized crime; and the use of violence and threats against both employers and their own rank and file. Although the committee initially took elaborate steps to avoid the appearance of taking sides between unions and management, its investigation focused on corruption in unions, especially the Teamsters.

Hearings in early 1957 featured DAVE BECK, president of the Teamsters, who repeatedly took the Fifth Amendment in response to charges that he had taken union funds to pay for personal investments and real estate. Indicted for tax fraud and other crimes and suspended from the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Beck resigned his post with the Teamsters. That October JAMES HOFFA succeeded Beck, and he, too, was called before the McClellan Committee to answer allegations regarding his involvement with organized crime. As the committee's chief counsel, Robert F. Kennedy supervised the investigation and led the questioning of witnesses. The hearings documented Hoffa's extensive ties with organized crime figures. On numerous occasions, Kennedy listed names of racketeers on Hoffa's payroll and asked if Hoffa were aware of their past and if he intended to remove them from their positions. Hoffa promised to dismiss those tied to organized crime, but he never did. The panel also uncovered evidence of how Teamsters officials enriched themselves by extorting money from companies with which the Teamsters had contracts in exchange for labor peace. Employers paid off the Teamsters officials by putting them on the payroll for doing nonexistent jobs. The committee further found that Hoffa personally profited from his connections with the Teamsters. Evidence of Hoffa's wrongdoing contributed greatly to convincing Congress of the need for legislation to prevent corruption in organized labor.

Although the hearings focused on the Teamsters, the McClellan Committee also probed the United Textile Workers, Bakery and Confectionery Workers, and some smaller unions. As a result of the panel's findings, the AFL-CIO expelled the Teamsters, the Bakery and Confectionery Workers, and the laundry workers union in December. At the insistence of the Republicans on the committee, the investigation included WALTER REUTHER and his United Auto Workers. Unlike Hoffa, however, Reuther's personal activities easily withstood congressional scrutiny.

While continuing its hearings, the committee issued an interim report on March 24, 1958. Describing Hoffa as a national menace running a "hoodlum empire," the panel recommended legislation that would regulate health and welfare funds and pension funds, ensure democratic procedures in unions, and curb the activities of middlemen in labor-management disputes. As a result, in April the Labor Subcommittee, chaired by Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), reported favorably on a bill, introduced in the previous session by Senator PAUL DOUGLAS (D-Ill.), that provided for public disclosure of information about pension and welfare funds. The Senate passed the measure without a dissenting vote in August.

Responding to pressure from Republicans, who demanded more comprehensive labor reform, McClellan, in June 1958, endorsed a second, broader labor reform measure, known as the Kennedy-Ives bill. The measure included: restrictions on the authority of national and international unions to place locals under trusteeship, conditions and standards for the election of union officers, a code of ethical practices, and amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act favored by building trades unions. The bill won the endorsement of the AFL-CIO, and the Senate passed it in June. The House, however, rejected it.

Early in 1959, Senators Kennedy and SAM ERVIN (D-N.C.), with the backing of the Democratic leadership, introduced a new measure containing the same relatively modest reform proposals as the Kennedy-Ives bill. Republicans wanted more thoroughgoing reform, but they lacked the numbers in the Senate to gain passage of a bill of their own. Therefore, they recommended amending the Kennedy-Ervin bill so as to address the abuses revealed by the McClellan Committee's investigation.

McClellan's influence with a large block of southern Democrats and his standing in the Senate as a whole made him the key figure in shaping the legislation that ultimately passed. When the debate over the Kennedy-Ervin bill began in April, McClellan demanded the elimination of the changes to the Taft-Hartley Act desired by the AFL-CIO. Kennedy refused, which prompted Ervin to withdraw his sponsorship and released a number of southern senators from their obligation to support the measure. McClellan made an impassioned speech on April 22, in which he introduced an amendment containing a "bill of rights" for union members that attempted to guarantee their rights to vote, speak, and resort to law. Kennedy and most liberals in the Senate opposed the measure as too great an interference in the internal affairs of the labor movement. Nevertheless, McClellan's amendment narrowly passed.

The addition of McClellan's amendment rendered the bill unacceptable to Kennedy. The AFL-CIO also withdrew its support of the legislation. Subsequently, and with McClellan's approval, the measure was modified to qualify the language in the equal rights section and to eliminate a provision granting the secretary of labor authority to seek injunctions in federal court against union officials. Southerners worried that those provisions might serve as precedent for future civil rights legislation. The Senate passed the final version on April 25 and sent it to the House.

On the other side of Capitol Hill, the House passed a measure sponsored by Representatives PHILIP LANDRUM (D-Ga.) and ROBERT GRIFFIN (R-Mich.) on August 15. The Landrum-Griffin bill contained several recommendations made by McClellan that the Senate had earlier rejected, including prohibitions against secondary boycotts by unions and curbs on picketing. The measure also included provisions that prevented individuals with criminal records from holding positions of leadership in unions and increased fines and prison sentences for union officials convicted of misusing union funds. In September 1959, Congress passed the Landrum-Griffin Act, and President Eisenhower signed it into law.

McClellan consistently opposed civil rights legislation. In 1956, he signed the Southern Manifesto, which called on states to resist the Supreme Court's decision striking down segregation in public schools. He opposed civil rights legislation sponsored by the Eisenhower administration and passed by Congress in 1957 and 1960. During the confrontation over the desegregation of Central High School in Little Rock, Arkansas, McClellan attempted unsuccessfully to mediate between the state's governor, ORVAL FAUBUS, and President Eisenhower. When Eisenhower sent federal troops to enforce the order of a federal court, McClellan vehemently denounced the president's action.

During the 1960s, McClellan continued his opposition to civil rights legislation, voting against the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. He consistently supported tougher criminal penalties and broader powers for police; McClellan argued that decisions by the Supreme Court expanding the rights of those accused of crimes hampered law enforcement. While opposed to most of LYNDON JOHNSON's Great Society, McClellan supported the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (1965) and usually supported aid for the rural South. Although a fiscal conservative on most domestic issues, McClellan and Senator ROBERT KERR (D-Okla.) worked for more than two decades to obtain over $1 billion in federal funds for the Arkansas River Navigation Project. Throughout the 1960s, McClellan supported the war in Vietnam. He backed President RICHARD M. NIXON's policy of Vietnamization but opposed expanding the conflict into Laos and Cambodia. Throughout it all, he continued to conduct investigations. In 1963, he headed probes of organized crime (that included spectacular testimony by Joseph Valachi on the activities of La Cosa Nostra), the relationship between the Agriculture Department and Billie Sol Estes, a well-connected financier from Texas, and the Defense Department's awarding of a contract for the production of the TFX aircraft. McClellan also presided over inquiries relating to missile procurement, race riots, and campus unrest. Upon the death of Senator ALLEN J. ELLENDER (D-La.), the chair of the Appropriations Committee, in 1972, McClellan gave up his seat on the Government Operations Committee to become chair of the Appropriations Committee. He held that position until he died in Little Rock on November 27, 1977.

—TLH

McCloy, John J(ay)

(1895–1989) chairman of the board, Chase National Bank; presidential adviser

The son of a claims officer for the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, John McCloy was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on March 31, 1895. Just before McCloy's sixth birthday, his father died, after which the child was raised by his mother, who devoted herself to the advancement of her sole surviving child. Her hairdressing business put her in touch with wealthy and influential people, and she made sure her son benefited from those contacts. McCloy attended Peddie School in Hightstown, New Jersey, and graduated from Amherst College in 1916. In the summers of 1915 and 1916, he attended the reserve officers' training camp in Plattsburg, New York, and earned a commission as a second lieutenant in the army reserve. He entered Harvard Law School in the fall of 1916 but left after his first year to enlist in the U.S. Army. After seeing limited action in France during World War I as a provisional second lieutenant in a field artillery brigade, he returned to Harvard in 1919 and received his law degree in 1921. Upon graduating from law school, he went to New York to take a position with the prestigious firm of Cadwalader, Wickersham, and Taft. In 1924, McCloy moved to Cravath, Henderson & de Gersdorff. His work took him to Europe, where he worked on several postwar reconstruction projects. After returning to the United States, he represented Schechter Poultry in Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States (1935), in which the Supreme Court declared the National Industrial Recovery Act unconstitutional.

Throughout the 1930s, McCloy was involved in an effort to gain compensation for Bethlehem Steel for an explosion that took place in 1916 at a munitions depot on Black Tom Island in New York Harbor. By demonstrating that the explosion was the work of saboteurs operating on orders from the German government, he won a $50 million award for his clients in 1939.

His experience with the Black Tom case, his concern about Nazi expansionism, and his friendship with Secretary of War Henry Stimson led to McCloy's appointment as a consultant to Army Intelligence in 1940. He became assistant secretary of war in 1941. In that capacity, he was involved in some of the major policy decisions made both during the lead-up to America's entry into the war and during the war itself. He was a primary lobbyist for lend-lease legislation. Within the councils of the administration, McCloy supported the internment of Japanese Americans and coordinated the development of the program. Although he regarded the decision to intern Japanese Americans as inevitable and necessary, he did make efforts to moderate the conditions of the internees. Another important decision in which McCloy was involved was the decision not to bomb Auschwitz or the railheads servicing the concentration camp; he advised against it. He participated in the creation of the Office of Strategic Services, the forerunner of the Central Intelligence Agency, and was also involved in the construction of the Pentagon, the establishment of the United Nations, and the planning for the Dumbarton Oaks Conference. In the later stages of the war, one of his assignments was the administration of occupied areas. McCloy and Stimson successfully opposed the plan, advanced by Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, to strip Germany of its industrial capacity. In the debate over whether to use the atomic bomb on Japan, McCloy argued for issuing a warning before the bomb was used.

In January 1946, McCloy joined the law firm of Milbank, Tweed, Hope & Hadley, as a name partner. Nevertheless, he continued to heed the call to public service. He became president of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (later the World Bank) in February 1947. McCloy energetically lobbied Congress to approve the Marshall Plan. In June 1949, he replaced General LUCIUS CLAY as military governor of Germany. Two months later, when the three Western zones of occupation were combined to form the Federal Republic of Germany, McCloy became U.S. high commissioner for Germany. He worked to restore the German economy and supervised the transition of West Germany from an occupied zone to a sovereign state. Under McCloy, the role of the United States changed from occupier to partner. Indeed, McCloy advocated transferring authority to the German government at a more rapid rate than either his superiors in Washington or the British, French, or Soviet governments approved. The ever pragmatic McCloy preferred the restoration of Germany to its punishment. His administration employed the services of notorious former Nazi officials, including Klaus Barbie and Franz Six. Limited though it was, denazification was more extensive in the American zone than it was in those of the British or French. Even that modest commitment yielded to other considerations as the cold war emerged and the West worried about Soviet expansion and espionage. Given those concerns, the high commissioner cared less about excluding Nazis than he did about making Germany strong enough to resist the Soviets. McCloy stirred up controversy when he reduced the sentences of dozens of ex-Nazis convicted at the Nuremberg War Crime Trials, including Alfred Krupp, who had been convicted for using slave labor in his family's armament factories. McCloy also pushed for European integration. After serving as high commissioner for three years, he left Germany in 1952.

Eisenhower considered McCloy for secretary of state, a position that went to JOHN FOSTER DULLES. In January 1953, McCloy became chairman of Chase National Bank and arranged the merger with the Bank of Manhattan that created Chase Manhattan Bank. If Chase were to take over the Bank of Manhattan, it would have required the approval of every stockholder in the Bank of Manhattan. McCloy avoided this difficulty by having the smaller Bank of Manhattan absorb Chase. The merger took place in March 1955, and McCloy became chairman of what was the second largest commercial bank in the United States. He aggressively moved the bank into foreign markets.

Beyond his work at Chase Manhattan, McCloy influenced policy through membership in a host of elite institutions. He served on the board of directors of several corporations, including the United Fruit Company, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, the Dreyfus Corporation, Westinghouse Electric Corporation, and Allied Chemical Corporation. In addition, he cofounded the American Council on Germany and chaired both the Council on Foreign Relations and the Ford Foundation (1953–70). As chair of the Council on Foreign Relations, McCloy picked a professor of government at Harvard named HENRY KISSINGER to head a study of the impact of nuclear weapons on foreign policy. Such behind-the-scenes influence led the journalist RICHARD ROVERE to call McCloy the “chairman of the establishment.” In 1956 and 1957, McCloy went to Egypt as special financial adviser on the Suez Crisis to Dag Hammarskjöld, the secretary-general of the United Nations. McCloy also served as a special adviser on disarmament to President Eisenhower.

McCloy retired from Chase Manhattan in December 1960 and returned to Millbank, Tweed. He represented the major oil companies and had better access to some Middle Eastern governments than did the State Department. Throughout the decade of the 1960s, he accepted high-level diplomatic assignments for the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. An adviser to Kennedy on disarmament, he helped draft the legislation creating the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in 1961. During the Cuban Missile Crisis in 1962, Kennedy named McCloy to head a team that worked out the details for the withdrawal of Soviet missiles from Cuba. LYNDON JOHNSON called on McCloy to serve on the Warren Commission, appointed to investigate the assassination of JOHN F. KENNEDY. McCloy also served as President Johnson's special envoy to the mutual defense talks between the United States, Great Britain, and West Germany in 1966.

Although he had reservations about American policy in Vietnam, McCloy, when asked, supported Johnson's policy. In 1968, McCloy became a member of the Senior Advisory Group on Vietnam, convened by Johnson to consider the military's request for more than 200,000 additional troops in Vietnam.

Despite his dissatisfaction with the conduct of the war, he did not press for a dramatic change. Ultimately, though, the group, dubbed “the Wise Men” by the press, reported to Johnson that the war could not be won without unacceptable risks and unacceptable costs; the time had come to disengage.

In the 1970s, President James E. Carter sought McCloy’s advice on various matters relating to foreign policy, but, in general, the elder statesman had little influence on Carter or his administration. On at least one occasion, however, he did prevail. When the United States refused to give the exiled shah of Iran permission to enter the United States, McCloy vigorously and successfully lobbied the Carter administration to admit the fatally ill former ruler. The decision prompted angry radicals in Iran to take over the U.S. embassy. McCloy received more respectful treatment from Carter’s successor, Ronald W. Reagan. In his last years, McCloy maintained an office in New York and resided in Stamford, Connecticut, where he died on March 11, 1989.

—MSM

McCone, John A(lex)

(1902–1991) director, Atomic Energy Commission

Born into a prosperous family in San Francisco, California, on January 4, 1902, McCone attended public schools and graduated from the University of California at Berkeley in 1922. After graduating from college, he went to work as a riveter and boilermaker for the Llewellyn Iron Works, where he rose to become construction manager in the late 1920s. Llewellyn merged with the Consolidated Steel Corporation in 1929, and McCone became executive vice president and director of Consolidated in 1933. McCone left Consolidated in 1937 and joined with a college classmate, Stephen Bechtel, to form their own engineering firm, Bechtel-McCone. The successful business made McCone a millionaire within a decade. During World War II, Bechtel-McCone made military aircraft; the company also became involved in shipbuilding. As head of the California Shipbuilding Corporation during World War II, McCone directed construction of almost 500 ships. After the war, McCone left the partnership and became president and sole proprietor of the Joshua Hendy Iron Works (later the Joshua Hendy Corporation), a shipping firm in Los Angeles.

In 1947, Truman appointed McCone to the Air Policy Commission, formed to consider the role of air power in American defense policy. The commission recommended the creation of an independent air force. McCone served as a special deputy to Secretary of Defense James V. Forrestal in 1948, after which he returned to private business. In June 1950, McCone became undersecretary of the air force. He fought for a larger share of the defense budget for the air force and was assigned responsibility for accelerating the production of war planes. McCone strenuously advocated the development of guided missiles and urged President HARRY TRUMAN to embark on a program, under a single director, to develop these weapons. Truman rejected the proposal. McCone again returned to private business in 1951.

In June 1958, President Eisenhower nominated McCone to succeed LEWIS STRAUSS as head of the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC). Confirmed the following month, McCone implemented the “Atoms for Peace” program, which promoted civilian uses of nuclear power. McCone initially opposed a nuclear test ban; he believed that the United States needed more time for research. By 1959, however, he supported the president’s one-year moratorium on testing. That year, McCone attended talks with the Soviets in Geneva on controlling nuclear energy. The talks stalled over the issue of on-site inspections and conditions for underground testing.

McCone supported the administration’s efforts to expand international research on the peaceful uses of atomic energy. These included a plan to disseminate information on nuclear reactors to members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. In 1958 he signed a treaty between the United States and West Germany, France, Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands in which the United States provided a loan of $135 million and a 20-year supply of uranium to fuel allied reactors. The agreement also called for a joint commitment of $100 million for a combined American-European research effort. In 1959, McCone helped formulate a pact with the Soviet Union establishing a joint U.S.–USSR program of nuclear research that included the exchange of scientists and research data.

During the last half of the decade, the AEC came under criticism for suppressing information on radioactive fallout. With an eye on the presidential contest in 1960, Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY (D-Minn.), in March 1959, charged that the agency had been “playing down the dangers of radioactive fallout as it pursued its weapons program.” He asserted that data had been withheld because it cast doubt on government statements about the danger of atomic weapons tests. The senator charged that “the [AEC], . . . with its important and primary interest in the field of atomic weapons and power, [was] not the best agency to conduct research on fallout and its effects on human health and heredity.” McCone denied that the AEC had suppressed information; he did, however, call on the National Academy of Sciences to arrange a governmentwide review of the issue. In October 1960, the AEC reduced the maximum permissible radioactive dosage for workers in nuclear plants.

A lifelong Republican, McCone resigned his post with the AEC in January 1961. In the aftermath of the Bay of Pigs, however, President JOHN F. KENNEDY appointed McCone to head the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). As director, McCone helped restore morale and placed greater emphasis on intelligence-gathering functions. He served on the Executive Committee, a group of top advisers assembled to advise the president during the Cuban Missile Crisis, and opposed the American-backed coup against Ngo Dinh Diem in 1963. McCone clashed with President LYNDON B. JOHNSON over American policy in Vietnam. His disagreements with Johnson over policy and Johnson’s failure to support McCone’s efforts to centralize intelligence operations led McCone to resign in April 1965.

McCone went back to managing the Joshua Hendy Corporation, which he sold in 1969. He also served as a director of International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation. After the race riot in Watts in 1965, Governor EDMUND G. BROWN, SR., named McCone to chair a commission appointed to study the causes of the riots. McCone died at his home in Pebble Beach, California, on February 14, 1991.

—MSM

McCormack, John W(illiam)

(1891–1980) U.S. congressman, House majority leader, House minority whip

The son of a stonemason, McCormack was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on December 21, 1891. He grew up in South Boston and attended public schools until the age of 13, when he left to support his family after the death of his father. After working as a newsboy and an errand boy for a brokerage house, he took a job as an office boy in a law firm. While working for the law firm, he studied law and passed the bar examination in 1913. McCormack began to practice law in South Boston and showed a talent for the profession. Politics, however, soon attracted him. In 1917, he won election as a delegate to the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention, which convened that year. He resigned to enlist as a private in the army and served stateside. He won election to the Massachusetts House of Representatives as a Democrat in 1919, serving three consecutive one-year terms beginning in 1920. He won election to the state senate in 1923 and served as leader of the Democratic minority in 1925 and 1926. In the latter year, he tried to win a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives and mounted an unsuccessful campaign for the Democratic nomination against a veteran incumbent, Rep. James A. Gallivan (D-Mass.). When Gallivan died in 1928, McCormack won a special election to fill the seat, which he held until his retirement in 1971.

In the House, McCormack quickly attracted the attention of the minority leader, John Nance Garner (D-Tex.), with his diligence and unswerving obedience. When Garner became speaker in 1931, he appointed the relatively junior McCormack to the Ways and Means Committee as a reward for his loyalty. McCormack’s reputation for protecting the interests of his party led to his appointment as chair of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities in 1934. Although the committee was formed primarily to look into Nazi and anti-Semitic organizations, McCormack focused the committee’s attention on the Communist Party. In 1937, McCormack provided crucial support for SAM RAYBURN’S (D-Tex.) successful bid to become majority leader. Three years later, Rayburn became speaker of the House, and McCormack succeeded Rayburn as majority leader.

For the next 22 years, McCormack served as Rayburn's lieutenant. Known for his highly partisan and flamboyant debating style, McCormack often antagonized colleagues with his sarcasm. Dealing with his fellow members on an individual basis, however, he was less abrasive. Within the Democratic caucus, he developed a reputation as a compromiser who could mediate between liberal northerners and conservative southerners.

Throughout the 1930s and 1940s, McCormack consistently supported the domestic legislative agenda of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations. He played a role in drafting the Social Security Act of 1935 and supported Franklin D. Roosevelt's plan to pack the Supreme Court. In foreign policy, he was an isolationist until the outbreak of World War II in Europe, at which point he shifted to internationalism and supported Roosevelt's cautious moves toward American intervention. After Truman became president, McCormack lined up votes for the Employment Act of 1946 and unsuccessfully attempted to block the congressional override of Truman's veto of the Taft-Hartley Act. Always an aggressive opponent of communism, McCormack strongly supported resistance to communist expansion after the war. He backed aid to Greece and Turkey in 1947, the Marshall Plan, and the decision to send American forces to Korea. When the Republicans won both houses in the elections of 1946, McCormack became minority whip. With the return of the Democrats to power in 1949, he again became majority leader.

As chair of the Democratic platform committee in 1952, McCormack preached the importance of party unity and helped reach a compromise between southern and northern delegates on the civil rights plank. Similarly, after Eisenhower won election to the presidency, McCormack supported Rayburn's policy of moderate opposition to the policies of the Eisenhower administration during the 1950s. At the same time, McCormack provided a hectoring, partisan voice for the Democratic opposition. Despite his intense partisanship and his scolding rhetoric, McCormack consistently demonstrated a willingness to compromise. Democratic representatives of either a more intellectual or a more ideologically liberal bent regarded McCormack as a machine politician with little concern for principles. McCormack, in turn, regarded such colleagues as idealists or ideologues, who, relying on their formal educations, took positions based on ideas or theories but had no grasp of political reality.

From 1953 to 1955, when Republicans controlled the House, McCormack once again assumed the role of minority whip. In 1953, he opposed reduction in new public housing units passed by the Republican-controlled Congress. With the return of the Democrats to majority status after the elections of 1954, McCormack became majority leader for the third time. In 1955, he backed an unsuccessful Democratic effort to provide individual taxpayers with an income tax credit of $20. In 1959, McCormack and Rayburn successfully introduced a bill to extend the period of eligibility for unemployment compensation by three months. The following year, McCormack used a parliamentary maneuver to bring to the floor a bill providing for area redevelopment. Although Congress passed the measure, Eisenhower vetoed it.

As a devout Catholic with close ties to the church hierarchy, McCormack was fiercely anti-communist. He backed the repressive Communist Control Act of 1954, which denied legal standing to the Communist Party. That same year, he questioned the adequacy of the administration's defense budget. McCormack was a consistent critic of the "New Look," which cut military budgets and relied on air power, technology, and the nuclear deterrent. He did not always oppose Eisenhower on defense issues. In 1955, he urged an "overwhelming" vote in favor of the Formosa Resolution, requested by President Eisenhower, that authorized the president to use armed force "if in his judgment it became necessary" to defend Formosa, the Pescadores, and "closely related localities." In that situation, McCormack thought it important to display unity. Some Democrats, however, objected that the resolution gave the president excessively broad authority. McCormack argued that the "calculated risks" entailed in passing the resolution were less than those that resulted from inaction. In the late 1950s, he repeatedly called for an increase in spending on defense.

Although both were Irish Catholics from the Bay State, McCormack and Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) did not enjoy a cordial relationship. Separated by almost a generation, as well as by disparities of wealth and education, McCormack repeatedly clashed with his younger colleague. The two fought a number of battles over control of the Democratic Party in Massachusetts. McCormack kept his distance from Kennedy's unsuccessful attempt to capture the vice presidential nomination in 1956. Nevertheless, McCormack chaired the pro-Kennedy Massachusetts delegation to the Democratic convention in 1960. At the convention, he helped overcome opposition to Kennedy's choice of LYNDON JOHNSON (D-Tex.), the majority leader in the Senate, as his running mate. McCormack campaigned for Kennedy in the general election.

After Kennedy became president, McCormack almost always supported his legislative programs. Still relations between the two remained frosty. In 1961, McCormack successfully opposed Kennedy's proposal for federal aid to education because it did not provide support to parochial schools. The following year, McCormack's nephew, Edward J. McCormack, Jr., and Edward Kennedy, the president's youngest brother, waged a bitter contest in the Democratic primary for a seat in the U.S. Senate from Massachusetts. Kennedy won the primary and the general election. After Rayburn's death in January 1962, McCormack became Speaker. Although he dutifully attempted to line up support for Kennedy's domestic agenda, he had little success getting southern Democrats to back the president's proposals. After Kennedy was assassinated and Johnson assumed the presidency, McCormack became first in line to succeed to the presidency under the Presidential Succession Act of 1947. McCormack remained first in line until the swearing-in of HUBERT HUMPHREY on January 20, 1965. That caused many in Congress to reconsider the issue of succession. Some in Congress believed that he should have resigned the speakership because of his advanced age. In 1965, Congress passed a constitutional amendment providing for the appointment of a vice president in the event of a vacancy. The states ratified the Twenty-fifth Amendment in 1967.

After Johnson became president, McCormack forged a good working relationship with him and supported Johnson's Great Society. During the 1960s, McCormack found his leadership under increasing attack. Younger liberal Democrats criticized him for his defense of the seniority system and his deference to senior southern Democrats; as the decade wore on, they objected to his support of the war in Vietnam. At the start of the new Congress in 1969, Morris Udall (D-Ariz.) challenged him for the speakership. McCormack comfortably defeated Udall, but his support of President RICHARD M. NIXON's policies in Vietnam and his continuing resistance to institutional change in the House further alienated younger and liberal Democrats. Further, in 1969, Life magazine reported that McCormack's administrative assistant, Martin Sweig, and one of McCormack's friends, Nathan Voloshen, had engaged in influence peddling. In May 1970, a federal grand jury indicted them and cleared McCormack of any wrongdoing, after which the Speaker, who earlier that year had survived a no-confidence vote in the Democratic caucus, announced that he would not seek reelection. Not long after his departure from the House, McCormack returned to Boston, where he lived in quiet retirement until his death in Dedham, Massachusetts, on November 22, 1980.

—MSM

McDonald, David J(ohn)

(1902–1979) president, United Steelworkers of America

The son of a skilled Irish Catholic steelworker, McDonald was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on November 22, 1902. At the age of 16, he began working for U.S. Steel, but he went to high school in the evenings and graduated in 1919, after which he went to work as a typist for Wheeling Steel. In 1923, he became the personal secretary to Philip Murray, a vice president of the United Mine Workers. For most of the next three decades, McDonald's career followed Murray's. McDonald worked as Murray's aide during the bitter strikes in the Appalachian coalfields in the 1920s, in the successful organizing drives of the early New Deal era, and in the formation of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). In 1936, the president of the CIO, JOHN L. LEWIS, named Murray to head an organizing drive in the steel industry, and Murray appointed McDonald secretary-treasurer of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee (SWOC). When Murray became president of the CIO in 1940, McDonald assumed more of the day-to-day duties of running the SWOC, which became the United Steelworkers of America (USWA) in 1942. Murray was the new organization's president and McDonald its secretary-treasurer. After World War II, McDonald advocated purging leftists from the USWA and the CIO. Many had come to regard McDonald as Murray's heir apparent, but, by the early 1950s, McDonald's relations with his mentor had become strained. Murray criticized McDonald's expensive tastes and flamboyant lifestyle; he may also have feared that his onetime protégé was plotting to oust him. At the USWA convention in 1952, Murray managed to get the organization to strip the position of secretary-treasurer of much of its power. When Murray died in late 1952, however, McDonald swiftly consolidated his position, and the executive board named him interim president of the USWA, which by then had 1 million members. The following year, McDonald ran unopposed for the presidency.

McDonald preferred a conciliatory approach to labor-management relations and advocated what he called a "mutual trusteeship" for the steel industry. In 1953, almost immediately after winning the election for the presidency, he conducted a two-week tour of steel plants with BENJAMIN FAIRLESS, chief executive officer of the U.S. Steel Corporation. In 1953 and 1954, the USWA won wage increases and a noncontributory pension plan. Employers in the steel industry, however, increasingly resisted wage demands by the USWA, and that led to two major strikes in the 1950s. Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY stepped in to settle a work stoppage in 1956. Humphrey convinced the industry to give the steelworkers a generous economic package, which it immediately passed on to buyers in the form of higher prices. When negotiations for a new contract opened in 1959, McDonald insisted that high profits and productivity in the steel industry justified a substantial increase in wages without price increases. At that time, however, the most important issue was the loss of jobs to automation. The USWA sought to maintain control over work rules in the plants in order to safeguard jobs (employment in steel had dropped from 540,000 to 461,000 during the preceding decade). On the other side, the steel industry wanted the freedom to introduce new methods of production. The impasse resulted in a strike, which began in July and shut down 85 percent of the country's steel production capacity. After 116 days, the president invoked the emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act and ordered the Justice Department to seek an 80-day injunction to end the strike. Industry leaders expected this "cooling-off" period to induce the workers to approve management's last offer. When polls indicated that they would reject it and resume the strike, Vice President RICHARD NIXON personally intervened to obtain a settlement favoring the union's position.

With the merger of the AFL and CIO in 1955, McDonald became a vice president of the combined organization and a member of its executive board. Even as he rose through the ranks of labor, he faced internal opposition within the USWA. In 1955, a coalition of district directors unsuccessfully opposed his candidate for vice president of the union. The next year, McDonald pushed through a two-dollar-a-month increase in dues that inspired a Dues Protest Movement among the rank and file. The leader of that protest, Donald Rarick, a little-known grievance committeeman, ran against McDonald in 1957 and won 35 percent of the vote in the first contested election in the USWA's history. Rarick's strong showing, despite McDonald's control of the union's treasury and its 1,000-strong staff (both of which he used to his advantage in the election), indicated the existence of considerable dissatisfaction with McDonald.

As Democrats jockeyed for the presidential nomination in 1960, McDonald became an early and enthusiastic backer of Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), even though the senator from Massachusetts refused to back a USWA proposal for a 32-hour workweek that was intended to preserve jobs in the industry. Unlike others in the AFL-CIO leadership, McDonald supported Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) for the vice presidential nomination. At the Democratic National Convention, after Kennedy announced that he had selected Johnson as his running mate, McDonald worked to overcome labor's opposition to Johnson.

Early in Kennedy's presidency, McDonald cooperated with the administration to coordinate the USWA's bargaining strategy with the government's economic policy. Fearing inflation, the administration urged that all collective bargaining settlements be limited to the annual increase in productivity. Kennedy specifically urged the USWA and the steel industry to reach an accord within the administration's guidelines. Ignoring opposition from within his wage policy committee, McDonald reached an agreement with the industry in March 1962. The contract called for an increase of 10 cents an hour in fringe benefits but no across-the-board wage increase. The agreement fell well within the administration's guidelines but was the first USWA contract since 1942 that did not contain an increase in wages. The steel companies raised prices anyway, which resulted in a confrontation between Kennedy and U.S. Steel that ultimately led the companies to roll back the price increase. In June 1963, McDonald negotiated another contract with no across-the-board wage increase. The modest gains proved unpopular with many workers, especially in light of McDonald's lavish lifestyle. Moreover, some within the union's leadership resented the fact that McDonald negotiated the settlement in secret through a labor-management "Human Relations Committee." In 1965, the secretary-treasurer of the USWA, I. W. Abel, defeated McDonald for the union presidency in a close race.

After losing the presidency of the USWA, McDonald retired to Palm Springs, California, and published an autobiography, Union Man, in 1969. He died of cancer in Palms Springs on August 8, 1979.

—MSM

McElroy, Neil H(olsler)

(1904–1972) secretary of defense

Neil McElroy was born in Berea, Ohio, on October 30, 1904. After graduating from Harvard University in 1925, he began a long career with Procter & Gamble, a soap-manufacturing concern based in Cincinnati. Starting as a door-to-door salesman, he became director of the promotions department in 1929, vice president and general manager in 1946, and president in 1948. By that time, Procter & Gamble had the largest advertising budget of any company in the world. Under McElroy's directorship, company profits expanded from $28.6 million in 1949 to $59.3 million in 1956.

McElroy chaired the White House Conference on Education in 1955 and 1956. When, in 1957, CHARLES E. WILSON informed President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER of his intention to resign as secretary of defense, Eisenhower chose McElroy to replace Wilson. McElroy agreed to accept the post on the condition that he would take a leave of absence rather than resign from Procter & Gamble. In order to avoid any conflict of interest, Procter & Gamble would drop the small number of defense contracts it held. McElroy also stipulated that he would serve only two years. The president agreed to both conditions, and McElroy was sworn in on October 9.

McElroy entered the Pentagon in the midst of controversy. In August 1957, the Soviet Union had launched the world's first intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM). Two months later, it placed into orbit Sputnik, the world's first artificial satellite. These events shook public confidence in America's defenses and initiated a debate on military organization and weapons development programs. A number of powerful senators, among them STUART SYMINGTON (D-Mo.), HENRY JACKSON (D-Wash.), and LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), called for more rapid production of missiles. In response, McElroy defended Eisenhower's plan for doing everything possible to increase production within the guidelines of the existing defense budget.

Shortly after the launch of Sputnik, Eisenhower authorized McElroy to seek a supplemental appropriation of $1.26 billion for the remainder of fiscal year 1958. The additional money was to accelerate existing programs to develop intermediate range ballistic missiles (IRBM) and ICBMs, protect the strategic bomber force, improve detection devices, and speed up development of an antimissile missile. Eisenhower and McElroy privately acknowledged that two-thirds of the supplementary funding served "more to stabilize public opinion than to meet the real need for acceleration." McElroy consolidated control of all military missile programs in a new agency that reported directly to him. He emphasized the development of IRBMs, which the United States had in advanced stages of testing, and argued that with proper deployment overseas they would be as effective as Soviet ICBMs. Waiving final tests, he ordered the air force's Thor and army's Jupiter IRBMs into production, with projected deployment in the United Kingdom by the end of 1958 and in Europe soon after. McElroy also ordered accelerated development of the navy's Polaris IRBM and the Minuteman ICBM, the latter of which was scheduled to become operational in the early 1960s.

Although he consistently attempted to control defense spending, Eisenhower remained conscious of the danger of placing economy above preparedness. In the aftermath of Sputnik, Eisenhower and McElroy resisted pressure from Democratic critics to spend more money on defense and the development of missiles. They adjusted some priorities and added modest sums to defense expenditures, but they resisted massive increases in spending on defense. In November 1957, McElroy testified before the Senate Preparedness Subcommittee. He admitted that the USSR was "obviously" ahead of the United States in missiles that could put a satellite into orbit, but he refused to agree that the Soviets led in long-range missiles. Several months later, McElroy argued against a crash program for missile development. He maintained that "a rather frantic . . . program would be of dubious effectiveness" and stated that there was "little we can do to make a significant change in the date by which we can achieve the first operational intercontinental ballistic missile."

McElroy also rebutted Symington's allegation that the Soviet Union had surpassed the United States in total military strength and argued that the United States did not need a total reorganization of its defense plans. At an American Legion Convention in September, he said "the spending of more tax dollars would, at this time, be an unwarranted risk of your money." "There is a point," he declared, "beyond which granting huge sums on untried weapons would be foolhardy—would, in fact, endanger [U.S.] economic and even . . . military security."

When Eisenhower proposed a plan for the reorganization of the Defense Department in 1958, McElroy played a major role in defending the plan to Congress and the public. Submitted in the spring, the legislation proposed to consolidate operational units of the U.S. armed forces under unified commands reporting directly to the secretary of defense. Further, under its provisions, most defense funding would be appropriated to the Defense Department, rather than the individual services. The measure would also have created a central authority to oversee all research and development in the Pentagon. The bill that emerged from Congress gave Eisenhower most of what he wanted. However, Congress added a provision that gave the service secretaries and chiefs of staff the right to go, on their own initiative, to Congress with "any recommendations relating to the Department of Defense they might deem proper." Eisenhower called it "legalized insubordination" but in the end accepted it as a necessary compromise and signed the Defense Reorganization Act into law on August 6. The president gave McElroy considerable credit for its passage.

McElroy strongly supported military assistance and sought to mobilize congressional and public support for the program. "Military assistance," he said, "is to the defense of our Country as fire prevention is to fire fighting. You can have the best, most modern sprinkling system in our factory, but it will be useless if you don't take steps to prevent fires from getting out of control before they reach your plant." Despite his efforts, congressional opposition limited expenditures for military aid.

As he intended, McElroy remained at the Defense Department only two years. He left in December 1959 and returned to Procter & Gamble as chairman of the board. During the next decade, McElroy also served as director of the General Electric Company, the Chrysler Corporation, and the Equitable Life Insurance Company. He stepped down as chairman of the board at Procter & Gamble in October 1971 and became chairman of the company's executive committee. McElroy died of cancer in Cincinnati, Ohio, on November 30, 1972.

—MSM

McKay, Douglas

(1893–1959) secretary of the interior

The son of a carpenter, Douglas McKay was born in Portland, Oregon, on June 24, 1893. While in high school, he delivered papers and worked as a meat-cutter. He left high school without receiving a diploma and worked as an office boy for two years before entering Oregon State College, from which he graduated in 1917. He enlisted as an officer in the army during World War I and served in Europe, where he was wounded. After his return to the United States, he began working as an insurance salesman in 1923 and then sold cars until 1927, when he opened his own auto agency. McKay entered politics as a Republican and won election as mayor of Salem in 1932. He was elected to the Oregon state senate in 1934 and held that office until 1948 except for a brief period from 1942 to 1943, during which he served in the army.

McKay won a three-way race for governor in 1948. As governor, he was a fiscal conservative who opposed the expansion of federal authority and advocated state and local responsibility. In general, he favored private over public development of natural resources, but he supported city-owned water projects. He won reelection in 1950.

Although identified with the conservative wing of the Republican Party, McKay doubted that the leader of that wing, Senator ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio), could win the presidency in 1952. McKay therefore became an early supporter of General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the nomination. The governor of Oregon first came to Eisenhower's attention during the Republican National Convention of 1952, when he sent a telegram to the National Committee urging the seating of a pro-Eisenhower delegation from Texas. In January 1953, Eisenhower appointed him secretary of the interior. The president wanted a westerner for the job because of the importance of conservation and the development of water power to that area. At the same time, the president wanted someone who was not from a state involved in a dispute over water rights to the Colorado River or another disputed river that flowed across state lines. Eisenhower also wanted an individual who shared his desires to balance the budget and to limit the federal government's role in the development of natural resources. McKay fit those criteria.

As secretary of the interior, McKay generally favored reversing the trend toward the nationalization of hydroelectric power but did not support dismantling the Tennessee Valley Authority. His approach mirrored Eisenhower's vision, in which the federal government would cooperate with state governments, local public groups, and private enterprise in building facilities. In July 1953, McKay presented a draft statement of the new administration's power policy. The paper reversed the Truman administration's emphasis on federal development of power and placed responsibility on local communities for supplying power needs. The Interior Department would build plants only if "economically justified and feasible" and if the project was too large to be financed privately or by local government. Even before presenting this proposal, McKay announced that the Interior Department would withdraw the Truman administration's objection to the Federal Power Commission's granting a license to the Idaho Power Company to build the Oxbow Dam. This effectively blocked plans for a large, federally built dam at Hell's Canyon in Idaho. After two years of hearings, the Federal Power Commission granted the Idaho Power Company the license in August 1955.

His positions and his combative personality made McKay one of the most controversial figures in Eisenhower's cabinet. McKay supported the Submerged Lands Act of 1953, which redeemed Eisenhower's campaign pledge to give control of oil-rich tidelands to the states. Critics called the secretary "give-away McKay."

His critics also alleged that McKay favored business interests and Republicans over Democrats. In April 1953, McKay announced that Albert M. Day, director of the Wildlife Service since 1946, would be replaced by John L. Farley, former head of the California Fish and Game Commission, who then worked for a paper-manufacturing firm. The secretary's critics accused McKay of preferring Farley because of his ties to Alaska salmon packers and commercial hunters. That same month, McKay announced the resignation of a career civil servant, Marion Clawson, as director of the Bureau of Land Management. McKay said he would appoint Clawson's successor and reinstate the former director in a lower-paying job. Clawson denied he had resigned and asked McKay to explain his dismissal. The secretary then charged him with insubordination and denied him the other position. Soon afterward, McKay nominated Tom Lyon to replace John J. Forbes as director of the Bureau of Mines. United Mine Workers President JOHN L. LEWIS protested the nomination on the grounds that Lyon advocated that the states rather than the federal government administer the Mine Safety Act. Subsequent hearings revealed that Lyon held a pension from the Anaconda Copper Co. that could be revoked at their displeasure. The nomination was withdrawn in June 1953. By the summer, Eisenhower insisted that all high-ranking appointments in the Interior Department be given his personal scrutiny.

McKay's most important achievement was the series of improvements he made to the national park system. Early in 1954, Eisenhower sent a memo to the secretary voicing his concern about the deterioration of the parks. McKay thereafter developed a program of improvements known as "Mission 66," a 10-year plan designed to preserve and improve parks as well as to prepare them to accommodate an expected 80 million visitors in 1966. The secretary also succeeded in protecting park lands, notably blocking a possible transfer of lands in the Wichita Wildlife Refuge for use by the army. Further, the department instituted exacting guidelines for oil and gas leasing in wildlife areas and added nine new wildlife reserves. McKay supervised the addition of 400,000 acres to the parks from 1953 to 1956.

McKay also implemented plans that attempted to further the integration of Native Americans into American society. The so-called termination policy, developed during the Truman administration, proposed to end federal relations with the tribes at the earliest possible time and attempted to promote assimilation. While McKay was secretary, the Department of Interior terminated federal supervision over six Indian groups. The policy encountered resistance from Indian tribes. In addition to the termination policy, the federal government attempted to encourage voluntary relocation from reservations to cities. This intended to ease economic pressures on reservations and to promote integration. Opposition to these policies led the Eisenhower administration to reverse itself in 1958.

In March 1956, McKay resigned to challenge Senator WAYNE MORSE's (D-Oreg.) bid for reelection. Although he waged a vigorous campaign, McKay suffered the first defeat of his political career. Subsequently, in 1957, McKay became chair of the International Joint Commission, which dealt with boundary water problems between the United States and Canada. He died in Salem, Oregon, on July 22, 1959.

—MSM

McKeldin, Theodore Roosevelt
(1900–1974) governor of Maryland, mayor of Baltimore

The son of a Scotch-Irish immigrant stonemason who later became a policeman, McKeldin was born in Baltimore, Maryland, on November 20, 1900. In a working class family of 11 children, money was scarce, and McKeldin left school at the age of 14 to help support the family. While working as an office boy for Alexander Brown & Sons and then for a bank, he attended night school. After earning the equivalent of a high school diploma, he attended night classes at the University of Maryland Law School and earned his LL.B. in 1925. McKeldin practiced law and began his political career in 1927, when he worked for the mayoral campaign of William F. Broening, a prominent Republican. When Broening won the election, he appointed McKeldin to be his executive secretary. McKeldin returned to his private law practice in 1931 but remained active in Republican politics. He ran unsuccessfully for mayor of Baltimore in 1939. Three years later, he was the Republican nominee for governor of Maryland, but lost to the Democratic incumbent, Herbert R. O'Connor. In 1943, after a vigorous door-to-door campaign, McKeldin won an upset victory over the incumbent mayor of Baltimore, Howard Jackson. Running in an overwhelmingly Democratic city, McKeldin won by more than 20,000 votes. A powerful, often florid, orator, McKeldin became the most prominent Republican in his state for the next 25 years.

As mayor, he revised the city charter and initiated plans for a civic center, an international airport, an expressway system, and urban renewal. A long-time opponent of racial segregation, he appointed the first African-American members of the school board and hired black members for his personal staff and to work in the city solicitor's office. While serving as mayor, McKeldin ran again for the governorship in 1946 but lost. When his term as mayor expired in 1947, he returned to the practice of law and studied economics at Johns Hopkins University. McKeldin ran for governor a third time in 1950 and won a landslide victory over the incumbent, William Preston Lane, Jr., who had pushed through an unpopular sales tax.

As governor, McKeldin faced a legislature controlled by Democrats. He launched an extensive program of reform and reconstruction. He appointed a commission, headed by his lifelong friend and adviser, SIMON E. SOBELOFF, to study state government. The Commission on State Government and Bureaucratic Administration (also known as the Little Hoover Commission or the Sobeloff Commission) did an exhaustive study of every aspect of state government, including taxation, budgeting, and the structure of the executive branch. McKeldin also put in place a 12-year program for the construction of highways. One of the major achievements of his administration was the completion in 1952 of the Chesapeake Bay Bridge, a project begun under his predecessor, which linked Maryland's Eastern Shore with the western part of the state. His administration reformed unemployment and workers' compensation laws. McKeldin also continued his support for civil rights. He worked to integrate the state's beaches, parks, and buses. McKeldin supported the basic structure of the New Deal and endorsed many aspects of HARRY S. TRUMAN's Fair Deal, although he criticized the corruption of the Truman administration. An early and outspoken opponent of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.), McKeldin denounced what he described as the senator's "smear technique," "big lie," and "sly innuendo."

Through his activities in the Southern Governors' Conference and other bodies, McKeldin emerged as a leading eastern, or liberal, Republican. In an effort to deny the Maryland delegation to Senator ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio), the favorite of the conservative wing of the party, McKeldin announced his candidacy as a favorite son for the party's presidential nomination in the spring of 1952. Subsequently, McKeldin joined the parade of liberal and moderate Republicans who went to Paris to persuade General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to seek the Republican nomination. At the Republican National Convention, McKeldin was chosen to give the speech nominating Eisenhower. His nationally televised speech won widespread praise.

McKeldin won reelection as governor in 1954 by defeating Harry C. ("Curley") Byrd, a popular former president of the University of Maryland. During his second term, McKeldin became involved in the crisis over the desegregation of Central High School in Little Rock, Arkansas. In September 1954, Governor ORVAL FAUBUS of Arkansas obstructed a federal court order requiring the desegregation of Central High School. Eisenhower responded by nationalizing the Arkansas National Guard and sending elements of the 101st Airborne to enforce the order. Predictably, the action received a hostile reception among southern officeholders. The Southern Governors' Conference established a committee, composed of moderates and chaired by Governor LUTHER HODGES of North Carolina, to meet with the president and seek the withdrawal of the troops. McKeldin was one of four members of that committee. Eisenhower informed the governors that, if they could persuade Faubus to assume responsibility for maintaining order, he would withdraw the federal troops and return the Arkansas National Guard to state control. After difficult negotiations with Faubus, in which he repeatedly proved untrustworthy, the committee of southern governors acknowledged defeat. McKeldin issued a blast at Faubus, in which he accused the governor of Arkansas of "double-crossing" the committee.

Barred by the state constitution from running for a third term, McKeldin decided to enter the race for mayor of Baltimore in 1959. This time, he was defeated. After leaving the governor's mansion in 1959, McKeldin remained active in politics and won election to a second term as mayor of Baltimore in 1963. Back in the mayor's office, he continued his support of racial equality. Before Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1964, he undertook several pioneering initiatives to bring about social equality in the city. His reputation as a strong supporter of civil rights enabled him to defuse racial tensions in the city. Although Baltimore experienced race riots, it did not suffer the extensive damage some cities did. In one instance, McKeldin avoided a confrontation between a group of African Americans and the National Guard by approaching the crowd and saying: "My brothers, my sisters, what is the problem?" The erstwhile rioters extended a warm welcome to the mayor, chatted with him for a while, and then dispersed. When the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) made Baltimore one of its "target cities," McKeldin worked with the organization and called for an end to discrimination in employment. He embarked on a massive program of urban renewal, which included the redevelopment of the city's inner harbor, construction of a new municipal building, and urban renewal. In 1964, McKeldin backed New York's governor, Nelson A. Rockefeller, for the Republican presidential nomination. When the conservative Senator BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.) won the Republican presidential nomination, McKeldin bolted the party and supported LYNDON B. JOHNSON for the presidency. That decision strained his relations with the Republican Party. On the other hand, McKeldin enjoyed good relations with the Johnson administration, which enabled him to obtain a large loan from the federal government for the development of Baltimore's Inner Harbor.

After his second term as mayor expired in 1967, McKeldin remained active in public affairs and continued his activities with various community and charitable organizations. An early opponent of the U.S. involvement in the war in Vietnam, he was appointed by Johnson to a panel of American observers chosen to supervise the elections in South Vietnam in September 1967. Johnson also appointed McKeldin to the U.S. Indian Claims Commission. Under pressure from Goldwater, Nixon did not reappoint McKeldin to the Indian Claims Commission when the latter's term ended in 1969. In the later part of his political career, McKeldin became committed to the abolition of capital punishment. He testified against the death penalty before Congress in 1968. A forceful and outspoken supporter of the state of Israel, he was a founder and president of the America-Israel Society. His successor as mayor appointed McKeldin to the board of municipal zoning appeals in 1971. McKeldin died at his home in Baltimore on August 10, 1974.

—MSM

McLeod, R(obert) W(alter) Scott

(1914–1961) administrator, Bureau of Security, Consular Affairs and Inspection; ambassador to Ireland

Scott McLeod was born in Davenport, Iowa, on June 17, 1914. After graduating from Grinnell College in 1937, he sold advertising for the Des Moines Register and Tribune. In 1938, he took a job as police reporter for the Cedar Rapids Gazette. After working as an FBI agent from 1942 to 1949, he served as administrative assistant to Senator STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.) from 1949 to 1953. While working for Bridges, a powerful voice of the Republican right, McLeod helped to write the Republican report protesting President HARRY S. TRUMAN's dismissal of General Douglas MacArthur. McLeod's work as Bridges's administrative assistant also brought him to the attention of Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.).

During Truman's second term, the State Department was shaken by allegations that some of its employees were guilty of disloyalty. When the administration of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER took office in 1953, the new secretary of state, JOHN FOSTER DULLES, was determined to avoid the kind of problems Truman and his secretary of state, DEAN ACHESON, had with Congress. At the administration's request, Congress created a new position, undersecretary of state for administration and operations. Dulles chose Donald B. Lourie, the president of the Quaker Oats Company, to be undersecretary for administration and operations. Lourie chose McLeod as the State Department's chief security officer. The appointment of McLeod, an ally of McCarthy, was widely regarded as an attempt to appease the right wing of the Republican Party. As administrator of security, consular affairs, and inspection, McLeod served as the State Department's security liaison with the FBI, the Central Intelligence Agency, and Congress. In addition, it fell to him to implement Eisenhower's Executive Order 10450, which replaced Truman's Loyalty Program with a new program designed to ensure that the employment of any government worker was "clearly consistent" with national security. The order also shifted responsibility for administering the program to heads of departments and agencies, who were to establish security programs within their departments. McLeod insisted that, in order to carry out his duties, the office of personnel be placed under his authority. He considered every job at the State Department as a sensitive position and ordered the FBI to conduct a full field investigation on all employees. McLeod hired two dozen ex-FBI agents and within three weeks had fired 21 employees for alleged homosexuality. He and his team looked at what was on top of desks, inside drawers, and in file cabinets. They even examined what employees read. McLeod's activities had a detrimental effect on the morale of employees at the State Department.

McLeod proved a constant thorn in the side of the administration. He kept on his desk an autographed photo of McCarthy. His methods soon upset Dulles, and McLeod's agreement to give McCarthy limited access to the State Department's classified personnel files particularly rankled the secretary of state. Even more infuriating were McLeod's efforts to interfere with the confirmation of CHARLES E. BOHLEN as ambassador to the Soviet Union in March 1953. A career diplomat and an expert on Soviet affairs, Bohlen had served as an interpreter and adviser at Yalta. His association with Yalta made him a target for conservatives, including Bridges, who had demanded that the new administration repudiate the Yalta accords. In reviewing the FBI's report on Bohlen, McLeod found that the FBI's investigation of the nominee had turned up some derogatory information, which it acknowledged was speculative and unreliable. Nevertheless, McLeod attempted to use the material to block Bohlen's confirmation. He not only informed Dulles of the derogatory information, but he passed it on to leading opponents of the nomination, including Bridges, Senator PAT McCARRAN (D-Nev.), and McCarthy. Dulles personally examined the FBI report and testified before the Foreign Relations Committee that "there [was] not a whisper of a suggestion" that Bohlen was a security risk. The Foreign Relations Committee unanimously recommended approval of the nomination, but this did not quell the opposition of furious conservatives. Eisenhower publicly supported the nomination, and Dulles announced that he had informed the president of all derogatory information in Bohlen's file. Dulles also reiterated his support for the nomination and declared that he and McLeod agreed on the final evaluation of Bohlen. McLeod met with General WILTON ("JERRY") PERSONS, Eisenhower's congressional liaison, to complain that he and Dulles did not agree on Bohlen. Frustrated over the response he received at the White House, McLeod threatened to resign, but SHERMAN ADAMS, Eisenhower's chief of staff, bluntly told him not to do so. McLeod then related his experience at the White House to McCarthy. In the face of bitter opposition in the Senate led by McCarran, Bridges, and McCarthy, the majority leader, ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio), proposed that one senator from each party review the FBI report on Bohlen. Taft and JOHN SPARKMAN (D-Ala.), the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 1952, examined the report and secured a statement from McLeod that he had seen only the report (as opposed to the "raw files"). During the debate on the floor of the Senate, Taft and Sparkman informed their colleagues that they found nothing in the report to prevent Bohlen's confirmation. Indeed, Taft declared that Bohlen was "a completely good security risk in every respect." The Senate overwhelmingly confirmed Bohlen.

McLeod's activities during the confirmation battle displeased his superiors. Eisenhower told Dulles that he would have the president's support if he fired McLeod. Dulles, however, worried about the trouble firing McLeod would stir up with McCarthy and his allies. In the end, McLeod wrote a letter of apology, and Dulles decided not to fire him. When Bohlen met with the president just before departing for Moscow, Eisenhower told him that McLeod's appointment was "an error on our part" but that "it would be a worse error to dismiss him."

McLeod further irritated Eisenhower by supporting McCarthy's investigation into the Voice of America and its parent, the International Information Agency. On several occasions, McLeod's partisanship, heavy-handed tactics, and seeming ineptitude embarrassed the administration. In testimony before a subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee in early 1954, McLeod admitted that he had purged only 11 people from the State Department for "loyalty reasons"; in seven of the cases, the process had begun under the Truman administration. McLeod came under criticism for making a series of highly partisan speeches on Lincoln Day 1954. In February 1954, JOSEPH ALSOP and STEWART ALSOP published a scathing attack on McLeod in their influential column. On March 1, 1954, the administration stripped McLeod of authority over State Department personnel, although he remained in charge of departmental security matters. In August 1954, five former diplomats published a letter in the New York Times attacking McLeod and his methods.

As supervisor of the passport and visa divisions and the office of special consular services, McLeod had responsibility for enforcing the Refugee Act of 1953, a measure designed to allow more than 200,000 refugees from communist countries to enter the United States over and above the existing quotas. McLeod insisted on such a careful screening of each immigrant that only nine refugees gained admission under the act in 1953–54. This angered EDWARD CORSI, a special adviser for immigration affairs. After leaving the State Department, Corsi testified before a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee that the administration of the Refugee Act was a national scandal.

Partly to remove McLeod from a position in which he had attracted so much criticism, Eisenhower nominated McLeod as ambassador to Ireland in 1957. Democratic senators opposed the nomination. During the debate over McLeod's confirmation, Senator JOSEPH CLARK (D-Pa.) attacked him as a "symbol of the witch hunter." Despite the opposition, the Senate voted overwhelmingly to confirm McLeod. At the end of the Eisenhower administration, McLeod resigned his position as ambassador. In 1961, he received an appointment as general counsel to Republican members of the Senate Appropriations Committee. He died of a heart attack in Concord, New Hampshire, on November 7, 1961.

—MSM

McNamara, Patrick V(incent)

(1894–1966) U.S. senator

The son of Irish immigrants, McNamara was born in North Weymouth, Massachusetts, on October 4, 1894. He attended public schools in Weymouth and the Bethlehem Steel Company's Fore River Apprentice School in Quincy, Massachusetts, from 1912 to 1916. While working as a pipe fitter at the Fore River Shipyard, he played semiprofessional football. He moved to Detroit, Michigan, in 1921 to head a construction gang for the Grinell Company. Subsequently, he worked for two mechanical contracting firms. He was job superintendent for R. L. Spitzley Company from 1922 to 1926 and worked as general superintendent of H. Kelly Company from 1926 to 1930. After the depression curtailed construction, McNamara went to work as a maintenance foreman for the Chrysler Corporation in 1931. He returned to mechanical contracting with the Donald Miller Company in 1934. Even though he had moved into management, McNamara held a succession of unpaid offices in the Pipe Fitters Local 636 of the American Federation of Labor before becoming president of that union in 1937. He held that office without pay until he entered the Senate in 1955. McNamara also served as vice president of the Detroit Federation of Labor from 1939 to 1945, for which he also declined payment. In 1945, McNamara joined the Stanley-Carter Company, a mechanical contracting firm, first as superintendent of construction and customer contact man, then as head of labor relations, and, from 1950 to 1954, as vice president in charge of sales.

McNamara first held public office during World War II, when he served as rent director of the Detroit area for the Office of Price Administration from 1942 to 1945. After the war, he served on the Detroit Common Council from 1946 to 1948 and the Detroit Board of Education from 1949 to 1955. He sought the Democratic nomination for a seat in the U.S. Senate in 1954. Few gave him much of a chance against his opponent in the primary, Blair Moody, a former senator who had the backing of Governor G. MENNEN WILLIAMS and the party organization. When Moody died a month before the primary, however, the Democratic organization shifted its support to McNamara. In the general election, he faced the Republican incumbent, HOMER FERGUSON, who was seeking a third term. McNamara campaigned against the Eisenhower administration's economic, labor, and farm policies. He called for a repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, advocated federal aid to education, and denounced the Eisenhower administration's foreign policy. In November, he defeated Ferguson by 40,000 votes.

McNamara established a liberal voting record in the Senate. In 1956, he opposed a bill that would have exempted independent natural gas producers from the Federal Power Commission's rate regulations. He supported a federally funded dam and power facility at Hell's Canyon in 1957 and backed measures providing for federal support for public housing, public works, and education. In addition, he supported the Truman administration's rigid price supports for agriculture. The liberal Americans for Democratic Action gave him a 100 percent rating in 1957.

McNamara was a strong supporter of civil rights. In November 1956, he was one of six liberal senators who issued a 16-point "Democratic Declaration of 1957." It called not only for equal voting and educational rights for African Americans, but also for a "reasonable" substitute for Senate rule 22, which required a two-thirds vote to cut off debate. Making it easier to invoke cloture would have denied southern Democrats their most effective tool in thwarting civil rights legislation, the filibuster. In 1957, McNamara supported the Eisenhower administration's civil rights bill, including the controversial Title III, which authorized the Justice Department to seek injunctions in civil rights cases. McNamara opposed an amendment that would have required jury trials for those who violated federal court injunctions relating to voting rights. As passed, the Civil Rights Act of 1957 did not include Title III and did include the jury trial amendment. Three years later, McNamara supported what became the Civil Rights Act of 1960, a measure designed to protect black voting rights.

McNamara was also a strong supporter of organized labor. He consistently backed efforts to increase the minimum wage. In February 1959, he introduced a bill to establish a minimum wage for farmworkers of 75 cents per hour. As a member of the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, established in 1957 to investigate corruption in unions and industry, McNamara opposed the investigation of the United Auto Workers (UAW) proposed by KARL MUNDT (R-S. Dak.) and BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.). McNamara also opposed the committee's report, issued on March 24, 1958, which found extensive corruption in labor unions and collusion between labor leaders and management. He charged that, despite an effort to "give a semblance of balance," the overall effect of the report was "to frame a blanket indictment against the labor movement." McNamara resigned from the committee on March 31. The AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education gave him a 100 percent rating in 1958.

McNamara won reelection in 1960 by 120,000 votes. In 1961, he sponsored and served as floor manager for a bill that raised the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour and extended coverage to an additional 3.6 million workers. As ranking member of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and chair of its subcommittee on labor, McNamara had a hand in enacting much of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's Great Society legislation. In 1965, he played a significant role in gaining passage of Medicare and federal aid to education. McNamara chaired the Special Committee on Aging during the 87th Congress and the Public Works Committee during the 88th and 89th Congresses. Ill much of the time after going under major surgery in 1960, McNamara announced in early 1966 that he would not seek reelection. He died in Bethesda, Maryland, on April 30, 1966, less than a year before his second term expired.

—MSM

Meany, George (1894–1980) union leader

The son of an Irish Catholic plumber and union official, Meany was born in New York City on August 16, 1894. He grew up in the Bronx and left school at the age of 14 to work as a messenger for an advertising agency. In 1910, he became a plumber's helper. Upon becoming a journeyman in 1917, he joined Local 463 of the Plumber's Union. He won a seat on the executive board in 1919. Meany was elected to his first full-time union office (business agent of Local 463) in 1922; he never worked as a plumber again. In 1932, he became the building trades' delegate to the New York central labor council and was elected to the executive board of the New York State Federation of Labor. Two years later, he won election as president of the New York Federation of Labor, a post that made him the chief labor spokesperson in Albany and put him in close contact with the Roosevelt administration and the national leadership of the American Federation of Labor (AFL). Meany proved a skillful lobbyist, and in 1940 the president of the AFL, William Green, chose him to be secretary-treasurer of the AFL.

During World War II, Meany served on the National Defense Mediation Board and the War Labor Board. Through his activities in government and within the AFL, he became the architect of an activist role for the AFL in international affairs. In the postwar years, as Green's health failed, Meany assumed increasing responsibility for running the AFL's day-to-day activities. Meany helped lead the AFL's fight against passage of the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947, but he supported the noncommunist affidavits required of union officials under the law. He also worked closely with the American government in building anticommunist trade unions abroad and was instrumental in the formation of the pro-Western International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in 1949.

When Green died in November 1952, the AFL's executive council named Meany president. Although a firm business unionist who remained loyal to the craft traditions of the AFL, Meany was less hostile to the rival Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) than others in the AFL's hierarchy. One of his first acts as president was to revive merger negotiations (which had been suspended in 1950) with the CIO. The CIO's president, WALTER REUTHER, also favored unity but insisted on several preconditions, including the establishment of machinery to resolve jurisdictional disputes between industrial and craft unions and the elimination of organized crime from AFL affiliates.

In 1953, Meany moved against the East Coast's International Longshoremen's Association (ILA), which had long been dominated by gangsters (a situation brought to public attention by the New York State Crime Commission in 1952 and 1953). After the ILA's president, Joseph Ryan, refused to reform the union's hiring system and fire officers with criminal records, the AFL, at Meany's initiative, voted to expel the longshoremen. The AFL chartered a new union, the International Brotherhood of Longshoremen, but New York's dockworkers rejected the AFL's alternative.

In June 1953, Meany reached an agreement with Reuther on a no-raiding pact, which essentially froze the existing jurisdictions of AFL and CIO unions. Although several large AFL affiliates, including the Carpenters and Teamsters, disliked the pact, it was an important step toward an eventual merger, which took place in February 1955. Since the AFL was nearly twice as large as the CIO, Meany assumed the presidency of the new AFL-CIO in December 1955. Reuther became a vice president and head of the Industrial Union Department. CIO leaders agreed to retain the loose structure of the AFL, which gave wide autonomy to member unions.

Among the politically more aggressive labor leaders of the postwar period, Meany in 1947 helped found Labor's League for Political Education, the political arm of the AFL, which worked closely with the Democratic Party. He also persuaded the AFL to break officially with its nonpartisan tradition for the first time by endorsing the Democratic presidential nominee, ADLAI STEVENSON, in 1952. The AFL's primary political objective from 1947 on, however, was to secure the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. Although disappointed that DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER defeated Stevenson in 1952, leaders of the AFL applauded the new president's pledge to back certain revisions of the Taft-Hartley law, including provisions for striking workers to vote in representation elections and a requirement that employers as well as union officers sign noncommunist affidavits. The appointment of MARTIN DURKIN, head of Meany's own plumbers' union, as secretary of labor encouraged labor leaders and raised their hopes for amending the Taft-Hartley Act. In early 1953, Eisenhower established a committee to make recommendations regarding the revision of the Taft-Hartley Act. Meany worked with the committee, primarily through Durkin. The committee proposed 19 amendments to the Taft-Hartley law, including a repeal of section 14b, which permitted states to pass laws barring the union shop. Senator ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio), the majority leader, died the day that Eisenhower intended to send the proposals to Congress. Concluding that it would have been tactless to ask for amendments to Taft's bill on the day of his death, the administration delayed submitting the proposals. Taft's death had other consequences, as well. It would have taken someone with Taft's standing to shepherd the amendments through Congress, and Taft did not support all of them. The new Republican leader in the Senate, WILLIAM KNOWLAND of California, was less able and less sympathetic to revising the act. Moreover, opponents within the administration, led by Secretary of Commerce SINCLAIR WEEKS and pressure from business groups, persuaded the president to withdraw his support. Believing that he had been betrayed, Durkin resigned in August 1953. After that, labor lobbyists spent the rest of the decade devoting their efforts to fending off conservative proposals to strengthen Taft-Hartley.

Meany believed in social unionism (the idea that organized labor should advance the larger cause of social justice). Even after the merger, however, the combined AFL-CIO found it difficult to realize its legislative goals. In 1957, for example, Meany threw the organization's resources behind an effort to win health insurance for the aged. Organized labor's lobbyists succeeded in blocking a bill, sponsored by the administration, that would have provided for underwriting health insurance through private companies, rather than the social security system; but they could not secure passage of the measure backed by the AFL-CIO.

Meany blamed the conservative coalition in Congress as much as the administration for labor's legislative defeats. He grew increasingly skeptical of electoral activity, particularly because many southern Democrats were beyond the political reach of unions. In 1956, Meany unsuccessfully sought to withhold the AFL-CIO's endorsement from Stevenson. Meany reasoned that, even if the Democrats won the presidency, the same antilabor forces would continue to control congressional committees.

While Meany differed with Eisenhower on many domestic issues, he supported the president's defense and foreign policies. Under Meany's leadership, the AFL cooperated with the Foreign Operations Administration, the State Department, the Defense Department, and other government agencies in carrying out labor programs overseas as well as realizing broader policy objectives of the administration. In 1953 and 1954, Meany and his staff worked with the Central Intelligence Agency to topple the government of Guatemala's president, Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán. In an effort to weaken the communist-dominated Guatemalan labor federation, the AFL created a rival union, the leaders of which joined the "liberation army" led by General Carlos Castillo Armas. After the overthrow of Arbenz in June 1954, however, Armas and the new government proceeded to suppress all trade unions in Guatemala.

In his staunch commitment to combating communist influence in the international labor movement and to defending what he perceived to be the national interests of the United States, Meany was strongly influenced by JAY LOVESTONE, the head of the AFL foreign affairs department and a former leader of the Communist Party. Under Meany's aegis, Lovestone set up a network, most of whom had been associates of his in the Communist Party, stationed in various parts of the world. These operatives had large, often untraceable, funds at their disposal. In the 1960s, a series of articles in American newspapers and magazines revealed that much of that money came from government sources, including the CIA. After the merger of the AFL and the CIO, Lovestone's operations became a source of conflict between Meany and Reuther, who wanted to work through the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). Meany and Lovestone regarded the ICFTU as insufficiently anticommunist and preferred to channel financial aid and political direction independently to trade unions abroad.

Public exposures of union corruption in 1957 forced Meany to take action. The Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, headed by Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN (D-Ark.), began an investigation of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters in January. Meany instructed AFL-CIO officials to cooperate with the investigation. The McClellan Committee quickly compiled a mountain of evidence against the president of the Teamsters, DAVE BECK. Investigators alleged that Beck had taken more than $30,000 in union funds to pay for personal gifts and real estate. After Beck refused to answer more than 90 questions before the committee in March, Meany had him suspended from his seat on the AFL-CIO executive council. The McClellan Committee then turned its attention to Beck's successor, JAMES HOFFA.

In October 1957, Meany recommended that the Teamsters be suspended from the AFL-CIO pending the removal of Beck, Hoffa, and other officials. The leaders of the Teamsters refused to initiate internal reforms, and in December the AFL-CIO voted to expel the union. At the same time, Meany moved against several smaller unions that had been subjects of the McClellan Committee's investigations. The AFL-CIO expelled two unions, the Bakers and Confectioners and the Laundry Workers, and placed a third, the United Textile Workers, on probation. Even as he took action against racketeers in the AFL-CIO, Meany denounced the McClellan Committee as "little more than a vehicle of reactionary elements seeking to discredit the American labor movement" and complained that the Senate investigations ignored corrupt practices by business.

The revelations of the McClellan Committee led to growing demands in Congress for government regulation of the finances, internal governance, and strike activities of unions. In 1958, partly to forestall more stringent legislation, the AFL-CIO endorsed a bill sponsored by Senators JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) and IRVING IVES (R-N.Y.). The bill included restrictions on the authority of national and international unions to place locals under trusteeships, conditions and standards for the election of union officers, and a code of ethical practices. It also included several amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act favored by building trades unions. Business groups and congressional conservatives worked to eliminate the amendments sought by the building trades unions. The Kennedy-Ives bill passed the Senate in June but died in the House.

Reacting aggressively to what it perceived as the threat of antilabor legislation, the AFL-CIO threw its resources into the congressional elections of 1958. It sought to defeat right-to-work proposals that had been placed on several state ballots and to elect its "friends" to office. In the elections that November, 70 percent of the candidates backed by the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education won. Meany hailed the results as a vindication of organized labor, despite the unfavorable publicity generated by the McClellan Committee's investigations.

After the off-year elections of 1958, the Senate was almost two-thirds Democratic, and Republicans warned of a "labor-bossed Congress." It came as a surprise to Meany, therefore, when the AFL-CIO's efforts to block reform proposals collapsed in the new Congress. In April 1959, the Senate Subcommittee on Labor, dominated by liberals, reported out a bill, drawn in close cooperation with representatives of the AFL-CIO. At the insistence of McClellan, however, the bill was amended to include a "bill of rights" aimed at guaranteeing democratic procedures in union governance. The bill of rights included the rights to vote, speak, and resort to law. Meany and other labor leaders strongly opposed the amendment. The Senate modified the bill of rights to meet some of organized labor's objections and passed the measure. In the House, however, a coalition of southern Democrats and Republicans, supported by the administration, introduced a substitute measure, known as the Landrum-Griffin bill. The Landrum-Griffin bill contained McClellan's proposals as well as additional amendments strengthening prohibitions against secondary boycotts and curbing picketing rights. Despite strong opposition from the AFL-CIO, the bill passed in August, and President Eisenhower signed it into law on September 14.

During the late 1950s, Meany came under increasing criticism from Reuther and other former CIO leaders for what they regarded as his insufficiently dynamic leadership and his hard-line position on the cold war. Reuther urged Meany to throw the AFL-CIO's resources into organizing the estimated 26 million nonunion workers in the United States. Meany, however, remained unwilling to ask individual unions to abandon their jurisdictional claims in joint organizing drives. In his public remarks on foreign policy, Meany consistently opposed détente with the Soviet Union and denounced neutral nations, such as India, for being, "in effect," allies of communism. When Soviet leaders Anastas Mikoyan and Nikita Khrushchev visited the United States in 1959, Meany refused them permission to tour the AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington, D.C., or to address the AFL-CIO convention in San Francisco. Meany also criticized Reuther for meeting with them.

Like corruption, racism proved a difficult issue for Meany and the AFL-CIO in the 1950s. Meany himself supported civil rights, but he was reluctant to confront racial injustice within the labor movement. Although the AFL-CIO pledged itself in 1955 to the rapid elimination of racial discrimination within its ranks, Meany came under fire from black unionists and civil rights leaders, particularly when, in 1956, the AFL-CIO admitted two railroad unions that barred nonwhites from membership. In 1958, the NAACP filed complaints with the AFL-CIO civil rights department against the locals of 12 unions for discriminatory seniority provisions, systematic exclusion of African Americans from leadership positions, and other forms of bias. In the following year, A. PHILIP RANDOLPH, head of the black Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, brought these and other complaints to the floor of the AFL-CIO convention. After an angry exchange, during which Meany demanded of Randolph, "Who in the hell appointed you guardian of the Negro members in America?," the AFL-CIO refused to expel the accused locals.

Meany strongly backed John F. Kennedy at the Democratic National Convention in July 1960. He favored Senator HENRY JACKSON (D-Wash.) for the second spot on the ticket and was shocked when Kennedy chose Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) as his running mate. Meany held Johnson, the Senate majority leader, responsible for allowing the Landrum-Griffin Act to pass. Only Reuther's strenuous efforts on Kennedy's behalf prevented the AFL-CIO caucus at the convention from publicly condemning the selection of Johnson. Not until August did the AFL-CIO's executive council, with Meany's consent, finally endorse the ticket.

Meany applauded the social welfare legislation proposed by the Kennedy administration but criticized the president for failing to reduce unemployment. At the same time, he threw the AFL-CIO's support behind Kennedy's anticommunist initiatives in foreign policy. Meany helped to create the largely government-funded American Institute for Free Labor Development, which trained Latin American union leaders to oppose anti-U.S. regimes.

Racial issues continued to plague the AFL-CIO and its leader. In June 1961, Randolph submitted a stinging report accusing the AFL-CIO of "tokenism in civil rights" and calling for the expulsion of those unions that continued to practice discrimination. Meany responded by attempting to undercut Randolph's standing within the AFL-CIO. He appointed a committee to investigate Randolph's charges. In October, the committee brought forward a resolution "censuring" the black leader for "causing the gap that has developed between organized labor and the Negro community." Despite the harsh rhetoric and sometimes bruising tactics, Meany and Randolph reached an accord; the AFL-CIO dropped its censure resolution and, at its convention in December 1961, adopted a resolution calling for "appropriate action" against unions that persisted in discriminatory practices.

After Kennedy was assassinated, Meany enthusiastically supported the Johnson administration's Great Society programs. Meany's earlier hostility to Johnson developed into a close friendship. Believing that labor did not have the capacity to eliminate discriminatory practices within its own ranks, Meany supported legislation prohibiting discrimination in employment. He was one of the architects of the provision prohibiting job discrimination in the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Meany also supported Johnson's foreign policy, in particular the war in Vietnam.

Meany mobilized AFL-CIO efforts on behalf of Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY'S (D-Minn.) presidential candidacy in 1968. After RICHARD M. NIXON defeated Humphrey for the presidency, Meany supported Nixon's foreign policy, particularly with respect to the war in Vietnam, but opposed many of Nixon's domestic initiatives. In 1972, Meany regarded the antiwar position of the Democratic presidential nominee, Senator GEORGE MCGOVERN (D-S. Dak.), as absurd. In addition, the countercultural lifestyle of many of McGovern's supporters appalled the culturally conservative Meany. He withheld the AFL-CIO's endorsement and its resources from McGovern. As the Watergate scandal developed, however, the AFL-CIO became the first major organization to call for Nixon to resign.

In his last years, Meany typified what many criticized in the labor movement. He was remote from the rank and file; he was ambivalent toward the claims of minorities and women; he clung to older ways of doing things in an age of rapid economic, social, and cultural change. He finally left office in November 1979 and died in Bethesda, Maryland, on January 10, 1980.

—MSM

Merchant, Livingston T(allmadge)

(1903–1976) assistant secretary of state for European affairs, ambassador to Canada, deputy undersecretary of state for political affairs, undersecretary of state for political affairs

A descendant of Oliver Wolcott, Jr., secretary of the Treasury under George Washington and John Adams, and General William Floyd, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, Livingston Merchant was born in New York City on November 23, 1903. He graduated from Hotchkiss School in 1922 and from Princeton University in 1926, after which he joined the Boston branch of Scudder, Stevens & Clark and embarked on a successful career as an investment counselor. He became a partner in 1930. After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Merchant joined the State Department as assistant chief of its division of defense materials. He held a number of positions in the economic division, including economic counselor at the United States embassy in Paris. In 1947, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted as counselor in Nanking, China, where he served until the defeat of the Nationalist Chinese. He went to Taiwan briefly before being called to Washington in 1949 to become assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs.

In March 1953, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES named Merchant assistant secretary of state for European affairs. During his three years in that position, he accompanied President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to Berlin in 1954 and to London, Geneva, and Paris the following year. He was a principal planner of the summit conference held at Geneva in July 1955 to discuss the unification of Germany and the status of Berlin. At the conference, he served as a top adviser to Eisenhower. He subsequently participated in a series of conferences in preparation for a meeting of foreign ministers in October 1955 that focused on Germany and the relaxation of East-West tensions.

Eisenhower nominated Merchant as ambassador to Canada in April 1956. Merchant assumed his post at a time of increasing tension between the two countries. The Canadian Conservative Party was accusing the Liberal government of “selling out to foreign capital” (i.e., the United States) through its policy of encouraging foreign investment. By appointing a high-ranking diplomat as ambassador, Eisenhower hoped to demonstrate that the United States recognized the importance of Canada and took cognizance of its problems. Nevertheless, relations between the two countries remained cool throughout Merchant’s tour.

In 1959, Secretary of State CHRISTIAN HERTER sent Merchant to Panama in an attempt to ease tensions following anti-American riots over control of the Canal Zone. Despite his assurances that Panama maintained titular sovereignty over the area under the treaty of 1903 and his suggestions that the United States would increase economic aid, Merchant failed to stop the violence. He returned to Washington as deputy undersecretary of state for political affairs in August 1959 and became undersecretary of state for political affairs in January 1960. Merchant played a significant role in planning for the 1959 meeting of foreign ministers in Geneva to discuss the matter of Berlin. He also participated in that meeting.

President JOHN F. KENNEDY appointed Merchant ambassador to Canada in 1961, where he served until his retirement from the Foreign Service in 1962. Merchant served as the president’s special representative for Multilateral Force Negotiations in 1963. From 1965 to 1968, he was executive director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Merchant died in Washington, D.C., on May 15, 1976.

—MSM

Metcalf, Lee

(1911–1978) U.S. congressman and senator

The son of a bank cashier, Metcalf was born in Stevensville, Montana, on January 28, 1911. He grew up on his family’s 300-acre farm outside Stevensville. After attending Montana State University (later the University of Montana) for a year, he transferred to Stanford University, from which he graduated, and earned an LL.B. degree from Montana State University in 1936. That same year, he was elected as a Democrat to the Montana House of Representatives. In 1937, he was appointed an assistant state attorney general, a post he held until 1941, when he resigned to embark on the private practice of law. Metcalf enlisted in the army in December 1942, attended officers' training school, was commissioned, and participated in the Normandy invasion and the Battle of the Bulge. With the defeat of Germany, his duties focused on the care and repatriation of displaced persons. He also helped to draft ordinances for local elections in Germany. After his discharge from the army as a first lieutenant in April 1946, Metcalf was elected later that year to a six-year term as an associate justice of the Montana Supreme Court. In 1952, he ran successfully for the U.S. House of Representatives from Montana's first district, which comprised the western third of the state.

From his first term in Congress, Metcalf established a reputation as a liberal on domestic issues. An outspoken supporter of conservation, he played a role in defeating a grazing lands bill in 1953 that conservationists and wildlife groups opposed because, they argued, it would have made grazing permits on federal lands tantamount to ownership. The following year, Metcalf led the successful floor opposition to a timberlands exchange bill that would have required the federal government to give private interests timber rights on federal lands in payment for land requisitioned by the government. Metcalf first added several amendments to the measure, including one specifying that timber rights, but not title, would be transferred to private interests. He then moved successfully to recommit the bill to the Interior Committee. On other issues, Metcalf was a critic of private utility companies and their rate structures. He also advocated federal aid to education and consumer protection.

In 1957, Metcalf was one of the founders of a caucus of young liberal Democratic representatives known as the Democratic Study Group. He joined 27 representatives in issuing the caucus's policy statement, which included recommendations for federal aid for school construction, medical education, and housing; repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act; extension of the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act; protection of civil rights; and revision of immigration and naturalization laws to eliminate the national origins rule.

Later in 1957, Metcalf was one of the members of the Education and Labor Committee who voted unsuccessfully to deny the panel's chair, Representative GRAHAM A. BARDEN (D-N.C.), the right to appoint subcommittee chairs and staff members. In 1958, Metcalf and Senator James E. Murray (D-Mont.), a member of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, cosponsored a bill to provide federal aid for the construction of schools and for scholarships. Congress instead passed a somewhat more modest bill backed by the administration. The senators from Montana reintroduced their bill again the following year, but the Murray-Metcalf bill stalled in the Rules Committee.

Metcalf won election to the U.S. Senate in 1960. He was subsequently reelected in 1966 and 1972. In the Senate, he continued to focus his attention on education, the regulation of private utility companies, and conservation. He introduced a bill in 1962 to protect national recreation areas, fish, and wildlife from destruction by federal highway construction programs. The bill never passed. In 1963, Metcalf also fought unsuccessfully for the construction in southern Montana of a federal dam able to produce commercial power. He published a book, Overcharge (1967), in which he maintained that states could not effectively regulate private utility companies because they did not have the resources to discipline the industry. Metcalf continued his support for federal aid to education and was a major supporter of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. In the late 1960s and into the 1970s, Metcalf continued to support conservation, congressional reform, and legislation to protect consumers. Suffering from ill health, he announced in 1977 that he would not stand for reelection in 1978. He died in Helena, Montana, on January 12, 1978.

—MSM

Meyner, Robert B(aumle)

(1908–1990) governor of New Jersey

The son of a silk-loom fixer, Robert B. Meyner was born in Easton, Pennsylvania, on July 3, 1908. He moved with his family to Phillipsburg, New Jersey, where he attended public schools. Meyner earned his undergraduate degree from Lafayette College and an LL.B. from Columbia University Law School. After receiving his law degree in 1933, he opened a private law practice in Phillipsburg. He ran unsuccessfully for the state senate in 1941. Following service in the navy during World War II, during which he rose to the rank of lieutenant commander, Meyner made an unsuccessful bid for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives in 1946. He won election to the state senate in 1947 as a Democrat. Meyner became minority leader in 1950 and chair of the state party convention in 1951. Despite his rise in the party, he lost his bid for reelection in 1951.

In 1953, Meyner won the Democratic gubernatorial primary against the candidate of the powerful Hudson County machine. In the general election, he ran on a platform that stressed the need to combat organized crime, revise taxes, and increase aid to public schools. He also accused his Republican opponent, a wealthy building contractor, of seeking clemency for a labor racketeer. Meyner went on to win the general election by 153,000 votes.

In office, Meyner governed as a fiscal conservative and a centrist. He often promoted legislation with bipartisan appeal. During his first term, he aggressively supported state funding for education and a plan to restructure the state government. In 1956, he presided over the opening of the state's first medical college at Seton Hall. He also undertook several large public works projects. In 1954, he began the 164-mile-long Garden State Parkway, and, the following year, he established the Delaware Basin Authority.

Many of Meyner's proposals were not enacted into law, in part because he lacked a strong political base. The Democratic Hudson County machine was in decline, and Republican Bergen County was growing. Further, Meyner's decision in March 1954 to remove former governor Harold G. Hoffman as employment security director on charges of corruption did little to endear him to John V. Kenny, the boss of Hudson County. When Hoffman died a few months later, Meyner made public a confession left by the disgraced official that admitted to having embezzled some $300,000 in state funds.

Meyner became a prominent figure at the Governors' Conference in 1954, and many regarded him as a possible vice presidential candidate in 1956. However, he announced that he would not seek national office and would run for another term as governor. His slate of uncommitted delegates easily won the New Jersey presidential primary in May 1956, defeating a slate pledged to Senator ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.). At the Democratic National Convention in August, Meyner threw his support to ADLAI STEVENSON.

In November 1957, Meyner won reelection by a large margin, becoming the first governor of New Jersey to serve two four-year terms. His second term saw passage of the Water Supply Act of 1958, which provided $40 million to build reservoirs along the Raritan River and develop New Jersey's groundwater resources. He also got approval for a "green acres" bond issue in 1961 that provided $60 million to buy land for public use. This made New Jersey one of the first states to approve large-scale recreational land purchases.

Meyner spent much of his second term traveling abroad and visiting national Democratic leaders in an attempt to position himself as a contender for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1960. He failed to garner much support, however. In addition, throughout the spring of 1960, Joseph P. Kennedy busily gathered support for his son, Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), among politicians in northern New Jersey. Angered by what he regarded as the elder Kennedy's presumption, the governor bound New Jersey's delegation to his candidacy through the first ballot at the convention. His decision was motivated by more than pique; he hoped to prevent Kennedy from winning the nomination and to wind up with the second spot on a ticket headed by Stevenson. At the Democratic National Convention in July 1960, Meyner did not release his delegates in time to put Kennedy over the top, and, consequently, after Kennedy won the election, he did not offer Meyner a position in the new administration.

After leaving public office, Meyner returned to the practice of law. He attempted a political comeback in 1969 and won the Democratic primary for governor. In the general election, he lost badly to the Republican candidate, William T. Cahill. Meyner died in Captiva, Florida, on May 27, 1990.

—MSM

Miller, Arthur

(1915–2005) playwright

The son of a Jewish immigrant father from Radomizl, Poland, and an American-born mother whose family came from the same town, Arthur Miller was born in New York City on October 17, 1915. His father ran a successful coat-manufacturing business that collapsed during the Great Depression. Although the family was not particularly observant, Miller's Jewish upbringing played a central role in shaping his character and worldview. After graduating from Abraham Lincoln High School in 1932, Miller held several jobs before settling down as a shipping clerk in a warehouse for auto parts. He enrolled at the University of Michigan in 1934, where he won two Avery Hopwood awards for playwriting and received his B.A. in 1938. Upon graduating, he returned to New York and took a series of jobs that included writing for the Federal Theater Project and working as a steamfitter at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Rejected from military service because of an old football injury to his knee, Miller spent World War II writing radio dramas and working part-time as a steamfitter and truck driver. He toured army camps to collect material for a movie, The Story of GI Joe, based on a book by Ernie Pyle. In 1944, he published a journal of the tour titled Situation Normal. That same year, the Broadway production of his play The Man Who Had All the Luck opened and closed after four performances. The play focused on a man whose puritan instincts made him unable to accept his extraordinary good fortune and who therefore behaved in a self-destructive manner to prove that he had control of his life. Despite its lack of commercial success, the play won a Theater Guild Award. In 1945, Miller published a novel Focus, which examined American anti-Semitism.

His first critical and commercial success was All My Sons, presented in 1947, for which he won the New York Drama Critic's Circle Award. Dealing with themes that would drive his most significant works, the play tells the story of Joe Kellner, the owner of a small factory who, during World War II, allows cracked cylinder heads to be shipped to the air force in order to save his contract with the government. As a result, 21 pilots die in crashes.

Arthur Miller (Library of Congress)

Kellner lets his partner take the blame, but eventually his own son exposes him.

In 1949, Miller wrote Death of a Salesman, which also won the Circle Award as well as a Pulitzer Prize and a Tony. The work portrays the disintegration of Willy Loman, a traveling salesman forced to confront his failures at work and in his personal life. Willy has imbued his sons with his own grandiose dreams and the shallow values that guide his career as a salesman. He has built a career on "a smile and a shoeshine." "Be liked and you will never want," he preaches. Willy has always regarded his son, Biff, as the embodiment of his hopes and dreams for the future. Biff, however, is heading nowhere; he wanders through a series of low-paid menial jobs and a life of petty crime. Once the star of his high school football team, Biff was about to start college on a football scholarship when he discovered his father's infidelity, after which he dropped out of school and embarked on the path that led to his present state. Willy's other son works in a department store. Willy himself is no longer the hotshot salesman he once was but cannot bring himself to come to terms with the failure of his dreams, which, in a larger sense, is the failure of the American dream. When his young boss fires him, Willy pleads for his job, declaring that “a man is not a piece of fruit.” The loss of Willy’s job adds one more worry to the life of his careworn wife. Acknowledging that Willy is not “a great man” or “the finest character that ever lived,” Willy’s wife cries, “but he’s a human being, and a terrible thing is happening to him. So attention must be paid.” The loss of his job brings Willy partial awareness, but he clings to the fantasy of his dreams for himself and for Biff. The salesman commits suicide by crashing his car, fortified by the thought that Biff will receive the insurance.

With Willy’s plea for his job and his wife’s famous assertion that “attention must be paid,” Miller denounced the cruelties of American capitalism. The playwright regarded as even more inhumane, however, the tantalizing dream that hid the true nature of the system. Intellectual journals dismissed the play as an exercise in sentimentality, melodrama, or Marxist propaganda. Death of a Salesman, however, had a profound effect on audiences.

During the 1940s, Miller associated with a number of communist writers and signed numerous appeals and protests by groups the U.S. government classified as communist front organizations. He was appalled by the anticommunist excesses of the early cold war and, in 1950, wrote an adaptation of Henrik Ibsen’s drama, An Enemy of the People, in which the hero resisted pressure to conform to prevailing ideology. Miller’s third Broadway play, The Crucible, produced in 1953, brought him to the forefront of the controversy over domestic subversion and Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY’s (R-Wis.) charges that communists had infiltrated the national government. The play dealt with the struggle of individuals to hold on to both their integrity and their lives when confronted by the witch-hunters of 17th-century Salem, Massachusetts. In Miller’s version, John Proctor, when faced with a choice between death and compromising his conscience, declined to save himself at the expense of his honor. Playgoers readily drew the obvious parallel between congressional investigators and the Puritans who conducted the witch trials. Some connected the play to the trial of JULIUS and ETHEL ROSENBERG. Although the play won a Tony, it did not do especially well at the box office. Five months after it opened, Miller restaged the play himself. Although better received, the revised version was not especially successful, either. Some critics remained unconvinced by the analogy of the witch hunts in Salem to the hearings conducted by the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) and Senator McCarthy. Several pointed to a manifest failure in the comparison; there had never been witches, but there were communists.

In 1954, Miller published an ironic attack on congressional investigators titled “Every American Should Go to Jail: A Modest Proposal for the Pacification of the Public Temper.” Predictably, Miller drew the attention of the HUAC, which called him to testify during its hearings in 1956 on the unauthorized use of U.S. passports. By the time HUAC subpoenaed Miller, its hearings had largely run out of steam. Even though Miller had made himself a likely target by signing countless leftist petitions in the past, the committee did not subpoena him until after the announcement of his engagement to Marilyn Monroe, the actress and sex symbol. The issue, at least ostensibly, was Miller’s eligibility to travel abroad, given his communist leanings. Because Miller was an internationally respected figure, HUAC conducted its investigation in a rather restrained manner. The historian Walter Goodman described Miller’s testimony as “responsive, collected and only moderately sententious.” Facing accusations of having signed numerous statements connected with allegedly pro-communist organizations and of having made a formal application to join the Communist Party, Miller conceded his activities with the communists in the 1940s but denied that he applied to or joined the Communist Party. In addition, he stated that “I would not now support a cause or movement dominated by Communists.” Members of the committee mildly praised him for his example of “repentance,” but he angered the panel by refusing to offer the names of communists with whom he had associated. “My conscience,” he declared, “will not permit me to use the name of another person and bring trouble to him.” Miller was cited for contempt of Congress and received a $500 fine and a 30-day suspended jail sentence. He appealed and in 1958 won a reversal of the contempt citation.

Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Miller continued to write plays in a style sometimes described as “social realism.” These included A Memory of Two Mondays (1955), a reminiscence of Miller’s time working in the auto parts warehouse, and A View from the Bridge (1955), the story of an Italian-American longshoreman whose jealousy over his niece leads him to turn in two of his wife’s relatives as illegal immigrants. Neither of these social dramas had the power of Death of a Salesman.

Miller adapted one of his short stories into a screenplay for The Misfits (1961). The movie starred Monroe, whom Miller had married in 1956, and Clark Gable. Miller’s next play, After the Fall (1964), was his most overtly autobiographical work. It examined his married life with Monroe as well as his relationships with artists who named names during the anticommunist investigations. Some critics regarded the play, written shortly after Miller’s divorce from Monroe, as a cruel, even indecent, way of getting even. Incident at Vichy (1965), a long one-act play based on an actual incident, dramatized 90 minutes in the lives of a group of men waiting to be interviewed by the Gestapo in 1942. As Miller presented it, those content to avoid complicity in Nazi crimes shared the guilt of the persecutors. With his next play, The Price (1968), Miller returned to domestic drama. The play involved the intense confrontation between two estranged brothers, one a surgeon and the other a police officer who gave up the chance for a more promising career to support their father, brought together by their father’s death. The Price, which did reasonably well financially and received some critical praise, turned out to be Miller’s last success on Broadway.

Miller continued to be politically active in the 1960s. He was elected president of P.E.N., the International Association of Writers, in 1965. He spoke against the war in Vietnam at the first teach-ins at the University of Michigan in 1965 and rejected an invitation to the White House in protest against the war. In 1968, he served as a delegate for Senator EUGENE McCARTHY (D-Minn.) at the Democratic National Convention.

Miller continued to write plays into the first decade of the 21st century, but they found neither the commercial nor critical success of his earlier works. Critics attacked his later work as moralistic and turgid. This, in turn, led Miller to make some corrosive statements about the American theater. Miller also wrote short stories, a novella, travel books, and an autobiography, Timebends: A Life (1987). Miller died at his home in Roxbury, Connecticut, on February 10, 2005.

The Great Depression, which Miller regarded as the most significant event of American history with the possible exception of the Civil War, hovered over Miller’s works. His best plays explored the emptiness of the American dream. World War II and the Holocaust provided another rich vein for Miller. His works exploring those events included All My Sons, Incident at Vichy, Broken Glass, and, in 1980, Playing for Time (a dramatization for television of a book about a Jewish woman who survived Auschwitz by playing the violin for Nazi officers). Some critics found his didacticism and the ostentatious display of his liberal conscience difficult to swallow. Even when commenting on Miller’s earlier work, Robert Brustein wrote that when Miller “evokes our sympathy for the common man, we are confronted less with works of art than with political acts or social gestures.” Critics also complained that his dialogue represented more the attempt of a playwright determined to convey his message to an audience than the voice of authentic human beings. For all that, Miller’s best plays continue to resonate with audiences. Miller staged Death of a Salesman in China in the 1980s, and The Crucible became a Hollywood movie in the 1990s.

—MSM

Millikin, Eugene D(onald)

(1891–1958) U.S. senator; chairman, Senate Finance Committee

The son of a dentist, Eugene Millikin was born in Hamilton, Ohio, on February 12, 1891. He enrolled in the University of Colorado Law School in 1910. Upon graduating in 1913, he began to practice law in Salt Lake City, Utah. He embarked on a career in politics as executive secretary to the governor of Colorado, George Carlson, from 1915 to 1917. During World War I, Millikin enlisted as a private in the Colorado National Guard. He saw action in France and was mustered out a lieutenant colonel. After the war, he formed a law partnership in Denver, Colorado, with Karl Schuyler. When Schuyler was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1932, Millikin accompanied him to Washington as his secretary but returned to Colorado the next year after Schuyler died in an automobile accident. Millikin resumed his corporate law practice and served as president of the Kinney-Coastal Oil Company.

In 1941, Millikin, a Republican, was appointed to the Senate to fill a vacancy created by the death of Senator Alva Adams (D-Colo.). He was elected to serve the remainder of Adams's term in 1942 and won election to full terms in 1944 and 1950. A close ally of Senator ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio), Millikin shared Taft's fiscal conservatism but was rather more inclined to support internationalism in foreign policy. Millikin provided important support for the ratification of the United Nations Charter, the Marshall Plan, and the North Atlantic Treaty. In domestic matters, he became an expert in the intricacies of trade and taxation. After the Republicans won control of both houses of Congress in the elections of 1946, he chaired the Finance Committee during the 80th Congress. When the Democrats regained control of Congress in the elections of 1948, Millikin became the ranking Republican on the Finance Committee. On domestic issues, he was consistently friendly to business and often devoted his technical expertise and formidable skill in debate to the creation of corporate tax breaks. He believed that the accumulation of wealth served the national interest. Someone with an income of $500,000 a year, he once argued, "has the big estate . . . to maintain. . . . He has three Cadillacs. . . . They must be garaged, oiled, greased, and driven." Millikin also opposed most Democratic social programs. During the administration of HARRY S. TRUMAN, Millikin opposed the Full Employment Act of 1946, public housing, and federal aid to education. An effective and increasingly powerful senator, Millikin shunned the limelight, preferring to work behind the scenes.

Millikin supported Taft for the Republican nomination in 1952, but when DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER defeated Taft, the senator from Colorado played a useful role in bringing the party together for the general election. Eisenhower won the White House, and Republicans captured majorities in both houses of Congress. When Republicans organized the Senate in 1953, Millikin resumed the chair of the Finance Committee. In addition, he became chair of the Senate Republican Conference, sat on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, and was the second ranking Republican on the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee. Millikin was one of a handful of congressional Republicans who met once a week to discuss policy with the president. In January 1954, Business Week characterized him as "probably the most influential Republican in the Senate."

For the most part, Millikin exercised his influence on behalf of the Eisenhower administration's programs. According to Congressional Quarterly, his voting record placed him among the five most frequent supporters of the administration in the Senate. Even more important from the administration's point of view was his reliability as chair of the Finance Committee, particularly since his counterpart in the House, Representative DANIEL REED (R-N.Y.), the chair of the Ways and Means Committee, proved difficult to deal with and often defied the administration.

For example, the administration requested a six-month extension of the excess profits tax, which passed the House in July 1953 only after experiencing great difficulty in Reed's committee. In the Senate, however, Millikin rushed the measure through the Finance Committee without holding hearings; it passed the Senate by a voice vote. In another instance, Millikin opposed an amendment by Senator JOHN WILLIAMS (R-Del.) to raise the business tax credit from $25,000 to $100,000, which would have required approval of the revised bill by the House (something Millikin likened to "passing a kidney stone"). The administration objected to the amendment, and Millikin pleaded successfully against it.

In 1954, Millikin fought for an amendment exempting from taxation a portion of income derived from stock dividends. The Senate passed the amendment but then reversed itself. The conference committee partly restored the provision exempting dividends. Millikin also successfully led Republican opposition to an attempt by Democrats to amend the same bill to raise the personal tax exemption from $600 to $700. Democrats accused the bill and Millikin of favoring the affluent over those with lower incomes.

Millikin did not always support the administration. Initially inclined to support the Bricker amendment, Millikin sought a compromise with the president, who adamantly opposed it. In the end, Millikin went against the president's wishes and voted for the George amendment, a compromise that the administration rejected. Millikin also voted against the censure of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.).

With respect to trade policy, Millikin steered a moderate course between his own protectionist leanings and the administration's desire to renew reciprocal trade agreements. In June 1954, he guided through the Senate passage of a one-year extension of the agreements. In April 1955, he tried to limit extension to two years instead of three, but he lost in the Finance Committee by a vote of eight to seven. He did win passage of an "escape clause" amendment to limit certain imports if they "contributed materially" to a "threat of serious injury" to a domestic industry. Advocates of free trade charged that Millikin's amendment "watered down" the bill, but the Senate passed it in that form.

From his senior position on the Interior Committee, Millikin was an influential supporter of the Colorado River Storage Project, a billion-dollar program to construct water storage facilities along the Upper Colorado River Basin. Many regarded Millikin's vote for the St. Lawrence Seaway in 1954 as a trade-off for the administration's support of the Colorado River project. The Senate approved the Colorado River project in 1955; the House passed it a year later.

Throughout his tenure in the Senate, Millikin generally favored lower taxes and reducing the size of the federal government. His strongest commitment, however, was to a balanced budget. Despite his influence and ability, Millikin never demonstrated any ambitions for the presidency and spurned opportunities to be Republican leader in the Senate. Ailing from arthritis, he did not seek reelection in 1956. Millikin died of pneumonia in Denver, Colorado, on July 26, 1958.

—MSM

Mills, C(harles) W(right)

(1916–1962) sociologist

The product of a middle-class family of Irish and English descent, C. Wright Mills was born in Waco, Texas, on August 28, 1916. His father was an insurance agent, and Mills grew up in Sherman, Fort Worth, and Dallas, where he attended Catholic schools and public high schools. After a year at Texas A&M, Mills enrolled at the University of Texas, from which he received a B.A. in 1938 and an M.A. in philosophy and sociology in 1939. He then enrolled in the doctoral program in sociology at the University of Wisconsin, where he wrote his dissertation under Hans Gerth and received his degree in 1942. His dissertation, later published as Sociology and Pragmatism (1964), dealt with professionalization in higher education and the role of pragmatism in that process. After teaching sociology at the University of Maryland from 1942 to 1946, he moved to Columbia University, where he remained for the rest of his career and emerged as one of the most widely read and controversial critics of postwar American society.

Using the methodologies of Karl Marx, Max Weber, and Karl Mannheim, Mills sought to identify the changing relationships of social and political power in the United States and to offer prescriptions for radical change. Fundamentally opposed to liberal social scientists' ideas of objective scholarship, Mills also increasingly diverged from traditional Marxist approaches. His New Men of Power (1948) offered a sociological portrait of labor leaders and a study of their political attitudes. Mills concluded that support for a labor party, which he thought necessary to represent the interests of American workers, had declined among labor leaders since the 1930s. Leaders of large unions were attracted to oligarchy, liberalism, and the retention of their own power. Rather than a money elite, they formed a power elite that contested with other elites. Mills, however, contended that the power labor union leaders had achieved since World War II provided them with a basis to form a radical coalition with intellectuals and white collar workers capable of "stopping the main drift towards war and slump."

In White Collar: The American Middle Classes (1951), Mills described the emergence of a new American middle class, made up not of the independent entrepreneurs that typified the “old middle class” but of “the small creature who is acted upon but who does not act, who works alone unnoticed in somebody’s office or store, never talking loud, never talking back, never taking a stand.” Mills argued that the white collar workers of the mid-20th century were analogous to the industrial workers of the late 19th century. They did not have ownership, did routinized, repetitive tasks, and had little or no control over their work, the final product, or the workplace. In one important respect, however, they were worse off than their 19th-century counterparts. Early industrial workers had to sell only their time and energy; in the bureaucratic environment of the mid-20th century, the white collar workers had to sell their personalities as well.

Mills published The Power Elite in 1956. In it, he asserted that the American political system was not truly democratic. For Mills, contrary to Marxists and Weberians, power lay neither in the process of production nor in the market. The growth of large-scale bureaucracies, the development of new techniques for the manipulation of people, and the emergence of a vast military establishment armed with weapons of mass destruction, Mills maintained, gave rise to an interconnected elite of military, governmental, and industrial leaders that wielded unprecedented power. He attacked the theory, propounded by JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH, that “countervailing powers” checked the power of corporations. Real power, Mills maintained, was exercised by an “overlapping” alliance composed of major corporate leaders, top military brass, and a handful of politicians. These leaders made decisions in private and rarely even engaged in “public or . . . Congressional debate.” Mills also attacked the ideas of SEYMOUR MARTIN LIPSET and DANIEL BELL, two sociologists who celebrated the “pluralistic” character of American politics and the “end of ideology.” Mills argued that “mass society” was easily manipulated and that therefore the policies of the power elite could not be effectively opposed. Neither education, religion, television, nor movies possessed any truly independent organization or ideology to counter the pervasive influence of the power elite. Therefore, Mills concluded, workers had come to accept the values sponsored by the power elite, and they yearned for nothing more than white collar jobs and suburban homes. The study came in for severe criticism from some sociologists, including Bell, who argued that the theory of a “power elite” implied a “unity of purpose and community of interest” among the elite, which Mills had asserted rather than proved.

Mills expanded his focus on the elite in The Causes of World War Three (1958). The book suggested an international power elite, one that, to be sure, did not share an ideology but that “in structural trend and in official action” became “increasingly alike.” Mills regarded a new and devastating war as almost unavoidable, because the existing power structure left the fate of the world in the hands of an isolated few whom he regarded as both unscrupulous and incompetent. He further argued that the “balance of blame” was shifting from the Soviet bloc to the West. Mills’s professional colleagues essentially ignored the book; it embarrassed even members of the intelligentsia, whom Mills had courted for years.

In The Sociological Imagination (1959), Mills claimed that only an exertion of leadership by a new generation of intellectuals could prevent the catastrophe he described in The Causes of World War Three. Before they could assert such leadership, however, Mills maintained that intellectuals would have to direct their research away from abstract issues and toward “urgent public issues and instant human trouble.” Thus, The Sociological Imagination took on what Mills saw as the two dominant tendencies of sociology in his day, the hyperbolic pretension of what he termed “Grand Theory” and the irrelevant, narrow, microscopic focus of “Abstracted Empiricism.” Mills called for a sociological imagination that “enables us to grasp history and biography and the relations between the two within society. . . . No social study that does not come back to the problems of biography, of history and of their intersections within a society has completed its intellectual journey.”

In his “Letter to the New Left” (1960), Mills called attention to a new kind of radicalism. A cultural elite (a “young intelligentsia”) comprising radical students and professors was creating an intellectually fresh “New Left.” This movement manifested itself in the protests against the House

Un-American Activities Committee and in its participation in the Civil Rights movement.

Mills was staunchly anticommunist and anti-Soviet until the late 1950s, but visits to Poland in 1956 and the USSR in 1960 left him ambivalent about communist societies. Listen Yankee! The Revolution in Cuba (1960), published after a trip to Cuba in the summer of 1960, vigorously defended the Cuban Revolution (with which Mills identified himself through the use of the word “we”) and did much to generate enthusiasm for the Castro government among the American student Left. Irving Louis Horowitz, a political scientist and Mills’s biographer, wrote that “Mills embraced the Cuban Revolution because it seemed to confirm his long-held pet theories about the decline of liberalism in the West and the growing embrace of democratic values by Marxist states.” While Mills demonstrated some apprehension about the lack of democracy in Cuba, he argued that the new regime was building the preconditions for a good society and warned that the United States would attempt to destroy the revolution by force. This unbridled polemic led many of his professional colleagues to write him off as a sociologist.

Mills died of a heart attack in West Nyack, New York, on March 20, 1962. His work greatly influenced the development of the New Left during the 1960s. Both Mills’s ideas and his style influenced “The Port Huron Statement,” the manifesto that brought the Students for a Democratic Society to public attention in 1962. Readings of Mills gave rise to New Left concepts such as “participatory democracy.” Although most widely known as the precursor or patron saint of the New Left of the 1960s, Mills’s own work was deeply grounded in the concerns of the late 1940s and 1950s. His most creative work elaborated on the link between culture and politics, as well as the relationship between the larger society and the private discontent of an individual pointed out by writers such as DAVID RIESMAN and WILLIAM WHYTE. Moreover, Mills’s work reflected the concerns of the postwar American affluent society; it focused less on the material plight of disadvantaged groups or on programs to help them than on the psychological and moral strains afflicting the middle class. In addition, Mills always exaggerated his own status as an outsider (young New Leftists embraced his image as a motorcycle-riding, cabin-building Texan). There was, to be sure, an element of truth in that image. Unconstrained by the direction of his discipline, by its commitment to objective scholarship, or by academic collegiality, Mills scathingly attacked his fellow sociologists for focusing on narrow and irrelevant topics. None of this endeared him to academic social scientists, many of whom dismissed his work as journalistic or polemical. Nevertheless, Mills addressed large topics (what he called “the big questions”) and, particularly in White Collar, demonstrated an impressive ability to analyze powerful and significant trends shaping his society.

—MSM

Mills, Wilbur D(aigh)

(1909–1992) U.S. congressman; chairman, Ways and Means Committee

The son of a prosperous (at least by local standards) owner of a general store, Wilbur Mills was born on May 24, 1909, in Kensett, Arkansas. He attended public schools and graduated from Searcy (Arkansas) High School in 1926 and four years later from Hendrix College in Conway, Arkansas. A champion debater in college and salutatorian of his class, Mills entered Harvard Law School in 1930. He returned to Arkansas without receiving a degree in 1933 and took a job as a cashier in a bank his father had acquired. Mills was elected county and probate judge for White County, an office he held from 1934 to 1938, when he won a seat as a Democrat in the U.S. House of Representatives. At the time, Mills was the youngest person ever elected to Congress. He subsequently won reelection 18 consecutive times with little or no opposition.

His experience in law and banking led to his assignment to the House Banking and Currency Committee in 1939. A protégé of SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.), Mills rose in the House after Rayburn became Speaker in 1940. Rayburn’s sponsorship gained Mills an appointment to the Ways and Means Committee in 1943, an uncommonly swift ascension to the powerful committee responsible for writing tax legislation. Mills industriously applied himself to the details of government finance and trade legislation; by the 1950s, he became the House’s foremost expert on taxes. Although he supported much of the Fair Deal, Mills voted for the Taft-Hartley Act and to override President HARRY S. TRUMAN's veto of the measure. Throughout the late 1940s and early 1950s, Mills voted for anticommunist laws. He also supported an excess profits tax to help pay for the Korean War. In foreign policy, Mills regularly supported the Truman administration; he voted for aid to Greece and Turkey, the Marshall Plan, and the North Atlantic Treaty.

During the administration of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, Mills generally voted as a moderate; from 1953 to 1960, he voted for positions favored by the liberal Americans for Democratic Action an average of 45 percent of the time on major issues. He voted against statehood for Alaska and Hawaii and against the Saint Lawrence Seaway project; he voted for public housing, the federal highway program, and federal aid for the prevention of water pollution. Worried that it might become a lever to enforce school desegregation, Mills opposed federal aid for school construction. Although not an especially outspoken segregationist, he consistently opposed civil rights legislation and in 1956 signed the Southern Manifesto, which denounced the Supreme Court's ruling in Brown v. Board of Education (1954) that segregated public schools were unconstitutional.

In 1953, Mills supported the extension to the end of the year of the excess profits tax levied during the Korean War. The next year, he voted in favor of an unsuccessful amendment to substitute general tax relief for a bill, sponsored by the Eisenhower administration, providing for preferential treatment of income from dividends. Early in 1955, Mills introduced a Democratic plan to give a tax credit of $20 to every taxpayer and his dependents. The measure passed the House by a vote of 234 to 201, but the Senate rejected it. A proponent of reciprocal trade treaties and lowered tariffs, Mills worked on the Ways and Means Committee to block protectionist amendments to trade bills.

With the death of Representative JERE COOPER (D-Tenn.) in December 1957, Mills assumed the chair of the Ways and Means Committee, one of the most powerful positions in the House. Besides deliberating on legislative matters such as taxes, trade, and Social Security, the committee functioned as the House Democratic Committee on Committees, which gave out committee assignments to Democratic representatives. Mills's mastery of the complexities of the tax code won him general respect that augmented his power. He became an unusually powerful chair of an unusually powerful committee.

Mills suffered a defeat in his first major test as the chair. In response to the economic recession and the growing number of workers whose unemployment benefits were exhausted, the Ways and Means Committee, under Mills's leadership, passed a controversial bill providing 16 additional weeks of federally financed unemployment payments to roughly 3 million people whose benefits had run out and making additional workers eligible for benefits. The Eisenhower administration opposed the bill, as did a coalition of conservative Republicans and southern Democrats. On May 1, 1958, Mills introduced the measure in the House, which rejected it by a vote of 223 to 165. This rebuff had a far-reaching effect on Mills. It accentuated his native caution and sharpened his sensitivity to the climate of opinion in the House as a whole. After that, he held bills in his committee until he had formed a broad consensus behind them and was certain of approval by the House. Some have argued that this led to his famous role in the delay and obstruction of controversial social and economic legislation during the 1960s.

Mills enjoyed greater success in his management of the administration's trade program in 1958. With the support of most of his Democratic colleagues on the committee, he won approval of a five-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act together with a provision granting the president the authority to cut tariffs by 25 percent at a top rate of 5 percent a year. Mills's first hurdle on the House floor was a protectionist substitute offered by Representative Richard Simpson (R-Pa.), which Mills called "far worse than no extension at all." The House rejected Simpson's substitute by a vote of 234 to 147 and passed the committee's bill by 317 to 98. The Senate reduced the extension to three years and the president's power to cut tariffs to 15 percent. The compromise version that emerged from the conference committee set the figures at four years and 20 percent.

Beginning in 1960, Mills played a crucial role in the struggle over providing medical care for the aged. He blocked a liberal proposal, known as Medicare, that would have provided free medical care for the aged financed through the Social Security system. The American Medical Association vehemently opposed the plan, and Mills feared alienating the officials of his state's medical society, which exerted a powerful influence in Arkansas politics. Moreover, as a fiscal conservative, he questioned the feasibility of financing an ambitious program out of the Social Security system. In response to pressure from the Democratic leadership, Mills agreed to consider the plan. In the end, he remained opposed to it, and, on June 3, 1960, the bill failed in the Ways and Means Committee by a vote of 17 to 8.

Mills then arranged passage of his own bill, which permitted the federal government to make matching grants to the states to provide medical care for the elderly poor. Unlike Medicare, Mills's plan applied only to the elderly indigent and only in those states that chose to extend medical aid. In addition, the plan was financed out of general revenues, not the Social Security system. It passed the House by a vote of 380 to 83. With some modifications inspired by Senator ROBERT KERR (D-Okla.), the Senate enacted the measure, known as the Kerr-Mills Act, in August. Subsequently, Mills bottled up legislation providing for Medicare in the Ways and Means Committee until 1965, when it became apparent that a majority of the House favored the program. He then supported the measure and became the chief architect in the House of the bill that passed Congress that year.

Mills played a similar role in the tax battles of the 1960s. Both when President JOHN F. KENNEDY proposed a sweeping tax cut in 1963 and when President LYNDON B. JOHNSON requested a 10 percent surcharge on income taxes in 1967, Mills initially opposed the measures, out of both fiscal conservatism and doubt about the receptivity of the House. After he had extracted sufficient concessions involving spending limits or budget cuts and shaped each plan to his satisfaction, he steered the bills to passage in his committee and on the floor of the House. During the presidency of RICHARD M. NIXON, Mills made common cause with the Republican administration in opposing busing to achieve racial integration, supporting the war in Vietnam, and backing Nixon's unsuccessful attempt to reform the welfare system. Fearing that it meant the loss of congressional power, he steadfastly opposed Nixon's plans for revenue sharing.

Despite his often-repeated aim of making a thorough revision of the complicated and inequitable tax code, Mills never attempted major tax reform during his tenure as chair of the Ways and Means Committee. In fact, he generally smothered reform proposals within the committee. In October 1974, Mills became embroiled in a scandal involving his relationship with an Argentine stripper named Annabel Battistella, who performed under the name Fanne Foxe, and public displays of drunkenness. Despite the unfavorable headlines and jokes on late-night television, he won reelection that November. However, Mills stepped down as chair of the Ways and Means Committee in December 1974. He confessed to being an alcoholic and entered a hospital for treatment. Mills retired from Congress in January 1977 and went to work as a tax consultant, lobbyist, and lawyer for the Washington office of Shea, Gould, Climenko & Casey, a law firm based in New York. In the early 1980s, he returned to Kensett, where he resided until he collapsed at his home and died in a hospital in Searcy, Arkansas, on May 2, 1992.

—MSM

Minton, Sherman

(1890–1965) associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court

Born in Georgetown, Indiana, on October 20, 1890, Minton attended public schools and earned an LL.B. in 1915 from Indiana University, where he graduated at the head of his class in the law college. He received an LL.M. from Yale the following year and commenced the practice of law in New Albany, Indiana. Minton served as a captain in the Motor Transport Corps from 1917 to 1919 and spent a year overseas. After his military service, he returned to New Albany to practice law. He moved to Miami, Florida, in 1925 and practiced law there until 1928, when he returned to New Albany. In 1933, Minton became counselor of the Indiana Public Service Commission. He won election as a Democrat to the U.S. Senate from Indiana in 1934. An enthusiastic and outspoken supporter of the New Deal, Minton aggressively criticized the Supreme Court's decisions striking down New Deal legislation during 1935 and 1936. In 1937 he backed Franklin D. Roosevelt's plan to pack the Supreme Court. Defeated for reelection in 1940, Minton briefly served as an administrative assistant in the Executive Office of the President in 1941. In May of that year, Roosevelt named him to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. HARRY S. TRUMAN, who had known Minton since their days together in the Senate, appointed him to the Supreme Court in September 1949. Minton took the oath of office on October 12.

Based on his record in the Senate, most observers believed that Minton would be a liberal on the Court. Indeed, some conservative senators attempted to call him before the Senate Judiciary Committee so that they could question him on his support for the Court packing plan and other matters. Minton declined to appear. Contrary to expectations, his accession to the bench helped to create a conservative bloc that held sway for the next four years. In the summer of 1949, two of the Court's more liberal justices, Frank Murphy and Wiley B. Rutledge, died. Truman appointed TOM C. CLARK to replace Murphy and Minton to replace Rutledge. The two new justices, along with Truman's two other appointments to the Court, HAROLD H. BURTON and Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON, moved the Court to the right, especially on issues relating to civil liberties.

The basis of Minton's conservatism lay in his commitment to judicial restraint. The controversies of the 1930s convinced him that the judiciary should allow the executive and legislative branches, as well as the states, the greatest latitude to make policy. The Court, believed Minton, should not interfere with any constitutionally permissible actions by the other branches, however unwise the justices might think them. As a result, Minton voted to uphold the government's position in most cases involving civil liberties and the rights of those accused of a crime.

During the early years of the cold war, Minton supported virtually all of the government's anti-subversive programs and actions. In Dennis v. U.S. (1951), he voted with the majority to uphold the convictions of leaders of the American Communist Party for violating the Smith Act by conspiring to overthrow the government of the United States. He dissented when, in Joint Antifascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath (1951), the Court struck down procedures established by Truman's federal loyalty program that allowed the attorney general to place groups on a list of subversive organizations without a hearing. Minton wrote the majority opinion in Adler v. Board of Education of New York (1952), upholding a law passed by New York State that provided for the dismissal of public school teachers on grounds of disloyalty and accepted membership in certain organizations as evidence of disloyalty.

Similarly, Minton consistently supported the government's power to intervene in the economy. He joined Vinson in dissent when the Court declared unconstitutional Truman's seizure of the steel mills during the Korean War (Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer [1952]).

Under Chief Justice EARL WARREN, Minton continued to vote in a similar fashion, but he found himself more frequently in the minority. He dissented in April 1956, when the Court, in Pennsylvania v. Nelson, overturned a state sedition law on the ground that federal action had preempted the field. In another case the same month, Minton objected to a majority ruling that a local government could not discharge a professor solely because he invoked the Fifth Amendment during a federal investigation (Slochower v. Board). He dissented again in June 1956, when the Court held, in Cole v. Young, that federal employees could not be summarily suspended as security risks if they held nonsensitive jobs. Minton joined the majority, however, in Peters v. Hobby (1955), which held that the Civil Service Commission's Loyalty Review Board had exceeded its authority when it reviewed of its own initiative and found unfit a consultant to the Public Health Service who had already been cleared twice by the Health Service's departmental loyalty board.

In criminal cases, Minton was extremely reluctant to upset a conviction when the defendant made no claim of innocence but charged that the government had made procedural errors in the course of arrest and prosecution. In Lutwak v. United States (1953), he wrote that "a defendant is entitled to a fair trial but not a perfect one." Minton also disliked interfering with the criminal justice systems of the states. For that reason, he dissented in April 1956 when the Court ruled, in Griffin v. Illinois, that the states must furnish a trial transcript to an indigent defendant if the transcript was necessary to appeal a conviction.

In civil rights cases, Minton generally voted to outlaw racial and religious discrimination. He believed that the government had no constitutional power to discriminate and that the Court could legitimately intervene to protect minority rights against infringement by the government. Minton joined with the majority in Shelley v. Kraemer (1948) to hold restrictive covenants that barred sales to minorities judicially unenforceable. He also voted with the majority to require the admission of a black student to the University of Texas Law School in Sweatt v. Painter (1950) and to force the University of Oklahoma to end discriminatory practices against a graduate student in McLaurin v. Oklahoma (1950). Speaking for the Court in Barrows v. Jackson (1953), Minton held that state courts could not force a property owner to pay damages to his neighbors for violating a restrictive covenant by selling his property to African Americans. Minton also joined a unanimous court in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which ruled that racial segregation in public schools was unconstitutional. Minton, however, was the lone dissenter in May 1953, when the Court decided that the pre-primary elections of the Jaybird Democratic Association in one Texas county were in effect state actions and therefore could not exclude African Americans. Minton asserted that the association was purely private and that, however undesirable its policy of barring African Americans, the Constitution did not prohibit such discrimination by private organizations. "I am not concerned in the least," he wrote, "as to what happens to the Jaybirds or their unworthy scheme. I am concerned about what this court says is state action."

Declining health led Minton to retire from the Court on October 15, 1956. A warm, gregarious, and unpretentious man who often used earthy language, "Shay" Minton was well liked by all his colleagues throughout his years on the bench. He was not, however, a leading figure on the Court, and he wrote few significant opinions. He did not have an outstanding intellect, and analysts of the Court have overwhelmingly ranked him as an undistinguished justice. Following his retirement, Minton was active in the Indiana Bar Association. He died in New Albany on April 9, 1965.

—MSM

Mitchell, Clarence, M., Jr.

(1911–1984) director, Washington Bureau, NAACP
Born in Baltimore, Maryland, on March 8, 1911, Clarence Mitchell attended public schools and graduated from Lincoln University in 1932. He worked as a reporter for the Baltimore Afro American from 1933 to 1936, when he left to do a year of graduate study at the Atlanta School of Social Work on a National Urban League fellowship. After completing the program in 1937, he worked briefly as director of the Maryland office of the Division of Negro Affairs of the National Youth Administration. In November 1937, he became executive secretary of the Urban League office in St. Paul, Minnesota. He took a job in 1941 with the Negro Employment and Training Branch in the labor division of the Office of Production Management. Initially, he worked as field employment assistant but was quickly promoted to assistant director of the department. In January 1943, Mitchell was appointed associate director of the division of field operations for the Fair Employment Practices Committee (FEPC); he became director of field operations in 1945. After the war, Congress discontinued the agency, and Walter White, executive secretary of the NAACP, hired Mitchell in 1946 as labor secretary in the organization's Washington bureau. Four years later, Mitchell became director of the Washington bureau. In that capacity, Mitchell served as a lobbyist, presented the NAACP's point of view in the Crisis (the NAACP's magazine), and worked with the executive branch to promote enforcement of civil rights.

An important force in shaping and articulating the NAACP's ideas and goals during the 1950s, Mitchell believed that change would be brought about through legislation, action by sympathetic whites, and public relations, rather than by direct-action protests by African Americans. In the early 1950s, the NAACP worked for peaceful desegregation through legal challenges to segregation as well as efforts to persuade the executive and legislative branches to take action. The military became one of the prime targets for executive action, because an executive order could force immediate desegregation of the armed services. In 1953, Mitchell publicly charged that desegregation of military bases was proceeding too slowly. The Eisenhower administration moved expeditiously against segregation on military bases. Mitchell also charged that local opposition was blocking desegregation in locally run schools on military posts and in local schools receiving aid to accommodate the presence of military dependants. In these areas, complexities of the situations made it difficult for the administration to respond as effectively.

Mitchell opposed the congressional seniority system because it often placed southern Democrats at the head of important committees, where they could block civil rights bills. He singled out Senator JAMES O. EASTLAND (D-Miss.), chair of the Judiciary Committee, for particular criticism and threatened that blacks would vote Republican if Democrats did not support civil rights demands.

Mitchell advocated withholding federal funds from segregated areas as a means of advancing desegregation. In 1955, he supported amendments, offered by Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR. (D-N.Y.), to bills sponsored by the Eisenhower administration providing federal aid for the construction of schools and for training national reserve units. The so-called Powell amendments banned aid to school districts or reserve units that practiced segregation. The Powell amendment became part of the National Reserve Training Act. Eisenhower opposed the Powell amendment to the school construction bill as "extraneous"; besides, he argued, the Supreme Court had declared segregated public schools unconstitutional. Bills providing for federal aid for school construction both with and without the Powell amendment failed to pass Congress. Mitchell also demanded in 1955 that the government refuse to pay the expenses of South Carolina's delegation to the first White House Conference on Education because the state resisted desegregation of its schools.

Mitchell focused his attention on the extension of voting rights, because he believed that increased black suffrage would result in gains in other fields. In 1956, he urged the NAACP to give top priority to a bill that would "protect the right to vote and . . . protect individuals against violence." That year, the administration proposed a civil rights bill that would have elevated the civil rights section of the Justice Department to the status of a division, provided for a civil rights commission, granted the attorney general authority to enter civil suits to desegregate, and provided protection for black voting rights. The majority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), consigned the bill to the deep freeze of Eastland's Judiciary Committee. The administration called for passage of the measure again the following year. By the time the bill passed Congress in 1957, the provision granting the attorney general authority to file civil suits had been deleted, and the protection of voting rights had been substantially weakened. In its final form, the Civil Rights Act of 1957 disappointed Mitchell, and he lobbied for the Civil Rights Act of 1960, which attempted to shore up protections of voting rights. That, too, proved inadequate to protect black voting rights.

Mitchell continued to press for civil rights legislation during the 1960s and 1970s. In addition to his position at the NAACP, he served as legislative chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. He was disturbed by what he considered President JOHN F. KENNEDY's foot-dragging on black civil rights. In contrast, he praised President Lyndon B. Johnson's strong stand on behalf of civil rights and lobbied extensively for the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Alone among black leaders who met with Johnson in March 1968, Mitchell supported the president's decision to seek passage of a fair housing law in Congress. The others favored an executive order. Events bore out Mitchell's judgment when, in April, Congress passed the Fair Housing Act of 1968. Mitchell lobbied for passage of extensions of the Voting Rights Act in 1970 and 1975. He attacked the Nixon administration as "anti-Negro" and marshaled support to defeat two of Nixon's nominees to the Supreme Court, CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH and G. Harold Carswell.

Mitchell attended night classes at the University of Maryland School of Law and graduated in 1962. He gained admission to the bar in 1965. After Nixon left office, Mitchell continued as director of the NAACP's Washington bureau and the organization's chief lobbyist through the administration of GERALD FORD and into that of Jimmy Carter. He retired from the NAACP in 1978 but served as a consultant to the organization and practiced law in Baltimore; he also was a delegate to the United Nations. Mitchell received numerous awards, including the NAACP's Spingarn Medal in 1969. Carter presented him with the Medal of Freedom in 1980. Mitchell died in Baltimore, Maryland, on March 18, 1984.

—MSM

Mitchell, James P(aul)

(1900–1964) assistant secretary of the army, secretary of labor

Mitchell was born in Elizabeth, New Jersey, on November 12, 1900. His father, who edited a trade journal, died in 1912, which left the family in straitened financial circumstances. Although he had to contribute to the family's support, Mitchell graduated from high school in 1917. He worked for several years in a grocery store before opening a small "butter and egg" dairy store in 1919 and opened a second store in 1921. When they failed in 1923, Mitchell worked as a truck driver and then as a salesman. In 1929, he became an expeditor for the Western Electric Company. The following year, he was transferred to the personnel department. Laid off in 1932, he served for four years as director of the Union County Emergency Relief Association. He returned to Western Electric in 1936, but the company lent his services to the Works Projects Administration, where he was put in charge of labor relations in New York City.

Beginning in 1940, Mitchell served as director of industrial personnel for the War Department, where he had responsibility for the administration of nearly 1 million employees. Returning to private business in 1945, he directed personnel and industrial relations for R. H. Macy & Company until 1947, when he became vice president in charge of labor relations at Bloomingdale Brothers. Even while working in the private sector, Mitchell conducted studies of employment for the U.S. Army in Germany and served on the personnel advisory board of the first Hoover Commission.

Mitchell supported DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for president in 1952. In April 1953, the new president appointed him assistant secretary of the army in charge of manpower and reserve affairs. He remained there until October, when MARTIN DURKIN resigned as secretary of labor because he thought that Eisenhower had gone back on a commitment to support his attempts to amend the Taft-Hartley Act. Eisenhower quickly named Mitchell to replace Durkin.

Eisenhower regarded Mitchell as one of the most capable members of his cabinet and respected Mitchell for what the president regarded as the secretary's moderation and realistic approach to labor problems. Mitchell did not wish to be considered the voice of organized labor in government. Rather, he regarded the secretary of labor as a servant of the public. At the same time, he resisted the influence of the more conservative members of the administration, particularly SINCLAIR WEEKS, the secretary of commerce, with whom he frequently clashed. As secretary of labor, he opposed right-to-work laws, sought to improve conditions for vulnerable workers such as migrant farmworkers, elderly workers, and handicapped workers. Mitchell strove consistently to promote better relations between labor and management. Further, he demonstrated an early awareness of the nation's growing need for an adequate supply of trained workers. Finally, he improved the efficiency of his department and encouraged the upgrading of civil servants rather than bringing in political appointees.

James P. Mitchell, Secretary of Labor (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

In general, Mitchell did not believe that the government should intervene frequently in labor disputes. In accord with Mitchell's advice, Eisenhower declined to intervene in strikes against the Louisville and Nashville Railroad in 1954 (in spite of pressure from several governors and members of Congress) and Southern Bell Telephone the same year. Nevertheless, Mitchell's reputation with union leaders as "very able and fair" and a "shrewd bargainer" made him an effective mediator. In 1956, Mitchell announced that he would not act to prevent a steel strike, although he did quietly meet with leaders of the industry and persuaded them to make an offer that prevented a strike. Moreover, he played a major role in the settlement of the steel strike in 1959. That strike began on July 15 and continued for 116 days before it was halted by an 80-day injunction invoked under the Taft-Hartley Act. During the last weeks of 1959, Mitchell and Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON worked behind the scenes to reach an agreement. Finally, a settlement was announced on January 4, 1960. The unions and major steel companies agreed to wages and benefits costing 41 cents over two-and-one-half years; management abandoned its demands for increased efficiency. Although Mitchell played a central role in the negotiations, he yielded the public spotlight to Nixon.

Shortly after assuming office, Mitchell backed an increase in the minimum wage of 75 cents an hour. He wished, however, to hold off the increase until the economy improved. When the issue came before Congress in 1955, labor pushed for $1.25, while the Eisenhower administration submitted an increase of 90 cents. Congress passed a bill raising the figure to $1, a figure that the administration had agreed in advance was acceptable, and Eisenhower signed the measure. Mitchell opposed a further increase in 1957 on the ground that it would be inflationary.

The secretary also sought to increase the number of workers covered under the federal minimum wage. He extended coverage to industries dealing with office machinery, electric lamps, structural steel, pulp, and water. He liberally interpreted the Walsh-Healey Act, determining the prevailing minimum wages in various industries. Consequently, workers on government contracts in the soft coal as well as the woollen and worsted industries received raises.

In response to the corruption in unions uncovered by the Senate Committee on Improper Relations in the Labor or Management Field, Mitchell, in January 1958, drew up proposed legislation for the administration designed to end labor racketeering and to "provide greater protection for the rights of individual workers, the public, and management and unions." The legislation required unions to file annual financial reports, certify they operated under democratic procedures, and obliged employers and unions to report financial dealings with each other. It prohibited collusion between labor and management and set criminal penalties for bribes, embezzlement, and misappropriation of union funds. In addition, it called for efforts to tighten laws against secondary boycotts and certain types of organizational picketing.

Congress took only limited action on the proposals during 1958. In August, Eisenhower signed a law designed to safeguard pension and welfare funds by requiring disclosure of financial operations. A second measure, sponsored by Senators JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) and IRVING IVES (R-N.Y.), dealt with labor corruption. The Kennedy-Ives bill contained some of the anticorruption measures favored by the administration. It also included several changes in the Taft-Hartley Act strongly supported by organized labor. Mitchell opposed the measure. He thought that the "imperfections, omissions or loopholes" made it "almost impossible to administer" and would give union members only "illusory protection." He also objected to the fact that the bill did not tighten the ban on secondary boycotts or bar organizational picketing. The bill passed the Senate but failed in the House.

Eisenhower resubmitted Mitchell's program the following year. The administration wanted particularly to strengthen procedures dealing with secondary boycotts and "blackmail picketing." After vigorous struggles in both the House and the Senate, these provisions eventually made their way into the Landrum-Griffin Act, which Eisenhower signed into law in September 1959. The law included a "bill of rights" for union members that included the rights to secret and fair elections of union officials. The measure also required unions to file reports on union funds with the Department of Labor.

Mitchell strongly supported civil rights for African Americans. In one of his first acts as secretary, he told the National Council of Negro Women that, beginning on November 16, 1953, all contracts with the government of the District of Columbia would contain a clause banning discrimination. During the administration's internal debate over civil rights legislation in 1956 and 1957, Mitchell was one of the strongest voices in the administration for a measure that would effectively protect the rights of African Americans. Congress substantially weakened the legislation proposed by the administration before passing it. As passed by Congress, the Civil Rights Act of 1957 disappointed Mitchell, who called it "weak, watered-down and, in my opinion, ineffectual."

Mitchell greatly improved the efficiency of his office. He established the new career position of undersecretary of labor and three positions of deputy assistant secretary of labor. He added the office of research and development to his department. Mitchell established the practice of meeting regularly with heads of independent agencies, such as the National Labor Relations Board, the Federal Mediation and Reconciliations Service, and the National Retirement Board. Under his leadership, the budget of the Department of Labor rose from $28 million in fiscal 1954 to $53 million by fiscal 1960.

Mitchell left government at the end of the Eisenhower administration and ran unsuccessfully as the Republican nominee for governor of New Jersey in 1961. That same year, he joined the Crown Zellerbach Corporation as a consultant and a director. In 1962, he became senior vice president of industrial relations for the West Coast Pulp and Paper Company. Mitchell resided in Hillsborough, California, until his death from a heart attack in New York City on October 19, 1964.

—MSM

Mitchell, Stephen A(rnold)

(1903–1974) chairman, Democratic National Committee

Born in Rock Valley, Iowa, on March 3, 1903, Mitchell graduated from Creighton University preparatory school in 1921. He then ran the family farm before working as an assistant credit manager in a dry goods company and as credit and sales manager for General Motors Acceptance Corporation. After completing a business course at Creighton University in 1926, he moved to Washington, D.C., and attended Georgetown University Law School at night. Mitchell received his LL.B. in 1928. He worked as an executive for General Motors in New York until 1932, when he joined the Chicago law firm of Taylor, Miller, Busch & Boyden. The firm made him a partner in 1936. Mitchell served as head of the French division of the Lend-Lease Administration from 1942 to 1944 and then worked for the State Department as adviser on French economic affairs. In 1945, he returned to the private practice of law.

Mitchell became one of the postwar generation of Democratic politicians known as "Stevenson Democrats." Upper middle class in origin, these reformers had not set foot in a political clubhouse before 1945. Between 1945 and 1947, Mitchell advocated reform in the Democratic Party of Illinois. In 1947, he sought an appointment as U.S. district attorney. He unsuccessfully attempted to gain the support of the Cook County machine, and the appointment went to Otto Kerner. That same year, ADLAI E. STEVENSON asked for Mitchell's help in securing the senatorial nomination. The Cook County machine, worried that the maverick Democrat, PAUL DOUGLAS, might become governor, preferred to see Douglas run for the Senate and offered Stevenson the gubernatorial nomination. Mitchell played an active role in Stevenson's successful campaign for governor.

In March 1952, Mitchell was appointed chief counsel to a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee charged with investigating corruption in the Justice Department. In April, the attorney general, J. Howard McGrath, fired a special counsel appointed to investigate the matter, and Truman announced McGrath's resignation. The subcommittee's report, released in October, criticized McGrath's "deplorable lack of knowledge" of his department and his lack of "enthusiasm" for moving against corruption. Mitchell worked with the new attorney general, James P. McGranery, in reorganizing the department.

Mitchell helped begin the draft Stevenson movement that helped Stevenson win the Democratic nomination for the presidency in 1952. Hoping to counter Republican charges of Democratic corruption, Stevenson appointed Mitchell as chair of the Democratic National Committee. The Democratic candidate chose Mitchell because the latter was personally loyal to him, was not associated with the Truman administration, and had been involved in the investigation of corruption in the Justice Department. The decision infuriated Truman. During the campaign, Mitchell scheduled television time, raised funds, and administered the party's treasury.

Mitchell's most difficult task was maintaining unity within the Democratic Party while distancing Stevenson from the unpopular Truman administration. He announced that Stevenson would hold a series of meetings with Democratic politicians and candidates. Mitchell also assured party regulars that the nominee believed that the fruits of victory should go to those "laboring in the vineyards." In September, after the New York Post revealed that the Republican vice presidential nominee, RICHARD M. NIXON, had a "secret" political fund, Mitchell attempted to use the issue of corruption against the Republicans. He immediately demanded that Eisenhower ask for Nixon's resignation. It turned out, however, that the fund was no secret; Nixon had answered questions about it from reporters. Moreover, Nixon successfully confronted the charges in a televised speech, and it came out that Stevenson had a similar fund. The issue probably did more to harm Stevenson than the Republican ticket. In the end, Mitchell's efforts to separate Stevenson from Truman and the corruption of Truman's administration failed. The American electorate gave DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER a large margin of victory in November, and the Republicans carried both houses of Congress.

After the election, Mitchell retained the chair of the Democratic National Committee. He raised money to pay off Stevenson's campaign debt of $830,000. Perhaps his most difficult task was to maintain unity within a party riven by competing interests. Northern liberals, big city bosses, and powerful southern officeholders struggled for influence in the party. In addition, Mitchell attempted to counter charges that the party was drifting to the left and to mount an effective opposition to Eisenhower and his administration. Reacting to criticism from conservatives that the party was too closely linked to the liberal organization, Americans for Democratic Action (ADA), Mitchell attempted to minimize the significance of the ADA. He mentioned that he had never seen a "live" member and maintained that Democratic candidates could "get along without" endorsement by the ADA. In an interview with the Chicago Sun Times, Mitchell charged that the organization was injuring the Democratic Party because it competed for the same money from wealthy liberals.

Mitchell continually confronted the problem of promoting opposition to an administration led by a popular president widely perceived as a father figure. While most prominent Democrats were content to attack Eisenhower's programs, Mitchell attacked Eisenhower personally. In March 1954, he announced that the president should be held responsible for the actions of all Republicans and charged that Eisenhower backed McCarthyism as the Republicans' best formula for success. Five months later, Mitchell charged Eisenhower with cronyism for supporting the Dixon-Yates contract, which provided for a private utility to replace the Tennessee Valley Authority as the Atomic Energy Commission's chief supplier of power in that region. Mitchell charged that Bobby Jones (the professional golfer, a friend of the president, and director of one of the companies involved in the proposal) had influenced Eisenhower's decision. Both Eisenhower and Jones denied the charge. The attack backfired against Mitchell and the Democrats, who were never able to substantiate the allegations of improper relations between Eisenhower and Jones. The New York Times accused Mitchell of making unfair and unsubstantiated allegations.

Mitchell's greatest success as the chair of his party was the campaign of 1954, in which Democrats won back both houses of Congress. In December 1954, Mitchell publicly announced that he wished to return to his law practice. Before stepping down, he saw to it that his successor would be a liberal able to hold the center of the party. Mitchell's personal choice, PAUL BUTLER, became his successor.

Mitchell remained active in Democratic politics throughout the decade. While chairman and after stepping down, he worked to strengthen Stevenson's connection with southern leaders. In particular, he cultivated Representative SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.) and Senator RICHARD RUSSELL (D-Ga.). In early 1956, Mitchell helped organize a committee to promote Stevenson's candidacy for the presidency. That year, Mitchell also made an unsuccessful attempt to gain the nomination for governor. Although his own bid failed, Mitchell helped Stevenson win the Democratic presidential nomination in August. One of his major contributions was to help stave off efforts by segregationists to splinter the party. At the Democratic convention, he contributed to the prevention of a dispute over a loyalty oath like the one that disrupted the convention four years earlier. Mitchell set up a special advisory committee on rules that came up with a resolution acceptable to most party members. The compromise stated that it was understood that state Democratic parties would put the names of the convention's nominees on the ballot. Mitchell also negotiated a weak civil rights plank in the Democratic platform of 1956 that helped prevent a walkout by southerners. He again served with Stevenson's campaign in the general election. After Eisenhower defeated Stevenson by an even greater margin than four years earlier, Mitchell returned to his law practice.

In April 1960, Mitchell ran unsuccessfully for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination in Illinois. From 1964 to 1966, he was director of communication on administrative affairs for the American Council on Education. He subsequently served as a vice president for education with the Raytheon Corporation, vice president for research and public service at the University of Oklahoma, and vice president for development at Nova University in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. In 1968, Mitchell worked for the unsuccessful presidential candidacy of Senator EUGENE McCARTHY (D-Minn.). Mitchell died in New Taos, Mexico, on April 23, 1974.

—MSM

Monroney, A(Imer) S(tillwell) Mike (1902–1980) U.S. senator

The son of a pioneer family, Monroney was born in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, on March 2, 1902. He attended public schools in Oklahoma City and received a B.A. from the University of Oklahoma in 1924. After graduating, he went to work as a reporter and political writer for the Oklahoma News. His career as a journalist was cut short in 1928, when his father became seriously ill and Monroney had to take over the family's furniture business. Over the next 10 years, he ran the business and became active in civic affairs, serving as president of the Oklahoma City Rotary Club and the Oklahoma City Retailer's Association. He was elected as a Democrat to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1938 and won reelection in five successive races. In Congress, he supported most of the New Deal and Fair Deal. During the 1940s, Monroney gained public attention as a champion of congressional reform. He sponsored legislation to reduce the number of committees, modify seniority rules, and limit the power of the Rules Committee. In foreign policy, he supported the expansion of the U.S. Navy and Lend-Lease before the United States entered World War II. Subsequently, he backed most of the foreign policies of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations.

In 1950, Monroney narrowly defeated an incumbent senator in the Democratic primary and then easily defeated the Republican candidate in the general election. In the Senate, Monroney was one of the few senators who challenged Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) during the last years of the administration of HARRY S. TRUMAN. After DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER became president, Monroney continued to speak out against the demagogue from Wisconsin. In July 1953, Monroney charged McCarthy with making a "shambles" of the State Department's Foreign Service and endangering the Central Intelligence Agency. He also ridiculed a tour of Europe made by two of McCarthy's aides, ROY COHN and G. DAVID SCHINE. Monroney dismissed their search for subversive literature in American overseas libraries as a "keystone cops" chase. As a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, Monroney unsuccessfully opposed the nomination of Robert E. Lee, an associate of McCarthy, to the Federal Communications Commission. Monroney was one of the few senators who supported a resolution by Senator RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.) calling for McCarthy's removal from his committee chairmanships and later voted for the resolution to censure McCarthy.

Despite his reputation as a reformer in the House, Monroney did not always support proposals aimed at reforming the rules of the Senate. He opposed attempts by liberals in 1953 and 1957 to ease the requirements for cloture in an effort to pass civil rights legislation. Nevertheless, Monroney voted for the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. A strong supporter of foreign aid programs, he sponsored a resolution in 1958 that led to the eventual establishment of the International Development Association to provide long-term, low-interest loans to foreign countries. In 1955, Monroney became chair of the Aviation Subcommittee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. He supported legislation in 1956 and 1958 that led to the establishment of the Federal Aviation Administration. Aviation emerged as his primary area of expertise and interest. He strongly supported efforts to aid the aviation industry and sponsored legislation providing grants to airports. At the same time, he never forgot the folks back home; throughout his years in the Senate, Monroney obtained millions of dollars for aviation and aeronautics projects in Oklahoma. He also favored the oil depletion allowance, agricultural price supports, soil conservation programs, rural electrification projects, and efforts to manage resources. In addition, Monroney continued his support for federal aid to education. In 1960, he joined with Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK (D-Pa.) to propose an amendment to the school aid bill that would have authorized federal funds in the amount of $20 per school-age child for the construction of classrooms and to increase the salaries of teachers. The Senate passed the bill, but it died in the House Rules Committee.

During the 1960s, Monroney supported most of the programs of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations and backed the war in Vietnam. He also continued to support aid to the aviation industry and renewed his interest in congressional reform. In his one effort to join the Democratic leadership, he ran for majority whip in 1965 but lost to Senator RUSSELL LONG (D-La.). Although Monroney easily won reelection in 1956 and 1962, he lost his bid for a fourth term by a decisive margin. Upon leaving the Senate, he worked as a consultant to several aviation companies before retiring in 1974. He died in Rockville, Maryland, on February 13, 1980.

—MSM

Morgan, Gerald D(emuth)

(1908–1976) special presidential assistant for congressional liaison, White House administrative assistant, special counsel to the president, deputy assistant to the president

The son of a lawyer, Morgan was born in New York City on December 19, 1908. He graduated from Hotchkiss School in 1926, Princeton University in 1930, and Harvard Law School in 1933. After working in the office of the solicitor for U.S. Steel Corporation for a year, he moved to Washington, D.C., to become assistant legislative counsel for the House of Representatives. He entered private law practice in Louisville, Kentucky, in 1938 but returned to his former position with the House a year later. In 1945, he became a partner in the law firm of Morgan and Calhoun in Washington. During the postwar period, he also undertook numerous assignments for House panels, including the Foreign Affairs and Un-American Activities Committees. Most notably, Morgan served as counsel to the Republican majority of the House Labor Committee between 1947 and 1949 and played a major role in drafting the Taft-Hartley Act.

Morgan took no part in the presidential campaign in 1952 and had never met DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER before the latter became president. Nevertheless, in February 1953, Eisenhower appointed him a special presidential assistant. Morgan worked under General WILTON B. PERSONS in the congressional liaison office.

Morgan's appointment rested mainly on the strength of his work on the Taft-Hartley Act, and his early duties dealt primarily with issues relating to labor. During the opening months of the administration, he was involved in the attempt to formulate a labor policy that would attract support from labor while retaining the loyalty of the conservative wing of the Republican Party and groups that traditionally supported the Republican Party, such as the National Association of Manufacturers. When Eisenhower named BERNARD SHANLEY to head a committee to study a revision of the Taft-Hartley Act, Morgan was assigned to assist Shanley. Morgan helped draft a series of 19 amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, many of which had the support of organized labor. Taft died the day that Eisenhower planned to submit the proposals to Congress, and the administration agreed that it would have been impolitic to send the amendments to Congress on the day that the sponsor of the original act died. Taft's death greatly dimmed any prospect for passage of the proposed amendments. Without Taft's prestige and influence, particularly with the Republican right, the amendments had little chance of passing. Moreover, the election of WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) as majority leader made passage even more unlikely. Further, Secretary of Commerce SINCLAIR WEEKS mobilized an effective campaign against the proposals, which were never sent to Capitol Hill.

Morgan became embroiled in the controversy over how to deal with Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), particularly after the demagogue from Wisconsin turned his vitriolic attacks on the administration. One group in the White House urged the president publicly to repudiate McCarthy; the other, including Morgan, favored "getting along" with the senator. By early 1954, however, Eisenhower concluded that McCarthy's attacks had become too blatant to ignore, and Morgan helped devise a moderate retaliatory policy that called for exposing McCarthy's more irresponsible charges to public scrutiny and attempting to limit the interrogation of White House personnel by congressional committees.

In February 1955, Morgan was promoted to the post of special counsel to the president. In that capacity, he helped develop Eisenhower's legislative program. Morgan handled all bills the administration planned to introduce to Congress and advised the president on legislation not initiated by the administration. Morgan helped formulate the administration's response to the so-called Powell amendment. That amendment, offered by Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR., (D-N.Y.) to a bill sponsored by the administration that called for federal aid for the construction of schools, would have withheld funds from school districts that practiced racial segregation. Predictably, southerners resolutely attempted to defeat the amendment. In addition, many northern members of Congress also opposed the amendment on the ground that it would jeopardize the passage of the entire bill. For a variety of reasons, including Powell's frequent support of the administration, Eisenhower considered backing the amendment, but the president's primary concern in this instance was the national shortage of classrooms. Morgan cautioned against wholehearted support of the amendment because it would leave Eisenhower open to charges that he was less than sincere about passing the aid for school construction. Eisenhower adopted a position similar to the one Morgan suggested. Ultimately, the Powell amendment failed, as did the larger bill. Morgan also lobbied for the administration's civil rights bill in 1956, which became the Civil Rights Act of 1957, and took part in the meeting between Eisenhower and Governor ORVILLE FAUBUS of Arkansas in which they attempted to resolve the crisis set off by a court order to desegregate Little Rock's Central High School.

As special counsel, Morgan also advised and often accompanied members of the administration called to testify before congressional committees. When, in 1955 and 1956, SHERMAN ADAMS refused to testify before the House Government Operations Committee about charges of conflict of interest, Morgan counseled him to plead executive privilege. In 1958, Adams was called before the House Committee on Legislative Oversight to answer questions concerning favors he allegedly did for BERNARD GOLDFINE, a financier from Boston, and gifts he had received from Goldfine. When Adams testified, Morgan accompanied him. Morgan was involved in the discussions that led to Adams's resignation in September 1958.

Following Adams's departure, Persons replaced Adams as chief of staff, and Morgan became Persons's deputy. Persons, who came from Alabama, felt emotionally incapable of remaining objective on issues relating to civil rights, and he asked Morgan to handle such matters.

When Eisenhower left office, Morgan returned to private law practice. He returned to public service in 1971 as vice president for public and governmental affairs for the National Railroad Passenger Corporation (Amtrak). In 1973, he joined the Washington law firm of Hamel, Park, McCabe and Saunders. Morgan died on June 15, 1976, while vacationing on St. Vincent Island in the West Indies.

—MSM

Morrison, deLesseps S(tory)

(1912–1964) mayor of New Orleans

The son of a parish district attorney, deLesseps Morrison was born in New Roads, Louisiana, on January 18, 1912. His maternal lineage included Ferdinand deLesseps, the builder of the Suez Canal, and Sidney Story, an alderman in New Orleans who established the city's regulated, legalized red-light district that came to bear his name. Ill with cancer, Morrison's father committed suicide in 1929. His modest estate was ruined by the stock market crash later that year, leaving the family in greatly reduced circumstances. DeLesseps Morrison worked his way through Louisiana State University, graduating in 1932 with a B.A. and a commission as a second lieutenant in the U.S. Army Reserve. Two years later, he earned a law degree from LSU. Upon finishing law school, he took a job as a lawyer with the National Recovery Administration (NRA). After the Supreme Court declared the NRA unconstitutional in 1935, Morrison formed a law firm with his half brother and a family friend, HALE BOGGS. Morrison became involved with reform politics in New Orleans in 1936. Three years later, he helped form the People's League of Independent Voters, which opposed the Long machine that dominated the Democratic Party and therefore politics in Louisiana. Morrison won a seat in the state legislature in 1940. He went on active duty with the army shortly after Pearl Harbor and rose to the rank of colonel.

While still serving in the army, he was reelected in 1944.

In 1946, Morrison ran as the reform candidate for mayor of New Orleans against the incumbent, Robert S. Maestri, who had the backing of the Long machine. With the support of veterans organizations, African Americans, and reform groups, Morrison defeated Maestri in the Democratic primary. In a heavily Democratic city in a state dominated by Democrats, winning the Democratic primary was tantamount to winning election. After going through the formality of sweeping the general election, Morrison took office in May 1946. He held the office for the next 15 years.

As mayor, Morrison gained a national reputation as a reformer and as an executive concerned with public relations. He used his charisma and urbane persona to create a new image for New Orleans. Morrison's administration stressed efficiency and economy in government. He reformed the city government, revamped the municipal purchasing system, and reorganized the police department. During the late 1940s, he defeated Earl Long's attempts to end the city's home rule. In a successful effort to increase trade and industry, the mayor established the first municipal international relations office in the United States. He also toured the Caribbean and South America as a goodwill ambassador for the city. Morrison undertook an extensive construction program to rebuild the decaying downtown area, provide housing for veterans, and expand recreational facilities. He built a new civic center and a new bridge across the Mississippi River. Conscious of the growing black electorate, Morrison gave symbolic recognition to the African-American community in New Orleans and improved municipal services and facilities in black areas. The mayor nonetheless maintained his commitment to segregation.

Despite Morrison's reputation as a reformer, critics often charged that his efforts produced more illusion than substance. Described by a reporter as "the consummate political animal," the mayor developed his own political machine and placed many of his supporters in key posts. When revelations of police corruption rocked the city in the early 1950s, Morrison used a variety of means to hamper the investigation. Throughout his administration, rumors persisted that Morrison had contacts with the city's underworld. Even his popular construction program imposed a financial burden on the city at a time it, like many other urban centers, was losing its tax base as the middle class fled to the suburbs. Further, investigations revealed that the city had used poor materials and shoddy construction methods in many of those projects. With respect to African Americans, Morrison's policies proved, in many cases, to be tokenism. Few blacks had positions of responsibility in the local party or municipal government.

During the 1950s, Morrison faced growing demands by African Americans for desegregation. Because he needed to maintain support from both blacks and whites, the mayor attempted to maintain a moderate position. He courted the black vote and expended political favors to the black community; nevertheless, he never publicly or privately challenged segregation. In the second half of the decade, federal court orders to desegregate encountered massive resistance, and Morrison's style of racial moderation became increasingly difficult to sustain. While resisting pressure from die-hard segregationists, Morrison urged civil rights groups to accept gradual integration and to refrain from direct action protests. The mayor's attempt at moderation pleased neither side.

Morrison faced his most difficult test when Judge J. SKELLEY WRIGHT, who had originally ordered the Orleans Parish School Board to "make arrangements for admission of children . . . on a racially non-discriminatory basis with all deliberate speed" in 1956, ordered the desegregation of the city's public schools in 1960. During the period after Wright's decision in 1956, Morrison sought to equalize black schools in New Orleans in an effort, as he put it, "to remove the causes that would create agitation among the races." His dual objectives, as he explained in a letter written in June 1959, were to "[keep] down mixing and . . . not [have] any trouble." Wright's decision in 1960 made Morrison's position untenable. After a survey indicated that white parents preferred desegregation to closing the schools, the mayor opposed Governor JIMMIE H. DAVIS's attempts to take over the system and shut it down. Nevertheless, he refused to come out in favor of desegregation. The desegregation of schools in New Orleans that November was accompanied by sometimes violent demonstrations. The city's police protected the students from physical injury but initially did not arrest any demonstrators. Only as the violence escalated did the police make arrests, and most of those arrested were African American. Morrison made a televised address asking for an end to the civil disturbances, which some critics claimed could have been avoided had the mayor taken a more assertive stand in the crisis. He also asked parents to keep their children in school and made it clear that the New Orleans police department was not "enforcing the federal court orders relative to school integration"; rather, they were "only maintaining law and order."

While serving as mayor, Morrison made unsuccessful bids for the governorship in 1956 and 1960. His urbane cosmopolitanism and Roman Catholicism proved a liability in rural, Protestant areas of Louisiana. He also faced opposition from the Long machine and from segregationists, who resented his moderate position on desegregation. In 1961, Morrison mounted an unsuccessful attempt to amend the city's charter so that he could run for a fifth term.

In June 1961, Morrison accepted the post of ambassador to the Organization of American States, where his primary assignment was to promote the Alliance for Progress in Latin American countries. He resigned the position in 1963 to make another bid for the governorship of Louisiana the following year. Morrison lost a runoff election for the Democratic nomination. As it had in 1960, Morrison's moderate position on desegregation cost him many votes and probably the election. After the election, Morrison accepted a job with a bank in New Orleans. Governor John McKeithen appointed him to head a committee charged with bringing new business into the state. Morrison died in a plane crash near Ciudad Victoria, Mexico, on May 22, 1964.

—MSM

Morrow, E. Frederic

(1909–1994) White House administrative assistant, administrative officer for special projects

The son of a minister, Morrow was born in Hackensack, New Jersey, on April 20, 1909. Upon graduating from Bowdoin College in 1930, he took a job with the Works Progress Administration in Englewood, New Jersey, after which he worked as a bank messenger. He then worked for Opportunity magazine, the official organ of the National Urban League (NUL). After two years with the NUL, he went to work in 1937 as coordinator of branches for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Called up by his draft board, Morrow volunteered for military service in 1942. He served throughout the war in the United States and rose to the rank of major. Immediately after being mustered out in October 1946, he entered Rutgers University School of Law on the GI Bill. Upon completing his law degree in September 1948, he clerked for a lawyer in Englewood before becoming a writer for the public affairs division of CBS television. He remained with CBS until 1952, when he took a leave of absence to work as a consultant for DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's presidential campaign.

After the election, Eisenhower's chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS, informed Morrow that the president-elect had asked him to offer Morrow a position on the White House staff. Adams advised Morrow to resign his position at CBS. Six months passed, while Morrow lived on his savings. Finally, BERNARD SHANLEY, special counsel to the president, informed Morrow that there would not be a place for him in the White House. Through the efforts of Charles Willis, Jr., an assistant to Adams, Morrow received an offer of a position as adviser on business affairs in the Department of Commerce.

In July 1955, Morrow joined the White House as administrative officer for special projects. During his tenure at the White House, Morrow frequently encountered frustration and embarrassment. He believed that he served as a "whipping boy" for the black press and their dissatisfaction with the policies of the Eisenhower administration. Further, he found the behavior of some of his colleagues on the White House staff correct but cold. In addition, he found his duties too vaguely defined. Although Morrow hoped to avoid becoming a specialist on racial issues, he was sometimes called upon to represent the president before black organizations or to attend state functions.

The failure of Eisenhower and his administration to take a stronger public position on civil rights frustrated Morrow. In his journal, he stated that the White House handled civil rights issues "like a bad dream." As early as the summer of 1955, Morrow, troubled by the racial violence in the South after the Brown decisions, urged Sherman Adams and Maxwell Rabb to convince the president to speak out against it. Though sympathetic, Adams and Rabb fretted about the lack of black support for Eisenhower and warned that the president could not afford to alienate white southern voters. Moreover, advisers such as WILTON B. PERSONS and GERALD MORGAN argued for a cautious policy on civil rights. In the wake of the murder of EMMETT TILL, Morrow suggested that either Adams or Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON meet with a group of black leaders. This earned the ire of Rabb, who told Morrow that the president had called for a commission to study the problem of civil rights and make recommendations. Moreover, Rabb fulminated about the lack of appreciation among black leaders for the steps the administration had taken.

The arrest of black leaders in Montgomery in February 1956 prompted Morrow once again to write to Adams. This time, he asked for permission to meet with black leaders to explain the actions the administration was taking in the field of civil rights. Adams thought the situation too politically fraught and expressed concern for Morrow's safety in such a situation.

Morrow participated in the Republican National Convention in San Francisco in 1956, but the uncertainty of his role made him uncomfortable. In addition, the president's acceptance speech disappointed Morrow. It addressed civil rights issues only in passing.

After the election, Morrow served as a marshal in the inaugural parade, after which, at Eisenhower's invitation, he took a seat in the president's box. Still, Morrow rankled at what he perceived to be cold treatment from some colleagues on the White House staff, and he remained impatient with the administration's cautious approach to civil rights matters.

Morrow found Vice President Richard M. Nixon among the most sympathetic members of the administration. He accompanied the vice president on an official trip to Africa in 1957, a principal purpose of which was to participate in the celebration of the birth of Ghana as an independent nation.

In Ghana, Nixon met MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., and invited the rising black leader to visit him in Washington.

In June 1957, Morrow wrote a memorandum to Adams urging that the president meet with a group of black leaders. Adams thought the meeting a good idea but thought it should not take place until after the congressional battle over the administration's civil rights bill had resolved itself. Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1957, a substantially weakened version of the administration's bill, in August. Morrow regarded it as "a pitiful, watered down version of the original bill emasculated by amendments added by southern senators," and expressed his hope that the president would veto it. Eisenhower had no wish to veto a civil rights measure, much less one originally introduced by his own administration and the first civil rights bill to pass Congress since Reconstruction. The president signed the measure into law in early September. Whatever Morrow's reservations about the act, its passage cleared the way for the president to meet with black leaders, but the desegregation crisis at Little Rock's Central High School further delayed the meeting.

By fall 1957, Morrow became increasingly frustrated by his position. He felt awkward "standing on platforms all over the country, trying to defend the administration's record on civil rights" when he was frustrated by its unwillingness to act more forcefully. Further, in October, Morrow was transferred to work for ARTHUR LARSON, who had recently been chosen as Eisenhower's principal speechwriter. Although reluctant to make the change, Morrow agreed. As it turned out, he never established a satisfactory working relationship with Larson and repeatedly requested to be reassigned.

In April 1958, Morrow returned to his former position in the president's executive office. He played a role in organizing Eisenhower's meeting with a group of black leaders, which finally took place in June 1958. When Max Rabb, who had handled minority affairs, left the White House staff in the spring of 1958, Morrow was given the assignment of dealing with matters relating to civil rights and African Americans. Not only did Morrow find himself in a position he had earlier hoped to avoid, but the departure of Sherman Adams deprived him of someone who had been a source of personal support as well as access to the president. Adams's replacement was Persons, a southerner who was uncomfortable dealing with civil rights issues. Persons urged Morrow to take such matters to Morgan or "anyone else," including the president, rather than to him.

Morrow became increasingly frustrated with his situation, and, in April 1959, he gave speeches to the Wayne County Republican Club in Detroit and the Republican Woman's Convention in Washington in which he criticized the Republican Party for failing to reach out to black voters. The speeches drew considerable public attention. The address to the Republican Women's Club in particular prompted a flood of complaints to the White House; although it prompted numerous expressions of support as well. In 1960, with the presidential campaign in the offing, Morrow repeatedly sent memos to LEONARD HALL, the Republican national chairman, and Senator THRUSTON MORTON (R-Ky.), former national chairman, urging them to make efforts to mobilize and attract black voters. Morrow's recommendations were brushed aside. Nevertheless, Morrow, who had enjoyed a warm relationship with Nixon, took a two-month leave of absence from the White House to work for Nixon's presidential campaign. Once he joined the campaign, however, Morrow found himself shunted to the side. When Martin Luther King, Jr., was jailed in Atlanta on a minor charge, Morrow beseeched Nixon's staff to have the candidate take some action. Morrow's pleas fell on deaf ears. Morrow believed that the decision by the Democratic nominee, JOHN F. KENNEDY, to intercede in the situation won him the election.

As the Eisenhower administration wound down, Morrow could not find a job in private business commensurate with his abilities and experience. He rejected jobs that focused on a company's relations with African Americans. Upon leaving the White House in 1961, Morrow became a vice president of public affairs of the African-American Institute in New York. Morrow became an assistant vice president at the Bank of New York in 1964. Three years later, he became a vice president and was promoted to a division head in 1969. He retired in 1975, after which he worked as an executive associate at the Educational Testing Service. Morrow published a version of the journal he kept in the White House,

Black Man in the White House, in 1963 and an autobiography, Forty Years a Guinea Pig, in 1980. He died in New York City on July 19, 1994.

—MSM

Morse, Wayne (Lyman)

(1900–1974) U.S. senator

Born on his parents' farm near Madison, Wisconsin, on October 20, 1900, Wayne Morse received a B.A. from the University of Wisconsin in 1923 and an M.A. from the same institution the following year. In 1924, he enrolled at the University of Minnesota for a graduate degree in speech but switched to law and earned a law degree in 1928. He became an assistant professor of law at the University of Oregon in 1929, rising to associate professor in 1930 and full professor in 1931. While serving as dean of the University of Oregon Law School from 1931 to 1944, he earned a doctorate of jurisprudence at Columbia University in 1932. Morse specialized in labor law, and, in 1938, Frances Perkins, the secretary of labor, named him labor arbitrator for the Pacific Coast. He won recognition as a leading arbitrator, and that reputation led President Franklin D. Roosevelt to appoint him to the War Labor Board in 1942. Morse resigned two years later to protest what he considered excessive concessions to JOHN L. LEWIS's United Mine Workers.

Running as a Republican, Morse won election in 1944 to the U.S. Senate from Oregon. He quickly established a reputation as a liberal maverick willing to break from his party on key issues. In addition to generally supporting President HARRY S. TRUMAN's domestic and foreign policies, he not only voted against but filibustered to prevent passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. Further, Morse joined Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH (R-Me.) in attacking the anticommunist antics of Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Morse's consistent refusal to compromise and his self-righteous attitude alienated many members of the Senate, and not just those in his own party. Fortunately for Morse, his independence and outspokenness proved popular with his constituents.

After winning reelection in 1950, Morse continued to feud with his own party. The Republican leader, ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio), denied Morse

a seat on the Foreign Relations Committee. Morse began to attack Republican leaders, including the party's presidential nominee in 1952, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, for failing to repudiate McCarthy. After the Republican National Convention, Morse left the Republican Party and campaigned for the Democratic nominee, ADLAI STEVENSON. Morse cited the choice of RICHARD M. NIXON as the vice presidential candidate and what he described as the conservative platform as his reasons for bolting.

When the Senate convened in January 1953, Morse ostentatiously brought a folding chair into the chamber and placed it in the aisle that divided the Republicans from the Democrats. Nevertheless, in the vote to organize the chamber, he cast his ballot for the Republicans, giving them narrow control of the Senate (had Morse voted with the Democrats, it would have produced a tie that would have left the deciding vote with the vice president and the Republicans in control). The Republican leadership, however, denied him key committee assignments, including a place on the Labor Committee.

A strong supporter of federal power and resource development, Morse opposed the submerged lands bill, which granted ownership of offshore oil deposits to the states. In a speech that lasted 22 hours and 26 minutes, Morse attacked the bill as a "raid on the public domain." That speech broke the Senate record for a filibuster. (The record lasted only a few years, until STROM THURMOND (D-S.C.) broke it filibustering against a civil rights bill in 1957.) Despite Morse's efforts, the submerged lands bill passed the Senate, and Eisenhower signed it into law in May 1953. From 1951 to 1955, Morse annually introduced a bill that would have provided for public construction of a dam and power plant at Hell's Canyon on the Snake River in Idaho. The measure failed each time.

Although an early critic of McCarthy, Morse was a cautious one. He joined other liberals in debating specific charges McCarthy had made but at the same argued for the need to investigate subversives. After McCarthy assumed the chair of the Senate Government Operations Committee, Morse muted his attacks on the junior senator from Wisconsin. Morse's biographer, A. Robert Smith, maintained that this was because McCarthy was investigating a lobbyist from Oregon who was close to Morse.

When the movement to censure McCarthy gained force during 1954, Morse once again took out after the senator from Wisconsin more aggressively.

After the elections of 1954, the Democrats controlled one more seat in the Senate than the Republicans, with Morse as an Independent. Had Morse voted with the Republicans, the result would have been a tie, and the vice president would have cast the deciding vote for the Republicans. Instead, Morse voted for Democratic control of the chamber. In February 1955, he officially switched to the Democratic Party, induced, in part, by the promise of a seat on the Foreign Relations Committee. Morse became a strident critic of the administration. In addition, he became a leading opponent of the admission of evidence gained from wiretaps in federal courts and annually introduced a bill requiring members of Congress to disclose their outside sources of income. Morse ran for reelection in 1956 as a Democrat and won a third term.

A staunch supporter of civil rights, Morse voted against the Civil Rights Act of 1957 because he believed it too weak. As a member of the District of Columbia Committee, he was the leading proponent in the Senate of home rule for the nation's capital, the population of which was approximately half African American. Morse vigorously opposed the administration's policy of promoting private ownership on the public domain and its foreign policy, most notably concerning the offshore islands of Taiwan.

Morse earned a well-deserved reputation for vicious personal attacks on those who differed with him. During a debate on the construction of federal power facilities, he charged that President Eisenhower was as corrupt as DAVE BECK, the president of the Teamsters who was then under investigation for using his position for personal gain. In 1958, Morse campaigned for Oregon's governor, Robert D. Holmes, and repeatedly reminded voters that the Republican challenger, Mark Hatfield, had been involved in an auto accident in which a young girl had been killed. Some observers believed that Morse's conduct contributed to the defeat of Holmes. That same year, Morse broke with his protégé, Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER (D-Oreg.), because the younger man had supported some of the administration's proposals, including the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

Characterizing Senators JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) and HUBERT H. HUMPHREY (D-Minn.) as "phony liberals," Morse entered the race for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1960. Defeats in the District of Columbia, Maryland, and Oregon primaries, however, ended his campaign. After his disastrous showing in the presidential primaries, Morse continued his career in the Senate. In 1961, he became chair of the subcommittee on education, from which position he gave important support to federal aid to education. Morse supported most of the domestic legislation proposed by the administrations of Kennedy and LYNDON B. JOHNSON. He enjoyed a particularly good working relationship with Johnson, who appointed him to two emergency labor relations boards. Ironically, in both instances he angered the unions involved, and they worked against his reelection in 1968. An early opponent of the war in Vietnam, Morse was one of only two senators to vote against the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution in 1964. ERNEST GRUENING (D-Alaska) was the other. Throughout the rest of his career in the Senate, Morse vigorously opposed the war in Vietnam. In 1966, he introduced an amendment to repeal the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution, which went down to defeat by a vote of 95 to 5.

Morse lost his bid for reelection in 1968 to the Republican nominee, Robert Packwood. After leaving the Senate, he worked as a lecturer and labor arbitrator. He was a distinguished visiting scholar at the State University of New York from 1969 to 1970. Morse ran against Hatfield for Oregon's other seat in the Senate in 1972 but lost that election, too. He won the Democratic senatorial primary for his old seat in 1974 but died of kidney failure while campaigning in Portland, Oregon, on July 22, 1974.

—MSM

Morton, Thruston B(allard)

(1907–1982) assistant secretary of state for congressional relations, U.S. senator, Republican national chairman

Thruston Morton was born in Louisville, Kentucky, on August 19, 1907. The product of an old and wealthy Kentucky family, he attended Woodberry Forest School in Virginia and Yale University.

Upon graduating from Yale in 1929, Morton went to work for Ballard and Ballard, the family's grain and milling firm. He enlisted in the navy before the United States entered World War II and served in the Pacific during the war. In 1946, he returned to Kentucky, where he became president of Ballard and Ballard. That November he was elected as a Republican to the U.S. House of Representatives, where he aligned himself with the liberal and internationalist wing of his party. Reelected in 1948 and 1950, Morton supported the Tennessee Valley Authority, was an early advocate of federal aid to education, and backed President HARRY S. TRUMAN's major initiatives in foreign policy (including aid to Greece and Turkey, the Marshall Plan, and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization). In addition to defending the basic structure of the New Deal, he emerged as an outspoken critic of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.). Morton announced that he would not seek reelection in 1952. He managed JOHN SHERMAN COOPER's successful campaign for the U.S. Senate in 1952 and that same year was the lone supporter of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER among Kentucky's 20 delegates to the Republican National Convention.

Following Eisenhower's inauguration in January 1953, he named Morton assistant secretary of state for congressional relations. In that post, Morton played an important role in defeating a constitutional amendment, proposed by Senator JOHN W. BRICKER (R-Ohio), designed to limit the president's power to make treaties. Morton's efforts earned him the enmity of conservative groups, in particular the John Birch Society. Morton also fought to save the reciprocal trade bill from defeat by a Republican Congress. As he had in Congress, Morton took exception to McCarthy's approach to fighting communism. While acknowledging the severity of the threat posed by communism, Morton declared that it did not warrant the destruction of American liberties. "You cannot," he maintained, "chip away part of the structure of liberty without beginning to destroy the entire structure."

In 1956, Morton resigned his post to run for the Senate. He defeated the incumbent, Earle Clements, by a narrow margin, aided by the president's presence at the top of the Republican ticket and a split between Kentucky's governor, A. B. "HAPPY"

CHANDLER and Clements. Chandler withheld his support from Clements. In the Senate, Morton loyally backed the administration's programs. In 1957 and 1958, he was Eisenhower's most consistent supporter in the upper house. A longtime opponent of racial segregation, he backed the administration's civil rights bill in 1957. Morton joined liberals in the Senate in attempting to prevent the addition of an amendment to the bill, sponsored by southern Democrats, requiring a jury trial for those accused of violating injunctions protecting black voting rights. Nevertheless, the amendment passed and substantially weakened the law. In 1957, Morton supported the Eisenhower Doctrine, which provided for military and economic aid to the Middle East and granted the president authority to send American troops to any nation in the region that faced "overt armed aggression by any country controlled by international communism" and requested assistance. Morton cosponsored a bill with Cooper that called for $1.6 billion in federal aid to education over four years.

When MEADE ALCORN retired as Republican national chairman in 1959, Morton replaced him and held the position for two years. He defended the administration against criticism after the Soviets downed a U-2 spy plane. At the Republican National Convention in 1960, Morton had substantial backing for the vice presidential nomination, but RICHARD M. NIXON chose HENRY CABOT LODGE instead. Morton easily won reelection in 1962. Although disappointed that the conservative BARRY GOLDWATER captured the Republican nomination in 1964, Morton loyally supported the party's ticket. He favored civil rights and programs to alleviate poverty in Appalachia but opposed many of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's other domestic programs. An initial supporter of American military involvement in Vietnam, he became disillusioned by 1967 and called for a withdrawal of American forces. In February 1968, he announced that he would not seek a third term in the Senate. He urged Governor NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER to run for the Republican presidential nomination in 1968 and became cochair of Rockefeller's campaign. When Rockefeller lost to Nixon, Morton joined Nixon's campaign; his brother, Rogers C. B. Morton, was Nixon's floor manager at the convention. Morton returned to Louisville, where he was vice chairman of the Liberty National Bank and Trust Company. He also served on the board of directors for a number of companies and pursued his lifelong interest in thoroughbred horses, serving as president of the American Horse Council and chairman of the board of Churchill Downs. Morton died in Louisville on August 14, 1982.

—MSM

Mundt, Karl E(arl)

(1900–1974) U.S. senator

The son of a small businessman, Karl Mundt was born in Humboldt, South Dakota, on June 3, 1900. He attended public schools in Humboldt, Pierre, and Madison, South Dakota. After receiving his B.A. at Carleton College in Minnesota in 1923, he returned to South Dakota and taught high school speech and social science in Bryant. From 1924 to 1927, he served as the town's superintendent of schools. He earned an M.A. in education at Columbia University in 1927, after which he taught speech at Beadle State Teachers College in Madison, South Dakota, from 1927 to 1936. While at Beadle State, he also worked with his father in the Mundt Loan and Investment Company. He attained prominence as a civic leader, and his interest in conservation issues brought him into politics. In 1927, he was elected state president of the Izaak Walton League, a group interested in conservation. He also served on the South Dakota State Game and Fish commission from 1931 to 1937. Following an unsuccessful run for Congress in 1936, he won a seat in 1938. As a Republican candidate in South Dakota's largely German and conservative corn belt, his platform was anti-British and isolationist. Following that path once he entered Congress, Mundt opposed the Selective Service Act of 1940 and Lend-Lease in 1941. After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, however, he threw himself behind the American war effort.

Mundt received an appointment to the Special House Committee on Un-American Activities, known as the Dies Committee, in 1943. As World War II drew to a close, Mundt became one of the most outspoken advocates of anticommunism in both foreign and domestic policy. After the war, he was appointed to the successor to the Dies Committee, the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC). Mundt led the Republican attack on the Truman administration's loyalty program in the late 1940s. Presiding over HUAC's investigations of alleged communist infiltration of government departments in 1948, Mundt took an active role in the investigation of the charge by WHITTAKER CHAMBERS that Alger Hiss, a former government official, had been a communist. Information developed during that investigation led a grand jury to indict Alger Hiss for perjury the following year. In 1948, Mundt and Representative RICHARD M. NIXON (R-Calif.) cosponsored a bill that required the American Communist Party to register its membership with the Department of Justice, denied communists passports, and barred communists from federal employment.

Mundt won election to the Senate in 1948 and promptly introduced a similar measure in that body. Truman strongly opposed the Mundt bills, but in 1950 Congress overrode Truman's veto to pass the omnibus Internal Security Act, known as the McCarran Act, which incorporated the provisions Mundt sponsored. Despite his vigorous (some would have said extreme) anticommunism, Mundt defied stereotypes. Unlike most midwestern conservative Republicans, he supported the creation of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization.

When the Senate convened in January 1953, Mundt was assigned to the Government Operations Committee and to its Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, both of which were chaired by Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). Mundt had strongly supported McCarthy's anticommunist crusade ever since the senator from Wisconsin rose to prominence in 1950, and he worked closely with McCarthy on the subcommittee's wide-ranging probes of alleged communist subversion. In January and February 1954, however, after McCarthy began an investigation of the army, Mundt joined other Republicans on the panel in an effort to forestall a public rupture between the subcommittee and the army or between the subcommittee and the administration. Acting as a mediator at a luncheon on February 24, Mundt drew up a "memorandum of understanding" in which the Secretary of the Army ROBERT STEVENS conceded the right of the chair of the subcommittee to question army officers. Prompted by news reports that described the agreement as a “capitulation” by Stevens, the army proceeded with its plans to expose the activities of McCarthy and the subcommittee’s counsel, ROY COHN, on behalf of G. DAVID SCHINE, a sometime staff member of the subcommittee (and friend of Cohn) who had been drafted. In March, the subcommittee voted to investigate the dispute. McCarthy temporarily resigned from the panel in order to testify, and Mundt reluctantly accepted the job of acting chairman for the duration of the Army-McCarthy hearings. After unsuccessfully attempting to bar the press from the committee room, he took almost no active part in the nationally televised proceedings. Moreover, he proved unable to control either the junior senator from Wisconsin or JOSEPH N. WELCH, the counsel for the army and McCarthy’s principal adversary. Despite the decline in McCarthy’s popularity after the hearings, Mundt remained one of his strongest partisans and worked to prevent the Senate from condemning McCarthy’s conduct. Although he voted against it, Mundt proved unable to prevent the Senate from passing a resolution censuring McCarthy in December 1954.

As the issue of communism in government began to wane after 1954, Mundt’s name faded from public prominence. He remained a powerful force for conservatism in the Senate, however, and regularly opposed social welfare programs and domestic spending. He also advocated government regulation of labor unions. Although he voted with the conservative coalition of southern Democrats and conservative Republicans on most issues, Mundt consistently supported civil rights and measures to protect the environment. He sponsored legislation establishing the National Endangered Species List.

As a member of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, Mundt was appointed in January 1957 to the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, chaired by Senator JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.). Following investigations of corruption in the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and other unions, the panel conducted hearings in February and March 1958 on a violent strike by the United Auto Workers (UAW) against the Kohler Company of Kohler, Wisconsin. Mundt and other Republicans on the McClellan Committee initiated the probe partly to embarrass the committee’s counsel, ROBERT F. KENNEDY, and the panel’s liberal Democrats, who had close political ties with the UAW’s president, WALTER REUTHER. Amid angry charges of partisanship and “whitewashing” that nearly resulted in the breakup of the panel, the investigation of the UAW produced little evidence to support allegations of corruption by officials of the UAW. The committee’s Republicans, Mundt, BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.), and CARL CURTIS (R-Neb.), pressed for a separate inquiry into the UAW’s political activities, but the Democrats blocked it.

During the Kennedy administration, Mundt once again became involved in several high-profile investigations, including a probe by the Investigations Subcommittee in 1962 of the relationship between the Agriculture Department and Billie Sol Estes, a financier from Texas, and hearings in 1963 on the Defense Department’s conduct in awarding contracts for the TFX fighter bomber. Mundt won a fourth term in 1966 but in 1969 suffered a debilitating stroke that prevented him from carrying on his duties in the Senate. In 1972, the Republican leadership in the Senate relieved him of his posts as ranking Republican on the Government Operations Committee and second-ranking minority member on the Foreign Relations and Appropriations Committees. Mundt did not stand for reelection in 1972 and died in Washington, D.C., on August 16, 1974.

—MSM

Muñoz Marín, Luis

(1898–1980) governor, Puerto Rico

The son of Luis Muñoz Rivera, the “George Washington of Puerto Rico,” Muñoz was born in San Juan, Puerto Rico, on February 18, 1898. Raised in New York and Washington, D.C., he attended Georgetown Preparatory School from 1911 to 1915 and studied law for a year at Georgetown University. Upon the death of his father in 1916, Muñoz left law school to become secretary to the resident commissioner from Puerto Rico. He also edited his father’s papers for publication, wrote articles for the Baltimore Sun and several magazines (including the Nation), and published two books of his own essays. Muñoz moved to New York in 1918, where he worked as a freelance writer and founded a magazine dedicated to Latin American culture. He moved to San Juan in 1931, where he was editor of a newspaper and a founder, in 1932, of the Liberal Party, which supported political independence for Puerto Rico. Although his party lost the elections in 1932, Muñoz won a seat in the Puerto Rican senate. He used his cultural and political contacts in the United States to help bring money from the Roosevelt administration to Puerto Rico. During this period, Muñoz came to the conclusion that independence did not serve the interests of Puerto Rico, which led to a split with the Liberal Party in 1937. The following year, Muñoz founded the Popular Democratic Party (PPD), which mobilized support of the rural masses with promises of land reform, electricity, education, and access to medical services. After the PPD won an unexpected victory in the elections of 1940, Muñoz became president of the senate. Legislation passed in 1941 gave the government the power to acquire land and divide it among the landless. With the cooperation of the appointed governor, Rexford Tugwell, the PPD majority also enacted legislation providing electricity, water, schools, and medical clinics. Subsequently, the PPD won the elections of 1944 in a landslide and went on to win the next five elections.

After World War II, Muñoz concluded that Puerto Rico could not support a growing population on a solely agricultural base. He helped create "Operation Bootstrap," an economic development program designed to attract industry to the island. He also sought to increase the island's autonomy from the United States. Puerto Rico gained the right to elect its own governor in 1947, and the following year Muñoz became the island's first elected governor. In 1950, President HARRY S. TRUMAN signed Public Law 600, which allowed Puerto Ricans to draft their own constitution. In a referendum the following year, Puerto Rican voters approved the American legislation. Convinced that independence was not the best course for Puerto Rico, Muñoz proposed autonomy as an alternative to independence or statehood. In July 1952, the people of Puerto Rico ratified a constitution that established the island as a commonwealth in free association with the United States. Under this arrangement, the residents of Puerto Rico paid no federal income taxes and did not vote in presidential elections. Further, they did not have voting representation in Congress but had a resident commissioner. Finally, the United States represented Puerto Rico in foreign affairs and provided it with military protection. In the same year they ratified the constitution, the people of Puerto Rico elected Muñoz to a second term as governor.

Throughout the 1950s, Muñoz maintained that commonwealth status ensured the island's fiscal and cultural autonomy while providing the benefits of U.S. citizenship. However, he faced growing opposition from pro-independence and pro-statehood movements. The Nationalist Party regarded Muñoz as a traitor, and in 1950 five Nationalists were killed in an attempt to assassinate the governor. That same year, two Nationalists attacked Blair House, where President Harry S. Truman was staying while the White House underwent renovation. In 1954, several members of the Nationalist Party sprayed bullets in the chamber of the U.S. House of Representatives and wounded five members of Congress. Muñoz immediately flew to Washington to condemn the shootings and assure the American public that the majority of Puerto Ricans wanted to continue the island's ties to the United States. Communist countries made use of the calls for Puerto Rican independence in their propaganda and asserted that Puerto Rico's commonwealth status was a cover for U.S. colonial domination.

For Muñoz, however, the greater immediate threat came from the pro-statehood Republican Party of Puerto Rico. In the gubernatorial election of 1956, Muñoz won a third term, but the Republicans received 25 percent of the vote, twice as much as they received four years earlier. Recruited mainly from the island's growing middle class, Republicans held that commonwealth status could be no more than a transitional solution. After all, they argued, the U.S. Congress could rescind the law that provided for the commonwealth at any time. In contrast, statehood offered a permanent solution that guaranteed Puerto Ricans U.S. citizenship. Republicans acknowledged the drawback of having to pay federal taxes, but they contended that the dignity and equality conferred by statehood made it a good bargain. Further, they maintained that statehood would provide the stability necessary for further economic development. Muñoz did not respond to the challenge posed by the Republicans until 1959, when the Legislative Assembly controlled by the PPD called on the U.S. Congress to clarify aspects of the relationship between the United States and Puerto Rico established in the Federal Relations Act. The Fernos-Murray bill, which would have slightly augmented Puerto Rican autonomy, addressed some of these concerns, but it was never reported out of committee.

During the 1950s, Operation Bootstrap registered impressive economic gains. Industrial production and per capita income increased. Industry became the dominant economic activity on the island. The improved economic performance owed partly to a large migration to the mainland. Nevertheless, it enhanced Muñoz's image at home and abroad. In 1955, Muñoz proposed "Operation Serenity," a vaguely defined cultural program, which became an effort to upgrade education and to preserve the island's Hispanic traditions and rural values.

Muñoz also sought to play a larger role in U.S.-Latin American relations. In 1958, he asserted that Puerto Rico, because of its Hispanic heritage, its relationship with the United States government, and its prosperity, could best translate U.S. political and economic ideals to Latin Americans. Similarly, Puerto Rico was in a position to explain Latin American aspirations to North America. In March 1958, he told a Senate committee that Latin America had not received its fair share of U.S. foreign aid and urged the United States to undertake more extensive efforts to develop the economies of the Western Hemisphere and to support democratic movements. After Fidel Castro took power in Cuba, Muñoz defended the new regime and, throughout 1959, explained its political violence as a consequence of the brutality of the Batista regime. In time, however, Muñoz became a severe critic of Castro and his regime.

Muñoz won a fourth term as governor in 1960, but the controversy over the island's commonwealth status continued. Faced with growing support for pro-independence and pro-statehood movements, Muñoz suggested to President JOHN F. KENNEDY in 1962 that a plebiscite of the people of Puerto Rico would be the best way finally to decide the issue. Once Kennedy agreed, Muñoz declined his party's nomination for a fifth term in 1964 and returned to the island's senate. He put forward his friend and secretary of state, Roberto Sánchez Vilella, for governor. Muñoz campaigned vigorously for commonwealth status, and 60 percent of voters chose it over either independence or statehood when the plebiscite was held in 1967. The next year, however, the PPD lost the governorship to the pro-statehood New Progressive Party. The question of the island's status was only one issue with which Muñoz and the PPD had to contend. Operation Bootstrap, which had seemed so successful in the 1950s, looked less impressive by the 1960s, when Puerto Rico was plagued by high unemployment. Despite his party's defeat, Muñoz won reelection to the senate in 1968. In May 1970, however, he resigned and traveled in Europe, where he wrote his memoirs. He returned to Puerto Rico in 1972 and campaigned extensively for the PPD in the elections of that year. His efforts contributed to the PPD's victory in the gubernatorial election. Muñoz retired from active politics in 1975 and died in San Juan on April 30, 1980.

—MSM

Murphy, Robert D(aniel)

(1894–1978) ambassador to Japan, assistant secretary of state for United Nations affairs, deputy undersecretary of state for political affairs, undersecretary of state

The son of a steamfitter and railroad worker, Robert Murphy was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on October 28, 1894. He attended Marquette Academy and Marquette University before earning an LL.B. from George Washington University in 1920. Upon receiving his degree, he joined the foreign service in 1921 and was posted as vice-consul to Zurich. During the 1920s, Murphy served in a variety of positions in Washington and Europe. He was vice-consul in Munich from 1921 to 1923 and consul there from 1923 to 1925. After serving briefly as counsel in Seville in 1925, he returned to Washington and worked in the State Department from 1926 to 1930. While in Washington, he earned an LL.M. from George Washington University in 1928.

Murphy was assigned in 1930 as consul to the American embassy in Paris, where he remained until 1941. From 1936 to 1939, he also served as first secretary, and he became counselor of the embassy in 1939. He was the ranking American diplomat when the Germans entered the French capital. In May 1940, he was assigned as chargé d'affaires to Vichy, the capital of the collaborationist government headed by Marshal Philippe Pétain. Murphy headed the embassy until the arrival of Ambassador William Leahy in January 1941. In early 1941, President Franklin D. Roosevelt named Murphy as his personal representative to French North Africa. After the United States entered World War II, Murphy became chief civilian affairs officer on General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's staff. In that capacity, Murphy negotiated a deal with Admiral François Darlan, the Vichy commander in chief, under the terms of which Darlan would not oppose Allied landings in North Africa. After the French surrendered, Murphy and General MARK CLARK negotiated the Clark-Darlan Agreement, which left Vichy administrators in office. Murphy drew considerable criticism from the press in the United States and Great Britain for dealing with Darlan, a famously Anglophobic and anti-Semitic fascist.

Murphy became chief civilian affairs officer at the Allied headquarters on November 8, 1942. The next month, he was named political adviser to the supreme allied commander. After attending the Casablanca Conference in 1943, Murphy was assigned as the principal civilian representative of the president and State Department with the Allied command in Italy. One of his duties was to help negotiate the surrender of Italy. In September 1944, Murphy became Eisenhower's chief adviser on German affairs. He attended the Potsdam Conference in July 1945 as a member of the occupation government of Germany.

After the war, Murphy served in a variety of posts. From 1945 to 1949, he remained in Germany with the rank of ambassador and served as political adviser to General LUCIUS CLAY. He returned to Washington in February 1949 to become director of the State Department's Office of German and Austrian Affairs. In September 1949, he was appointed ambassador to Belgium. He became the United States's first postwar ambassador to Japan in 1952. When Eisenhower entered the White House in 1953, he named a new ambassador to Japan, and Murphy served as an adviser to General Mark Clark, then engaged in negotiations for a cease-fire in the Korean War.

After the Korean armistice was signed in July 1953, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES appointed Murphy assistant secretary of state for United Nations affairs. Although Murphy was theoretically in charge of the U.S. mission, HENRY CABOT LODGE, the ambassador to the UN, demanded autonomy from the State Department. Lodge, who had the backing of Eisenhower and Dulles, got his way.

In November 1953, Eisenhower appointed Murphy deputy undersecretary for political affairs. During the Eisenhower administration, Murphy acted as the State Department's chief troubleshooter. In 1954, Eisenhower sent Murphy to Belgrade to advance stalled negotiations between Italy and Yugoslavia over Trieste. The following year, Murphy returned to Belgrade to negotiate better military and economic cooperation between Yugoslavia and the United States.

As recognition for his service, Murphy received the rank of career ambassador in 1956. That same year, Murphy headed a mission to dissuade the British prime minister, Anthony Eden, from military action against Egypt after Gamal Abdel Nasser nationalized the Suez Canal. The mission proved unsuccessful, and, in November 1956, a joint French and British expedition seized the canal.

Murphy continued to handle some of the most sensitive diplomatic assignments. In 1958, he helped mediate a dispute between France and Tunisia triggered by the French bombing of a Tunisian village that harbored Algerian rebels. Murphy crafted an agreement under which France withdrew all of its troops in Tunisia to a base at Bizerte. Tunisia granted France the right to occupy the base indefinitely in exchange for recognition of Tunisian sovereignty over it.

Eisenhower sent Murphy to Lebanon in July 1958 following the landing of American troops there at the request of Lebanon's president, Camille Chamoun. The show of force was intended to prevent a possible coup by pro-Nasser elements agitated by Chamoun's maneuvering to retain office beyond the stipulated term. Murphy facilitated an agreement that paved the way for Chamoun's departure and the election of General Fuad Chehab, a candidate acceptable to both sides.

In 1959, Murphy helped work out an agreement providing for an exchange of visits between Eisenhower and the Soviet premier, Nikita Khrushchev. While Khrushchev did tour the United States, the U-2 incident resulted in the cancellation of Eisenhower's visit to the Soviet Union.

After retiring from the Foreign Service in 1959, Murphy joined the board of directors of Corning Glass Works. He became chairman of the board in 1964 and honorary chairman of Corning International in 1971. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, Murphy served on a number of presidential commissions on foreign intelligence activities. He published his memoirs, Diplomat Among Warriors, in 1964. Murphy died in New York City on January 9, 1978.

—MSM

Murrow, Edward R(oscoe)

(1908–1965) television journalist

Born Egbert Roscoe Murrow on April 25, 1908, near Greensboro, North Carolina, Murrow moved, at the age of five, with his family to rural northwest Washington State. He attended public schools and worked his way through Washington State College (later Washington State University) in Pullman, where he graduated Phi Beta Kappa in 1930. While in college, he majored in speech, was active in student politics, and changed his first name to Edward. He was elected president of the National Student Federation in 1929. After graduating, Murrow led the National Student Federation for two years. He then worked as assistant director of the Institute of International Education from 1932 until 1935, when he began a long career with the Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS). Murrow went to London as director of CBS's European operations in 1937. He hired a newspaper man, William L. Shirer, to cover the continent for CBS. The two men reported on the Anschluss and the crisis in the Sudetenland, which Hitler claimed for Germany.

When World War II broke out, Murrow was based in London. During the Battle of Britain in 1940, he achieved national recognition for radio broadcasts bringing to America firsthand accounts of the blitz. His signature opening, "This . . . is London," and his dramatic live reporting gripped audiences. The drama of his reporting came not through hyperbole, but rather through calm, terse, intense description. Murrow hired a group of reporters who went on to shape modern broadcasting, including Eric Sevareid, Charles Collingwood, Howard K. Smith, Richard C. Hottelet, Larry LeSueur, and Winston Burdett. Murrow preferred to hire print journalists, because, as he put it, "I'm hiring reporters, not announcers." Later in the war, Murrow broadcast from North Africa and the European continent. He was the first Allied correspondent to enter the Nazi concentration camp at Buchenwald.

Murrow returned to America after World War II as a vice president of news operations, but he returned to the air in 1947 with an evening report on radio called Edward R. Murrow with the News. He and Fred W. Friendly, a producer, teamed to create a series of historical record albums called I Can Hear It Now. This led to a weekly program on CBS radio called Hear It Now.

Murrow entered the new field of television in the early 1950s doing editorial tailpieces on the CBS Evening News and covering special events. Beginning in 1951, together with Friendly, he produced See It Now, a 30-minute weekly adaptation of Hear It Now. Anchored by Murrow, the program usually dealt with a provocative topic. Person-to-Person, a weekly informal interview program hosted by Murrow, premiered in October 1953. Although the show did interviews with serious individuals, such as the Cuban revolutionary Fidel Castro and Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, it was basically devoted to celebrity interviews. Guests included Gypsy Rose Lee, the renowned stripper, and Marilyn Monroe, the movie star and sex symbol. The level of conversation rarely rose above what the New York Times described as "urbane small talk."

See It Now was, in general, the more serious of the two shows. Murrow had been cautious about dealing with the issues relating to the Red Scare and Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY, JR. (R-Wis.), and had done very little with those matters on television until October 1953. Friendly later recalled that "Murrow felt we had to be careful that we weren't too far ahead of public opinion." By October 1953, however, there were signs of impatience with McCarthy both in the Senate and in the White House. On October 20, Murrow presented the case of Lieutenant Milo Radulovich on See It Now. The air force planned to muster out Radulovich as a security risk because of anonymous reports about the left-wing sympathies of his father and sister. Investigators sent by Murrow and Friendly found no evidence to support the allegations, and the broadcast argued for the exoneration of Radulovich. The program generated a public outcry, and the air force reinstated the young lieutenant.

On March 9, 1954, Murrow devoted a program to the noisiest and most irresponsible of the anti-communists. Friendly and the staff of See It Now put together film clips of McCarthy's career, and Murrow wrote a denunciation of the senator's methods. Making no attempt at balance, Murrow's team chose clips that showed McCarthy at his worst, picking his nose, belching, giggling at his own jokes, browbeating witnesses, and contradicting himself. At the end of the program, Murrow told viewers that "we must not confuse dissent with disloyalty." "This is," he declared, "no time for men who oppose Senator McCarthy's methods to be silent."

At the outset of his program, Murrow offered McCarthy equal time. The junior senator from Wisconsin took up the offer and presented his defense in early April. He accused Murrow of past involvement with subversive groups and of being "the symbol, the leader and the cleverest of the jackal pack" who would attack "anyone who dares to expose individual Communists." The senator's inept rebuttal only reinforced the image presented in the original broadcast. William S. Paley, chairman of CBS, thought that McCarthy's reply did more damage to the senator than Murrow's original program.

Contrary to conventional wisdom, Murrow and the See It Now program did not bring down McCarthy. McCarthy had already begun to slip in the polls and opposition to the senator from Wisconsin had begun to find its voice in the Senate by the time Murrow took to the air. By the time of the broadcast, even conservative Republican newspapers had begun to turn against McCarthy. Similarly, Eisenhower's vigorous defense of his secretary of defense, ROBERT STEVENS, after McCarthy launched his attack on the army came before Murrow's broadcast and played a role in altering public opinion. An editorial in the New York Post, then a liberal paper and one of the first to attack McCarthy, chided Murrow: "'This is no time for men who oppose Sen. McCarthy's methods to keep silent,' said Ed as he leaped gracefully aboard the crowded band-wagon."

Edward R. Murrow broadcasting the 1956 election returns (Library of Congress)

The programs on Radulovich and McCarthy generated largely favorable responses. Some programs, however, created problems for the management of CBS. A broadcast in January 1954 focused on an amendment, sponsored by Senator JOHN W. BRICKER (R-Ohio), to restrict the president's power to enter treaties. Bricker accused Murrow of slanting the program to discredit the proposal. Frank Stanton, the president of CBS, regretted the broadcast on Bricker.

Despite occasional high ratings when it covered a particularly controversial subject, See It Now generally did not attract large audiences. After the programs devoted to McCarthy, See It Now ran as a weekly program for one more season. During that season (1954–55), Murrow, chain-smoking all the while, narrated a two-part series on the relationship between smoking and cancer. In January 1955, he interviewed J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER, the renowned physicist who had been denied a federal security clearance. Although it ended as a weekly broadcast, the show continued as a series of special reports for CBS News. The show's final broadcast, "Watch on the Ruhr," which dealt with postwar Germany, aired in July 1958. The following season, the show became CBS Reports, and Murrow's role and authority were reduced.

Beginning in 1958, Murrow hosted a talk show, Small World, which brought together political figures by remote telecasting for one-on-one debates. He also continued to host Person-to-Person, but Murrow grew increasingly disenchanted with CBS. When CBS removed See It Now from its regular schedule after 1955, Murrow's relations with Stanton, which had never been especially cordial, deteriorated. At a convention of radio and TV news directors in 1958, Murrow shocked his audience with an angry address in which he attacked the television networks for their emphasis on profit and called on them to donate one or two regularly scheduled shows for public affairs programs. In October 1959, the president of CBS publicly criticized Person-to-Person, and Murrow bitterly denounced Stanton. Murrow took a sabbatical starting in the summer of 1959, during which he contributed to CBS Reports and Small World. His last major telecast was "Harvest of Shame," an installment of CBS Reports that aired in November 1960 and reported on the plight of migrant farmworkers.

Because of his popularity, Murrow was sought out as a candidate for political office. In 1958, a coalition of liberal Democrats in New York, led by ELEANOR ROOSEVELT, attempted to persuade Murrow to run for the U.S. Senate from their state. After conferring with former president HARRY S. TRUMAN and others, Murrow decided not to run.

The press frequently mentioned him as a senatorial candidate again in 1962.

Murrow left CBS in 1961 to serve as director of the United States Information Agency in the Kennedy administration. After being diagnosed with cancer in October 1963, Murrow had an operation to remove his left lung. Three months later, he resigned as head of the United States Information Agency. After that, he was in and out of hospitals until his death from cancer in Pawling, New York, on April 27, 1965.

—MSM

Muste, A(braham) J(ohannes)

(1885–1967) clergyman, peace activist

Born in Zierikzee, the Netherlands, on January 8, 1885, A. J. Muste moved with his family to Michigan in 1891. His upbringing and early education in schools sponsored by the Dutch Reformed Church of America were both politically and religiously conservative. He attended Hope Preparatory School and Hope College, from which he graduated in 1905. After teaching Greek and Latin for a year at Northwestern Classical Academy in Iowa, he entered the theological seminary of the Dutch Reformed Church in New Brunswick, New Jersey. Upon his graduation in 1909, he was ordained as a Dutch Reformed minister and took a position as minister at the Fort Washington Collegiate Church in Washington Heights. From 1909 to 1913, he attended Union Theological Seminary, where he earned a bachelor of divinity degree and was exposed to liberal Christian theology. Muste resigned his ministry at Fort Washington Collegiate Church in 1914 because he no longer accepted Calvinist doctrine and had ceased to believe in a literal interpretation of the Bible. He moved to Newton, Massachusetts, where he became minister of the Central Congregational Church.

As the preparedness controversy raged in 1915, Muste read the works of Christian mystics and moved toward pacifism. His pacifism put him in opposition to his congregation, and he resigned in 1917. He became a mediator for the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), a nondenominational, pacifist organization, in 1918. One purpose of the FOR was to promote the nonviolent conciliation of labor disputes, and in 1919 Muste was a leader of a strike of textile workers in Lawrence, Massachusetts. This led to his election as general secretary of the Amalgamated Textile Workers of America. In 1921, he became chairman of the faculty of Brookwood Labor College in Katonah, New York. Although the American Federation of Labor (AFL) provided funds for the school, the leaders of the AFL distrusted the college because its faculty advocated industrial unions and the formation of an independent labor party, positions antithetical to the AFL. In spite of his nonorthodox views, Muste won election as vice president of the American Federation of Teachers in 1923. In the late 1920s, he became a Trotskyist, which put him at odds with the AFL. He founded and became chair of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action (CPLA) in 1929. The depression brought financial difficulties and factionalism to Brookwood Labor College, and Muste left the institution in 1933.

During the early years of the depression, Muste and the CPLA played an important role in the creation of unemployment leagues to promote the cause of the jobless, but his campaign never became a national mass movement. Muste and his followers moved gradually to an independent Marxist position and formed the American Workers Party (AWP) in 1933. A year later, the AWP merged with the orthodox Trotskyist Communist League of America to form the Workers Party. In 1935, however, the Trotskyists ousted him as party leader. Wounded by the loss of his chairmanship, Muste left for a tour of Europe. While visiting the Église Saint-Sulpice in Paris, he experienced what he described as a "reconversion" to pacifism. Although he remained a socialist and continued to believe that the achievement of a just society required a significant disruption of the social order, he believed this should be achieved through nonviolent means.

Upon returning to the United States in 1936, he also returned to the FOR as industrial secretary. From 1937 to 1940, he was director of the Presbyterian Labor Temple in New York City. Muste's efforts, however, shifted increasingly from the labor movement to pacifism. As executive secretary of FOR from 1940 to 1953, Muste made opposition to racial discrimination part of FOR's agenda. Following up on that initiative, several staff members of FOR formed the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) in 1942. Muste served on CORE's national advisory board until his death. He and his followers, including James Farmer, BAYARD RUSTIN, and George Hauser, exercised considerable influence on the developing Civil Rights movement. Muste was also active in the antinuclear movement from its earliest days after World War II. He organized protests against the buildup of nuclear weapons, nuclear testing, and civil defense. In the larger cause of pacifism, he worked on behalf of conscientious objectors confined by the U.S. government during World War II, organized protests against conscription, and opposed the cold war. In 1948, he joined 300 ministers in calling on all young men to refuse to register for conscription or serve in the armed forces.

His retirement from FOR in 1953 did not slow his activities on behalf of the causes to which he was committed. In 1954, he promoted the Third Way International Movement, which sought to unify all groups opposed to the policies of the U.S. and Soviet blocs. As chair of the American Third Camp Committee, he helped found Liberation magazine in 1956. The following year, Muste joined several peace groups in forming the Committee for Non-violent Action to stage direct action protests. He also served as its national chairman. An organizer of the first protests at nuclear testing sites, Muste was arrested for trespassing on the grounds of the Mercury Project in Nevada in 1957 and at the missile base in Mead, Nebraska, two years later. He was also active in organizing the Polaris Action Project in New London, Connecticut, in 1960 and participated in the annual protests against civil defense drills held at New York's City Hall Park from 1955 to 1961. Muste's followers helped organize the National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy (SANE).

Although a committed anticommunist, Muste carried on an open dialogue with communists and defended their civil liberties. In 1955, he, ELEANOR ROOSEVELT, and NORMAN THOMAS appeared before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee. Although he offered to discuss his views with J. EDGAR HOOVER personally, Muste refused to comply with any governmental agency or official engaged in an investigation of religious or political opinions. During the same year, he organized the American Forum for Socialist Education, an educational group sponsoring debates in which communists were invited to participate.

Until his death in 1967, Muste traveled widely for the cause of peace. In 1963, he helped establish the International Confederation for Disarmament and Peace as a rival to the communist-sponsored World Peace Council, which he criticized for endorsing the Chinese communist position in the war in Vietnam. A prominent opponent of U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia, Muste took an active part in organizing rallies, vigils, and marches to protest the war in Vietnam. In January 1967, he was one of three clergymen who met with Ho Chi Minh in North Vietnam for what they described as a “very frank, very cordial” meeting. Muste died in New York City on February 11, 1967.

—MSM

Nathan, Robert (Roy)

(1908–2001) economist, national chairman, Americans for Democratic Action

Born and raised in Dayton, Ohio, on December 25, 1908, Nathan worked his way through the University of Pennsylvania, where he earned a bachelor's degree in economics (1931) and an M.S. in economics (1933) from the Wharton School. He immediately went to work for the Commerce Department but resigned in June 1934 to work for the Pennsylvania Emergency Relief Board. While there, he served as a part-time consultant to and with the President's Commission on Economic Security, which played a central role in developing the Social Security system. Nathan returned to the Commerce Department in December 1934 as chief of the National Income Section (later the National Income Division), where he remained until 1940. While at Commerce, he earned a law degree from Georgetown University in 1938. During the 1930s, Nathan criticized what he described as the nation's lackadaisical approach to increasing production. From 1940 to 1942, he was associate director of research and statistics of the National Defense Advisory Commission. Shortly after Pearl Harbor, he was appointed chairman of the planning committee of the War Production Board. In 1945, he became director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion (OWMR). Considered one of the most talented of the New Deal economists, he published National Income in the U.S. in 1939 and Mobilizing for Abundance five years later. In 1946, Nathan resigned from the OWMR in protest against the policies of its director, John Snyder, a conservative banker from Missouri, who was moving quickly to remove all wartime controls on the economy. Nathan founded his own consulting firm, Robert R. Nathan Associates, to advise labor unions, businesses, and foreign governments. An early member of the Americans for Democratic Action (ADA), Nathan served as the organization's leading spokesman on economic policy during the Truman and Eisenhower years. In 1949, he joined other liberal economists in advocating a massive federal spending program to pull the economy out of a recession that began earlier that year.

Nathan was a frequent and vocal critic of the Eisenhower administration. He called for greater stimulation to the economy during recessions and more extensive tax relief for lower incomes. Six months after Eisenhower's inauguration, Nathan presented the first of many ADA critiques of the administration's economic policies. He criticized Eisenhower's failure to pursue economic planning and charged that the incomes of farmers were shrinking, security prices were dropping, and business was jittery. Speaking for the ADA, he called for a pledge of full employment, aid to farmers, a tax cut, expansion of public housing, and an increase in the minimum wage from $0.75 to $1.25 an hour. During testimony before the Joint Committee on the Economic Report in 1956, Nathan advocated tax relief for lower income groups and repeal of loopholes favoring wealthy taxpayers and corporations.

Nathan proposed a similar economic plan to counter the recession in 1958. Testifying before the House Ways and Means Committee in January of that year, he called for a tax cut and an increase in spending for education, mental health, and housing. Even if this unbalanced the federal budget, he maintained, it would “arrest the recession.” On April 6, Nathan expanded the scope of his proposals by suggesting federal grants to the needy, a federal food stamp program, extended and enlarged unemployment benefits, and a “vigorous program” to rebuild depressed areas.

In foreign policy, Nathan stressed the importance of economic instead of military aid. In his opinion, the administration’s “emphasis on military might and de-emphasis on economic and social considerations [was] playing havoc with America’s role in world affairs.” Nathan predicted that “hundreds of millions for economic development can save billions for defense and war.” He was particularly impressed with the economic progress of South Vietnam and in 1959 predicted it would outproduce the communist North. The people of South Vietnam, he said, “are hard working and capable and have demonstrated their determination to suffer and fight for high ideals and for freedom and independence.”

Nathan served as an adviser to the presidential campaign of Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY (D-Minn.) in 1960. After Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) captured the Democratic nomination and went on to defeat RICHARD M. NIXON in November, Nathan served on the economic transition team. In office, Kennedy often consulted Nathan on economic matters. When Humphrey ran for the presidency in 1968, Nathan once again served as an adviser to the campaign. He stepped down as president of Robert R. Nathan Associates in 1978 but remained chairman of the board until shortly before his death in Bethesda, Maryland, on September 4, 2001.

—MSM

Neuberger, Richard (Lewis)

(1912–1960) U.S. senator

Born in Portland, Oregon, on December 26, 1912, Neuberger attended public schools there and graduated from the University of Oregon in 1935, where he studied journalism and was editor of the campus newspaper. Although initially a political conservative, he moved to the left by 1933. While at the University of Oregon, he studied law from 1933 to 1934. After graduating, he wrote for national magazines. He also wrote or coauthored three books, including a highly critical examination of the Townsend Plan for old age pensions, a biography of Senator George William Norris, and a history of the Pacific Northwest. In 1939, he became the Pacific Northwest correspondent for the New York Times. The following year, he won election as a Democrat to the Oregon house of representatives. He resigned his seat to join the army in 1942. Commissioned a lieutenant, his service included time on the staff of the general assigned to construct the Alaska Highway and an assignment as military adviser to the U.S. delegation at the San Francisco Conference in 1945. After the war, Neuberger returned to journalism, but he almost immediately reentered politics. In 1946, he ran unsuccessfully for the state senate. Two years later, he won the seat. When his wife, Maurine, was elected to the state house of representatives in 1950, the Neuberger family became the first married couple to serve in a state legislature at the same time.

In 1954, Neuberger ran for the U.S. Senate against the incumbent, Guy Cordon, (R-Oreg.); an advocate of the transfer of offshore oil reserves to the states. Neuberger attacked Cordon as an opponent of conservation and, with the aid of ADLAI STEVENSON and WAYNE MORSE (I-Oreg.), Neuberger won a narrow victory. Neuberger’s stunning upset helped the Democrats regain control of the Senate.

In the Senate, Neuberger backed housing legislation, conservation measures, government financing of federal election campaigns, rigid price supports for farmers, and statehood for Alaska. With respect to local and regional interests, he strongly advocated preservation of the Klamath Basin and the Oregon Dunes. He also supported the Hell’s Canyon Dam. In 1957, the liberal Americans for Democratic Action gave him a 100 percent rating, as did the AFL-CIO’s Committee on Political Education the following year. Neuberger joined Morse in criticizing Eisenhower’s economic policies. Unlike Morse, however, he got along with the Democratic leadership in the Senate. As Neuberger received increasingly favorable attention from the press, his relations with Morse deteriorated and eventually became a noted political feud.

A strong supporter of civil rights for African Americans, Neuberger was one of six Democratic senators who announced in 1956 that they would attempt to abolish Senate Rule 22, which required a two-thirds vote of the membership to cut off debate, in order to facilitate the passage of civil rights legislation. Contained in the six-point "Democratic Declaration of 1957," this proposal also called on Congress to guarantee black voting and educational rights. The majority leader in the Senate, LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), opposed the motion to amend Rule 22, and it was tabled in January 1957. Neuberger supported another unsuccessful attempt to change the rule in 1959.

Neuberger aggressively backed the Civil Rights Act of 1957 and resisted attempts to weaken the proposal. In July, he unsuccessfully opposed a motion to delete Title III, which granted the federal government authority to enter civil suits to further desegregation. The following month, he again unsuccessfully fought a southern attempt to weaken the bill by guaranteeing a jury trial to people charged with criminal contempt. Neuberger chided Eisenhower for what the senator alleged was the president's lukewarm support of the proposal. He declared that the president was responsible for its fate, and charged that his apathy had "made infinitely more difficult the task of those" who favored "meaningful and effective civil rights legislation." The senator from Oregon remained silent about the role of Johnson, who crafted the agreement to eliminate Title III and add the jury trial amendment to Title IV.

Neuberger vigorously supported increased public housing and voted in August 1959 for a bill that would have promoted urban renewal and provided 37,000 new units of housing as well as loans and grants to aid homeowners, the elderly, colleges, and hospitals. That September he joined an unsuccessful attempt to overturn Eisenhower's veto of the proposal. Neuberger also voted to override the president's veto of a billion-dollar public works bill that month. In that case, the Senate successfully overrode the veto.

Diagnosed with cancer in 1958, Neuberger underwent radiation therapy, which seemed to be proceeding successfully, and he was planning to run for a second term in 1960 when he died unexpectedly of a cerebral hemorrhage in Portland on March 9, 1960. The governor of Oregon appointed H. S. Lusk, a justice of the state supreme court, to complete Neuberger's term. In November 1960, however, Neuberger's widow, Maurine Brown Neuberger, won election to her husband's seat in the Senate.

—MSM

Newsom, Herschel D(avis)

(1905–1970) master, the National Grange

Born in Bartholomew County, Indiana, on May 1, 1905, Herschel Newsom grew up on his family's farm. He graduated from Indiana University in 1926 with a B.A. in chemistry and then, like his Quaker forebears, became a farmer. A member of the Grange, an agrarian social and self-help organization, since his days as a schoolboy, Newsom became especially active in the organization in the 1930s. He was chosen master of the Columbus Subordinate Grange of Bartholomew County in 1933 and was elected master of the Indiana State Grange in 1937, an office which his father had once held and which Newsom retained for 13 years. He joined the National Grange's executive committee in 1946 and became its chairman in 1949. In November of the following year, he was elected master of the National Grange.

The election of Newsom reflected increasingly conservative trends in the national farm organization. Newsom claimed that he was elected because he opposed "excessive governmental control of farm production in our daily lives." The Grange, which claimed to be the oldest farm organization in the world (founded in 1867), was politically on the middle ground between the two other large U.S. farm groups, the conservative American Farm Bureau Foundation (AFBF) and the liberal National Farmers Union (NFU). Especially strong in New England, Ohio, and the Northwest, the Grange, or "Patrons of Husbandry," had over 850,000 dues-paying members, which made it larger than the NFU, but smaller than the AFBF.

Under Newsom's leadership, the Grange tended to take a conservative position on farm issues during the early years of the Eisenhower administration. Newsom applauded Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON's farm program, including his plans to return American agriculture to the free market system and solve the problems of overproduction and declining farm income by reducing acreage controls, price supports, and direct subsidies. Newsom, however, believed that immediate abolition of process supports would be ruinous for American farmers, who had, under the administration of HARRY S. TRUMAN, enjoyed 90 percent of parity price supports for basic crops. Speaking before the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee in March 1954, he recommended gradual cuts. Newsom also backed Benson's efforts to expand sales of U.S. farm products abroad, suggesting that they be integrated with a two-price system for wheat and cotton. Under a two-price system, higher prices would be maintained for farm products in the United States, while prices would be lowered on the international market, so that American farmers could successfully compete with foreign producers. In February 1955, as farm income continued the steady decline begun at the end of the Korean War, Newsom spoke out strongly against a measure to restore 90 percent of parity price supports.

Gradually, however, Newsom and the Grange, representing many small farmers, became dissatisfied with the administration, which, they argued, favored the interests of large growers. By 1956, Newsom's disenchantment seemed complete. In November, he rejected the choice between 100 percent of parity price supports advocated by the NFU and most Democrats and the flexible support price program of Secretary Benson. Rather, Newsom wanted an individual commodity-by-commodity approach to price supports and dual parity that guaranteed farmers high prices on food for domestic consumption but unsupported market prices on exports. In addition, Newsom and the Grange called for the creation of a bipartisan commission to study and recommend equitable revisions in the federal tax structure. Newsom opposed tax cuts that would require deficit financing. If tax cuts were possible, however, he argued that they should be given to the lower income brackets. He also advocated the repeal of excise taxes on farm equipment not used on highways and suggested that the government use farm surpluses, not dollars, in foreign economic aid programs. In opposition to the administration, Newsom supported congressional efforts in 1958 to prevent the reduction in price support levels for a number of commodities. In June 1959, Newsom said that Congress had the responsibility to develop a workable farm program, whether or not the president would sign it. Referring to a compromise farm bill, he attacked Eisenhower, saying that "we may eventually have a President who will sign it."

Finally, in a speech before the annual national meeting of the Grange in November 1959, Newsom reversed his position on price supports by asserting that to attempt to remove the government from agriculture or any other area of the economy "is worst than sheer folly . . . it is tantamount to economic disaster." He went on to say that "the nation can afford neither a continuation of the present system of price supports and subsidies nor a return to full free competition for agriculture." He opposed price fixing but argued that government measures should ensure a certain level of farm income, just as they helped determine industrial prices and the wages of labor.

During the Kennedy and Johnson years, Newsom worked closely with Secretary of Agriculture ORVILLE FREEMAN to win adoption of the two-price wheat support plan the Grange had advocated for many years. In 1968, Newsom left the Grange to become U.S. tariff commissioner. He died in Washington, D.C., on July 2, 1970, after suffering a heart attack.

—MSM

Niebuhr, Reinhold (1892–1971) theologian

The son of a German immigrant minister, Niebuhr was born in Wright City, Missouri, on June 21, 1892. He grew up in Missouri and Illinois and was educated at Elmhurst College near St. Louis and Eden Theological Seminary in Missouri, from which he received a bachelor of divinity in 1913. That same year, he was ordained a minister. When his father died in the spring of 1913, Niebuhr served as interim pastor for his father's congregation before departing that fall to attend Yale Divinity School, where he received a second bachelor of divinity in 1914 and an M.A. in 1915. Upon completing his M.A., Niebuhr became a minister of the Bethel Evangelical Church in Detroit, where he was active in labor, pacifist, and socialist movements. When America entered World War I, Niebuhr sought to Americanize his largely German congregation. After the war, Niebuhr became a well-known voice for liberal Protestantism. He could command a pulpit like few of his day. His sermons awed listeners with their energy and erudition. A supporter of the Social Gospel, Niebuhr constantly drew on the book of Amos and urged that justice “run down as waters and righteousness as a mighty stream.” Beginning in 1922, Niebuhr was a regular contributor to the Christian Century, a leading organ of liberal Protestantism. He advocated the creation of a labor party and urged liberal Protestants to side with labor in its struggle with capital. In the mid-1920s, Niebuhr moved toward socialism.

In 1929, he became an associate professor of ethics at Union Theological Seminary in New York and an editor of the socialist publication, World Tomorrow. Niebuhr ran as a socialist candidate for the state senate from Manhattan’s Upper West Side in 1930 but made a very poor showing. He ran for Congress from the same district in 1932 and received less than 5 percent of the vote. Although Niebuhr remained a socialist for the rest of the decade, he concluded that voters had rejected socialism, and he withdrew from active participation in party affairs.

Throughout the 1930s, Niebuhr engaged in an extensive reexamination of his ethical and political beliefs. This ultimately led him to reject socialism on religious grounds. He concluded that it was a form of idolatry to believe that human beings could conceive and bring about God’s kingdom on earth. Niebuhr first broke with many of his liberal and socialist colleagues in 1932 with the publication of Moral Man and Immoral Society. In it, he rejected the liberal Protestant goal of bringing about a community of “perpetual peace and brotherhood” on Earth. Niebuhr conceded that individuals might sometimes behave in a moral and altruistic manner, but he nonetheless insisted that social groups, especially those as large as nations, operated only according to their particular interests. This “realistic” perspective led him to abandon pacifism as irrelevant to contemporary problems.

One result of his philosophical reassessment was that, during the 1930s, Niebuhr turned his energies to religious, rather than secular, organizations. He also devoted himself more to the study of theology. Critics, including his own brother, H. Richard Niebuhr, a professor of ethics at Yale Divinity School and an important neoorthodox theologian, faulted Moral Man and Immoral Society for its vision of unending social conflict and its lack of any message of hope. In his theological explorations, Reinhold Niebuhr was influenced by Paul Tillich, a German theologian who joined Union Seminary in 1933. Tillich focused on the idea of myth and used it to argue that, contrary to liberal Christianity, Christianity was more than an ethical imperative. Niebuhr’s An Interpretation of Christian Ethics (1935) revealed the influence of Tillich in its analysis of two important Christian “myths,” the Creation and the Fall. Christianity’s ethical force, Niebuhr wrote, derived from belief in a Creator who loved people but judged them and from the belief that humans were responsible for their own sins. The same year he published An Interpretation of Christian Ethics, he became William E. Dodge, Jr., Professor of Applied Christianity, a chair he held until 1955.

As the 1930s drew to a close, Niebuhr’s theology was also influenced by the threat of European fascism. He was among the first radical American Christians to argue that class struggle had to yield to a “united front” against fascism. At the Oxford Conference on Church, Community, and State in 1937, he argued that the international crisis resulted not only from economic conditions but from human nature. Liberals and communists, he maintained, were equally deluded. Communists thought that changing the economic system would bring social harmony; liberals thought that human beings were essentially good and needed only the proper education to construct a good society. Christians, said Niebuhr, knew better; the doctrine of original sin, which humanists rejected, taught the imperfect nature of human beings and the imperfectability of any society they would produce. Moreover, he argued, experience demonstrated that truth on a daily basis. That same year, Niebuhr published Beyond Tragedy.

In 1939, with Europe at war, Niebuhr delivered the Gifford Lectures at the University of Edinburgh. The publication of those lectures in two volumes as The Nature and Destiny of Man (1941, 1943) established him as a major theologian and an important force in American culture. Niebuhr's most significant theological contribution was to revive the doctrine of original sin. Humans, he taught, had the freedom and creativity to do good works, but this led them to overestimate themselves. They came to think of themselves as creators of their own destinies, saw in themselves limitless potential, and strove to create perfection.

Niebuhr broke with the Socialist Party in 1940 because of its noninterventionism. Niebuhr favored American aid to the Allies because he regarded the Nazis as a threat to Western civilization. He played a leading role in founding the Union for Democratic Action (UDA) in 1941 and served as its chair. Noncommunist, pro-labor, and aggressively antifascist, UDA included in its membership a substantial number of former socialists who rejected the party's isolationism. Also in 1941, Niebuhr founded Christianity and Crisis, a biweekly paper dedicated to the proposition that "the halting of totalitarian aggression is a prerequisite to world peace and order" and designed to combat the influence of Christian Century, a pacifist organ. After the United States entered the war, Niebuhr vigorously supported the war effort. The Office of War Information sent him to England to give talks to American troops and to the British public. Niebuhr was also one of the few American intellectuals to call attention to the plight of Europe's Jews.

Niebuhr applied the theological insights of the Nature and Destiny of Man to political theory in The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness (1944). In it, he argued that the Children of Darkness (fascists), driven by the will to power, led to totalitarianism. Similarly, however, the foolish Children of Light (communists), driven by a utopian zeal, led to totalitarianism, as well. Indeed, the two extremes were guilty of the same sin, the original sin of intellectual pride. They ignored the imperfect nature of human beings and were willing to destroy freedom and anyone who got in their way in order to create their vision of a perfect society. Hope lay in the Children of Light who recognized the inherently imperfect nature of humans and applied that insight to political theory. Embracing democracy, a system he once believed needed to be replaced through class struggle, Niebuhr wrote: "Man's capacity for justice makes democracy possible, but man's inclination to injustice makes democracy necessary." Hope rested in what ARTHUR SCHLESINGER, JR., later called the "vital center."

Neoorthodoxy, with its emphasis on original sin, struck a chord with the American public in the years after World War II. Liberal Christianity offered no explanation for Hitler, the concentration camps, or Stalin. Neoorthodoxy did. The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness provided an ideological, not to mention theological, basis for emerging cold war liberalism, which supported a strong anticommunist foreign policy and New Deal liberalism at home. Niebuhr became involved in the founding of the Liberal Party of New York and served as its vice chairman. He was also a founder of the Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) and served on its board. The ADA became the leading organization of cold war liberals.

During the 1950s, Niebuhr emerged as one of the major intellectual spokesmen for anticommunist liberalism. Such prominent liberals as Schlesinger and Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY (D-Minn.) regarded Niebuhr as the father of "realistic liberalism." GEORGE F. KENNAN, the architect of the policy of containment, called him "the father of us all."

In The Irony of American History (1952), Niebuhr once again wrote in defense of pragmatic democracy. He pointed out ironic similarities between the United States and its adversary in the cold war, the Soviet Union. Both nations had origins in the confidence of humans to master their own destiny and to create an ideal society. Approaching the American experience as ironic, he maintained that American dreams had repeatedly been forced to yield in the face of "recalcitrant forces" that "have a power and persistence beyond our reckoning"; nevertheless, Americans were responsible for their own fate. Therefore, Niebuhr contended that people should commit themselves to political action, despite the virtual inevitability that it would fall short of complete success. In the process, he cautioned, people should guard against inflated and unrealistic hopes.

Throughout the 1950s, Niebuhr remained a powerful force in debates over domestic affairs. A stroke in 1952 left one arm partly paralyzed and made it difficult for him to speak. He traveled less but continued to write extensively on politics and religion. Niebuhr attacked Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) for undermining anticommunism with his reckless and irresponsible accusations. Throughout the Eisenhower administration, Niebuhr continued to campaign for social welfare programs. He was an outspoken supporter of the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), but, consistent with his pessimistic view of human nature, he expressed little hope for an easy resolution of racial problems in the United States. For his part, Niebuhr directed his personal attention almost exclusively to combating segregation within the church.

The rise of evangelicalism caused Niebuhr considerable concern. In an article that appeared in Life magazine in July 1957, he attacked BILLY GRAHAM and the wave of revivalism then sweeping the country. Niebuhr believed that Graham's emphasis on personal conversion and spiritual rebirth evaded the problem of social injustice. Indeed, Graham's "wholly individualistic" conception of sin was "almost completely irrelevant" to the collective problems faced by American society, such as racial prejudice and economic injustice.

In foreign policy, Niebuhr's realism resulted in an emphasis on America's need to live up to its responsibilities as leader of the free world. He held that nations were fundamentally immoral entities that could not be expected to cooperate with one another but, instead, were constantly involved in conflict. Niebuhr, therefore, insisted that foreign policy be based on maintaining a balance of power and that the United States had to serve as the primary counterweight to the totalitarian communist nations. International organizations such as the United Nations played little role in his thought, because they were not based on the realities of power politics. Thus, when the United States turned to the United Nations for a resolution of the Suez Crisis in 1956, he complained that President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER was guilty of both collaborating with the USSR against the interest of American allies and of compounding the error by pretending that the United Nations constituted a legitimate international authority. Niebuhr consistently advocated a strong American position in foreign affairs, particularly in Europe, which he considered the most important arena of international conflict. He warned consistently against committing American military forces in Asia, primarily because he worried that it might prompt Soviet aggression in Europe.

In 1955, Niebuhr became Charles A. Briggs Graduate Professor of Ethics and Theology. He also served as vice president of Union Theological Seminary after 1955.

By 1959, when he published The Structure of Nations and Empires, Niebuhr had somewhat softened his position on the cold war. He conceded that the Soviet Union had moved away from the absolute despotism of the Stalin era, and he hoped that change would ultimately serve to ease international tensions. He even discerned a ray of hope in the "ultimate irony" of the contemporary situation: security could be established "under the umbrella of an atomic stalemate."

Niebuhr retired in 1960 but continued his role as social, religious, and political commentator until his health declined in the mid-1960s. Although he had supported LYNDON B. JOHNSON for the presidency in 1964, Niebuhr became an outspoken critic of the war in Vietnam after the escalation of American involvement in 1965. He died in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, on June 1, 1971.

—MSM

Nixon, Richard M(ilhous)

(1913–1994) 37th president of the United States

Born in Yorba Linda, California, on January 9, 1913, to a Quaker family of modest means, Richard Nixon was the second of five sons. His father, Frank Nixon, owned a lemon grove in Yorba Linda. When the grove failed in 1922, he moved his family to nearby Whittier, California, where he opened a gasoline station and general store. Beginning at the age of 10 or 11, Richard Nixon worked in his father's store and as a part-time farm laborer.

An extremely diligent and studious young man, Nixon was student body president and an outstanding debater at both Whittier High School and Whittier College. In 1934, he received his B.A., graduating second in his college class. Nixon received a scholarship to attend Duke University Law School, where he earned his LL.B. in 1937 and ranked third in his class. He explored getting a job with a prestigious law firm in New York City, but only one showed any interest in him. After an unsuccessful attempt to get a job with the FBI, Nixon returned to Whittier to practice law with the firm of Wingert & Bewley.

A month after the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor, Nixon went to Washington and began working for the tire-rationing section of the Office of Price Administration (OPA). He later stated that, although he had been a liberal in law school, his experience with the inefficient bureaucracy at the OPA made him more conservative. In August 1942, Nixon resigned from the OPA and enlisted in the navy. He was assigned to the Combat Air Transport Command in the South Pacific as a lieutenant, junior grade. Nixon returned to the United States in August 1944 for a series of postings. At the end of the war, he was assigned to Baltimore, where he negotiated the termination of defense contracts.

Before Nixon was mustered out of the service in January 1946, a group of prominent Republicans in Whittier and its vicinity asked him to run for Congress against the liberal Democratic incumbent, Rep. Jerry Voorhis. Elected with the Roosevelt landslide of 1936, Voorhis had enthusiastically embraced the New Deal's social legislation and, indeed, wished to extend it further. With the end of the depression, the electorate had moved more toward the center, and Voorhis, who had entered politics with Upton Sinclair's End Poverty in California campaign, remained at the left of the spectrum of American politics. Nixon won the Republican primary and then waged an energetic and aggressive campaign against Voorhis. He linked the incumbent to the Congress of Industrial Organizations's (CIO) political action committee (PAC). He charged that it was communist-dominated and that Voorhis had voted for almost all measures supported by the CIO-PAC. Voorhis responded clumsily and attempted to hide the fact that he had received endorsements from several local CIO-PACs. Nixon was particularly effective in a series of five debates with his opponent. Dissatisfaction with the process of economic reconversion after the war made 1946 a Republican year; the party won control of both houses of Congress. Nixon defeated Voorhis, garnering roughly 66,000 votes to his opponent's 50,000.

President Eisenhower and Vice President Richard Nixon, August 21, 1954 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

In Congress, Nixon was assigned to the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) and the Education and Labor Committee. On the former panel, he played a key role in pressing the investigation of Alger Hiss, whom WHITTAKER CHAMBERS accused of having been a Soviet spy while serving in the State Department during the 1930s. As head of a special subcommittee, Nixon doggedly pursued Chambers's allegations. He arranged for a meeting between Hiss and Chambers before HUAC in August 1948. That confrontation, at which Hiss denied having known Chambers or having passed documents to him, led to Hiss's conviction for perjury in 1950. The Hiss case brought Nixon to national attention, but it also made him, as he wrote in his memoirs, "one of the most controversial figures in Washington." In 1948, Nixon also cosponsored the Nixon-Mundt bill to require the registration of communist political organizations and their members and communist-front groups and their officers. The measure did not pass, but portions of it were incorporated into the Internal Security Act of 1950.

Although conservative on many domestic issues, Nixon advocated raising the amount of money a retiree could earn and still receive benefits from Social Security. He also voted for federal support for housing and federal aid to education. In foreign affairs, he was an internationalist. In 1947, he supported President HARRY S. TRUMAN's program of aid to Greece and Turkey. During the same year, he served on a 19-member select panel, popularly known as the Herter Committee, that went on a fact-finding mission to Europe. He joined his colleagues on the panel in strongly endorsing the Marshall Plan.

Under California's cross-filing system, Nixon won both the Republican and Democratic congressional primaries in 1948. Two years later, he ran for a seat in the Senate vacated by Sheridan Downey (D-Calif.), who chose to retire when confronted with serious opposition in the Democratic primary. Unopposed in the Republican primary, Nixon faced in the general election Rep. Helen Gahagan Douglas (D-Calif.), who had emerged as the winner in a bitter Democratic primary race, during which her opponent, Ralph M. Boddy, accused her of left-wing sympathies and branded her the "pink lady." The contest between Nixon and Douglas was a vicious one. Repeating the strategy he had employed in 1946 and echoing Boddy's charges, Nixon alleged that "my opponent is a member of a small clique which joins the notorious Communist party-liner [Representative] Vito Marcantonio in voting time after time against measures that are for the security of this country." Nixon's campaign organization distributed a pink-colored flyer that linked the voting records of Douglas and Marcantonio. Douglas responded by calling Nixon "Tricky Dick" and describing her opponent and his supporters as "a backwash of young men in dark shirts," clearly implying that they were fascists. Nixon won the election with almost 2.2 million votes to Douglas's 1.5 million.

His election to the Senate marked Nixon's emergence as a significant, if highly divisive, political figure. His success in linking the Democratic Party and the Truman administration with subversive influences enraged liberal Democrats and many intellectuals. They regarded him as a notorious smear artist and opportunist who would employ any means to win elections. Republicans, on the other hand, regarded Nixon as a rising star who had played a key role in pushing one of the party's major issues. As a freshman senator, Nixon quickly became one of the most sought-after Republican speakers in the country. In the Senate, he attacked Truman's handling of the Korean War, criticized the corruption of the Truman administration, and demanded the removal of communists and communist sympathizers from government.

Even before DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER got the Republican presidential nomination in 1952, two of his top political advisers, THOMAS E. DEWEY, the governor of New York, and HERBERT BROWNELL, began seriously to consider Nixon as a running mate for the general. As a California delegate to the Chicago National Republican Convention in July, Nixon was committed to his state's favorite son, GOVERNOR EARL WARREN. Between the two leading contenders for the nomination, however, Nixon favored Eisenhower over Senator ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio), largely because he believed Eisenhower had a better chance to win. Warren's supporters charged that Nixon was surreptitiously aiding Eisenhower's candidacy to assure himself the second spot on the ticket. Nixon publicly restated his commitment to Warren and declared him to be the strongest of the dark horse candidates. Moreover, as a member of California's delegation, he was bound by law to vote for Warren on the first ballot. A few hours after Eisenhower won the nomination, Brownell informed Nixon that he would be the vice presidential nominee. Eisenhower's advisers thought that the selection of Nixon would help mollify conservative supporters of Taft. They also believed that Nixon's youth and his identification with the issue of subversive influence in Washington would aid the ticket. Finally, Nixon provided geographical balance.

On September 18, just after Nixon had begun his ambitious national campaign, the New York Post, a Democratic and sensationalist tabloid, ran a screaming headline over a story asserting that a group of wealthy businessmen had established a "secret fund" of somewhat over $18,000 for the candidate's personal use. The article referred to a fund created by some of Nixon's supporters in California after Nixon's election to the Senate in 1950. Nixon responded that the money was used only to help pay the expenses involved in his extensive speaking tours. He dismissed the charges as "another typical smear by the same left wing elements which have fought me ever since I took part in the investigation of . . . Alger Hiss." When STEPHEN A. MITCH-ELL, chair of the Democratic National Committee, demanded Nixon's resignation, Nixon snapped that Mitchell should ask for the resignation of the Democrats' vice-presidential nominee, Senator JOHN SPARKMAN (D-Ala.), whose wife was on his Senate payroll. However, Eisenhower was running a campaign against corruption in Washington, and a number of Republican newspapers immediately called for Nixon's withdrawal from the ticket. The majority of Eisenhower's top advisers believed that Nixon should resign. Eisenhower responded more calmly and cautiously. He issued a public statement in which he declared that he believed "Dick Nixon to be an honest man" and expressed his confidence that Nixon would "place all the facts before the American people." On September 20, however, Eisenhower told reporters in an informal press conference that Nixon would have to prove himself "clean as a hound's tooth."

Eisenhower's chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS, arranged for a thorough examination of the fund by a leading law firm in Los Angeles, Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher, and the accounting house of Price Waterhouse. The report revealed that the fund was not a secret, that it had been used exclusively for political purposes, and that it had violated no law. Moreover, the day Price Waterhouse delivered its report, the story broke that the Democratic nominee, ADLAI STEVENSON, had a similar fund.

To clear his name and retain his place on the ticket, Nixon made a half-hour televised speech on September 23. He denied that he used the fund for personal expenses and that any of the contributors had received special favors from him. After giving what he called a "complete" account of his financial holdings, Nixon observed: "It isn't very much, but Pat and I have the satisfaction that every dime we've got is honestly ours." He said that his wife, Pat, to whom the camera cut when references were made to her, did not own a mink coat but only a "respectable Republican cloth coat." (This was a reference to a mink coat that had been given by an attorney for a firm that received a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation [RFC] to an examiner for the RFC whose wife was a stenographer in the White House. The mink coat became a symbol of corruption of the Truman administration.) Having made full financial disclosure, Nixon called on Stevenson and Sparkman to do the same. Nixon did admit to having received a gift from a supporter in Texas; it was a cocker spaniel, and his daughters loved it. The older of his two daughters, Tricia, had named it Checkers, and, he continued, "regardless of what they say about it, we're going to keep it." The address subsequently came to be known as the Checkers speech. At the end of the speech, Nixon urged viewers to let the Republican National Committee know whether they thought he should stay on the ticket.

Although a highly combative politician, Nixon sometimes gave way to despair following an intense effort to overcome adversity. Immediately after the broadcast, he believed that the speech had been a failure because he had gone over his allotted half-hour and had been cut off the air. Moreover, he had urged the audience to contact the Republican National Committee but had forgotten to tell them where to "wire and write." When Eisenhower indicated that he needed more time to make up his mind concerning his running mate's status, Nixon dictated a telegram of resignation to ARTHUR SUMMERFIELD, chairman of the Republican National Committee. MURRAY CHOTINER, Nixon's campaign manager, destroyed the message. As it turned out, public reaction to the speech was overwhelmingly favorable. On the evening of September 24, Eisenhower met Nixon at the airport in Wheeling, West Virginia, and told him, "You're my boy."

Resuming his campaign, Nixon charged that the Democrats had been soft on communism and had permitted subversive influences to penetrate the national government. To demonstrate his own experience in dealing with subversives, Nixon, in a nationally televised campaign address on October 13, described his role in the Hiss affair. In the same speech, he created a political stir by criticizing Stevenson for having attested to Hiss's good character at the latter's trial.

Eisenhower and Nixon won in a landslide that November, and Nixon became an unusually active and visible vice president. He traveled extensively, visiting the Far East in 1953, Central America in 1955, Africa and Rome in 1957, South America in 1958, and the Soviet Union in 1959. He also served on the National Security Council. Eisenhower established a precedent by assigning Nixon to preside over meetings of the cabinet and National Security Council in the president's absence.

Nixon's most important role in the administration, particularly in the early years of the Eisenhower presidency, was as a congressional liaison and political adviser. He also served as a liaison to the Republican right and, in particular, to Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.). Nixon urged Eisenhower to avoid directly attacking McCarthy. The vice president argued that a break between the president and the senator from Wisconsin could split the Republican Party and open the administration to charges of being soft on communism. In March 1953, after McCarthy had made personal efforts to stop Greek ship operators from trading with communist China, HAROLD STASSEN, chief of the Mutual Security Administration, denounced the senator for "undermining" President Eisenhower's foreign policy. Nixon, who believed that the public approved of McCarthy's efforts, arranged a conference between the senator and Stassen's superior, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES. Dulles issued a statement praising McCarthy for acting in the national interest, and McCarthy promised to coordinate his actions with the State Department. In May 1953, McCarthy wrote a letter to the president asking why the administration was not attempting to end Western trade with communist countries. Nixon persuaded him to recall the letter. However, when McCarthy's attacks on the army made reconciliation impossible, Nixon abandoned his role as mediator. Speaking on behalf of the administration in a televised broadcast on March 13, 1954, he asserted that "men who have in the past done effective work exposing Communism in this country have, by reckless talk and questionable methods, made themselves the issue, rather than the cause they believe in so deeply."

In the congressional elections of 1954, Nixon campaigned extensively on behalf of Republican candidates. He charged that "the candidates running on the Democratic ticket in the key states are almost without exception members of the Democratic Party's left-wing clique which has been so blind to the Communist conspiracy and has tolerated it in the United States." Nixon warned that if the Democrats regained control of Congress, President Eisenhower's firm stand against communism would be jeopardized. To demonstrate Eisenhower's effectiveness in dealing with subversives, he claimed that thousands of security risks had been dismissed or had resigned from the federal government under the president's loyalty-security program. Nixon's attacks on Democrats were so heated that in June Eisenhower called him in and told him to tone it down. That fall, Nixon campaigned tirelessly, repeatedly attacking Democratic candidates, but the Democrats captured both houses of Congress.

Nixon's Checkers speech, his position on McCarthy, and his activities in the campaigns of 1952 and 1954 convinced his opponents more strongly than ever that he was an unscrupulous politician. Beginning in 1955, however, his image began to soften, even in the eyes of some of his staunchest foes, and there was talk of a new Nixon. The process began with President Eisenhower's heart attack on September 24, 1955. During the subsequent weeks of Eisenhower's hospitalization, Nixon maintained a low profile, played down the significance of his role, and avoided any appearance of attempting to use the circumstances for political gain. He presided over meetings of the cabinet and National Security Council from his own chair rather than the president's. In the White House, he used a conference room rather than the president's office. Nixon's restraint enhanced his prestige both within the administration and in the country at large.

Even as his standing with the public rose, Nixon considered leaving politics. In 1954, he had carried an extraordinarily heavy burden during the campaign and was a frequent target for Democratic attacks. The combination wore on him, and Nixon decided not to run again in 1956. In reality, leaving politics was never really an option for Nixon, and Eisenhower's heart attack in 1955 placed the vice presidency in a new light. Moreover, any shift to a different political office, such as running for the Senate or entering the cabinet, looked like a step down, so Nixon decided that he would run for reelection in 1956. Eisenhower, however, suggested to Nixon that it might be better for him to take a cabinet post. After a period of indecision, which proved agonizing to Nixon, the president announced in April that he wanted his vice president to remain on the ticket. Eisenhower's reluctance derived from his complicated relationship with Nixon and some concerns that Nixon might cost the ticket votes. His advisers, however, convinced the president that Nixon was important in maintaining support from the right wing of the Republican Party.

Nixon's campaign for reelection in 1956 contributed to his new image. During that campaign, Nixon largely abandoned his customary electoral strategy of attack and concentrated on defending the record of the Eisenhower administration. He told the public that the president had extricated the country from the Korean War without abandoning principle. Nixon also pointed to the healthy state of the economy and gainsaid the arguments that Republican policies led to economic depression and that the Democrats were the party of the working and poor people. Eisenhower still used him to answer Stevenson, who was again the Democratic nominee and who resorted to some shrill and personal attacks, but this time Nixon did so deftly and without going after Stevenson personally or challenging his patriotism. Eisenhower and Nixon won in a landslide.

During Eisenhower's second term, Nixon's foreign travels added significantly to his political standing. Even before the second term officially began, Eisenhower sent him to Austria in December 1956 to draw public attention to the Soviet Union's brutal repression of Hungary and the plight of Hungarian refugees. The leftist violence that plagued Nixon's tour of South America in May 1958 served to enhance Nixon's stature. In Lima, Peru, Nixon faced down a stone-throwing crowd at San Marcos University. In Caracas, Venezuela, a raging mob smashed the windows of his automobile, and troops arrived just in time to prevent him from being dragged from the car and killed. His courage and calmness in the face of great physical danger earned him considerable respect.

In July 1959, Nixon went to Moscow to open the American National Exhibition at Sokolniki Park. He was the highest-ranking American official to visit the Soviet Union since Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev's rise to power. On the day after his arrival, Nixon and Khrushchev engaged in a heated exchange, which continued as they visited the American Exhibition, where they debated the respective merits of capitalism and communism. Part of the discussion took place in the model kitchen of the exhibition, and the argument became known as the kitchen debate. Nixon's refusal to back down from the blustering Soviet premier and his spirited, effective defense of the United States burnished his reputation at home.

From the earliest days of Eisenhower's presidency, Nixon had been one of the strongest advocates of civil rights within the administration. As chairman of the President's Committee on Government Contracts, Nixon assumed an important role in the administration's efforts to eliminate discrimination practiced by contractors with the federal government and with Washington, D.C. He also figured prominently in the attempt to eliminate segregation from the nation's capital.

During Eisenhower's second term, Nixon made an effort to disassociate himself from the Republican Right and establish himself as a moderate. His support for civil rights constituted an important part of that undertaking. When the administration's civil rights bill was before Congress in 1957, he opposed southern attempts to eliminate Title III, a provision granting the attorney general the power to enforce desegregation through federal court action. He also argued against an amendment, sponsored by southern senators, granting jury trials in criminal contempt cases arising from the measure. The bill nevertheless emerged from Congress without Title III and with the jury-trial amendment. Two years later, Eisenhower considered sending Congress a measure that would merely have extended the life of the Civil Rights Commission. Nixon, Attorney General WILLIAM ROGERS, Health, Education and Welfare Secretary ARTHUR S. FLEMMING, and Labor Secretary JAMES MITCHELL argued forcefully and successfully for a more comprehensive civil rights bill. In a related matter, Nixon lent his support to senators wishing to modify the filibuster rule. In 1957 and again in 1959, he aided their cause by making favorable procedural decisions as president of the Senate.

On a trip to Africa in 1957, Nixon met MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., the civil rights activist, and invited him to visit the vice president's office when they returned to the United States. King took him up on the offer, and he and his aide RALPH ABERNATHY had a cordial meeting with Nixon. The vice president also supported federal aid to education, even though southern members of Congress worried that the federal government would use that aid to advance desegregation by denying it to school districts that continued to segregate. In addition, Nixon supported the decision to invite a group of African-American leaders to meet with the president.

In 1958, Nixon led those within the cabinet who favored more assistance for the unemployed and for depressed areas to fight the recession. Early the following year, he fought successfully in the cabinet to keep federal aid to education on the administration's legislative agenda. In December 1959 and January 1960, Nixon also established a reputation as a conciliator by helping to settle a steel strike that lasted 116 days.

In the second half of the 1950s, Nixon emerged as one of the strongest advocates within the administration of foreign economic aid, including to neutralist nations. He argued that economic aid was even more important than military assistance. In 1957, Eisenhower assigned him to help draw up mutual assistance, technical, and direct aid programs.

Nixon's support for foreign economic aid was a component of his approach to containment. Throughout Eisenhower's presidency, Nixon advocated a hard-line policy toward communist expansion. In 1954, he suggested, off the record, the possibility of sending troops to Indochina if the French pulled out. Four years later, he stated that, regardless of American public opinion, the administration should stand by its commitment to defend the tiny islands of Quemoy and Matsu, which were occupied by the Chinese Nationalists, against attack from Chinese Communists. Nixon's hard line, however, was not without nuance. In 1959, he met Cuban premier Fidel Castro and reported to the president that "he is either incredibly naïve about Communism or under Communist discipline." Nixon's "guess" was "the former." At the same time, the vice president acknowledged the Cuban dictator's "great gift of leadership" and suggested that it might be possible to "orient him in the right direction." Apparently, Nixon soon abandoned that idea. In his book, Six Crises, however, Nixon claimed that, after his meeting with Castro, he urged the arming and training of Cuban exiles in the United States and Latin American countries.

While suspicion of Nixon among Democrats and intellectuals became somewhat muted during the late 1950s, it did not disappear. Their long-held distrust surfaced when Eisenhower suffered a stroke in November 1957 that substantially incapacitated him for two weeks. In January 1958, Eisenhower drafted a letter to Nixon indicating that if the president became incapacitated and was aware of it, he would inform Nixon, and the vice president would assume the duties of the presidency. If, however, the president were so disabled as to be unaware of his incapacity, Nixon would “decide upon the devolution” of presidential powers and serve as acting president until the incapacity had ended. Questions over the constitutionality of this arrangement in part reflected anxiety over the possibility of Nixon’s becoming chief executive. The vice president’s characterization of Democrats as “radicals” in the 1958 congressional elections revived the suspicion among his traditional opponents that the new Nixon image was nothing more than a façade.

Immediately after the elections of 1958, Nixon gave his political backers permission to begin organizing a campaign for the Republican presidential nomination in 1960. The only significant obstacle was NELSON ROCKEFELLER, who had been elected governor of New York that year and emerged as the leader of the eastern, or liberal, wing of the party. However, Nixon, having assiduously campaigned for Republican candidates across the country since the early 1950s, was the solid favorite of state and local party leaders. Moreover, Nixon was a logical compromise for a divided party. He began his career identified with the conservative wing of the party but had served for eight years as vice president in an administration identified with the eastern wing. After testing the waters, Rockefeller announced in December 1959 that he would not seek the nomination.

To win the general election, Nixon needed the full support of Rockefeller and the party’s liberal wing. In July 1960, Rockefeller and Nixon met at the former’s Fifth Avenue apartment in New York City. The governor used his influence to secure changes in the Republican platform that stressed stronger efforts in the areas of military preparedness and economic growth. Although the “Treaty of Fifth Avenue” upset many conservative Republicans and was denounced by Senator BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.) as a “Munich,” Nixon won the nomination almost unanimously on July 27. He chose HENRY CABOT LODGE as his running mate. As ambassador to the United Nations, Lodge had gained national popularity through televised debates in the UN.

Since Nixon was the candidate of the minority party, he had to win the support of considerable numbers of voters who did not identify themselves as Republicans. To gain the support of independents and Democrats, he tried to establish clear differences between himself and his opponent, Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). Nixon stressed his belief in the free enterprise system and criticized Kennedy for allegedly promising to solve all problems through federal intervention. Since, however, Nixon wanted to present himself as a middle-of-the-road figure, he did not take a clear-cut position against popular social welfare programs. In fact, he and Kennedy had few differences on domestic issues.

In the field of foreign policy, Nixon criticized Kennedy for stating that Quemoy and Matsu were strategically worthless and indefensible, but this issue aroused little interest. Meanwhile, Kennedy took the offensive on the issue of policy toward Cuba. Although the Democratic candidate knew that the Eisenhower administration was training Cuban exiles for an invasion of Cuba, he denounced the president for not supporting the exiles and advocated an intervention similar to the one being planned. Nixon, who knew and strongly approved of the invasion plans but could not acknowledge them, denounced Kennedy for urging the violation of another country’s sovereignty. Although Kennedy took a somewhat more belligerent position on the cold war than Nixon and urged a substantial increase in defense spending and, in particular, in spending on conventional forces, Nixon also wanted an increase in the defense budget and more conventional forces. With respect to foreign and defense policies, little separated the two candidates.

One of Nixon’s advantages in the election was the continuing popularity of President Eisenhower and the aging hero’s endorsement of Nixon, but the usefulness of this backing was somewhat vitiated at a presidential press conference on August 24. When asked to give an example of an important idea of Nixon's that he had adopted, Eisenhower replied, "If you give me a week, I might think of one." Despite the subsequent explanation that Eisenhower merely wanted to end the press conference and indicate that he would answer the following week, the remark raised questions about the enthusiasm of Eisenhower's support. The president's electoral inactivity during September and October further eroded the significance of Eisenhower's endorsement.

Nixon was better known to the public than Kennedy and, unlike his opponent, could claim executive experience. Both of these advantages, however, were minimized by the four nationally televised debates between Nixon and Kennedy in September and October. Nixon agreed to the debates in part because of his success in the debate against Voorhis in 1946, the effectiveness of his 1952 Checkers speech, and the favorable reaction to his debate with Khrushchev in 1959. However, the mere presence of Kennedy on the same stage presented them as equals; it enormously diminished Nixon's advantage as the sitting vice president. Further, the debates exposed Kennedy to audiences of perhaps as many as 70 million people and materially cut into Nixon's advantage in name recognition. Furthermore, Kennedy's ability more or less to hold his own in the debates weakened the argument that he was too inexperienced to be president.

The first debate, held on September 26, particularly hurt Nixon. He had lost weight during a recent period of hospitalization. As a result, the candidate appeared gaunt, and his clothes seemed oversized. Moreover, Nixon wore a gray suit, white shirt, and blue tie. The gray suit showed up on black-and-white television as gray, the white shirt reflected light and showed up as gray, and the blue tie appeared gray. Nixon blended into the backdrop. Kennedy, whose aides were more savvy about television, wore a navy suit, which showed up black, a blue shirt, which appeared white, and a red tie, which appeared black. Kennedy appeared crisper and more defined. The networks offered both candidates professional makeup artists, but both refused. Kennedy, however, knew that a suntan looked good on television and had made sure that he was tanned before the debates. Just before the first debate, his aides made him up with Max Factor's Cream Puff.

Nixon's aides tried to cover his five o'clock shadow with Shavestick, which Nixon, who sweated profusely under television lights, promptly sweated off. One reporter described Nixon as looking "like a picture on a post office bulletin board." Significantly, a majority of those who watched the debate on television gave Kennedy the edge in the debate, while a majority of those who listened to the debate on radio believed that Nixon had won. The debate became a classic example for those who argued that the visual media projected image more prominently than substance. Unfortunately for Nixon, many more people watched the debate on television than listened on the radio. Although many people believed that Nixon won the final three debates, he did not enjoy a decisive advantage, and, in any event, those debates drew smaller audiences and made substantially less impact than the first one.

Kennedy won the election with an electoral vote margin of 303 to 219. His advantage in the popular vote, though, was only 113,000 votes out of 69 million, the smallest winning percentage in history to that time. Further, there was considerable evidence of fraudulent returns in Illinois and Texas, where Kennedy won by narrow margins. Reversals of the results in those states would have given the election to Nixon, but recounts would have been time-consuming and probably would not have changed the outcome. Kennedy's running mate, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, controlled the process in Texas to the point that no challenge was likely to succeed in that state. Thus, despite considerable pressure from some Republicans to demand a recount, Nixon refused to do so.

In mid-November 1960, President-elect Kennedy offered Nixon a temporary foreign assignment, but the vice president declined. Instead, he retired to private life and joined a law firm in Los Angeles. In March 1962, he published Six Crises, an account of six difficult episodes in his life. Persuaded by friends, Nixon entered the race for governor of California in 1962. He ran a spiritless race and lost the general election by a decisive margin to the incumbent, EDMUND "PAT" BROWN. The loss was a devastating blow to a politician who had been a national political figure for well over a decade. Nixon compounded matters at a press conference on the morning after the election. He charged that reporters had been biased against him throughout his career and ranted: "You won't have Nixon to kick around anymore because, gentlemen, this is my last press conference." Many believed that the intemperate display had ended Nixon's political career. The following year, Nixon joined the New York City law firm of Mudge, Stern, Baldwin & Todd, which became Nixon, Mudge, Rose, Guthrie, Anderson & Mitchell.

Before long, however, Nixon returned to the political wars. He campaigned dutifully for the GOP's presidential candidate, Senator Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), in 1964. After Goldwater lost in a landslide to Johnson and Republicans suffered disastrous reverses in Congress, Nixon continued to work hard for the party. He campaigned vigorously for many Republican candidates during the congressional elections of 1966, in which the Republicans gained 47 seats in the House and three in the Senate. This helped Nixon win the Republican presidential nomination in 1968, and he went on to defeat narrowly Vice President HUBERT HUMPHREY and George Wallace, the governor of Alabama, who ran on a third-party ticket and made an impressive showing, in the general election.

During his first term, Nixon gradually withdrew American ground forces from South Vietnam while resuming the bombing of North Vietnam and ordering an incursion into Cambodia. At the same time, Nixon charted a new course for the policy of containment by establishing détente with the Soviet Union and an opening to mainland China. Although his was not the first administration to recognize the Sino-Soviet split, his was the first to make it a focal point of foreign policy. In February 1972, he visited China. Practicing triangular relations, he effectively played the two communist superpowers off against each other. Moreover, allowing the Soviet Union and China to contain each other enabled him to end the draft, which undermined the antiwar movement. In one of his most significant achievements, Nixon negotiated a Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty with the Soviets, which, among other things, limited the deployment of antiballistic missiles and thereby halted a new round of the arms race.

With respect to domestic policy, he proposed a massive overhaul of the welfare system with his Family Assistance Plan. His administration banned tobacco advertising on television and made substantial gains in the protection of the environment. Nixon also supported health and safety protection for workers, built more units of public housing than all previous administrations combined, and undertook a massive expansion of the food stamp program. In an effort to control inflation, Nixon resorted first to Keynesian tactics and then to wage and price controls. One of Nixon's innovations was the New Federalism, whereby the federal government distributed several billion dollars of tax receipts each year directly to the states to be spent as they wished. Partly in an effort to appeal to southern Democrats, Nixon opposed court-ordered busing as a means to achieve desegregation.

Nixon won a landslide reelection victory over Senator George McGovern (D-S. Dak.) in 1972. In early 1973, Nixon reached an agreement to end American involvement in the Vietnam War. During his second term, however, suspicion mounted that he was covering up high-level complicity in a break-in at the Democratic National Headquarters in the Watergate complex by employees of his reelection committee in June 1972. The trial of the burglars and televised hearings before the Senate select committee established to investigate the matter uncovered Nixon's participation in the cover-up that began immediately after the unsuccessful break-in. After extensive hearings, the House Judiciary Committee voted articles of impeachment in July 1974. Nixon resigned in August 1974, after a court order forced him to release tape recordings of White House conversations that conclusively proved his involvement in the cover-up from its earliest stages. His successor, GERALD R. FORD, granted him a full pardon in September 1974.

After his resignation, Nixon worked hard to rehabilitate his reputation and to establish himself as a senior statesman. He enjoyed surprising success in that regard, but the cloud of Watergate always hung over him. Following a brief exile in California, he returned to the East Coast, where he lived first in New York and then in New Jersey. He traveled extensively (visiting China five times, where he was treated like a visiting head of state). In addition to publishing a two-volume memoir in 1978, Nixon offered advice to his successors as president and wrote extensively on foreign policy.

His books on foreign policy included The Real War (1980), Leaders (1982), Real Peace, (1983), No More Vietnams (1985), and 1999 (1988). Nixon died in Park Ridge, New Jersey, on April 22, 1994. Even at his death, Nixon remained a controversial figure, so much so that the New York Times, in an obituary that ran in its Sunday late edition of April 24, 1994, blatantly misrepresented what the notorious “pink sheet” from the 1950 senatorial election actually said.

—MSM

Norstad, Lauris

(1907–1988) supreme commander, Allied forces, Europe

The son of a Lutheran minister who had emigrated from Norway, Norstad was born in Minneapolis, Minnesota, on March 24, 1907. He graduated from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in 1930 and was commissioned a second lieutenant in the cavalry. In 1931, he transferred to the army air corps. During the early 1930s, he served as commander of the 18th Pursuit Group at Schofield Barracks in Hawaii. He served with the 9th Bomb Group and graduated from the Air Corps Tactical School. When the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor, he was the assistant chief of staff for intelligence of the air force. After the United States entered the war, General Harold H. “Hap” Arnold, commanding general of the army air forces, named Norstad to his advisory council. Assigned to the Twelfth Air Force as assistant chief of staff for operations, Norstad helped plan and direct the air campaign for the invasion of North Africa in 1942. His activities brought him to the attention of General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, the Allied commander. In early 1943, Norstad was promoted to brigadier general, and, in December of that year, he became director of operations of the Mediterranean Allied Air Forces. In that capacity, he helped plan the air campaign for the invasions of Sicily and Italy in 1943. His next assignment took him to Washington, D.C., in 1944 as chief of staff of the Twentieth Air Force. There, he took part in planning B-29 raids on Japan. Norstad became assistant chief of air staff for planning in 1945 and the following year was on the War Department’s general staff.

In 1946, Eisenhower secured Norstad’s appointment as director of the Plans and Operations Division of the War Department General Staff. He was involved in the negotiations that led to the unification of the armed forces under the Defense Department in 1947. In that context, he was instrumental in establishing the air force as an independent branch of the armed services. In October 1947, he was promoted to lieutenant general and made air force vice chief of staff for air operations in charge of planning for air defense. Norstad assumed command of the U.S. Air Force in Europe in 1950 and the following year became commander of Allied air forces in central Europe. Norstad was made a full general in 1952, the youngest American to date to achieve that rank. In 1953, he was named air deputy to the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe (NATO), where he helped formulate atomic strategy and modernize the military communications system.

Norstad became Supreme Commander of Allied Forces, Europe, in November 1956. Sensitive to the growing European belief that the alliance was too dependent on U.S. military power, he advocated the strengthening of NATO forces to respond to both conventional and nuclear warfare. He warned against British troop reductions in 1957 and the following year chided NATO foreign ministers for dilatoriness in meeting troop commitments. In April 1958, he asked for a buildup of active battalions in Europe over a five-year period.

While defending the maintenance of conventional troops in Europe as a first deterrent against Russian attack, Norstad believed that land-based ballistic missiles were a necessary component of defense and an important symbol of power. In November 1958, he announced a plan to increase the number of NATO battalions equipped with short-range missiles from 30 to 100 over a five-year period. Norstad opposed a total reliance on strategic nuclear arms and advocated arming NATO forces with tactical atomic weapons. He initially defended U.S. control of the arms but by 1959 proposed that the alliance build its own nuclear force.

The general believed that a militarily strong Germany was vital for the security of western Europe. In 1958, he rejected a Polish plan to make central Europe a demilitarized zone free of nuclear weapons. He believed that such weapons were “absolutely indispensable” to NATO’s effectiveness. As a result of his efforts, the Western European Union Council granted West Germany permission to build surface-to-air and air-to-air missiles in 1959. During the Berlin crisis of 1958–59, West Germany was equipped with rockets capable of carrying atomic warheads. They were placed under Norstad’s control.

In the 1960s, Norstad often came into conflict with the administration of President JOHN F. KENNEDY. Norstad, who worked assiduously to develop closer working ties between governments in the NATO alliance, envisioned himself as a servant of the international alliance, a position that did not always sit well with the Kennedy administration. Norstad’s continued calls for a NATO nuclear force often ran counter to American policy. Moreover, he thought that Kennedy placed too much emphasis on conventional forces in a nuclear age and continued his advocacy of the importance of tactical nuclear weapons. Although Norstad was scheduled to relinquish his NATO command on November 1, 1962, the Cuban missile crisis led NATO to ask him to continue in his post. Norstad retired from NATO and from the U.S. Air Force on January 2, 1963. After leaving the air force, he became president of the international division of Owens-Corning Fiberglass. He later became chairman and chief executive officer of Owens-Corning. He also served as a member of the company’s board of directors. President RICHARD M. NIXON named Norstad to the President’s Commission on an All-Volunteer Force and to the General Advisory Committee on Arms Control and Disarmament. Norstad retired from Owens-Corning in 1972 and died in Tucson, Arizona, on September 12, 1988.

—MSM

O'Mahoney, Joseph C(hristopher)
(1884–1962) U.S. senator

One of 11 children of Irish immigrant parents, O'Mahoney was born on November 5, 1884, in Chelsea, Massachusetts. He attended Columbia University from 1905 to 1907 and worked as a newspaper reporter for the Boulder (Colorado) Herald from 1908 until 1916, when he became city editor for the Cheyenne (Wyoming) State Leader. Originally a Progressive Republican, O'Mahoney switched to the Democratic Party the year he joined the State Leader, which was owned by the Democratic governor of Wyoming. When the newspaper's owner, John B. Kendrick, became a U.S. senator in 1917, O'Mahoney went to Washington as his executive secretary. While in Washington, O'Mahoney earned an LL.B. from Georgetown University in 1920. He opened law offices in Washington and Cheyenne and served as city attorney of Cheyenne from 1929 to 1931. From 1924 to 1930, he served as vice chairman of the Democratic Party's state committee. During that time, he ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Senate in 1924 and 1928. O'Mahoney had a substantial hand in writing the Democratic Party platform in 1932 and served as the vice chairman of the national campaign later that year. When Franklin D. Roosevelt won the election, O'Mahoney was rewarded with an appointment as first assistant postmaster general in 1933. Later that year, Kendrick died, and O'Mahoney was appointed to serve the remainder of his old patron's term. In November 1934, O'Mahoney won an election to a full term. He was reelected in 1940 and 1946.

In the Senate, O'Mahoney served on several important committees, including Appropriations, Judiciary, and Interior. An implacable opponent of big business, O'Mahoney supported most of the New Deal. Along with other western progressives, however, there were limits on the extent to which he was willing to tolerate the expansion of the federal government's authority. He also balked at backing Roosevelt's court-packing plan. O'Mahoney opposed legislation abolishing the poll tax, largely because he believed that changes in suffrage regulations required a constitutional amendment. Whatever his other views, he consistently supported legislation that favored the interests of constituents in Wyoming, particularly with respect to oil, livestock, and the use of land and water.

O'Mahoney was best known for his support for the regulation of big business. In one of his first actions in the Senate, he introduced a bill that would have required all corporations to obtain a federal license. In 1938, he introduced legislation to create the Temporary National Economic Committee. During its existence from 1938 to 1941, O'Mahoney chaired the committee, which was composed of six members of Congress and six members of the executive branch. From his positions on key committees, he pushed for the dismantling of monopolies, measures encouraging small business, and the regulation of insurance companies. O'Mahoney also advocated a greater role for the federal government in the management of the economy. From 1949 to 1952, O'Mahoney chaired the Interior Committee.

O'Mahoney lost his bid for reelection in 1952 and returned to the private practice of law. When Wyoming's other Senate seat became vacant with the death of the Democratic incumbent, Lester C. Hunt, in 1954, O'Mahoney won election both to serve out the remainder of Hunt's term and to a full term.

In 1955, O'Mahoney emerged as one of the strongest opponents of the Dixon-Yates contract, which provided for a private company to build a plant to provide power to the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) to replace the power that the TVA sold to the Atomic Energy Commission. The decision infuriated advocates of public power and created a minor scandal when it came out that a consultant to the Bureau of the Budget had been simultaneously advising the Dixon-Yates company. When the city of Memphis decided to build its own municipal power plant, which freed up power from the TVA for use by the AEC, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER took the opportunity to cancel the Dixon-Yates contract. Later, O'Mahoney opposed the confirmation of LEWIS STRAUSS as secretary of commerce in 1959, largely because he objected to Strauss's support, as head of the AEC, in favor of private power in the Dixon-Yates matter.

In 1956, O'Mahoney chaired a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee that reviewed the nomination of SIMON E. SOBELOFF, the solicitor general, to the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. Southerners bitterly opposed the nomination because of Sobeloff's support for desegregation and blocked the nomination when it was originally sent to the Senate in 1955. O'Mahoney conducted the hearings fairly and cut off unfounded attempts at character assassination. Ultimately, the nomination cleared the subcommittee and the Judiciary Committee as a whole; the Senate confirmed the nominee in July 1956.

O'Mahoney was a central figure in striking a deal in the Senate that amended the administration's civil rights bill in 1957 to provide for jury trials for those charged with criminal contempt for violating black voting rights. The majority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), arranged for western senators to vote to amend the civil rights measure in exchange for the support of southern Democrats for the Hell's Canyon Dam. The amendment substantially weakened the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

On other issues, O'Mahoney was a leading supporter of statehood for Alaska and Hawaii. He first offered bills providing for statehood for the two territories in 1952. Continuing his opposition to economic concentration, O'Mahoney sponsored a bill that would have required "concentrated industries" to give notification or offer public justification for price increases. He also offered legislation to ban automakers from operating finance firms.

After suffering a stroke in 1959, O'Mahoney decided not to run for reelection in 1960. He died in Bethesda, Maryland, on December 1, 1962.

—MSM

Oppenheimer, J. Robert

(1904–1967) physicist, Atomic Energy Commission consultant

The son of a wealthy German-born textile importer, J. Robert Oppenheimer was born in New York City on April 22, 1904. Raised in the luxury of his family's lavish apartment in Manhattan and summer home on Long Island, he graduated from the Ethical Culture School in Manhattan and from Harvard University, summa cum laude, in 1925. He went to Cambridge University for graduate study in experimental physics but found that he was no good at it. Drawn to theoretical physics, Oppenheimer left Cambridge for the University of Göttingen, where he received his doctorate in 1927. After a year as a National Research Council Fellow (1927–28), he began teaching concurrently at the California Institute of Technology and the University of California at Berkeley in 1929. His comprehensive command of theoretical physics won him a prominent place among American physicists, and he attracted a large, devoted group of students. During the early 1930s, Oppenheimer explored aspects of the newly discovered positron and developed a new theory of cosmic ray showers. Prior to the outbreak of World War II, he helped develop the theory of gravitational collapse, later used to explain quasars. His work demonstrated both brilliance and a certain carelessness. He often failed to follow up on his most profound insights.

Oppenheimer demonstrated little interest in politics before 1936. However, his exposure to the left-wing ideology shared by many intellectuals of the period and his awareness of the harsh treatment of Jews in Nazi Germany rapidly aroused strong political commitments. Perhaps above all, his engagement to Jean Tatlock, who joined the Communist Party, drew him into leftist circles, even as his father's death in 1937 made Oppenheimer a wealthy man. Although he probably never formally belonged to the Communist Party, he joined and contributed money to many left-wing and fellow-traveling organizations. In 1940, he married Katherine "Kitty" Puening, a former communist whose first husband died fighting for the Republican government during the Spanish civil war. According to his own account, Oppenheimer began to disengage himself from political activity in 1940 and apparently completed this withdrawal within two years. However, his left-wing involvement led some government officials to consider him a security risk when he joined the Manhattan Project, formed to develop the atomic bomb. These doubts continued, even as he undertook the direction of the Manhattan Project's facility at Los Alamos, New Mexico, in 1943. Oppenheimer recruited an impressive group of scientists to Los Alamos. In addition, his broad knowledge of physics and his charismatic personality enabled him to mediate between the military bureaucracy and the individualistic scientists, to ease clashes between people with enormous egos working under incredible pressure, and to help solve both theoretical and practical problems.

For all his achievements as a scientist and administrator, his past left-wing affiliations and his personal life raised continuing questions about whether Oppenheimer was a security risk. He added to those questions when he spent an evening at the home of his former fiancée, Jean Tatlock, in June 1943. Counterintelligence officers had followed him to Tatlock's home, and their superiors recommended that he be dismissed. General Leslie A. Groves, who was in charge of the entire Manhattan Project, overruled their recommendation on the ground that Oppenheimer was "absolutely essential to the Project." Tatlock committed suicide in January 1944.

In August 1943, Oppenheimer reported to security officers that a friend of his had approached scientists on the project about passing information to the Soviets. The incident, the details of which remain somewhat murky, involved Haakon Chevalier, a member of the French Department at Berkeley and a close friend of Oppenheimer. In late 1942, George Eltenton, a British engineer with communist sympathies, approached Chevalier and asked him to tell Oppenheimer that "he had means . . . of getting technical information to Soviet scientists." Chevalier passed Eltenton's message to Oppenheimer sometime in the winter of 1942–43. When Oppenheimer told security officials about the incident in 1943 (after learning that one of his former students, a leftist, had been dismissed from the Manhattan Project), Oppenheimer refused to divulge Chevalier's name until specifically ordered to do so by Groves. The intelligence report on the matter concluded that Oppenheimer posed no real threat to security. According to the report, the scientist was "deeply concerned with gaining a worldwide reputation" and, toward that end, wanted very much to keep his job. In short, his ambition would guarantee his loyalty. Still, Oppenheimer's failure to report the incident immediately and his conflicting accounts of it concerned intelligence officials, who monitored his activities closely throughout the war.

The first atomic device was detonated on July 16, 1945, at Alamogordo, New Mexico. The atomic bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945 and the subsequent Japanese surrender won Oppenheimer international acclaim as "the father of the atomic bomb." During the war, Oppenheimer assumed that the bomb would be used. Indeed, he advised against a technical demonstration and argued for use of the weapon against Japan. Soon after the use of the weapon, however, he began to question the scientists' social responsibility for its development. Despite his reservations, he played a leading role in molding atomic policy after the war. He was the main author of the Acheson-Lilienthal report, which called for international control of nuclear energy, and of the Baruch Plan for UN supervision of atomic power. The Soviet Union rejected both of these proposals in 1946. Oppenheimer was named chairman of the General Advisory Committee (GAC) of the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) in 1946. The following year, he became director of Princeton University's Institute for Advanced Study.

During the Truman administration, Oppenheimer became embroiled in the controversy over the development of the hydrogen (fusion) bomb. The possibility of creating such a device had been explored during the war, but the project had been halted by seemingly insuperable technical obstacles. EDWARD TELLER and others working on the fusion weapon nevertheless advocated continuing the project. When the Soviet Union exploded its first atomic device in August 1949, Teller and Ernest O. Lawrence lobbied aggressively to develop a hydrogen bomb. Oppenheimer and the majority of GAC members recommended only further theoretical study of the hydrogen bomb. They questioned the weapon's military usefulness and the morality of escalating the nuclear arms race. Oppenheimer himself thought it better to equip conventional forces in Europe with tactical nuclear weapons. The Joint Chiefs of Staff disagreed, and in 1950 President Truman authorized a crash program to develop the hydrogen bomb. During the Korean War, Oppenheimer participated in Project Vista, which proposed the development of small tactical nuclear weapons for conventional ground warfare as alternatives to the massive strategic bombing favored by the air force.

If Oppenheimer had enemies on the Right, he also alienated former friends on the Left when he named a former student as having once been a communist in testimony before the House Un-American Activities Committee. Perhaps, as Kai Bird and Martin Sherwin argued in their comprehensive biography of Oppenheimer, he was truly afraid of any association with his onetime radical friends and colleagues because "their company represented a link to his political past and therefore a threat to his political future."

In 1952, Truman named Oppenheimer chairman of a special State Department Advisory Committee on Disarmament. The committee's report, published in July 1953, urged the administration to speak more openly about the realities of nuclear warfare. It recommended a larger role in defense policymaking for the western European nations and called for the accelerated development of continental air defense. Oppenheimer also reiterated his warning against total reliance on strategic nuclear weapons and again urged the development of tactical ones. The Eisenhower administration, however, rejected Oppenheimer's proposals in favor of the New Look in military policy, which reduced overall military spending and focused defense policy on the delivery of nuclear weapons to strategic targets by air.

When LEWIS STRAUSS, who considered Oppenheimer a security risk, became chair of the AEC in 1953, he quickly moved to revoke the scientist's security clearance. In November 1953, William L. Borden, former executive director of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, sent FBI Director J. EDGAR HOOVER a letter in which he accused Oppenheimer of disloyalty. The letter outlined Oppenheimer's earlier ties to the Left, charged that he had brought communists to work on the Manhattan Project, and maintained that he had retarded the development of the hydrogen bomb. Borden stated that "more probably than not he has since been functioning as an espionage agent."

As a result of Borden's letter, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER ordered Oppenheimer's security clearance suspended pending a review. In December 1953, Strauss presented a list of charges. Strauss offered Oppenheimer the option of either resigning as a consultant with the AEC or requesting a hearing. Oppenheimer demanded a hearing. As was the case with many such hearings during that period, it fell far short of due process. Strauss had the FBI tap Oppenheimer's phones and those of his lawyer. Moreover, Strauss denied security clearance to Lloyd K. Garrison, Oppenheimer's principal lawyer, thus denying him access to classified materials used against Oppenheimer.

Oppenheimer's hearing before a special three-member board began on April 12, 1954. His eligibility for reinstatement was to be determined in accordance with the AEC's personnel security clearance criteria. Concrete actions, such as sabotage or espionage, were considered grounds for denial of clearance, as were political attitudes and associations. The board was also bound by Eisenhower's Executive Order 10450 (1953), which required that employment be “clearly consistent with the interests of national security.” In its review, the board considered the FBI’s file on Oppenheimer, although the scientist and his lawyers lacked the clearance necessary for access to the material.

Numerous scientists, including HANS BETHE, LINUS PAULING, and ALBERT EINSTEIN expressed shock at the charges against Oppenheimer and affirmed their confidence in him. At the hearing, most of the witnesses testified in favor of Oppenheimer; however, several, most notably Teller, spoke against reinstating him. The only leading scientist to testify against reinstatement, Teller acknowledged Oppenheimer’s loyalty but testified to doubts about his judgment, particularly with respect to his opposition to the development of the H-bomb.

Oppenheimer denied that he had opposed the development of the bomb after Truman had ordered it and asserted that he had worked for the project’s success. He acknowledged his past involvement with left-wing groups but stated that he had “never accepted Communist dogma or theory” and that he had become completely disillusioned with the communist movement. He dismissed Chevalier’s approach to him as inconsequential. When, however, lawyers for the AEC confronted him with the more damning description of the encounter he had given during the war, Oppenheimer acknowledged that his original story was a “lie,” a “cock-and-bull story” for which he had no explanation other than he had behaved like an “idiot.” Referring to the charge that he had hired communists to work on the Manhattan Project, Oppenheimer said that “past associations did not necessarily disqualify a man from employment, if we had confidence in his integrity and dependability.”

On May 27, the security board unanimously declared Oppenheimer a “loyal citizen” who “seems to have had a high degree of discretion reflecting an unusual ability to keep to himself vital secrets.” It is also found that, despite moral, political, strategic, and technical opposition to the hydrogen bomb, Oppenheimer had done nothing to frustrate its production after Truman’s decision in 1950. However, two of the three board members, Gordon Gray, former secretary of the army, and Thomas Morgan of the Sperry Rand Corporation, voted that Oppenheimer’s clearance should remain suspended on the ground that his “continuing conduct and associations . . . reflected a serious disregard for the requirements of the security system.” Ward V. Evans, a chemist, dissented.

Oppenheimer filed an appeal with the AEC in June, but on June 29 the commission announced its four-to-one decision against reinstatement. The majority, including Strauss, said that its decision was based on “proof of fundamental defects in his character” and the finding that “his association with persons known to him to be Communists has extended far beyond the tolerable limits of prudence and self-restraint.” They cited examples of what they termed “falsehoods, evasions and misrepresentations” in his dealings with the FBI, the Counter Intelligence Corps, and the AEC, especially in his account of the Eltenton incident.

Although his defenders saw Oppenheimer as a victim of the virulent anticommunism of the postwar period, they also considered him the target of personal vendettas carried on by Strauss and a group of scientists around Teller. They believed that Oppenheimer, already vulnerable because of his unpopular associations and views, had magnified these tensions with what JOSEPH ALSOP and STEWART ALSOP called his “regrettable tendency to be contemptuous of government flatfeet” and his unwillingness “willingly [to] suffer people whom he considered wrong.” Without doubt, Oppenheimer exacerbated differences over policy by treating opponents rudely and contemptuously.

After the AEC’s decision, Oppenheimer remained at Princeton, and, in October 1954, he was unanimously reelected director of the Institute for Advanced Study by the university’s trustees. Nevertheless, according to Garrison, “the blow [of the AEC’s ruling] was a lasting one which he took with him to his grave.” The great physicist Isidor I. Rabi agreed that the hearing “achieved what [Oppenheimer’s] opponents wanted to achieve; it destroyed him.” In 1957, when the launching of the Soviet satellite Sputnik generated fresh interest in government-sponsored scientific projects, the possibility was raised of a new hearing that might clear Oppenheimer. However, Strauss announced in January 1958 that the case would not be reopened unless Oppenheimer could present “substantial new evidence.” When JOHN McCONE succeeded Strauss as chairman of the AEC later that year, he ordered a legal review of the case. Lawyers for the AEC found “a messy record” and “a primitive abuse of the judicial system,” but took no further action.

The Federation of American Scientists petitioned the AEC to reopen the case after JOHN F. KENNEDY became president. The commission again declined to do so. Kennedy did, however, invite Oppenheimer to a White House dinner for Nobel Prize winners at which GLENN SEABORG, the AEC’s new chairman, offered him a new hearing. Oppenheimer declined. In 1962, Kennedy decided to vindicate Oppenheimer by presenting him with the AEC’s Enrico Fermi Award but postponed the controversial award until after the 1962 elections. He was assassinated before Oppenheimer received the honor. President LYNDON B. JOHNSON made the award in December 1963. Oppenheimer stepped down from his position at the Institute for Advanced Study in 1966 and died of throat cancer in Princeton, New Jersey, on February 18, 1967.

—MSM

P

Pace, Frank, Jr.

(1912–1988) chief executive officer, General Dynamics Corporation

Born in Little Rock, Arkansas, on July 5, 1912, Pace was educated at the Hill School in Pottstown, Pennsylvania, and earned a bachelors degree from Princeton in 1933. After receiving his law degree from Harvard in 1936, he joined the Arkansas district attorney's office. He served as the assistant district attorney for the 12th judicial district until 1938, when he became general counsel to the Arkansas Revenue Department, a post he held until 1940. Pace worked as his father's legal partner in 1941 but left the following year to join the Air Transport Command, where he served as a personnel and administrative officer and rose to the rank of major.

In 1946, Pace went to work for the federal government as the attorney general's special assistant on tax matters; after only a few months he left to become executive assistant to the postmaster general. Pace remained there from 1946 until 1948, when President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed him assistant director of the Bureau of the Budget. In January 1949, he succeeded James Webb as budget director. The following year, Truman named Pace to succeed Gordon Gray as secretary of the army. At the end of the Truman administration, Pace resigned his post and returned to private business. Nevertheless, he remained active in the Democratic Party and in 1954 turned down the post of chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

In May 1953, Pace was called before the Senate Armed Services Committee's Preparedness Subcommittee, which was investigating ammunition shortages in Korea. He testified that until January 1953 fighting in Korea was done solely with World War II surplus, leaving reserves severely depleted. The subcommittee's final report determined that these shortages had resulted in the "needless loss of American lives," but that "revised procedures had replenished stocks."

In 1953, Pace became executive vice president and a director of the General Dynamics Corporation (GD). He became vice chairman and senior vice president of operations and fiscal affairs in 1955. Two years later, he moved up to chief executive officer. During his tenure, GD became one of the nation's prime defense contractors. In the period from 1950 to 1956, the company held contracts worth $4.07 billion. From 1956 to 1957, it was second only to North American Aviation, with defense contracts totaling $1.33 billion. GD's electric boat division built the first atomic-powered submarine, the Nautilus, as well as two subsequent models. The company also received contracts to build the Atlas intercontinental ballistic missile and an experimental atomic-powered aircraft. Pace joined a group of American businessmen who, at a meeting with Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev in 1959, expressed their hopes for disarmament. The industrialists said that, under capitalism, "production for consumption" would be more profitable than production for the military.

During the Eisenhower administration, Pace served on several government committees, including the President's Commission on National Goals, formed in 1959 to set general domestic and foreign policy goals for the 1960s. The panel's report, issued in November 1960, called for "extraordinary personal responsibility, sustained effort and sacrifice" to achieve "high and difficult goals" in the period of "grave danger" ahead. It assumed that the cold war would continue and that bigger military outlays would be necessary. It stressed the need to increase domestic economic growth and aid the economic development of underdeveloped nations, which would be the focus of East-West struggle during the 1960s. In addition to an expanding economy, the major domestic goals included improved secondary and college-level education open to all, aid to the arts, and reform of the federal bureaucracy. The report declared that "vestiges of religious prejudice, handicaps to women, and, most important, discrimination on the basis of race must be recognized as morally wrong, [and] economically wasteful." The panel emphasized the importance of the right to vote and urged that, if necessary, the federal government take steps to insure every citizen the right to vote.

Pace resigned as chief executive officer of GD in 1962. He founded the International Executive Service Corporation, a nonprofit service organization, in 1964 and headed the organization until 1982. President LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed Pace to be the first chairman of the Public Broadcasting Corporation in 1968. Pace founded the National Executive Service Corps, which helped other nonprofit organizations fill management positions, in 1977 and served as its chair until his death in Greenwich, Connecticut, on January 8, 1988.

—MSM

Packard, Vance (Oakley)

(1914–1996) author and social critic

Born in Granville Summit, Pennsylvania, on May 22, 1914, Vance Packard moved with his family in 1924 to State College, Pennsylvania, where his father worked for Pennsylvania State College (later Pennsylvania State University), first as a farmhand, then as foreman, and eventually as superintendent of the college farm. An English major, Packard received his B.A. from Pennsylvania State College in 1936. He received an M.A. from Columbia University's Graduate School of Journalism the following year. After working as a reporter for the Boston Daily Record, he worked as a reporter and editor for the Associated Press from 1938 until 1942, when he became a writer and editor for American Magazine. In the postwar era, American Magazine, a mass-circulation monthly, offered its readers an anticommunist foreign policy, centrist domestic politics, and a celebration of American consumer culture. After that magazine folded in 1956, Packard wrote briefly for Collier's, until it, too, went out of business at the end of 1956. With the failure of Collier's, Packard devoted himself to writing books. In 1950, he had published Animal I.Q., which dealt with animal intelligence and instinct. Research for that project led him to investigate work being done by the Institute for Motivational Research in New York, a private corporation used by advertising agencies.

Packard published The Hidden Persuaders in 1957. The book discussed the manipulative methods used by the advertising industry to sell products. Many of the newer techniques were developed through "motivational research," which used basic psychological testing and in-depth interviewing of sample consumers to determine human desires and motivations that could be met with advertising campaigns. Packard showed how Madison Avenue sought to stimulate "impulse buying" by indirectly appealing to deep human fears, urges, and desires. "Many of us," he warned, "are being influenced and manipulated, far more than we realize, in the patterns of our everyday lives." Packard reserved his harshest criticism for "subliminal projection," a new technique in which words or images were flashed on television or a movie screen too rapidly to be recognized by the conscious mind. The unconscious picked up the advertising message, however, and directed the consumer to satisfy the subliminal suggestion. Packard maintained that before the 1950s advertising had been largely a matter of proclaiming the virtues of one product over another through appeals to the conscious mind; he advocated a return to this method and urged the industry to adopt a code of ethics. At a time when the nation was concerned with propaganda, brainwashing, and the effects of television, The Hidden Persuaders remained on the New York Times Best Seller List for a year. Representatives of the advertising industry attacked the book and denied that subliminal projection had ever been used in the marketplace.

Packard followed up with two more spectacular best sellers, The Status Seekers (1959) and The Waste Makers (1960), although neither sold as well as The Hidden Persuaders. In The Status Seekers, Packard argued that the “gloss of prosperity” led many to maintain that class lines were being eliminated in the United States. To the contrary, he argued that, while class lines were being redefined, they were becoming increasingly rigid, as Americans tried desperately “to find new ways to draw lines that will separate the elect from the non-elect.” Facing impersonal, routine work with large corporations and deriving less satisfaction and prestige from their jobs, Americans turned to material consumption for comfort and status. In this, they received encouragement from advertisers and market researchers.

The Waste Makers maintained that once an economy had achieved prosperity and the wide diffusion of consumer goods, business tended to try to maintain that prosperity by convincing consumers to buy replacements or more advanced models. Manufacturers and advertisers therefore sought to develop a “throwaway spirit” in consumers. They achieved this in part through planned obsolescence. A product became outmoded through the introduction of a newer product that performed the same function better, when it broke or wore out, or when a still sound product became less desirable because of a change in styling or fashion. Although he saw some potential for abuse, Packard granted that planned “obsolescence of function” led to better products. He focused more on “obsolescence of quality,” criticizing shoddy production of products designed to wear out in a specified period of time, and “obsolescence of desirability,” rebuking advertisers for encouraging consumers to discard perfectly serviceable products. The result, he maintained, was massive waste of natural and human resources.

The three books written at the end of the 1950s established Packard’s reputation. Over the next four decades, he continued to publish books at a frenetic pace. The Pyramid Climbers (1962) explored the nature of competition for advancement in modern corporations and its impact on managers and executives. Packard examined corporate demands for structured lives and conformity and concluded that those who gained success in the corporate structure were loyal, adaptable, and deferential. Their main attribute was the ability not to antagonize anyone. The Naked Society (1964) warned that new technologies, such as computerized filing and surveillance techniques, combined with new attitudes to allow increasing invasion of the privacy of the average American. The Sexual Wilderness (1968) chronicled the sexual confusion that accompanied the decline of traditional values. A Nation of Strangers (1972) argued that corporate transfers had created a nation of rootless and lonely people. The People Shapers (1977) analyzed the use of psychological and biological testing to manipulate human behavior. Our Endangered Children (1983) posited that the preoccupation with money, status, sex, and power ignored the needs of children. Ultra Rich: How Much Is Too Much (1989) explored the lives of 30 Americans whose average net worth was $330 million. Professional sociologists criticized his work for its lack of statistical rigor, his reliance on anecdotes, and its derivative nature. Nevertheless, he brought significant issues and the work of others to a large public. His earlier works in particular added phrases such as “hidden persuaders” and “status seekers” to the language. He died at his summer home on Martha’s Vineyard, Massachusetts, on December 12, 1996.

—MSM

Parks, Rosa (McCauley) (1913–2005) civil rights activist

Born in Tuskegee, Alabama, on February 4, 1913, Rosa McCauley went to a private school run by women from the North and attended Alabama State College in Montgomery. In 1932, she married Raymond Parks, a barber who was active in civil rights causes. To help support the household, she took in sewing, worked as a housekeeper and at a hospital, and was briefly a life insurance agent. During World War II, she worked at an army air force base. Rosa Parks was also active in black community affairs and worked for her church, for the Montgomery Voters League, and for the NAACP.

From 1943 to 1957, she served as secretary of the local branch of the NAACP.

On December 1, 1955, Parks boarded a city bus in downtown Montgomery to return home from her job as a seamstress at the Montgomery Fair department store. Shortly after she sat down, the driver ordered Parks to give up her seat on the racially segregated bus to a white man. Montgomery's segregation ordinance required that the first 10 rows of buses be reserved for whites only and the rear 10 for blacks. In the middle rows, white riders sat from front to back and black riders sat from back to front, but black and white riders could not share a row. If the bus became crowded, black passengers sitting farthest to the front were required to surrender their seats to whites. When the driver ordered her to surrender her seat, Parks quietly refused to move, and the driver called the police, who arrested and jailed her. Her dignified bearing assured that the police charged her with violating the segregation ordinance, rather than disorderly conduct. E. D. Nixon, the president of the Montgomery branch of the NAACP, accompanied by Clifford and Virginia Durr, two white civil rights activists, secured Parks's release on bail, and her trial was set for the following Monday, December 5. Although her husband opposed the idea, she became a test case to challenge the segregation ordinance.

By the time of this incident, Montgomery's bus system had become a particularly sore spot within the black community. The bus drivers, all of whom were white, often behaved abusively toward black passengers. African Americans had to pay their fare at the front door but then get off the bus and board through the rear door. Drivers would sometimes drive off after a black passenger had paid but before he had reached the rear entry. In the year before Parks's arrest, three other black women had refused to give up their seats and had been arrested, and there had been talk of a protest. Following one of these incidents, the black community did organize a citizens' committee to negotiate with the bus company management for improved treatment, but no results came from their meeting.

The arrest of Rosa Parks, a gentle and dignified woman who was highly respected in the black community, proved to be a catalyst for protest.

The night Parks was arrested, the Women's Political Council, a group of black women activists, drafted a letter calling for a boycott of the city's buses. In addition to Nixon, local Baptist ministers, including RALPH ABERNATHY and MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., became involved. The boycott began on December 5, the day of Parks's trial, in which she was found guilty of violating the segregation law and fined $10. That day, virtually no African Americans rode the buses. A group of black leaders met that afternoon to discuss strategy and make plans for the mass meeting scheduled for that evening. They formed an organization to coordinate the protest, the Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA), and chose Martin Luther King, Jr., as its leader. The boycott continued for 381 days and resulted in a Supreme Court decision striking down Montgomery's segregation ordinance. The Montgomery boycott catapulted King to national prominence and inaugurated an era of nonviolent protest against racial segregation and discrimination.

According to Parks, her refusal to give up her bus seat in December 1955 was wholly unprompted and unplanned. She had no idea, she later declared, that it would cause the reaction it did. The story that she refused to move because she was tired after a long day of work became part of the myth of the Montgomery bus boycott. In fact, she was an activist who had long believed segregation unjust and knew exactly what she was doing. She had previously defied Montgomery's segregation laws on buses and had attended an interracial workshop at the Highlander Folk School. Moreover, her compartment forced police to charge her with disobeying the segregation ordinance, thereby bringing it into court. In her autobiography, Rosa Parks: My Story (1992), she wrote: "People always say that I didn't give up my seat because I was tired, but that wasn't true. I was not tired physically, or no more tired than I usually was at the end of a working day. I was not old . . . No, the only tired I was, was tired of giving in."

During the boycott, Parks served on the program committee and the executive board of the Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA), the organization set up to organize the protest. She occasionally traveled to other parts of the country to help raise funds for the MIA. In January 1956, she was fired from her job at the Montgomery Fair and had to take in sewing at home. She also received many threatening and harassing phone calls, and her husband encountered pressure at work.

Represented by the NAACP, the MIA filed suit in federal court challenging the constitutionality of the segregation ordinance on February 1, 1956. On June 5, a three-judge panel voted in favor of the plaintiffs. The Supreme Court upheld that ruling on November 13.

In August 1957, Rosa and Raymond Parks along with her mother moved to Detroit, Michigan, where Rosa's brother lived. She worked as a dressmaker for several years and, beginning in 1965, as a receptionist and staff assistant in the office of Detroit representative John Conyers, Jr. (D-Mich.). Although she did not have a major role in the Civil Rights movement of the 1960s, Parks joined King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, remained a member of the NAACP, and participated in several protests, including the March on Washington in 1963 and the march from Selma to Montgomery in 1964. For the part she played in touching off the Montgomery bus boycott, Parks has been called "the mother of the civil rights movement." In later years, she was frequently honored by civil rights organizations. The federal government added to her honors; she received the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1996 and the Congressional Gold Medal in 1999. Parks died in Detroit on October 25, 2005.

—MSM

Parsons, J(ames) Graham

(1907–1991) ambassador to Laos, deputy assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs, assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs

Born in New York, New York, on October 28, 1907, Parsons graduated from the Groton School, received his B.A. from Yale in 1929, and did graduate work at New York University. He then embarked on a diplomatic career. Parsons was private secretary to the American ambassador to Japan from 1932 to 1936 and served as vice-consul in Havana, Ottawa, and Mukden (Manchuria) from 1936 to 1943. He then became the State Department's representative on the Permanent Joint Board of Defense of the United States and Canada. From 1945 to 1947, he was assistant chief of the division of British Commonwealth Affairs. After service as the assistant to the president's representative to the pope from 1947 to 1948 and at the New Delhi and Nepal consulates from 1948 to 1950, Parsons returned to the State Department as deputy director of the Office of European Regional Affairs from 1951 to 1953. He then served as deputy chief of mission and minister at the American embassy in Tokyo. Parsons became ambassador to Laos in 1956 and remained there until 1957, when he became deputy assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs. He was promoted to assistant secretary of state for the Far East in 1959.

Shortly thereafter, the House Government Operations Committee charged that, during his tenure in Laos, Parsons had "abetted" bribery and inefficiency in the disbursement of American aid. The panel maintained that he had removed a government auditor who was investigating charges of bribery in the program. The State Department, however, defended Parsons, praising his "superb job" in overseeing the distribution of aid.

In 1960, Parsons became involved in a dispute within the administration over the U.S. policy toward Laos. That August, a Laotian air force captain, Kong Le, overthrew the American-backed government of Phoumi Nosavan and turned administrative power over to neutralist Prince Souvanna Phouma. Souvanna then attempted to form a coalition government composed of Phoumi's supporters, neutralists, and members of the communist Pathet Lao. Phoumi refused to accept Souvanna's offer of a position in the new government. Instead he decided to use his control of the Royal Laotian Army to regain control of the country through a military campaign.

Parsons supported a neutralist government, as did Ambassador WINTHROP BROWN. Both men believed it would be impossible to form a pro-Western government in Laos, because of the corruption of the Phoumi regime and the growing nationalist feelings among the Laotians. At the same time, Parsons distrusted Souvanna, because he regarded the prince as naïve about communism. Higher officials in the State Department, fearing that Souvanna would be another Fidel Castro, demanded his replacement. During August, Parsons worked in Washington to keep U.S. policy options open, while giving Brown a chance to persuade Souvanna to form a coalition government acceptable to the United States.

In the beginning of October, the United States cut off military aid to Laos. On October 12, Parsons led a mission to that country to explain the conditions under which the United States would support Souvanna. He demanded that the prince end discussions with the communists about entry into a coalition government, resume talks with Phoumi and agree to give him a major role in the cabinet, and move his government away from Vientiane to Luang Prabang, where pro-Western influences were strongest. Finally, Parsons urged the prince to restrain Kong Le, who had been distributing U.S. military aid to the communists. Souvanna refused.

Fearing that Souvanna would turn to the Soviet Union for military aid, Parsons and Brown worked for the resumption of assistance. They could not, however, get Souvanna to agree to acceptable terms. Souvanna, facing an insurgency led by Phoumi, turned to the USSR for help. After that, Parsons joined his superiors in working for Souvanna's ouster. In December, a series of coups and countercoups drove Souvanna into exile, and the country moved toward civil war. As the Eisenhower administration came to a close, policy makers in Washington considered the possibility of an American intervention in Laos.

With respect to neighboring Vietnam, Parsons advocated a policy of supporting the government of Ngo Dinh Diem but also of pressing him to reform his government. Parsons met with Diem in Saigon on October 18, 1960, to present that position. By the end of 1960, Parsons had become increasingly pessimistic about the prospects of South Vietnam under Diem.

Parsons was appointed ambassador to Sweden in February 1961. He resigned that post in 1967 to become senior foreign service inspector. In 1969, Parsons was appointed deputy chairman of the U.S. delegation to the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks. He retired in 1972 and died in Lyme, Connecticut, on October 20, 1991.

—MSM

Parsons, Talcott

(1902–1979) sociologist

The son of a Congregationalist minister, Parsons was born in Colorado Springs, Colorado, on December 13, 1902. He was raised in Colorado and attended public schools until his family moved to New York City in 1918. Parsons graduated from the Horace Mann School in 1920 and received his B.A. in biology from Amherst College in 1924. At Amherst, he chaired the college's chapter of the Student League for Industrial Democracy and, as he later wrote, was an enthusiast "for the Russian Revolution and for the rise of the British Labour Party." Although he began college with the intention of going to medical school, he was attracted to the social sciences. He did graduate work from 1924 to 1925 at the London School of Economics, where he studied under the anthropologist Bronislaw Malinowski. The following year, Parsons attended Heidelberg University and was introduced to the sociological writings of Max Weber, about whom little was known in the United States. After spending a year as an instructor of economics and sociology at Amherst from 1926 to 1927, he went to Harvard as an instructor in the economics department. Parsons received his doctorate from Heidelberg in 1927. Three years later, he published his translation of Weber's The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, which argued that Protestantism, particularly Calvinism, played a significant role in the development of capitalism in Europe.

From 1927 to 1931, Parsons taught sociology at Harvard in the departments of economics and social ethics. When the university established a separate department of sociology in 1931, Parsons joined it. Parsons's first major work, The Structure of Social Action, was published in 1937. In it he posited a common theme of "voluntaristic" theory (the idea that humans functioned as conscious actors in social situations) in the writings of Alfred Marshall, Vilfredo Pareto, Emile Durkheim, and Max Weber. Parsons used this theme to construct a system situated between the individualism of classic liberal theory and the organicism of theories such as Marxism. He criticized orthodox economics for its emphasis on rational efficiency as a motivation for human behavior. That alone, he maintained, could not explain the phenomenon of social order. He argued that common values drew people into an organized social system, a process he dubbed “common value integration.” Society grew out of the actions of individuals as they were constrained and motivated by a complex set of norms and values.

During the next 20 years, Parsons developed and refined his theory. He wrote several essays during the 1930s in which he argued that the noneconomic forces in social organization argued against governmental and economic policy derived from strict laissez-faire economics. Maintaining that mechanisms of the market could be controlled without leading to economic disaster, Parsons supported the regulatory and social welfare measures of the New Deal.

Among the motives other than rational economic self-interest he identified as contributing to social cohesion, Parsons included the service orientation of modern professions. He predicted that values of professionalism, such as expertise, universalism, and loyalty to professional organizations, would play an increasingly important role in shaping modern society. Parsons planned to demonstrate that with an empirical study of the American medical profession, but the political crisis in Europe drew his attention in the later 1930s.

As Europe moved toward war, Parsons wrote articles for both professional and public consumption on Nazism and Japanese militarism and became an active interventionist. During the war, he worked for the Foreign Economic Administration and Harvard's School for Overseas Administration, established to train military officers for administrative posts in occupied territories. Parsons also collaborated with members of Harvard's anthropology and psychology departments to study the ways in which social structure, culture, and personality combined to create the national character of the belligerent nations. In 1943, this group proposed a new interdisciplinary program in the social sciences. Soon after the war, this program became the Department of Social Relations, which Parsons headed. This collaboration had a significant impact on Parsons's work; he became more deeply interested in psychoanalysis, and Freud's work became an important element of his social theory.

Parsons's career in the years after World War II reflected major trends in American academic and political life. Based on the experience of the war years, the federal government supported various sorts of scholarship in the early cold war era. Parsons worked with the Social Science Research Council to gain funding for research in the social sciences. As the cold war evolved, Parsons supported the Truman administration's policy toward the Soviet Union but also expressed his support for the British Labour government and the social democracy of Sweden. Although strongly anti-communist, Parsons stood against some of the excesses of anticommunism in the late 1940s and early 1950s. When the state university system of California imposed a loyalty oath on faculty members, Parsons supported professors in the system who objected to the oath. He believed that the fear of communism had reached exaggerated proportions and, in “Social Strains in America” (Parsons's contribution to Daniel Bell's anthology, The New American Right [1955]), argued that the red scare could be “understood as a relatively acute symptom of the strains which accompany a major change in the situation and structure of American society.” Among those strains, he identified the changing role of the United States in world affairs, the expanded role of government in American life, and the social insecurity of ethnics, who had “risen rapidly in the economic and social scale” but remained “sensitive about their full acceptance.”

The years after World War II also saw Parsons emerge as a leader of his discipline. He served as president of the American Sociological Society in 1949. In 1951, he published The Social System. In it, Parsons attempted a comprehensive theory of social behavior, which he called a “structural-functional” theory of society. He envisioned society as a system tending toward equilibrium, in which various “control mechanisms” established roles and directed action to conform with accepted norms. The book presented what became known as Parsonian theory.

While Parsons insisted that empirical studies could proceed only after the system was conceptualized in its entirety, The Social System contained a case study of the Soviet Union. Writing about two years before Stalin's death, Parsons argued that Stalinism distinguished itself from Nazism by proving more adaptive to outside conditions. The process of adaptation, however, would ultimately mean that the USSR would have to give up any serious hope of realizing the communist society its founders had envisioned. As an industrial nation, it would find itself moving closer and closer to the kinds of values espoused in the United States. In sharp contrast to such theorists as HANNAH ARENDT, who saw the whole world as moving toward totalitarianism, Parsons maintained that the totalitarian nations, once industrialized, would become increasingly democratic or face collapse. The book's extreme formalism and almost total lack of reference to empirical data prompted considerable criticism, as did its clotted, nearly impenetrable prose, but the work nonetheless had a significant impact on both American and European sociology.

In 1955, Parsons published Family, Socialization and Interaction Process. This attempt to integrate psychoanalysis and social theory demonstrated his continuing effort to construct a comprehensive social theory. Economy and Society: A Study in the Integration of Economic and Social Theory (1956), cowritten with Neil Smelser, was an attempt to establish the beginnings of a synthesis of economics and sociology. Parsons thought that the artificial separation of these disciplines in the university reflected existing institutional arrangements rather than a lack of common interests and concerns. His belief that the various academic disciplines dealt with aspects of social life and could be integrated for a comprehensive analysis of the social world reflected his overriding goal, a comprehensive explanatory model of social behavior. In addition to the social system, Parsons posited three other systems: a personality system, a cultural system, and the behavioral-organic system (the physical environment in which society functioned). He argued that, in order to survive, each system had to meet one of four functional prerequisites: adaptation, goal attainment, integration, and latency. The functional prerequisite for the behavioral-organic system was adaptation to the physical environment. The functional prerequisite for the personality system was "goal attainment" (a means of mobilizing resources to achieve objectives). Integration (coordinating social roles and establishing normative restraints) was the functional prerequisite for the social system, and "latency," or "pattern maintenance" (a means of instilling basic values), was the functional prerequisite for the cultural system. This "four-function paradigm" formed the basis for Parsons's subsequent work.

In Structure and Process in Modern Societies (1960), Parsons attempted to discover the defining principles of formal organizations, but once again he offered a case study. He returned to McCarthyism as an example of "a relatively acute symptom of the strains which accompany a major change in the situation and structure of American society." His analysis closely followed the one he offered in "Social Strains in America" and differed little from the explanations offered by social scientists such as SEYMOUR MARTIN LIPSET and DANIEL BELL, except that Parsons was more confident that right-wing movements posed no real threat to American society.

In the 1960s, Parsons became involved in the struggle for black civil rights. He took a leading role in protesting segregation at a hotel chosen for the convention of the American Sociological Society in 1961. His commitment also manifested itself in The American Negro (1965), a volume of essays he coedited.

Parsons's later contributions never departed from his central organizing principles and his concern with integrating the various academic disciplines. He published Societies: Evolutionary and Comparative Perspectives (1966), Politics and the Social Structure (1969), and The System of Modern Societies (1971), an attempt to answer his critics and offer historical grounding for his theoretical conception of societal evolution. Although he continued to write primarily on a theoretical level, he also contributed more substantive studies such as The American University (1973). Reflecting his prominence in American intellectual life, he served as president of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences from 1967 to 1971. After more than 40 years at Harvard, Parsons retired in 1973. He died in Munich, Germany, on May 8, 1979.

The emergence of the academic left in the 1960s challenged Parsons's ideas and his dominant place in sociology. As early as 1956, Lewis Coser, in The Functions of Social Conflict, charged that Parsons's focus on the phenomenon of order in social life downplayed the role of social conflict. C. WRIGHT MILLS, in The Sociological Imagination (1959), also attacked Parsons for his ponderous style and for what Mills regarded as his abandonment of a critical perspective on the problems of modern society. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, leftist graduate students in sociology regarded Parsons as the embodiment of the establishment and hidebound anticommunism. They found him too uncritical of American society and uninterested in or hostile to disruptive popular movements. More fundamentally, they argued that Parsons's approach failed to account for social change. While not entirely unfounded, these criticisms ignored Parsons's support for the Civil Rights movement and for the antiwar campaigns of EUGENE MCCARTHY in 1968 and GEORGE MCGOVERN in 1972. Feminists also criticized his work on family structure. Critics of all stripes found an easy target in Parsons's dense and sometimes undecipherable prose. The 1980s, however, saw a revival of interest in Parsons's work.

—MSM

Passman, Otto E(rnest)

(1900–1988) U.S. congressman; chairman, Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee

Born on a farm near Franklinton, in Washington Parish, Louisiana, on June 27, 1900, Passman was the son of poor sharecroppers. After leaving school at 13, he worked at various jobs and attended night classes. He graduated from Baton Rouge High School and Soule Business College in Bogaloussa, Louisiana. In 1929, Passman moved to Monroe, Louisiana, where he established a successful business manufacturing commercial refrigerators and distributing wholesale restaurant equipment. He joined the navy as a lieutenant in 1942 and served as a procurement officer. Discharged a lieutenant commander in 1944, he returned to his business. In 1946, he won election to Congress from Louisiana's largely rural fifth district and was subsequently reelected 14 times, usually without opposition.

During the Eisenhower years, Passman usually voted with southern Democrats. He opposed civil rights measures and advocated high price supports for farmers as well as curbs on labor unions. Assigned to the House Appropriations Committee in 1949, Passman developed an expertise in budgetary matters, and he soon emerged as the lower chamber's leading opponent of foreign aid. In 1955, Representative Clarence Cannon (D-Mo.), the conservative chairman of the Appropriations Committee, appointed Passman to head that panel's foreign operations subcommittee, which initiated congressional consideration of foreign aid appropriation bills. With Cannon's support, Passman led an annual and usually successful effort to cut the administration's requests for foreign assistance funds substantially. The subcommittee's recommendations were always quickly ratified by the full 50-member committee and, with this powerful backing, easily passed the House.

Immediately upon assuming the chairmanship, Passman slashed $627 million from the mutual security appropriations bill in 1955, most of which the Senate subsequently restored. The following year, the subcommittee approved a $4 billion ceiling on foreign aid, in spite of Passman's warning that "the best way to destroy friends [overseas] . . . is to start supporting them with gifts and favors." The appropriations bill, as enacted in July 1956, assigned $3.7 billion for operations abroad, some $1 billion less than the sum requested by the administration.

The Eisenhower administration could bring little effective pressure to bear on Passman to modify his stand. For one thing, his district contained no military bases or defense plants that the administration could threaten to remove or close. In 1957, Eisenhower invited Passman to a private conference at the White House with the president, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, and the joint chiefs of staff. Passman proved so recalcitrant, however, that the angry president afterward asked an aide to remind him "never to invite that fellow down here again." Later that year, Passman cut the administration's foreign aid request by 25 percent, despite a threat by the president to call a special session of Congress to force the House to vote the full amount.

Although the Senate usually restored some of the House-initiated foreign aid cuts, Passman was such an intransigent negotiator at House-Senate conferences that the final appropriations bill always fell far below the administration's original request. In 1958, Eisenhower prevailed on Speaker SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.) for help in dealing with Passman. Rayburn, who promised to “do his best,” personally pleaded with Passman to add more than the $220 million he had offered as a compromise to Senate conferees. The adamant chairman replied: “If they get $220 million, they’ll be damn lucky. They can have [the money] in a half hour, or they can get it in 10 days.” The Senate finally yielded to Passman’s terms.

During the Kennedy and Johnson years, Passman continued to be the most powerful foe of foreign assistance programs on Capitol Hill. When Cannon died in 1964, however, the new chair of the Appropriations Committee, GEORGE H. MAHON (D-Tex.), who did not share Passman’s views on foreign aid, curtailed the subcommittee chairman’s power both on his own panel and in the House as a whole. Facing accusations that he cheated on his congressional expense accounts and used his influence to persuade foreign governments to ship rice in ships owned by the St. John Maritime Company, Passman failed to win the Democratic primary election for his seat in 1976. After leaving Congress on January 3, 1977, he resided in Monroe, Louisiana. In 1979, Passman stood trial for taking $273,000 from Tongsun Park, a Korean rice trader, in exchange for using his influence on Park’s behalf. Passman died in Monroe on August 13, 1988.

—MSM

Pastore, John O(rlando)

(1907–2000) U.S. senator

The son of an Italian immigrant tailor, John Pastore was born on March 17, 1907. His father’s death in 1916 left the family in straitened circumstances. Pastore went to public schools and attended night classes offered by Northeastern University Law School at a Y.M.C.A. in Providence, Rhode Island, while working as a claims adjuster for Narragansett Electric Company. After graduating in 1931 and gaining admission to the bar the following year, he opened a private legal practice in Providence. His law practice attracted few clients, however, and Pastore decided to enter politics. In 1933, he asked the local political boss, Tommy Testa, to back him for the Democratic nomination for a seat in the General Assembly. With Testa’s support, Pastore won the election in a strongly Republican district in 1934 and was reelected two years later. He served as assistant state attorney general from 1937 to 1938 and again from 1940 to 1944. After winning election as lieutenant governor in 1944, he succeeded to the governorship in 1945, when the governor, J. Howard McGrath, accepted an appointment as solicitor general in the Truman administration. Pastore was elected governor in 1946 and reelected in 1948.

In 1950, Pastore won election to a seat in the U.S. Senate vacated by McCrath, who had resigned to become Truman’s attorney general. Pastore became the first U.S. senator of Italian descent. He won reelection in 1952, 1958, 1964, and 1970. During his first years in the Senate, Pastore established a liberal record on domestic affairs, supporting federal funds for public housing, hospitals, medical care, and medical research. He also favored raising corporate and personal income taxes in the higher brackets. In foreign policy, the senator supported HARRY S. TRUMAN’s requests for foreign aid and opposed efforts to limit the number of troops the president might send to Europe. In 1952, Pastore actively campaigned against the McCarran immigration bill, which Congress passed over Truman’s veto. The same year, he directed ADLAI STEVENSON’s presidential campaign among Italian Americans.

Pastore continued to back federal housing, school construction, and public works bills throughout the Eisenhower administration. In 1954, he led the Senate opponents of a measure exempting independent natural gas producers from rate regulation by the Federal Power Commission. He supported Eisenhower’s foreign aid requests and backed efforts to end the national origins quota system in immigration statutes.

Pastore supported the Civil Rights Act of 1957; however, he voted twice to eviscerate the measure in Congress. He voted to delete part III of the administration’s proposal, which would have given the attorney general wide powers to seek injunctions in any type of civil rights case with or without the consent of the alleged victim. Pastore held that it would give the attorney general excessively broad and insufficiently defined powers and further argued that, by antagonizing southerners, it would jeopardize the entire bill. Pastore also voted for an amendment to the measure that guaranteed jury trials not only in criminal contempt cases arising from the voting rights provisions of the law but also in cases stemming from more than 40 other laws.

As a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Pastore focused much of his attention on the questions of nuclear power development. In late 1954, he spearheaded Democratic efforts to delay the signing of the Dixon-Yates contract until the incoming 84th Congress, which Democrats controlled, had an opportunity to study it. The contract would have permitted a private utility to construct generating facilities near West Memphis, Arkansas, to supply the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) with power. The Dixon-Yates Company would have replaced the Tennessee Valley Authority as the power producer for the agency. The administration approved the agreement but cancelled it in July 1955, after revelations of a possible conflict of interest in awarding the contract.

During the 1950s, Pastore supported efforts to stimulate private research and development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy. In 1954, he backed measures designed to limit the patent rights on inventions used in producing fissionable materials in order to encourage private initiative. Two years later, he urged the production of demonstration reactors to spread nuclear technology. Pastore stated in 1957 that he backed government research in the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, but "the minute it becomes competitive . . . [and] no longer research, the government ought to get out of the operation, because that would be socialism."

Pastore supported the administration's desire to share atomic energy information with friendly nations. In 1954, he offered an amendment to the atomic energy bill of that year giving the president the right to deal with groups of nations as well as with individual countries in sharing atomic energy for peaceful uses. The amendment failed. Four years later, Pastore chaired the Joint Atomic Energy Subcommittee on Agreements for Cooperation, which formulated a measure to permit free exchange of atomic information and materials between the United States and its allies. He guided the bill through Congress; the president signed it on July 2.

Pastore strongly supported the domestic programs of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. In 1963, he provided important backing for the Kennedy administration's treaty with the Soviet Union banning atmospheric nuclear testing. He also played an important role in obtaining passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Although generally liberal on economic issues, Pastore tended to take more conservative positions on social and cultural issues. Initially a strong supporter of the war in Vietnam, Pastore moved away from that position during the presidency of RICHARD M. NIXON. Pastore retired from the Senate at the beginning of 1977 and resided in Cranston, Rhode Island, and North Kingstown, Rhode Island, until his death in Cranston on July 15, 2000.

—MSM

Patman, (John) (William) Wright

(1893–1976) U.S. congressman; chairman, Select Small Business Committee

The son of a tenant cotton farmer, Patman was born in Patman's Switch, Texas, on August 6, 1893. After graduating from high school in 1912, he studied law on his own and raised cotton as a sharecropper so that he could complete his legal studies at Cumberland University in Tennessee. He received his LL.B. degree there in 1916, was admitted to the bar the same year, and served as assistant county attorney of Cass County, Texas, in 1916 and 1917. During World War I, Patman served stateside in the army from 1917 to 1919. After the war, Patman won election to the Texas house of representatives in 1920 and was reelected in 1922. Two years later, he moved to Texarkana, where he was elected district attorney, serving from 1924 to 1929. In 1928, Patman won a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives; he won election to the next 23 congresses.

Patman represented the poor northeastern corner of Texas and quickly gained a reputation as a controversial populist enemy of concentrated wealth. After the Great Depression began, he emerged as a harsh critic of the policies of President HERBERT HOOVER and Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon. In 1932, he called for the impeachment of Mellon. Patman also supported legislation that would have mandated the immediate payment of bonuses promised to veterans of World War I but not scheduled for payment until 1940. He maintained that the measure would stimulate the economy by increasing consumer demand. The bill did not pass until 1936, when Congress overrode a veto by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to enact it. Patman blamed its failure to stem the depression on what he believed was the nullifying effect of a Federal Reserve Board decision to double reserve requirements for banks.

In 1936, Patman coauthored the Robinson-Patman Act, also known as the Anti-Chain Store Act. It sought to protect small retailers by prohibiting wholesalers from giving price breaks to large-volume dealers and by banning chain stores from cutting prices only in areas served by small competitors. Patman also unsuccessfully sought legislation that would have imposed punitive taxes on chain stores. After receiving an appointment to the House Committee on Banking and Currency in 1937, he used that position to wage war against holding companies and interlocking directorates.

During World War II, he helped small businesses win an enlarged share of defense contracts. The Murray-Patman Act established a Smaller War Plants Corporation to finance the conversion of small plants to production for the war effort. After the war, Patman played a key role in the enactment of the Employment Act of 1946, which created the Council of Economic Advisers and the Congressional Joint Economic Committee. The act also established as a national policy the objective of promoting "maximum employment, production and purchasing power."

The creation of the Small Business Administration (SBA) in 1953 was in large measure due to the efforts of Patman, who since 1940 had worked for the establishment of regional credit banks for small businesses. In 1953, Patman unsuccessfully attempted to amend the bill creating the SBA to increase the revolving fund from $250 million to $500 million and strike the limit of $100,000 in loans for any single firm. When the Select Small Business Committee was created in 1955, Patman became its chair. Two years later, he failed in an effort to boost the maximum loan for individual firms, by then set at $250,000, to $1 million.

In 1958, Patman introduced a bill to replace the SBA with a federal system of small business capital banks, to be located in each of the 12 Federal Reserve districts. Under pressure from the administration, the proposal was modified to create the Small Business Investment Division (SBID) within the SBA. As enacted into law, the SBID was authorized to lend money to state and federally chartered small business investment companies that provided credit to small businesses.

Patman believed that the concentrated power large commercial banks wielded through the Federal Reserve System threatened the welfare of the small businessmen, farmers, and individuals of little or modest means. He charged that the Federal Reserve's tight money policy and high interest rates benefited commercial banks but restricted economic growth and caused unemployment. Rejecting the contention that low interest rates would cause inflation, he asserted that the Federal Reserve could check inflation by increasing its member banks' reserve requirements. Beginning in the 1930s, Patman continually introduced legislation to restructure the Federal Reserve to end its independence of the federal government and thereby reduce the influence of the financial community upon it. These efforts had always failed, and they continued to fail during the 1950s.

Patman also charged that commercial banks dominated the Federal Reserve's Open Market Committee, which controlled the nation's money supply by buying and selling government securities. In 1955, he stated that the Open Market Committee "has the greatest financial power of any single group in all history" and introduced a resolution authorizing the Banking and Currency Committee, of which he was a member, to investigate it. The resolution failed to gain passage.

In addition to his attempts to regulate banking, Patman persistently tried to check the power of large corporations. He vainly opposed the sale of federal rubber plants in 1953, arguing that only "the big rubber companies" would have the resources to bid for them. In 1955, he failed in an effort to strengthen the penalties faced by corporations and their responsible executives for violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Patman favored fines up to 5 percent of a corporation's total assets and jail sentences from 30 days to one year. The following year, he sponsored a bill requiring corporations worth more than $1 million to notify the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission about merger intentions and giving the government more power to prohibit mergers. The House passed a bill incorporating Patman's proposals, but the Senate did not act on it. In 1959, Patman vigorously opposed a measure prohibiting states from taxing certain types of income earned by interstate businesses. He contended that the bill would give "a great advantage to interstate chains" in their competition with small retailers. Despite his efforts, the bill was signed into law in September.

Although Patman generally favored liberal domestic legislation, he opposed measures against racial discrimination. In 1956, he signed the Southern Manifesto protesting the Supreme Court's decision in the school desegregation cases two years earlier. He also voted against the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960.

In 1961, Patman, through the Select Small Business Committee, began a probe of private tax-exempt foundations. The following year, the panel, in the first of a series of reports, charged that many of these foundations were means of tax evasion. In 1963, Patman became chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. That same year, the committee issued a report charging that there was an extensive network of interlocking connections between banks. An expanded report in 1966 alleged connections between banks and between banks and other financial institutions. In 1970, he successfully opposed the plan of the Nixon administration to provide $200 million in loan guarantees to save the Penn Central Railroad.

Patman used his chairmanship of the Banking and Currency Committee as a forum to present his views on Federal Reserve reform and to interrogate banking and Federal Reserve officials. His years in the chair were marked by controversy. Patman maintained that he attracted criticism because he investigated and attacked powerful monied interests. Members of his committee, however, charged that he was arbitrary and dictatorial. In 1975, the House Democratic caucus ousted Patman as chair of the Banking and Currency Committee. He died of pneumonia at the Bethesda Naval Medical Center in Maryland on March 7, 1976.

—MSM

Patterson, John (Malcolm)

(1921–) attorney general of Alabama, governor of Alabama

Patterson was born in Goldville, Alabama, on September 27, 1921. He joined the army in 1939 and served during World War II in Sicily, Italy, southern France, and Germany. After his discharge from the army as a major at the end of World War II, Patterson studied law at the University of Alabama and received his LL.B. in 1949. He then commenced the practice of law with his father, Albert Patterson, in Phenix City, Alabama. John Patterson's legal career was interrupted when he was recalled into the army during the Korean War. After serving from 1951 to 1953, he returned to his law practice. Albert Patterson led the opposition to the racketeers who controlled Phenix, and in 1954 he ran for state attorney general with a pledge to rid the city of gangsters. The elder Patterson won the election but was assassinated before he could take office. John Patterson ran in a special election to take his father's place and was elected attorney general in 1955.

During Patterson's four-year term, he devoted considerable effort to combating organized crime. He was also a strenuous opponent of integration and achieved prominence for his efforts to stop the operations of the NAACP in Alabama. In 1956, he brought suit against the NAACP for failing to register under state law as a foreign corporation and for supporting the Montgomery bus boycott, which he deemed illegal. As a result, a state circuit judge issued a restraining order prohibiting the group from operating in the state. At the end of the decade, litigation was still being carried on over the issue, and the NAACP was unable to conduct business in Alabama until 1964.

Patterson ran for governor of Alabama in 1958. During the campaign, he solicited the backing of individuals associated with the Ku Klux Klan, and several officers of the Klan campaigned for him. After finishing first among candidates in the Democratic primary in May, he defeated George C. Wallace in a runoff the following month by 315,000 votes to 250,000 and went on easily to defeat his Republican opponent in November.

In his inaugural address, Patterson reiterated his adamant opposition to integration. He warned that if pressure for desegregation continued, Alabama's schools might be closed and "not be reopened in your lifetime or mine." In September 1959, during one of his weekly radio addresses to the state, Patterson pledged to "scrap the whole public school system of this state before I would submit to any integration of our schools." The following month, Patterson urged state officials to refuse cooperation with the Federal Civil Rights Commission, which was investigating black voter registration complaints. In December, he signed legislation permitting voter registration boards to limit registration activities to predominantly white precincts.

Despite his opposition to integration, Patterson opposed a break with the national Democratic Party. In June 1959, Patterson became one of the first public figures to endorse Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) for president. At the Southern Governors Conference in October 1959, he joined Governors LEROY COLLINS of Florida and LUTHER HODGES of North Carolina in opposing a southern bolt from the party in 1960 over civil rights.

In March 1960, as chairman of the state's Board of Education, Patterson ordered the president of the state-supported black Alabama State College to expel a group of students who had taken part in sit-in protests in Montgomery. Patterson and the state board of education also instigated a purge of the faculty. Later in the month, the New York Times published a fund-raising advertisement, which charged that Patterson had locked the school's dining room "to starve" the students. The governor charged that the Times had published "false and defamatory matter," and the newspaper responded by retracting two paragraphs of the advertisement. Patterson, however, asserted that this did not represent a "full and fair retraction," and on May 30, 1960, he filed a $1 million libel suit against the Times.

In 1961, after civil rights activists engaged in a Freedom Ride from Washington, D.C., to New Orleans encountered violence in Birmingham, Alabama, Attorney General ROBERT F. KENNEDY reached an agreement with Patterson to provide police protection for the freedom riders' journey from Birmingham to the city limits of Montgomery, at which point Montgomery's police commissioner had assured the governor that the city police would assume responsibility to protect the bus. When the bus pulled into the terminal in Montgomery on May 20, 1961, there was no police protection. After a mob savagely beat the freedom riders, Patterson denounced those who would "take the law into their own hands." On the following day, after a violent white mob surrounded a civil rights rally held in the First Baptist Church in Montgomery, Patterson declared martial law in the city and sent the National Guard to maintain order. He remained, however, an unyielding foe of integration and, when the governor of Mississippi, ROSS BARNETT, defied federal authority by attempting to block the desegregation of the University of Mississippi in September 1962, Patterson backed him.

Patterson's suit against the Times was pending in state court when the Supreme Court handed down a decision in a related suit, New York Times v. Sullivan (1964). In that case, the Court held that public officials could not recover damages for criticism of their official performance unless they could prove deliberate malice. Following that decision, Patterson dropped his suit.

After retiring from the governorship in January 1963 under the provision of the state constitution barring consecutive terms, Patterson practiced law in Montgomery. He entered the Democratic gubernatorial primary in 1966 but polled only about 4 percent of the vote. He ran unsuccessfully for chief justice of the Alabama Supreme Court in 1972 but was appointed to the State Court of Criminal Appeals in 1984 and held that position until he retired in 1997.

—MSM

Patton, James G(eorge)

(1902–1985) president, National Farmers Union

Born in Bazar, Kansas, on November 8, 1902, Patton grew up in an experimental community in Colorado called Nucla (New Utopia Cooperative Land Association). His father, a populist and a socialist, took the young Patton to political meetings. After the death of his father in 1920, Patton attended Western State College in Gunnison, Colorado, and worked as a physical education instructor. He returned to Western State as business manager from 1927 to 1929 but left to take a job selling insurance.

He joined the Colorado Farmers Union (CFU) in 1932 and established the Farmers Union Mutual Life Association, a cooperative insurance program. He then became executive secretary of the CFU in 1934 and its president in 1938. In 1940, he was elected president of the National Farmers Union (NFU). Based mainly in the Great Plains and Rocky Mountain states, the NFU represented the interests of small family farms. Patton revitalized the NFU, expanded its membership, and brought it into a close alliance with the Roosevelt administration and organized labor. The NFU became the most liberal of the nation's three major farm organizations.

Deeply suspicious of corporations, Patton believed that family farmers were essential to the political and social health of the country. He rejected the doctrine of scarcity (limiting agricultural and industrial output), which he maintained reflected the interests of large corporations. Patton believed that small farmers had to form a powerful national union and accept the fact that "we live in a legislated economy, . . . in which . . . almost every citizen now looks to Washington and Government for something."

Patton emerged as a major figure in American liberalism with interests that extended far beyond the area of farm policy. During World War II, fear of overproduction and declining prices gave way to concerns over shortages and inflation. Patton's answer was an expansion of production in agriculture and industry along with price controls. Patton also sought to insure the prosperity of farmers through subsidies. This brought Patton and the NFU closer to the Roosevelt administration.

In the years after World War II, Patton advocated federal aid to education and a national health plan. Although he initially had some substantial disagreements with the direction of President HARRY S. TRUMAN's agricultural policies, the administration moved closer to his positions and those of the NFU. Indeed, Patton came to exert considerable influence on the Truman administration. He contributed to the creation of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization in 1945 and served on the public advisory board that helped administer the Marshall Plan. Patton recognized that industry, not agriculture, dominated the American economy and concluded that consumption, rather than production, determined the fortunes of small farmers. His proposals for maintaining full employment and full production in the postwar economy constituted the basis for the Employment Act of 1946. Patton was close to Secretary of Agriculture Charles F. Brannan, and the Brannan Plan, which proposed maintaining subsidy payments while ending restrictions on production, reflected Patton's approach.

Under President Eisenhower, Patton was appointed to the public advisory board of the Foreign Operations Administration in 1953. The following year, he served as chairman of the Commission on School Support in Rural Areas, which presented a report to the White House Conference on Education in December 1955. Patton's influence in agriculture was generally diminished during the Eisenhower years, and his approach to agricultural policy frequently clashed with that of Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON. Nevertheless, as the leader of an organization representing 250,000 farm families, Patton still wielded considerable lobbying power. In 1954, Congress passed an NFU-sponsored law, inspired by Patton, that made possible the shipment of surplus food to needy countries. The following year, Patton proposed a "soil bank," a plan designed to alleviate the nation's chronic overproduction of basic crops by paying farmers to take portions of their land out of cultivation. Secretary Benson adopted the idea, and in 1956 the administration sponsored and Congress passed legislation enacting a soil bank.

Patton spent much of the Eisenhower years fighting Benson's farm policies. Benson sought to cut the overproduction of basic crops by reducing the price at which the government would take the surplus of a given crop off the market. Thus, Benson reasoned, prices for farm products would decline, encouraging greater efficiency and discouraging overproduction. Eventually, American agriculture would operate under the classical supply and demand market, and the government could conclude its role as the buyer of crops. Patton believed that a reduction of the level of price support payments, as advocated by Benson, would mean the collapse of farm prices, the economic ruin of thousands of farmers, the destruction of the family farm, and vast social dislocation nationally. Patton favored continued federal management of farm prices at high levels with the use of production controls to deal with the surplus problem. Over Patton's protests, Congress enacted a system of flexible price supports in 1954. Speaking before the House Agriculture Committee in March 1954, he backed maintaining price supports at 90 percent of parity and recommended extending price supports to a variety of grains at a level related to the support level for corn. Congress, however, passed a measure replacing price supports for basic commodities at 90 percent of parity with flexible supports that ranged from 82.5 to 90 percent of parity. Patton responded in June 1955 by calling for 100 percent of parity price supports.

Patton and the NFU took positions on a number of public issues, not all of them related to farming, during the Eisenhower years. Patton supported proposals for a food stamp program that would enable the poor to purchase nutritious foods. In 1954, he favored the extension of Social Security benefits to farmers, and, the following year, he spoke in favor of an increase in the minimum wage. In May 1956, Patton, in opposition to the administration, advocated government construction of nuclear energy reactors.

In 1959, Patton published The Case for Farmers, in which he surveyed the history of federal farm policy and presented a harsh criticism of Benson's policies. Patton also called for the use of agricultural abundance to further world peace. Overall, the book presented the case for the program of the NFU.

Patton was an influential force in drawing up the farm policy of the Democratic administrations of the 1960s. After retiring from the presidency of the NFU in 1966, he was president of the United World Federalists from 1967 to 1969 and served as a special consultant to the Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture from 1971 to 1973. He died in Palo Alto, California, on February 17, 1985.

—MSM

Pauling, Linus C(arl)

(1901–1994) chemist, disarmament activist

The son of a pharmacist, Pauling was born in Portland, Oregon, on February 28, 1901. Although he dropped out of high school as a protest against having to take courses he regarded as pointless, he gained admission to Oregon Agricultural College (later Oregon State University), where he majored in chemical engineering. After receiving his B.A., summa cum laude, in 1922, he enrolled at the California Institute of Technology, from which he received his doctorate in physical chemistry in 1925. After a year as a Guggenheim Fellow in 1926–27, during which he worked with the Danish physicist Niels Bohr (a pioneer in the field of quantum mechanics), Pauling returned to Caltech where he taught until 1963. He became an associate professor in 1927 and a full professor in 1931. During the 1930s, he applied quantum mechanics to investigate chemical bonding, the phenomenon that gave atoms the cohesiveness to form molecules. He concluded that the “resonance,” or internal vibrations, of atoms provided the cohesion of molecules. This research led to the development of various plastics, drugs, and synthetic fibers. In 1939, he published The Nature of the Chemical Bond, a landmark work that firmly established Pauling's reputation in the scientific community. His research on the chemical bond would later receive the Nobel Prize. At the end of the 1930s, Pauling turned his attention to the molecular structure of proteins.

During World War II, Pauling served in the explosives division of the National Defense Research Commission and on the Office of Scientific Research and Development's consultative committee on medical research. He helped produce the first synthetic antibodies from blood globules in 1942 and supervised a project that developed a substitute for plasma from gelatin in 1945. Pauling also helped several refugee Jewish scientists find places at American universities and hired a Japanese American as a gardener for his home, which vandals later defaced with anti-Japanese graffiti.

In the postwar years, Pauling became the leader of the small group of scientists who opposed nuclear testing and supported multinational disarmament. He believed that America's short-range military interest in maintaining nuclear supremacy to prevent Soviet expansion served only to increase tensions between the two countries. Instead of an arms race, he argued that nations should focus on developing an atmosphere of mutual confidence in which all would work together to control atomic energy. In the environment of the developing cold war, Pauling's ideas carried little weight.

Pauling's efforts on behalf of world peace took a variety of forms. He helped to organize a Congress for Peace, held in Mexico City, in 1949. The State Department denounced the group for "providing an apologia for the Moscow point of view." The following year, he helped to found a "peace crusade."

Pauling's activities led Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) to accuse him of being a communist. Pauling denied the charges, replying, "I am not even a theoretical Marxist." Nevertheless, his name appeared in 1955 on a list, put together by the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, of "most active and typical sponsors of Communist fronts in the past." The State Department denied him a passport in 1952. Later that year, he was issued a "limited passport" for travel to Great Britain and France. After his work on the chemical bond won the Nobel Prize in chemistry in 1954, however, the State Department issued him an unrestricted passport so that he could travel to Stockholm to receive the award.

Ironically, Pauling's theory of resonance offended Stalin, who found it incompatible with communist ideology. In 1951, the Soviet Union denounced the theory as "pseudo-scientific" and "hostile to the Marxist view," because it was hostile to dialectical materialism. Pauling responded with an attack on Stalinist science.

During the 1950s, Pauling explored the biochemical aspects of schizophrenia, the structure of hemoglobin, and the nature of nucleic acids. In the early years of the decade, James D. Watson and Francis Crick regarded Pauling as an inspiration and a rival. As it turned out, Pauling's work on proteins laid the groundwork for what many regarded as the most important scientific discovery of the 20th century, but his own theories in that area, which proposed a triple helix structure, proved a failure. In 1953, Watson and Crick demonstrated that the genetic strands of DNA formed a double helix, for which they were later awarded a Nobel Prize.

Pauling's ideas about peace and the threat of nuclear weapons became increasingly influential after 1955. By that time, fears that the cold war might turn hot had begun to moderate, and the red scare had abated. Moreover, both the United States and the USSR had developed massive nuclear arsenals capable of destroying their enemies. Even more important, scientists were beginning to discover the genetic and pathological effects of radioactive fallout from atomic blasts. In response to these dangers, a number of scientists, particularly those in the biological sciences, joined Pauling in demanding an end to nuclear testing. In 1955, Pauling was a leading participant at the first Pugwash Conference, composed of scientists who supported disarmament. Two years later, he presented the UN with a petition, signed by over 9,000 scientists, urging immediate cessation of nuclear tests. Pauling's petition won increased support when Albert Schweitzer broadcast an appeal for a test ban.

Pauling continued his plea for disarmament in a book titled No More War, published in 1958. In that work, he warned that the United States and the USSR already had enough nuclear weapons to destroy each other completely and that atomic tests produced radioactive strontium 90 and carbon 14, which could cause cancer, leukemia, and birth defects. Pauling maintained that the arms race was due to misunderstanding and ignorance. Once people were informed of all the dangers of fallout, nuclear war would be impossible for rational people. "I believe that the development of these terrible weapons forces us to move into a new period of peace and reason, when world problems are not solved by war or by force," wrote Pauling, "but are solved by the application of man's power of reason, in a way that does justice to all nations and that benefits all people."

In February 1958, Pauling debated the effects of radioactive fallout with EDWARD TELLER, the developer of the H-bomb and a major scientific proponent of continued testing. That year he also participated in an unsuccessful suit against the Defense Department and the Atomic Energy Commission, in an effort to prevent them from conducting further atomic weapons tests.

In 1960, the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee subpoenaed Pauling to testify "on Communist participation in, or support of, a propaganda campaign against nuclear testing." Pauling denied knowledge of any communist involvement and refused to give the names of scientists who had helped to circulate the petitions against testing. He stressed that his own opposition to nuclear testing derived from his concern for the biological effects of radiation. Never given to moderation in his views, Pauling warned that if people's dentists recommended annual or semiannual full mouth X-rays for children, they should "change dentists."

Pauling continued his efforts on behalf of nuclear disarmament through the 1960s. On October 10, 1963, the same day that a partial nuclear test ban treaty went into effect, it was announced that he had won the Nobel Peace Prize for 1962. This made him the only winner of two unshared Nobel Prizes. During the 1960s, Pauling participated in the movement against American military involvement in Vietnam and continued his scientific research. He left Caltech in 1963 and moved to the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. In 1967, he went to the University of California at San Diego as a professor of chemistry and left there for Stanford University in 1969, where he remained until 1974. When confronted with mandatory retirement, he established the Linus Pauling Institute of Science and Medicine. Pauling touched off a controversy with the publication of his book, Vitamin C and the Common Cold, in 1970. In it, he argued that large doses of vitamin C would build up the immune systems in humans and protect them against infectious diseases, including the common cold. Subsequently, a number of controlled experiments failed to find any connection between vitamin C and the prevention of the common cold. Unchastened, Pauling expanded his claims and suggested that large doses of vitamin C might also help in the treatment of cancer. In 1979, a study of patients with advanced cancer conducted by the Mayo Clinic and published in The New England Journal of Medicine reported that vitamin C provided no such benefits. Pauling continued to dose himself with large quantities of vitamin C. He died of cancer at his ranch at Big Sur, California, on August 19, 1994.

—MSM

Peale, Norman Vincent (1898–1993) clergyman

The son of a Methodist pastor, Peale was born in Bowersville, Ohio, on May 31, 1898. Following the Methodist itinerant tradition, the family moved frequently. As a boy, Peale earned money by delivering newspapers, working in a grocery, and selling pots and pans door to door. He graduated from Ohio Wesleyan University in 1920 with a B.A. in liberal arts. Upon graduating, he worked as a reporter for newspapers in Ohio and Michigan, but, within a year, he enrolled at Boston University School of Theology. After his ordination as a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1922, Peale took a pastorate in Rhode Island. He continued his studies at Boston University and received an M.A. and a Bachelor of Sacred Theology in 1924. Soon after completing his work at Boston University, he moved to Brooklyn, New York, where he became assistant pastor at St. Mark's Methodist Church. He then took over a failing congregation in another section of Brooklyn, where he increased membership from 40 to 900 and built a new church. In 1927, he moved to the University Methodist Church in Syracuse, New York. There he increased attendance at Sunday services and began a successful outreach program for college students. He also became one of the first clergymen to broadcast his own radio program.

Peale began his long affiliation with New York City's Marble Collegiate Church in 1932. In order to accept the pastorate there, he had to change his religious affiliation to the Reformed Church in America. Overwhelmed by the emotional problems of his congregants, he turned to psychiatry for help. In 1937, he began a collaboration with Dr. Smiley Blanton, a psychiatrist who had trained in Vienna with Freud. The two men established a clinic affiliated with the Marble Collegiate Church. The clinic expanded into the Blanton-Peale Institute of Religion and Health, which also trained pastoral counselors. In 1951, the clinic became the American Foundation of Religion and Psychiatry; Peale served as its president. Peale enlisted the aid of rabbis, priests, psychologists, and social workers in his clinic with the aim of helping patients sort out their mental problems and lead happier, Christian lives.

From his post in New York City, Peale built a national following. He offered a brand of Christianity that exhorted believers to have full faith in their own ability to achieve inner peace and the love of God. Peale preached to a packed church weekly, but he reached a much larger audience over radio. Beginning in 1935, he preached weekly on a radio program called The Art of Living, which ran on the NBC network. Physically, he seemed an unlikely candidate for a charismatic preacher. He was short and plump, and one observer likened his visage to that of a “benign owl.”

Peale published his first book, also called The Art of Living, in 1937. In it, he taught that “applied Christianity helps people to tap reservoirs of power within themselves.” Over the next 15 years, he wrote five more books, including You Can Win (1938) and A Guide to Confident Living (1948), as well as countless inspirational articles. In 1945, Peale founded the magazine Guideposts, which he hoped would become “an organ for a great, positive Christian movement.” A compact, monthly publication modeled after The Reader's Digest, the magazine contained inspirational stories.

Peale's books sold modestly well until the religious revival after World War II, which he helped to create. He achieved a new level of success in 1952 with the publication of The Power of Positive Thinking. Many of the ideas presented in the book appeared in Peale's earlier works, but The Power of Positive Thinking struck a responsive chord. It remained on the best-seller list of the New York Times for 186 consecutive weeks and became one of the best-selling inspirational books of all time.

Written in a simple style with familiar references, The Power of Positive Thinking taught that positive thoughts and sentiments would cause positive things to happen, or, as Peale put it, “affirmative attitudes help make their own affirmations come true.” His biblical source, according to Peale, was Jesus' statement, “Be of good cheer. I have overcome the world.” Basically, the book was a collection of anecdotes, stories about people (for the most part men) who had lost the sense of themselves under the pressures of work, family, and society. Moreover, their health had begun to suffer as a result. Key to the stories were the psychological and spiritual remedies Peale had prescribed. For Peale, the key to recovery was the Mind, which, for him, was a positive vision of the subconscious. To release the power of the subconscious, the conscious mind had to surrender to the Divine Presence or Mind. The technique for doing so was positive thinking.

Peale reduced his technique to a series of simple steps; he urged his readers to picturize, prayerize, actualize. In other words, Peale advised his subjects to envision a desired goal, engage in affirmative prayer in order to learn God's will about the goal, and, if God's will supported the goal, to take practical steps to realize it. Each chapter contained “confidence-concepts,” “faith attitudes,” “energy-producing thoughts,” or “spirit-lifters.”

The book drew on the New Thought tradition, which traced its origins to a 19th-century faith healer from Maine named Phineas Quimby. Quimby treated patients by encouraging them to rely on mental (meaning spiritual) ability to tap into the restorative power of divine energy. One of his followers, Mary Baker Eddy, became the founder of Christian Science.

Critics argued that Peale's book lacked any theological or philosophical analysis. Instead it gave advice on how to break “the worry habit,” maintain constant energy, be liked by people, and release each individual's “creative mind.” Peale himself never intended the book to be a theological treatise. He later recalled that “many ministers said my book was oversimplified and wasn't couched in the correct ecclesiastical language. That was true. It was written in simple language because I was trying to reach people who were not in church.”

Peale employed a wide variety of media to transmit his message. In addition to his books, radio program, and Guideposts, he began distributing his sermons widely in the early 1940s. With the arrival of television, Peale moved into the new medium. In 1952, he began a weekly television program called What's Your Trouble? that achieved high ratings and ran until 1968. He also wrote a newspaper column, “Confident Living,” which was syndicated nationally and carried by more than 200 newspapers. Finally, he wrote a regular advice column for Look magazine.

Peale's enormous popularity came at the peak of a strong religious revival in America. Peale, along with fellow television personality Bishop FULTON J. SHEEN and the evangelism of BILLY GRAHAM, set the tone of the postwar religious revival. During the Eisenhower administration, polls showed that fully 97 percent of Americans said they believed in God. Many of the most admired preachers of the time, like Peale, promised a path to a happier earthly existence through Christian faith. As Peale put it, "God and the doctor, that's what I give them. Anxiety is the great American disease."

Although Peale won millions of converts, he also attracted many critics, particularly among more scholarly religious thinkers. Critics regarded him as the embodiment of many of the worst elements of American religion. According to them, Peale preached a utilitarian and shallow faith that avoided issues of sin and guilt. Neoorthodox Christian theologians like REINHOLD NIEBUHR who stressed original sin and the paltry ability of humankind to redeem itself through its own works, regarded Peale's religion as an insipid, secularized faith. From a different perspective, political liberals and advocates of the social gospel chastised Peale for his emphasis on individual solutions and his complacency about social problems.

Peale also encountered criticism for his public political pronouncements. In the elections of 1952 and 1956, he openly urged the election of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. During the election of 1960, he headed a group of Protestant religious leaders who questioned whether the separation of church and state could be maintained if Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), a Catholic, were elected. Charged with propagating anti-Catholic sentiments, Peale submitted his resignation to Marble Collegiate Church officials, but his congregation refused to accept it. Although Peale withdrew from the position that the election of a Catholic threatened the separation of church and state, he continued to support Kennedy's opponent, Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON. After that controversy, he made no further formal partisan pronouncements.

The ever-active Peale continued throughout the late 1950s and 1960s to publish books, articles, and columns, speak on television and radio, and travel extensively to preach before devoted audiences. In 1963, his life story was portrayed in the film, One Man's Way. Maintaining that the clergy ought to stay out of politics, Peale criticized religious leaders who took a public position against the war in Vietnam; nevertheless, he tended to favor Republican politicians and expressed his own conservative views on political and social issues. President RICHARD M. NIXON often requested that Peale preach at White House services, and, at Nixon's request, he made a tour of war-torn South Vietnam in 1969. That same year, he was elected president of the Reformed Church in America. In the 1970s, he retained his pastorship at Marble Collegiate Church, contributed to Guideposts publications, and headed the Foundation for Christian Living, an organization that distributed pamphlets, books, and recordings of his sermons. Toward the end of his active ministry, he placed greater emphasis on the Christian view of repentance. "I am," he declared, "a very traditional Christian, and a sense of guilt is important." However, he still regarded "too much guilt" as "unhealthy." Peale retired as senior minister of the Marble Collegiate Church in 1984. That same year, President Ronald Reagan awarded him the Presidential Medal of Freedom. Peale died at his estate in Pawling, New York, on December 24, 1993.

—MSM

Pearson, Drew (Andrew) (Russell)

(1897–1969) syndicated columnist

The son of a college professor, Pearson was born in Evanston, Illinois, on December 13, 1897. He moved with his family to Pennsylvania in 1902, when his father became a professor of speech at Swarthmore College. After attending a local prep school and Exeter Academy, he graduated from Swarthmore in 1919. Pearson then went to the Balkans as a relief worker for the British Red Cross. After briefly returning to the United States in 1921, during which time he taught geography at the University of Pennsylvania, he then traveled throughout the Far East, earning money as a foreign correspondent. After a brief stint teaching at Columbia University, Pearson returned to journalism. In 1926, he became foreign editor of United States Daily (later to become U.S. News and World Report). Pearson joined the Baltimore Sun in 1929. He became head of the paper's Washington bureau, where he met journalist Robert S. Allen, with whom he published Washington Merry-Go-Round in 1931. An anecdotal account of political life behind the scenes in Washington, it melded partisan reporting and gossip into an attack on the Hoover administration. A sequel, More Merry-Go-Round, came out in 1932. Although both books were published anonymously, the identities of the authors became known after the second book, and Pearson and Allen lost their jobs. The two journalists then started a syndicated column, "Washington Merry-Go-Round," in December 1932. Syndicated by United Features, it began with a dozen newspapers and increased that number to 350 by 1941 and to about 600 in 1969. Pearson and Allen collaborated on two more books during the 1930s, both of which attacked the conservative Supreme Court. In addition, Pearson and Allen articulated their particular brand of liberal reformism on a popular radio program that ran on the ABC network beginning in 1938. During World War II, Allen severed the partnership to join the army; Pearson carried on alone. He hired David Karr as his chief assistant in 1943 and added Jack Anderson to his staff in 1945. In the late 1950s, Pearson began to share his writing chores and byline with Jack Anderson. He carried on the radio program until 1955.

In the postwar era, Pearson became one of the most influential political columnists in the country. He offered a combination of news, rumor, sensationalism, and a sense of taking his readers on a private guided tour through the corridors of power. The column exuded a smug sense of certainty, even when his information was tenuous. At the same time, no one could deny that Pearson had excellent sources within the government, and he broke some big stories.

Pearson used his column first and foremost to expose the incompetence or corruption of public officials. It also reflected his liberalism, and, although he went after Democratic as well as Republican wrongdoers, he took particular aim at conservative and right-wing figures. In 1948, Pearson began an investigation of Congressman John Parnell Thomas, the chair of the House Un-American Activities Committee. Based on information sent to him by Thomas's secretary, Pearson charged that Thomas had put friends on his congressional payroll. They did no work and kicked back part of their salaries to Thomas. The revelations forced Thomas to resign, and he was later convicted on criminal charges and sent to prison.

Pearson attacked Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) anticommunist campaign and, in turn, became a target of McCarthy. Pearson often supported groups under investigation by the House Un-American Activities Committee and used alleged communists, including Alger Hiss, Owen Lattimore, and Harry Dexter White, as sources for his column. Furthermore, Pearson vigorously denounced McCarthy personally and exposed the senator's exaggerated war record, his income tax evasion, his connections with the housing lobby, and his lack of evidence to substantiate his allegations. In December 1950, McCarthy physically attacked Pearson at Washington's swank Sulgrave Club. McCarthy sought to destroy Pearson's radio program by organizing a sponsors' boycott that almost succeeded in removing the liberal journalist from the airwaves.

Corruption remained Pearson's main focus. His "Washington Merry-Go-Round" column of September 1, 1955, revealed that PETER STROBEL, commissioner of public buildings and the second-ranking official at the Government Services Administration (GSA), had retained his ties with the consulting engineering firm of Strobel and Salzman after accepting his position with the government. Pearson also accused Strobel of refusing to provide his superior with a list of the firm's clients, an omission that prevented the government from determining whether it was doing business with any customers of Strobel and Salzman. A second column disclosed that Strobel had pressed his firm's claim against the Army Corps of Engineers for work done after the corps had expanded the scope of work beyond the initial contract and that the commissioner had refused to sign a conflict-of-interest form until his superior at the GSA "practically ordered" him to do so. Subsequently, Pearson granted Strobel two opportunities to reply to the varied charges, but Strobel ignored Pearson's offers.

Pearson's charges against Strobel prompted an investigation of the GSA by the House Antitrust Subcommittee. While the subcommittee turned up numerous irregularities, it divided evenly on the question of whether Strobel's conduct constituted either a conflict of interest or a violation of the GSA's code of ethics. Strobel resigned in November 1955, reportedly under pressure from the White House, although the administration denied it.

In January 1958, Pearson, after receiving information leaked from the House Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight, revealed in his column that the panel had voted to hamstring its inquiry into the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) because, in Pearson's words, "the facts were too hot to handle." Pearson accused Republicans on the subcommittee in particular of trying to bury the investigation and noted that the Republicans' view of corruption in government had changed substantially since the Truman administration.

That column also broke the story of suspicious circumstances surrounding the FCC's decision to award a television license in Miami, Florida, to National Airlines. Pearson asserted that one of the FCC commissioners, RICHARD MACK, had promised a lawyer from Miami who was "close" to National Airlines that he would support National's application.

A few days later, the columnist charged that the chairman of the FCC, JOHN DOERFER, had been reimbursed for a western junket in 1954 by both the television industry and the government. Prompted by his crusading zeal, the subcommittee's chief counsel, BERNARD SCHWARTZ, pressed the case, although not always in the most ethical manner. Several major newspapers compared his tactics to those of McCarthy. In the end, the subcommittee fired Schwartz for the manner in which he conducted the investigation, but the probe eventually resulted in the resignations of both Doerfer and Mack.

Toward the end of the decade, Pearson began to attack Eisenhower. In June 1958, at a time when the House Special Committee on Legislative Oversight was investigating the relationship between top presidential adviser SHERMAN ADAMS and Boston financier BERNARD GOLDFINE, Pearson accused the president of accepting several yards of vicuna material from Goldfine. Though admitting that Goldfine had offered the present, the White House hotly denied that the president had accepted the gift. It insisted that the gift had gone to a friend of the president's, whose name he could not recall. About a month later, Pearson's associate, Jack Anderson, was caught bugging Goldfine's hotel room. In response, Pearson, mimicking Eisenhower's defense of Adams, said that he would not dismiss Anderson and that his assistant was "imprudent, but I need him." In May 1960, Pearson alleged that various business tycoons had given Eisenhower gifts that the president used to buy machinery, livestock, and agricultural tools for his Gettysburg farm.

During the 1960s, Pearson broke the story that Senator THOMAS J. DODD (D-Conn.) had diverted over $100,000 from campaign contributions to his own use. In 1967, the Senate censured Dodd for conduct "contrary to accepted morals" that tended to bring the Senate into disrepute. Pearson also reported on the financial dealings of Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL (D-N.Y.) that led to his removal from the House. In one of his more spectacular revelations, Pearson reported that, as attorney general, ROBERT F. KENNEDY had authorized electronic surveillance of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. Pearson coauthored two books with Jack Anderson: U.S.A.: Second-Class Power (1958) and The Case Against Congress (1968). His first novel, The Senator (1968), was ghostwritten by Gerald Green and met with unfavorable reviews. Nevertheless, Pearson's reputation was at its height and his column at a peak of popularity when he died of a heart attack in Washington, D.C., on September 1, 1969.

—MSM

Percy, Charles H(arting)

(1919–) president, Bell and Howell Corporation; chairman, Republican Platform Committee

Born in Pensacola, Florida, on September 27, 1919, Percy grew up in Chicago, Illinois, where his father worked as a bank manager and then an office manager for Bell & Howell, a small camera company. As a child, Charles Percy sold magazines. Later, while attending high school, he held a series of jobs. With the help of his Sunday school teacher, Joseph H. McNabb, who was president of Bell & Howell, Percy joined a student training program at the company in 1936. Percy received a scholarship to attend the University of Chicago the following year. After working part-time in dormitory cafeterias and the college library, he took over a cooperative agency that sold food, linen, coal, and appliances to dormitories and fraternity houses. Percy turned the operation into a moneymaking enterprise and, in the process, earned a substantial amount of money.

In 1941, when Percy graduated with a B.A. in economics, his campus cooperative agency was grossing $150,000 a year. His cut of the profits was $10,000. While in college, Percy worked for Bell & Howell over the summers. Upon graduating, he immediately joined Bell & Howell on a full-time basis and became manager of the newly formed war contracts department. In 1942, he became assistant corporate secretary and was named to the board of directors. Percy enlisted in the navy as an apprentice seaman in 1943; by the time of his discharge in 1945 he had risen to the rank of lieutenant. Returning to Bell & Howell, Percy became corporate secretary for industrial relations and foreign manufacturing programs in 1946. When McNabb died in January 1949, Percy was elected president of the company, making him the youngest man until then to head a major U.S. corporation.

Under Percy's leadership, Bell & Howell grew rapidly during the 1950s and 1960s. The company became the largest manufacturer of camera equipment in the country. Percy also oversaw the company's diversification, and Bell & Howell doubled its sales to $22 million within the first two years of his presidency. He instituted a number of policies designed to benefit employees, including a profit-sharing plan and a retirement program. He maintained close relations with employees, delegated responsibility to managers, and established joint employee-executive boards concerned with research, merchandising, and plant safety. Percy also earmarked a large percentage of working capital for product research. By 1961, sales of products introduced under his presidency accounted for 82 percent of Bell & Howell's $100 million annual gross. At a time when most camera manufacturers feared imports and favored high tariffs, Percy favored low reciprocal tariffs and aggressively sought to penetrate foreign markets. His interest in overseas markets led him to make trips abroad, which, along with his concern for tariff policy, sparked his interest in politics.

Percy began his political career as a precinct captain for the Republican Party in 1946. In the mid-1950s, he became a protégé of President DWIGHT EISENHOWER. In April 1954, Percy served as spokesman for a delegation of more than 30 business leaders who met with the president at the White House to discuss foreign and economic policy. In an arranged exchange of letters released to the press, Percy supported Eisenhower's trade policies, and Eisenhower, who had called for a three-year extension of reciprocal trade agreements with authority for moderate tariff reductions, indicated his willingness to settle for a one-year extension. Percy became finance chairman of the Illinois Republican Party in August 1955. The following year, Eisenhower chose Percy as his special ambassador to attend presidential inauguration ceremonies in Peru and Bolivia. After the Republicans suffered a resounding defeat in the congressional elections of 1958, Eisenhower invited Percy to meet with him and others to discuss the party's future.

Speaking with Vice President RICHARD NIXON and MEADE ALCORN, the chair of the Republican National Committee, Percy proposed a committee to enunciate Republican programs and goals. Subsequently, the Republican National Committee created a Committee on Program and Progress in February 1959 and selected Percy to chair it. He released the group's four-part report, titled Decisions for a Better America, in October 1959. Intended as a vision of long-range goals for the Republican Party, the report, by inference, backed most policies of the Eisenhower administration.

Eisenhower and Nixon chose Percy to head the Republican platform committee in 1960. Percy supported Nixon for president and tailored a platform that accorded with the recommendations in Decisions for a Better America and the vice president's wishes. Governor NELSON ROCKEFELLER of New York, however, wanted a stronger civil rights plank and a commitment to more spending on national defense. Determined to head off a floor fight, Nixon met with Rockefeller four days before the party's national convention in July and agreed to a statement of understanding. Eisenhower objected to the wording on defense, and Nixon worked out language acceptable to the president. Eventually, the platform committee worked out a series of compromises. After the convention, Nixon declined most of Percy's offers of assistance and lost Illinois by 8,800 voters.

Percy stepped down as chief executive officer of Bell & Howell in 1963 (although he retained his position as chairman of the board) in order to run for governor of Illinois in 1964. Although he won the Republican nomination, he lost to the Democratic incumbent Otto G. Kerner. Two years later, however, he defeated the Democratic incumbent PAUL DOUGLAS for a seat in the U.S. Senate. Percy won reelection in 1972 and 1978. In the Senate, he established a reputation as one of the most liberal Republicans in the body. An outspoken critic of the war in Vietnam, he cosponsored with Senator JACOB JAVITS (R-N.Y.) the War Powers Act. In domestic affairs, he supported mass transit, housing programs, federal aid to education, consumer protection, and the food stamp program. His votes against the confirmation of Supreme Court nominees CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH and G. Harold Carswell, along with other votes, earned him a place on President Nixon's enemies list. A member of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging, Percy became a leading advocate for the needs of the elderly and presented a series of proposals in Growing Old in the Country of the Young (1974). He explored running for the presidency in 1968 and 1976 but dropped out early in both races. Percy lost his bid for reelection in 1984. He resides in Washington, D.C.

—MSM

Peress, Irving

(1917–) U.S. Army officer

The son of a tailor, Peress was born in the Bronx on July 31, 1917. Raised in Manhattan, he graduated from George Washington High School and City College, where he enrolled in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. Although City College was a hotbed of leftist political activism, Peress remained largely apolitical through college and dental school at New York University, from which he received his degree in 1940. He became involved in left-wing politics through his wife, who, as Peress later recalled, "came from a more politically advanced family." After graduating from dental school, he applied for a commission as a dentist in the army but was rejected for health reasons. He established a private practice in Queens, New York. After World War II, Peress emerged as a leader of the American Labor Party. By the time the military was drafting older doctors and dentists for the Korean War, Peress had an active private practice. Upon receiving his notice, Peress deliberately gained weight to increase his hypertension in an effort to fail his physical exam. The subterfuge failed, and he was inducted.

His brief career as an army draftee became a major issue in the confrontation between Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) and high officials in the military and administration in 1954. Peress was commissioned as a captain in the Army Reserve in October 1952 under the doctors' draft law. He began active duty in the Dental Corps in January 1953 and was assigned to Fort Lewis, Washington, from which he was to go to Yokohama, Japan. He received emergency compassionate leave because his wife and daughter were under psychiatric care and then was assigned to Camp Kilmer, New Jersey.

When commissioned in 1952, he signed a form swearing that he had never belonged to an organization that sought to alter the government by unconstitutional means. Decades later, Peress explained that he did not consider "the American Labor Party or the Communist Party subversive organizations." On subsequent forms, however, he wrote "federal constitutional privilege" in response to questions about membership in organizations declared subversive by the attorney general. In February 1953, shortly after Peress went on active duty, Army Intelligence was notified that he had written "federal constitutional privilege" on a loyalty form. In August 1953, he received an interrogatory citing the evidence against him and giving him a chance to reply. Once again he wrote "federal constitutional privilege" across the papers. The investigation concluded that sufficient evidence of communist tendencies existed to warrant the dentist's discharge as a security risk. In September 1953, while the investigation was in progress, Peress requested a promotion to the rank of major, for which he automatically qualified by his age and previous experience in the Army Reserve. His request was approved, but at the same time the commanding officer at Camp Kilmer, General RALPH W. ZWICKER, wrote a letter to his superiors recommending Peress's discharge. In November, the Pentagon ordered him released at the earliest possible date.

In December 1954, McCarthy, who had been investigating alleged communists in the army, subpoenaed Peress to appear before the Senate Government Operations Committee's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee. At a hearing on January 30, the dentist declined to answer all questions about his political activities. McCarthy, in turn, demanded his court-martial. In the meantime, the army, in mid-January 1954, had ordered Peress's honorable discharge and had given him the usual 90 days to select a termination date. He chose March 31. After his appearance before McCarthy's committee, however, Peress met with Zwicker on February 1 and asked for his immediate separation from the army. The army announced his honorable discharge on February 2.

On February 18, McCarthy's subcommittee heard testimony from a New York policewoman who had joined the Communist Party as an undercover agent. She testified that Peress and his wife had attended meetings and that he had attended a leadership class run by the party. She further stated that she believed Peress had been a member. When Peress appeared, he refused to answer any questions relating to communist affiliations; he did, however, say that he would oppose any group that advocated the violent overthrow of the government. He also said that anyone who equated invoking the Fifth Amendment with guilt was guilty of subversion and quoted the Book of Psalms: "His mischief shall return upon his own head and his violence shall come down upon his own pate." McCarthy launched a diatribe against the army for granting the dentist an honorable discharge. Later that day, General Zwicker testified. Stiff and at times unresponsive, Zwicker refused to disclose the names of those who had promoted and then honorably discharged Peress. Thereupon, McCarthy questioned whether Zwicker had "the brains of a five-year-old child" and whether the highly decorated veteran of World War II was "fit to wear that uniform." McCarthy's attack on Zwicker brought the simmering hostility between the army and the senator to a boiling point and set off the chain of events that led to the Army-McCarthy hearings in the spring of 1954 and ultimately to the Senate's condemnation of McCarthy in the winter of that year.

In March 1955, after the Republicans had lost control of the Senate, the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, with Senator JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.) replacing McCarthy as the chair, reopened hearings on the Peress case. Four months later, the subcommittee filed a report criticizing the army's handling of the matter and recommending changes in military security procedures. The report, however, found no evidence of subversion.

After the hearings, Peress returned to his dental practice in Queens. He sold his practice in 1980 and retired in 2003. He lives in New York City. In 2005, an interviewer asked him if he had changed his views about communism. He responded that he was "a true believer until the not-too-distant past." Asked if he had any regrets, Peress replied: "No. None at all. True believers don't have regrets."

—MSM

Persons, Wilton B(urton)

(1896–1977) special assistant to the president, deputy assistant to the president, White House chief of staff

Born in Montgomery, Alabama, on January 19, 1896, Persons attended Starke University School and graduated from Alabama Polytechnic Institute (later Auburn University) with a degree in electrical engineering in 1916, after which he went to work for the Western Electric Company. In August 1917, he was commissioned as a second lieutenant in the Coast Artillery Reserve, and, in October of that year, became a first lieutenant in the Coast Artillery Corps of the Regular Army. Persons served in France during World War I. After the war, he remained in the army and served at a number of posts. In 1923, he transferred to the signal corps and was promoted to captain. He spent the second half of the 1920s as a professor of military science and tactics at the University of Minnesota. In order to prepare himself for an administrative career, he entered Harvard Business School in 1929 and graduated, magna cum laude, two years later with an M.B.A. degree. His next assignment was with the office of the chief signal officer in Washington, D.C. In 1933, the army transferred him to the office of the assistant secretary of war, where he served as liaison with the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. Promoted to major in 1935, Persons entered Command and General Staff School in 1937, from which he graduated the following year. After graduating from the Air Corps Tactical School in 1939, he joined the office of the chief of staff, where he directed liaison with Congress. He received a promotion to lieutenant colonel in August 1940 and became chief of the liaison branch of the office of the deputy chief of staff of the army in December 1941. During World War II, Persons continued at his post. When General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER assumed command of the Allied forces in Europe, he asked that Persons, an old friend, be assigned to his staff. The army chief of staff, General George C. Marshall, considered Persons so valuable that he turned down Eisenhower's request.

During the postwar period, Persons rose to the rank of major general and became director of legislative liaison for the army and later for the Department of Defense. Forced to retire from the army in 1949 because of poor health, Persons became superintendent of the Stanton Military Academy. When Eisenhower became supreme commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) forces in 1951, Persons returned to active duty as a member of Eisenhower's staff. Persons again retired from the army in August 1952. After returning to the United States, he joined the Republican National Committee. During the presidential campaign of 1952, Persons served as liaison between Eisenhower and congressional Republicans.

A few weeks after winning the election, Eisenhower placed Persons in charge of congressional liaison. In that position, Persons used his extensive experience on Capitol Hill and his warm personality to gain passage of the administration's legislative agenda. Persons became extremely popular with members of Congress, due at least in part to his ability to arrange a White House audience for them as well as his great respect for congressional prerogatives and sensibilities.

Persons was one of President Eisenhower's more conservative advisers, in part, because of his belief that the administration needed the support of the Republican Right to pass its legislative agenda. He opposed any move by Eisenhower to denounce Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY's (R-Wis.) vitriolic attacks on communists in government, even after McCarthy began to turn his fire on the administration. Persons believed that such an approach would accomplish little other than dividing the Republican Party. When McCarthy attempted to prevent the appointment of CHARLES BOHLEN as ambassador to the Soviet Union and denounced him as a traitor, Persons counseled Eisenhower to act with caution. After McCarthy excoriated the army for lax loyalty procedures, Persons again pleaded for presidential restraint. Persons's recommendations had great weight with Eisenhower, who never publicly attacked McCarthy.

The issue of civil rights deeply troubled Persons. As a white southerner, he was uncomfortable about pushing for desegregation. Furthermore, his political instincts told him that a strong position in favor of desegregation would lose Eisenhower support in the south. Members of the White House staff who favored a stronger stand in defense of civil rights regarded Persons as a roadblock. FREDERIC MORROW, a black presidential assistant, remembered that White House staff meetings on civil rights proved "hard going" and especially pointed to Persons, who "while a 'liberal Southerner' [was] obviously deeply affected by and emotional about" the "changes in southern customs decreed by the Supreme Court." Persons was so close to the president that his deep disquietude over civil rights policy noticeably affected Eisenhower's civil rights policy, which for the most part reflected a cautious approach to the issue.

Eisenhower admired Persons both personally and professionally; the president later remembered coming "to respect his ability, particularly as a coordinator among individuals holding vigorous and differing views." In September 1958, Persons was promoted to White House chief of staff to replace the departing SHERMAN ADAMS. Despite his utter devotion to Eisenhower, Persons's effectiveness in that post was a matter of dispute. Some saw him as a liberator of information flowing to the president and appreciated his more relaxed style, while others believed that he created "an atmosphere of indecision and fear" that paralyzed the inner workings of the White House. Members of Congress in both parties preferred dealing with the affable Persons over the curt Adams.

As chief of staff, Persons found civil rights a particularly difficult issue. While assuring Morrow that the door to the chief of staff's office would always be open to him, Persons asked that Morrow take matters relating to civil rights to GERALD MORGAN. Persons explained that his brother was a former governor of Alabama and that the issues of civil rights and desegregation had almost caused a rift in his family.

After the election of 1960, Persons served as Eisenhower's liaison to the transition team of JOHN F. KENNEDY. Upon leaving the White House, Persons became headmaster of Graham-Dex Preparatory School in Palm Beach, Florida. He also accepted a position as a director of Univis Corporation. Persons died in Ft. Lauderdale, Florida, on September 5, 1977.

—MSM

Potter, Charles E(dward)

(1916–1979) U.S. senator

Born in Lapeer, Michigan, on October 30, 1916, Potter grew up in rural Michigan. He attended public schools and did social work while studying at Michigan State Normal College (later Eastern Michigan University). After earning his B.A. in 1938, he became administrator of the Bureau of Social Aid in Cheboygan County, Michigan, and held that position until he enlisted as a private in the U.S. Army in 1942. During World War II, Potter served with distinction as an infantry officer in France. He was seriously wounded in 1945 and, as a result, lost both legs. After his discharge from the service in 1946 as a major, he worked for the Retraining and Reemployment Administration. In 1947, Potter ran as a Republican in a special election to fill a seat in the House of Representatives left vacant by the death of an incumbent and won. He won reelection in 1948 and 1950. A member of the House Un-American Activities Committee, he used that as a credential during his successful bid in 1952 to fill the Senate seat left vacant by the death of Arthur Vandenberg (R-Mich.). That same year, he won election to a full term. Potter made anticommunism the major focus of his campaign against his Democratic opponent, Blair Moody. His strategy, however, mattered less than the presidential candidacy of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. Potter rode Eisenhower's coattails and defeated Moody by 45,000 votes.

During the 83rd Congress (1953–54), Potter served on the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, chaired by Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.). Like other Republican members of the panel, Potter tried to prevent an open break between McCarthy and the Republican administration. Potter nevertheless had his limits. When the head of the subcommittee's staff, J. B. MATTHEWS, published an article alleging that the Protestant clergy was "the largest single group supporting the Communist apparatus in the United States today," Potter joined the Democrats on the subcommittee in demanding that Matthews resign.

In 1954, when McCarthy intensified his investigation of subversion in the army (apparently in retaliation for complaints by the army that he had sought special treatment for his former aide, G. DAVID SCHINE), Potter joined Senators EVERETT DIRKSEN (R-Ill.) and KARL E. MUNDT (R-S. Dak.) in attempting to forestall the probe. McCarthy nevertheless proceeded with his investigation, and Potter was horrified at the senator from Wisconsin's abuse of General RALPH ZWICKER. Potter was also shocked after the army released its "chronology" of the efforts of ROY COHN, chief counsel of Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, on behalf of Schine. In the resulting Army-McCarthy hearings, Potter, encouraged by the administration and by the president himself, sought to bring the proceedings to an early close. On June 17, the last day of the investigation, Potter issued a dramatic statement saying he was convinced "that the principal accusation of each side in this controversy was born out by testimony." He further asserted that the testimony heard by the subcommittee was "saturated with statements which were not truthful and which might constitute perjury in the legal sense." The statement also called for the dismissal of employees "who have played top roles on both sides" and an overhaul of the subcommittee's staff. In the end, however, Potter signed the subcommittee's majority report of September 1954, which criticized McCarthy only mildly. At the same time, he filed his own "supplementary views" that essentially restated the position he had taken on June 17. In December 1954, Potter voted for the resolution censuring McCarthy.

Although he claimed, at times, to be an Eisenhower Republican, Potter often voted against the administration. In 1954, he supported the Bricker amendment, which would have limited the president's treaty-making powers and which the administration strongly opposed. During the 1956 congressional session, Potter opposed the administration on the natural gas bill, the farm bill, and the sale of air force jets to Yugoslavia.

Potter actively supported strong civil rights legislation in 1957. With other proponents of civil rights, he opposed an amendment granting jury trials to those who violated court orders protecting black voting rights. "The jury trial question is a straw-man," he declared in July and bluntly noted that the justification for the "denial of jury trials is obvious: in many instances Southern juries do not convict white men of offenses against Negroes." Although the jury trial amendment passed, Potter voted for the final version of the civil rights bill in August.

Even though he owed his election to the Senate to Eisenhower, Potter sought to separate himself from the administration when he ran for reelection in 1958. During the recession in 1957–58, he joined a group of Republican senators who unsuccessfully proposed a tax cut as an economic stimulant. To critics who thought the move inflationary, Potter responded, in March 1958, that "it is rather hard to get [his constituents] concerned about inflation when 350,000 people [in Michigan] are unemployed." In June 1958, Potter became one of the first Republican senators to call for the dismissal of the president's chief aide, SHERMAN ADAMS, who was accused of influence peddling.

Potter's political maneuvers failed. In a heavily Democratic year, he lost his Senate seat to Lieutenant Governor PHILIP A. HART by a margin of 170,000 votes. Potter quit active politics and remained in Washington. He worked as an industrial consultant and an international securities executive. In 1965, he published an account of the Army-McCarthy hearings, Days of Shame. As the Watergate scandal unfolded, he became, in March 1974, one of three trustees charged with overseeing disbursements of the $3.57 million surplus from President RICHARD M. NIXON's reelection campaign in 1972. Potter resided in Queenstown, Maryland, until his death in Washington, D.C., on November 23, 1979.

—MSM

Potter, David M(orris)

(1910–1971) historian

Born in Augusta, Georgia, on December 6, 1910, Potter graduated from Emory University in 1932. He then went to graduate school at Yale University, where he studied with the great southern historian, Ulrich Bonnell Phillips. Potter received a M.A. in 1933 and his Ph.D. in 1940; his dissertation was later published as Lincoln and His Party in the Secession Crisis (1942). Based on extensive research and written in graceful and lucid prose, the book became a classic. While working on his doctorate, Potter taught at the University of Mississippi from 1936 to 1938 and then took a job at Rice Institute in Houston, Texas, where he taught until 1942, when he accepted an appointment at Yale. He remained at Yale for 19 years.

In 1950, Potter delivered the Walgreen Lectures at the University of Chicago. Published in a revised form in 1954 as People of Plenty: Economic Abundance and the American Character, those lectures became what was quite likely his most significant book. People of Plenty reflected both Potter's interest in social science methodology and his involvement in the consensus school of American history. Progressive historians such as Charles A. Beard, Vernon Parrington, and Matthew Josephson emphasized the theme of conflict in American history. In contrast, Potter stressed the shared values of Americans and argued that consensus, rather than conflict, was the dominant theme of the American experience.

In contrast to Frederick Jackson Turner, who had argued that the frontier shaped the American character, Potter maintained that material abundance played the central role in forming the American character. Very much a product of its time, People of Plenty reflected both the growing influence of the social and behavioral sciences in the postwar era and the emergence of the American studies movement, an interdisciplinary search for the unique characteristics of America and the nature of an American character. In his search for what made America unique and what defined the American character, Potter found the key to that character in "economic abundance—not the abundance of locked-up natural resources to which man lacks the technological key but the abundance of usable goods produced from these resources—which the people of the United States have possessed in far greater degree than any other national population.” As a consequence of that abundance, he concluded, “American life is geared to success rather than to status.” Abundance also accounted for the competitive nature of the American character. “Increased abundance,” he wrote, “means increased rewards in the competitive struggle. Increased rewards mean an increased premium upon efficiency in competition.” Further, Potter argued, these conditions produced “a condition of mobility far more widespread and pervasive than any previous society or previous era of history.” This, in turn, gave rise to the American commitment to equality. “Abundance,” Potter wrote, “has influenced American life in many ways, but there is perhaps no respect in which this influence has been more profound than in the forming and strengthening of the American ideal and practice of equality, with all that the ideal has implied for the individual in the way of opportunity to make his own place in society and of emancipation from a system of status.” Potter was not uncritical of the American experience and recognized that the ideal and practice of equality were not always realized and that opportunity was not equally shared. For instance, minorities did not share fully in the opportunities of American life. Potter nevertheless argued that, despite differences in wealth, status, and racial or ethnic background, Americans shared a consensus based on the drive for economic success and social mobility.

Potter readily conceded that abundance and social mobility exacted costs. The very mobility of American society denied its people the comfort of having a place in an organic social order. According to Potter, however, the benefits conferred by abundance outweighed the costs. Foremost among them, he maintained, was American democracy.

In 1961, he moved to Stanford University, where he was head of the history department from 1965 to 1968, and served for six years as director of the American studies program. In 1968, his book The South and the Sectional Conflict received the Jules F. Landry Award from Louisiana State University Press and was nominated for a National Book Award. In reviewing that work, Martin Duber-man, a historian at Princeton University, wrote that “David Potter may be the greatest living historian in the United States.” That same year, Potter delivered the Walter Lynwood Fleming Lectures at Louisiana State University. His Fleming Lectures were published in 1972 as The South and the Concurrent Majority. Widely recognized as one of the preeminent historians of his generation, he was elected president of the Organization of American Historians in April 1970 and elected president of the American Historical Association in December of the same year. In addition to producing impressive scholarship, he was a dedicated teacher who drew hundreds of undergraduates to his classes and a revered mentor of graduate students.

Potter died in Palo Alto, California, on February 18, 1971. At the time of his death, he was working on several projects. At his request, Don Fehrenbacher finished compiling a collection of Potter’s previously published essays, History and American Society: Essays of David M. Potter (1973), and completed Potter’s magisterial work on the coming of the Civil War, The Impending Crisis, 1848–1861 (1976).

—MSM

Poulson, Norris

(1895–1982) mayor of Los Angeles

The son of Danish immigrants, Poulson was born on a ranch near Haines in Baker County, Oregon, on July 23, 1895. At an early age, he moved with his family to nearby Baker City. He graduated from Baker High School and attended Oregon Agricultural College (later Oregon State University) from 1913 to 1914. In the fall of 1914, he attended business college in Baker City, Oregon, and went to work as an accountant in February 1915. The following year, he became a farmer. Poulson moved to Los Angeles, California, in 1923, where he worked as a bookkeeper for two years until beginning an accounting practice of his own. He took correspondence courses and night classes at Southwestern University to prepare him to become a certified public accountant, which he did in 1933 and then worked at that occupation before entering politics as a Republican. After serving in the California Assembly from 1938 to 1942, he won election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1942. He lost his bid for reelection in 1944 but returned to Congress in 1946 and served until his resignation in 1953. In Congress, he was one of the leaders in California's dispute with Arizona over rights to water from the Colorado River.

In 1953, Poulson ran for mayor of Los Angeles against the incumbent Fletcher Bowron, who had held the office for 15 years. Poulson campaigned on the issue of air pollution, a problem he charged the incumbent had ignored. He aroused interest with his proposal that Congress grant tax rebates to industrial firms that installed antipollution equipment. In addition, he promised to ask the Public Health Service, the Department of Agriculture, and the Bureau of Mines for assistance in clearing up Los Angeles's smog. Poulson also attacked Bowron's support for a large public housing project in Chavez Ravine known as Elysian Park Heights. Poulson won the election in May and was reelected in 1957.

As mayor, Poulson was instrumental in the construction of the Los Angeles International Airport and in expanding the Los Angeles Harbor. He also played an important role in integrating the city's fire department and police department. His administration began a controversial garbage recycling program. Perhaps most notably, Poulson took the lead in persuading baseball's Brooklyn Dodgers to move to Los Angeles.

Poulson's activities as mayor involved him in national issues. He took an interest in the development of a civil defense program. Speaking on the NBC television program American Forum of the Air in February 1956, he insisted that the federal government had a duty to lay down guidelines for civil defense and arouse the public from its lethargy on the matter. Concerns about the effects of nuclear testing also commanded Poulson's attention. When the city health department reported that radioactive fallout in Los Angeles had increased 20 percent above the acceptable level following a test in Nevada in October 1958, he called President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to demand that the testing be discontinued immediately.

In the late 1950s, Poulson was active in the U.S. Conference of Mayors. As vice president of the Conference of Mayors in 1958, Poulson, a vigorous supporter of federal aid for urban redevelopment, joined New York City mayor ROBERT WAGNER, JR., in urging Eisenhower to release $450 million already granted by Congress for that purpose and to allocate $350 million annually over the next 10 years for redevelopment. On another issue, he supported the administration's position. In a statement at the Conference of Mayors, he opposed an increase of defense spending in light of the recent Soviet missile and satellite launchings. He said, "I fail to see what we could gain if we concentrate on a defense program that would make it necessary to neglect important local programs that mean so much for morale, loyalty and the prosperity necessary to support the federal government, especially in times of crisis." Chosen president of the Conference of Mayors in September 1958, Poulson pleaded with the Eisenhower administration to reconsider threats to cut off aid to housing development and recommended that the proposed federal contribution to slum clearance projects be raised from two-thirds to 80 percent of costs.

In September 1959, Poulson caused a minor diplomatic incident when Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev visited his city. Throughout the day, Khrushchev constantly touted the superiority of the Soviet Union. At a civic dinner, the mayor argued with the Soviet leader about the merits of capitalism and infuriated Khrushchev by chiding him for his comment that "we will bury you." Poulson said, "We tell you in the friendliest of terms possible we are planning no funerals, yours or ours." Khrushchev at first threatened to return home, but, four days later, he extended Poulson an invitation to visit Russia and gave him a gift of bottles of vodka and caviar. Khrushchev later devoted two-and-a-half pages of his memoirs to "that little Mayor of Los Angeles."

Poulson lost his bid for reelection in 1961 to Samuel Yorty. Some observers attributed Poulson's narrow defeat (he lost by only 15,000 votes) to the disaffection of African Americans and Mexican Americans, who believed that he had ignored their problems. Poulson served as California's water commissioner from 1963 to 1969. He resided in Tustin, California, until his death in Orange, California, on September 25, 1982.

—MSM

Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr.(1908–1972) U.S. congressman

The son of a pastor of the Abyssinian Baptist Church, Powell was born in New Haven, Connecticut, on November 29, 1908. He moved with his family to New York City in 1909, when his father became minister of the Abyssinian Baptist Church there. Raised in comfort, Powell graduated from Colgate University in 1930 and earned an M.A. from Columbia University in 1932. In his last year at Colgate, Powell decided to become a minister. During the 1930s, he directed a soup kitchen at his father's church, and in 1930 he became business manager of the church and director of its community center. In 1936, he began publishing a column in the Amsterdam News, a black weekly newspaper. At the age of 29, he succeeded his ailing father as pastor of the Abyssinian Baptist Church. Powell used his pulpit to plead for civil rights and social progress for African Americans. He organized boycotts of unions and companies that discriminated against African Americans. In 1941, Powell became the first African American to be elected to the New York City Council. When a new congressional district was created for Harlem in 1944, Powell ran for the seat and won. In Congress, he advocated a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission, elimination of the poll tax in federal elections, and an end to racial segregation in the armed forces.

During the 1950s, Powell emerged as a leading spokesman for civil rights in the House. In the early months of the Eisenhower administration, he accused several officials of the administration of "virtually countermanding" the president's orders to desegregate military facilities. After Eisenhower and Powell exchanged conciliatory letters, the bases were quietly desegregated.

Powell attempted to further integration by attaching amendments to various appropriations bills stipulating that federal funds could not be spent on projects that practiced segregation. The most controversial of the so-called Powell amendments came in 1956, when he attempted to attach the rider to a bill providing federal aid for the construction of schools. Eisenhower, whose administration proposed the bill, opposed the amendment as "extraneous." Although a coalition of northern Democrats and Republicans in the House passed the amendment, even many who voted for it criticized the proposal. Liberals such as ELEANOR ROOSEVELT and ADLAI STEVENSON thought that Powell's action would defeat or delay desperately needed funding for schools to respond to demands created by the baby boom. When the House voted on the bill, which included the Powell amendment, conservative Republicans and southern Democrats combined to kill the measure.

During the early years of the Eisenhower administration, Powell publicly praised the president for his contributions to the cause of desegregation. Thanks to Powell's generally friendly relations with the Eisenhower administration, he was able in 1954 to arrange for the emperor of Ethiopia, Haile Selassie, to visit the Abyssinian Baptist Church. Early in 1956, Powell declared his support for Eisenhower and asserted that the president had made "the greatest contribution to civil rights in the history of the United States." Two weeks later, however, Powell accused Eisenhower of "dodging the issue." Nevertheless, in the same statement, he denounced Adlai Stevenson, the leading Democratic candidate, for "middle-of-the-road shilly-shallying, pussyfooting, doubletalking." After meeting with Eisenhower on October 11, Powell again reversed himself and endorsed Eisenhower for reelection. The congressman explained that Eisenhower had a laudable record on civil rights and a good image abroad. In addition, he accused Stevenson, by then the Democratic nominee, of having snubbed him.

Powell's endorsement of Eisenhower angered the Democratic boss of New York City, CARMINE DESAPPIO, who, along with district leaders in Harlem, decided to challenge Powell in the Democratic primary of 1958. Powell campaigned hard and, in one speech, warned DeSapio and Hulan Jack, the black borough president of Manhattan, to avoid walking the streets of Harlem. The NAACP and other leading civil rights groups deplored the statement. Powell retracted it, won the primary, made his peace with DeSapio, and went on to win reelection.

Powell's flamboyant personality, his poor attendance record in the House, and his questionable financial and personal activities compromised his effectiveness as a civil rights leader. During the 1950s, he and several members of his staff were targets of a number of investigations. Several people in his office, as well as leading officials of the Abyssinian Baptist Church, were convicted of income tax evasion and embezzlement. Beginning in 1951, Powell himself had to defend a charge of preparing fraudulent income tax returns for his wife. He was finally acquitted in 1960. That same year, a woman from Harlem, whom he had accused of being a "bag-woman" (graft collector) for the New York City police, sued Powell for defamation and won. Powell refused to pay or to respond to subpoenas to appear in court to explain his failure to comply with the ruling.

As a consequence of the seniority system, Powell became chair of the House Education and Labor Committee in 1961. Legislation such as the Minimum Wage Bill of 1961, the Vocational Education Act, the Manpower Development and Training Act, and the Elementary and Secondary Education Act came out of his committee, as did the renewal of the National Defense Education Act. In addition, Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 authorized federal agencies to withhold aid from institutions that practiced racial segregation or discrimination; effectively, it enacted a version of the Powell amendment. Although Powell worked closely with Presidents JOHN F. KENNEDY and LYNDON B. JOHNSON to pass their domestic programs, his reputation was tarnished by his conduct. He spent tax dollars on lavish pleasure trips and often missed votes in Congress. His defiance of the court in his defamation case led to a citation first for civil contempt and then for criminal contempt of court in 1966. Powell avoided arrest by staying away from New York and taking up residence in Bimini. In 1967, a select committee of the House began an investigation into his alleged misuse of committee funds and his continuing contempt of New York State courts. Its report recommended that Powell be censured and stripped of his seniority. The full House went beyond the recommendations of the select committee and voted to expel him in March 1967, but, without making an appearance in Harlem, Powell won the special election to fill his vacant seat in a landslide. He also raised enough money to pay off the judgment against him. For two years, his seat remained vacant. After Powell won election again in 1968, the House voted to seat him in January 1969, but it stripped him of his seniority and fined him for improper use of payroll and travel funds. In 1969, the Supreme Court ruled that the House had improperly excluded Powell in 1967.

Although Powell returned to the House, his power had faded. The loss of his seniority cost him his committee chair. Adding to his difficulties, in 1969 he was hospitalized with cancer. In 1970, State Assemblyman Charles B. Rangel ran against Powell in the Democratic primary and narrowly defeated him. Powell died of cancer in Miami, Florida, on April 4, 1972.

—MSM

Powers, Francis Gary

(1929–1977) U-2 pilot

The son of a coal miner, Powers was born in Burdine, Kentucky, on August 17, 1929. After graduating from Milligan College in Johnson, Tennessee, he enlisted in the U.S. Air Force in 1950. He underwent basic training and went on to advanced training and gunnery school. He hoped to serve in the Korean War but came down with appendicitis; by the time he recovered, the war was over. In July 1953, he was stationed at Turner Air Force Base, near Albany, Georgia. In January 1956, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) recruited Powers to serve as a pilot in the new U-2 program. Planned and supervised by RICHARD M. BISSELL, JR., a special assistant to the director of intelligence, ALLEN W. DULLES, the program had been conceived in 1955 after the Soviet Union had rejected President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's "Open Skies" proposal for mutual aerial surveillance. The U-2, designed and built by Lockheed Aircraft, could fly for extended periods at very high altitudes and was capable of taking detailed photographs of Earth from that altitude.

Following a training period in the United States, Powers was assigned to a U-2 squadron stationed at Incirlick Air Force Base in Turkey. In late 1956, the squadron, publicly identified as a weather observation group, began flights over the Soviet Union and the Middle East. Powers flew over the Mediterranean Sea to monitor naval movements during the Suez Crisis. He also flew a number of missions over the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. The U-2 overflights proved extremely successful in supplying the United States with intelligence data. The Soviet military soon became aware of the flights but could not stop them, because its fighter planes could not reach the altitude at which the U-2s flew. By 1958, the Soviet Union had begun firing missiles at the planes but failed to hit any. Unwilling to admit publicly that they were unable to prevent such overflights, the Soviets never revealed their existence.

On May 1, 1960, Powers embarked on a flight from Peshawar, Pakistan, to Bodø, Norway. A near miss by a Soviet surface-to-air missile badly damaged the fragile plane, which crashed near the city of Sverdlovsk. Powers bailed out of the plane and was captured. Although the plane had been equipped with self-destruction devices and Powers supplied with a pin soaked in shellfish toxin to commit suicide, he used neither.

The CIA became nervous after losing contact with Powers. On May 2, officials announced, through the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), that a weather observation plane had been lost over Turkey. Three days later, however, the Soviet premier, Nikita S. Khrushchev, disclosed that the Soviets had shot down an American reconnaissance plane. He charged that the flight was "an aggressive provocation" aimed at wrecking the forthcoming summit conference scheduled to take place in Paris later that month. Khrushchev asked if the flight had been authorized by Eisenhower or was an independent act of "Pentagon militarists."

Convinced that if the plane had been shot down there was no chance that the pilot could survive, American officials denied the Soviet charges and continued to claim that the craft was a weather plane that had gone off course. On May 7, Khrushchev announced that Powers was alive and had confessed to having been on an intelligence mission sponsored by the CIA. Khrushchev also displayed five photos (actually counterfeits) that he claimed had been developed from film found in the wreckage.

Following the Soviet disclosures, the State Department admitted that Powers had been on a spy mission. Secretary of State CHRISTIAN HERTER and Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON defended the flights as necessary to prevent a surprise attack by the Soviet Union and implied that the flights would continue. Despite pressure to fire Allen Dulles, Eisenhower, who did not like scapegoats, took personal responsibility for the U-2 flights at a press conference on May 11.

Upon arriving in Paris on the eve of the scheduled summit, Khrushchev demanded that Eisenhower apologize for the flights or he would cancel the conference. Eisenhower announced that he had ended the flights but accused Khrushchev of using the issue to torpedo the summit. He refused to discuss the subject further. When the summit conference convened on May 16, Khrushchev blustered and the Soviets walked out; the summit broke up before it got under way. Shortly thereafter, the Soviet Union withdrew its invitation to Eisenhower to visit the country. The U-2 incident and the collapse of the Paris summit marked the end of a period of improved relations between the United States and the USSR that had followed Khrushchev's visit to the United States in 1959.

Charged with espionage against the Soviet Union, Powers pleaded guilty at his public trial in Moscow on August 17. He testified to details of the U-2 program and said that he was "deeply repentant" and "profoundly sorry" for his role in the overflights. Although the charge carried a death sentence, he received a sentence of three years' imprisonment and seven years of hard labor. As a result of his behavior at the trial and his failure to activate the aircraft's self-destruct equipment, Powers came under some criticism in the United States. Some also criticized him for not using the suicide pin.

On February 10, 1962, the Soviets exchanged Powers and an American student, Frederic Pryor, for a Soviet spy, Rudolf Abel (KGB Colonel Vilyam Fisher). Upon his release, Powers again faced criticism for his actions after his plane was hit. After extensive debriefing by the CIA, Lockheed, and the air force, Powers appeared on March 6, 1962, before a select committee of the Senate Armed Services Committee, chaired by Senator RICHARD RUSSELL (D-Ga.). The committee determined that Powers had followed orders, divulged no critical information, and conducted himself "as a fine young man under dangerous circumstances."

Powers left the CIA in October 1962 and joined Lockheed as a test pilot. He worked there until 1970, when he coauthored a book about the incident, Operation Overflight: A Memoir of the U-2 Incident. During the 1970s, he piloted a helicopter and reported on traffic for the radio station KGIL in Los Angeles. In late 1976, he joined KNBC, a television station, where he piloted a helicopter to report on fires, police chases, and other news. He died when his helicopter crashed while he was covering a brush fire in Los Angeles on August 1, 1977.

—MSM

Prettyman, E(lijah) Barrett

(1891–1971) U.S. Court of Appeals judge

Born in Lexington, Virginia, on August 23, 1891, Prettyman graduated from Randolph-Macon College in 1910 and received an M.A. from the same institution a year later. Following his graduation from Georgetown University Law School in 1915, he was admitted to the bar in Virginia and practiced law in Hopewell from 1915 to 1917. He served in the army during World War I and, after his discharge as a captain, became a special attorney for the Internal Revenue Department from 1919 to 1920, when he returned to private law practice in Washington, D.C. For the next 25 years, he alternated between private practice and government service as general counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue (1933–34) and as corporation counsel of the District of Columbia (1934–36). During this period, he also taught taxation at Georgetown University Law School.

In 1945, Prettyman was appointed judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Sitting on that court, through which much litigation involving the government passed, Prettyman wrote several important decisions involving internal security and constitutional rights. In 1952, he wrote the majority opinion in a decision upholding the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, known as the McCarran Act, which required the Communist Party to register as a subversive organization dominated by the Soviet Union.

During the Eisenhower administration, Prettyman wrote several important opinions involving the conduct of congressional investigations of communist subversion and the rights of the Communist Party. In July 1954, speaking for the majority, he dismissed the key count in the perjury indictment of Professor Owen Lattimore, an adviser to the State Department whose leftist views had brought him under the scrutiny of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.). When Lattimore appeared before Senator PAT McCARRAN's Internal Security Subcommittee in 1952, he told the subcommittee that he had never been a "sympathizer or any other kind of promoter of Communism or Communist interests." McCarran pressed the Justice Department to bring charges of perjury based on that statement and several other, more specific statements. Judge Luther Youngdahl of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia dismissed four of the seven counts. Writing for the court of appeals, Prettyman restored two of the four counts dismissed by Youngdahl. On the key count, that Lattimore had denied having been a communist sympathizer, Prettyman held that the charge was "void for vagueness," because neither the indictment nor the statute defined "sympathizer."

In December 1954, Prettyman wrote the majority opinion in Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, which upheld the Internal Security Act of 1950. The ruling affirmed an order by the Subversive Activities Control Board (SACB) that the Communist Party register with the Justice Department as a communist-action organization. The decision upheld the provision of the act requiring registration of the Communist Party. Describing the American Communist Party as part of a world communist movement whose purpose was the "destruction of all presently existing national governments" and "the establishment of a world dictatorship under Communist auspices," Prettyman ruled that the act constituted a reasonable exercise by Congress of its power to protect the nation against a worldwide communist conspiracy. In addition, the decision held valid the administrative procedures set forth in the Internal Security Act. The court further ruled that the act did not violate the First or Fifth Amendment. According to the decision, the law did not unconstitutionally impinge on freedom of speech because "the right to unimpeded expression of views does not apply to unimpeded conduct,” and “a purpose to establish a totalitarian dictatorship is a program of action rather than of mere discussion. It can be met with action by the government.” The statute did not violate the right against self-incrimination, declared Prettyman, since revealed membership in the Communist Party was not, in itself, a violation of any criminal statute. The Supreme Court overturned the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in 1956 on the ground that it had erred in not granting the Communist Party’s motion to reopen the case for reconsideration of the reliability of evidence offered by tainted witnesses.

After rehearing the matter, the SACB issued a revised report in December 1956 that once again ordered the Communist Party to register. The board denied a petition by the Communist Party to examine reports made to the FBI by four of the attorney general’s witnesses. The court of appeals reversed and remanded the case to the board with an order to make the reports available to the Communist Party.

Prettyman became chief judge in 1958. Not long after that, the Communist Party’s litigation against the Internal Security Act returned to the court of appeals. After further administrative proceedings, the SACB once again ordered the Communist Party to register. In July 1959, with Prettyman in the majority, the court once again affirmed the ruling of the Subversive Activities Control Board.

Prettyman retired as chief judge in December 1960 but continued to sit on the court. During the Kennedy administration, he served on several presidential panels, including the President’s Advisory Commission on Narcotics and Drug Abuse and the Administrative Conference formed to recommend improvement in the administration of federal agencies. Prettyman also headed the board of inquiry that investigated the conduct of FRANCIS GARY POWERS, the pilot of a U-2 plane shot down over the Soviet Union, while he was held prisoner by the Soviets. In Communist Party v. United States (1967), Prettyman wrote a separate concurring opinion when the Court of Appeals reversed the conviction of the Communist Party for failing to register under the provisions of the Internal Security Act. The majority opinion found the provisions of the statute “hopelessly at odds” with the Fifth Amendment, because it singled out the Communist Party for subjection to the “combined sanction of compelled disclosure and criminal punishment.” Prettyman died in Washington, D.C., on August 4, 1971.

—MSM

Proxmire, (Edward) William (1915–2005) U.S. senator

The son of a prominent surgeon in Chicago, Proxmire was born in Lake Forest, Illinois, on November 11, 1915. He attended the Hill School in Pottstown, Pennsylvania, and received his B.A. from Yale in 1938. After earning a masters degree in business administration from Harvard in 1940, he took an entry-level job with J. P. Morgan in New York. After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, he enlisted in the army and served in the army Counterintelligence Corps. Discharged as a lieutenant in 1946, he resumed graduate study and received a second master’s degree, in public administration, from Harvard in 1948. The following year, Proxmire moved to Wisconsin. He worked as a reporter and political analyst for the Capital Times in Madison from 1949 to 1950, when he was fired. He worked briefly for a union newspaper and had a weekly radio show sponsored by the American Federation of Labor. In 1950, he defeated a six-term incumbent in the Democratic primary and the Republican nominee in the general election for a seat in the state assembly. As assemblyman, Proxmire distinguished himself by criticizing the tactics used by Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) in his investigations of domestic subversion. During the 1950s, Proxmire ran unsuccessfully for governor three times; he lost to WALTER KOHLER in 1952 and 1954 and to Vernon Thompson in 1956.

When McCarthy died in May 1957, Proxmire won the Democratic nomination and defeated Kohler in the special election that August. Most observers had predicted that Kohler would win easily, but Proxmire conducted an intense, energetic campaign. His platform called for closing corporate tax loopholes and raising personal exemptions. He also promised to increase farm incomes by raising price supports and advocated lower lending rates.

Proxmire attacked President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER rather than Kohler and won an upset victory that made him the first Democratic senator from Wisconsin in 25 years. He won reelection in 1958, 1964, 1970, 1976, and 1982.

In the Senate, Proxmire established a reputation as a maverick. A loner, he was frequently at odds with members of his own party. Early in his first term, he clashed with the majority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) over civil rights legislation. Proxmire thought Johnson had compromised too much on the Civil Rights Act of 1957. He also attacked Johnson's support of tax breaks for the oil industry. When Proxmire was passed over for a seat on the Banking and Currency Committee in February 1958, he denounced Johnson for his "unwholesome and arbitrary power" and demanded more frequent caucuses of the Democratic Party.

In many respects, Proxmire was a liberal. He supported civil rights legislation and voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1957. The following year, he joined an unsuccessful bipartisan effort to enact a measure granting the government greater powers to end school segregation. On other matters, he backed increased agricultural price supports, medical care for the elderly financed through Social Security, and reforms designed to tax corporate interest and dividends at their source. During his first year in Congress, Proxmire received a 100 percent rating from the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Action. During the last years of Eisenhower's presidency, he voted against measures supported by the administration more frequently than any other Democrat in the Senate save one.

Proxmire favored housing and urban renewal measures. In March 1958, he and three other Democrats proposed lending $2 billion in construction funds to states and cities in order to combat the recession. He opposed Eisenhower's call for a partial federal withdrawal from urban renewal in early 1959. When the Banking and Currency Committee authorized $1 billion for more housing than Eisenhower had requested, Proxmire insisted on an even larger appropriation.

At the same time, he departed from his liberal colleagues on important issues. For example, Proxmire became known as a vocal opponent of government waste and favored a balanced budget.

Throughout the 1960s, Proxmire continued to irritate friend and foe alike. He opposed some of President JOHN F. KENNEDY's nominations because he detected a conflict of interest. He even filibustered against one for 19 hours. A fierce opponent of the war in Vietnam, he criticized the administrations of both Lyndon Johnson and RICHARD M. NIXON. During the 1970s, Proxmire carried on a widely publicized campaign against waste in federal government. In 1975, he began issuing press releases that announced a monthly Golden Fleece Award to bring attention to wasteful spending by the government. Proxmire's critics pointed out that some of his awards went to projects in basic science that led to important breakthroughs. Most basic research, they noted, could be made to look foolish. In spite of his opposition to government spending, he was a powerful advocate of the expensive system of dairy price supports, which benefited Wisconsin's large dairy industry. He also conducted a one-man campaign, beginning in 1967, to persuade the Senate to ratify the United Nations Genocide Convention, passed in 1948. He made daily speeches, over 3,000 of them, until the Senate ratified the treaty in 1986.

Proxmire chaired the Senate Banking Committee from 1975 to 1981 and again from 1987 until his retirement. He used the position to push for laws requiring lenders to disclose true rates of loans and advocated legislation giving consumers access to their credit ratings. In addition, he consistently pushed for more competition in the financial services industry.

Although generally a liberal, he earned the ire of feminists for his position on abortion (he was booed at a convention of feminists in 1982) and of fellow Democrats for his vote to confirm President Ronald W. Reagan's nomination of William H. Rehnquist to be chief justice of the Supreme Court. Proxmire remained best known for his ascetic approach to politics. Not only did he oppose wasteful and frivolous government spending, but he applied the same approach to his own activities. For a span of more than 20 years, from 1966 to 1988, he did not miss a roll call vote. In his last two campaigns, he accepted no contributions. During each of those campaigns, he spent less than $200, which he paid for out of his own pocket. He also paid for his own plane fares.

Many of his colleagues regarded him as a self-centered grandstander. Certainly, Proxmire stood out as something of an eccentric in the Senate. A physical culturist, he engaged in vigorous daily exercise and limited himself to a spartan diet. He reprimanded aides for eating junk food and published a book about fitness in 1973 titled You Can Do It: Senator Proxmire's Exercise, Diet and Relaxation Plan. Unusually concerned with his personal appearance, he had a well-publicized hair transplant and a facelift. At the same time, his frugality extended to his wardrobe, and he was known for wearing inexpensive suits. Declaring that he was "just too old," Proxmire did not stand for reelection in 1988. He resided in Washington, D.C., until Alzheimer's disease forced him to move to a nursing home in Sykesville, Maryland, where he died on December 15, 2005.

—MSM

Pusey, Nathan M(arsh)

(1907–2001) president, Harvard University

Pusey was born in Council Bluffs, Iowa, on April 4, 1907. After attending public schools, he earned a scholarship to Harvard, where he graduated magna cum laude in 1928 with a B.A. in English. After touring France and Italy, he taught at Riverdale Country Day School in New York before entering graduate school at Harvard in 1931. He earned a master's degree in ancient history the following year and took up a fellowship at the American School of Classical Study in Athens, Greece. Pusey began teaching at Lawrence College, in Appleton, Wisconsin, in 1935. After completing his Ph.D. at Harvard in 1937, he taught Greek and ancient history at Scripps College and Wesleyan University before becoming president of Lawrence College in 1944. Although a Republican and normally apolitical, Pusey cosponsored a campaign tract opposing the reelection of Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) in 1952. In June 1953, Pusey was named president of Harvard to succeed JAMES B. CONANT. The university announced that Pusey would reemphasize undergraduate education and the humanities.

McCarthy responded to Pusey's appointment by telling a reporter that "Harvard's loss is Wisconsin's gain" and that Pusey was "a rabid anti-anti-Communist," who hid "a combination of bigotry and intolerance behind a cloak of phony, hypocritical liberalism." Soon after Pusey assumed office, McCarthy attacked both Harvard and Pusey. In the spring of 1953, the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) had conducted an investigation of Harvard. One witness, Wendell H. Furry, an associate professor of physics, had earlier appeared before HUAC and denied that he was a communist as of March 1, 1951, but invoked the Fifth Amendment regarding his activities before that date. Harvard retained Furry. In November 1953, McCarthy charged that a "smelly mess" existed at Harvard and alleged that "Communist professors" at the university exposed students to Marxist "indoctrination." In a telegram to Pusey, McCarthy asked what action the president intended to take in Furry's case. In January 1954, Furry appeared before McCarthy's subcommittee. The physics professor testified about his own activities but refused to discuss other people. McCarthy fumed, "To me it is inconceivable that a university which has the reputation of being a great university would keep this type of a creature on teaching our children." McCarthy described Harvard as "a privileged sanctuary for Fifth Amendment Communists" and called for the dismissal of four faculty members. His accusations played into stereotypes of Harvard and other elite colleges. John Fox, the publisher of the Boston Post and a Harvard graduate, referred to his alma mater as "Kremlin on the Charles."

Pusey responded by saying that he was "not aware" of any communists on the faculty and stated his opposition to employing communists. Both he and the dean of the faculty, McGeorge Bundy, refused to hire former members of the Communist Party for faculty or administrative positions. At the same time, Pusey stated that he did not regard pleading the Fifth Amendment "as confession of guilt."

Pusey served as Harvard's president for 18 years. A devout Episcopalian, he raised money for the divinity school and criticized the "almost idolatrous preoccupation with the secular order." There was, he said, an "almost desperate urgency" for religious education at Harvard. That view found little support among Harvard's faculty. Pusey oversaw a dramatic expansion of the university's physical plant; he built more than 30 new buildings that almost doubled the floor space of the university. During his presidency, Harvard's endowment grew from $304 million to over $1 billion. Moreover, Harvard, like other major universities, received more and more direct support for pure and applied research. Money from the federal government accounted for one-fourth of Harvard's operating income in 1960. Pusey also oversaw the implementation of need-blind admissions.

Despite these achievements, his last years as president were troubled ones. The student protest movement of the late 1960s confounded him. Angry students protesting the war in Vietnam twice forced Pusey to shut down the campus before the spring semester's scheduled conclusion. Pusey complained that "learning has almost ceased" in many universities because of the violent actions of "a small group of overeager young . . . who feel they have a special calling to redeem society." In 1969, students occupied University Hall, which housed most of the university's administrative offices, to protest the presence of ROTC on campus. Pusey summoned the Cambridge police, who evicted the protesters; in the process, 45 people were injured and 197 arrested. Pusey maintained that he had called in the police to protect "freedom within the university." "People cannot," he said, "use force or violence to interfere with the normal workings" of the university. In his mind, he fought "for the same principles" when he called in the police to prevent coercive attempts to disrupt the university as when he opposed McCarthy. Most faculty and students disagreed; the action destroyed Pusey's already tenuous support within the university. He retired as president in 1971.

After leaving Harvard, Pusey became president of the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, a position he held from 1971 to 1975. He also served on the boards of several charitable organizations and, from 1979 to 1980, as president of the United States Board for Christian Higher Education in Asia. Pusey wrote two books, The Age of the Scholar (1963) and American Higher Education, 1945–1970: A Personal Report (1978). He died in New York City on November 14, 2001.

—MSM

Quarles, Donald A(ubrey)

(1894–1959) assistant secretary of defense for research and development, secretary of the air force, deputy secretary of defense

The son of a dentist, Quarles was born in Van Buren, Arkansas, on July 30, 1894. He graduated from high school at the age of 15. Already known for his enormous appetite for work, he taught school in his hometown while taking summer courses at the University of Missouri before entering Yale University at the age of 18. After receiving a B.A. in math and physics in 1917, he entered the army and saw action in France and Germany during World War I. After his discharge as a captain, he joined the division of Western Electric Company that later became Bell Telephone Laboratories and by 1940 was director of the Transmission Development Department, which included the company's radar program. During World War II, he directed the radar installation at Bell Laboratories and had responsibility for developments in telephone equipment for both military and commercial purposes. Quarles was appointed in 1946 to the Joint Research and Development Board's newly created Committee on Electronics; he became chair of the Committee on Electronics in 1949. In March 1952, he became vice president of Western Electric and president of Sandia Corporation, a subsidiary operating atomic research laboratories at White Sands, New Mexico.

Quarles was appointed assistant secretary of defense for research and development in 1953, an assignment that gave him responsibility for billions of dollars worth of missile and satellite programs. He oversaw programs to develop an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM), an intermediate range ballistic missile (IRBM), and an Earth-orbiting satellite.

Eisenhower chose Quarles as secretary of the air force in August 1955. Because Congress was in recess, Quarles received an interim appointment until Congress confirmed the nomination in February 1956. Known as an exceptionally hard worker, Quarles's major problem was to maintain American military superiority and proceed with new programs

President Eisenhower and Donald Quarles, December 23, 1958 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

despite reductions in defense spending. Quarles had to press the development of new missiles without sacrificing American superiority in traditional weaponry, such as B-52 bombers. During an appearance before the House Appropriations Subcommittee in 1956, he testified that manned planes, rather than missiles, would be the air force's essential weapon for at least five more years. Heatedly defending the need for more bombers, he denied that the ICBM was some sort of ultimate weapon that ended the arms race and precluded the need for development of better conventional weapons. At the same time, the administration gave highest priority to development of both the ICBM and IRBM.

Quarles gained a reputation as a "hard-liner" who supported the administration's New Look defense policy. He insisted that mutual deterrence would not preclude American use of nuclear weapons and warned that no aggressor should presume that the United States would fight a war with conventional weaponry, at it had in Korea.

Although Quarles sought more money for the air force than the president requested, he defended the administration's pared-down military appropriations requests and assured members of Congress that American retaliatory capability was more secure than ever. He continued to emphasize, as he had through his tenure as secretary of the air force, that the American advantage in quality more than made up for any Soviet numerical superiority in planes or missiles. Nevertheless, Quarles and NATHAN F. TWINING, chief of staff of the air force, justified the air force's expenditure of nearly $1 billion that Congress had appended to the previous year's allocation for the air force. They maintained that, although Soviet production of bombers was proceeding at a slower rate than previously predicted, the Soviets were catching up and that the additional funds were needed.

In April 1957, Quarles was confirmed as deputy secretary of defense, the second-ranking civilian position in the Pentagon. At that post, he continued to assert that the United States retained superiority in ICBMs over the Soviet Union. He argued for a calm, rational response to the Soviet Union's successful launch of a satellite in the fall of 1957. At a series of meetings in the White House during late October 1957, Quarles defended the policy of not mixing the science and defense establishments, as the Soviet Union had done. While not minimizing the Soviet achievement, he saw nothing to indicate that the Soviets had a technological or military advantage over the United States and pointed out that the army thought that it could have launched a satellite a year earlier. Further, he stressed that the United States should not panic and accelerate its satellite program. Quarles took the same positions in public during a two-day investigation of the American missile and space program by a subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee in November 1957. His pleas fell on deaf ears. In reaction to Sputnik, Congress increased funds for defense and space exploration.

Quarles died in his sleep of an apparent heart attack in Washington, D.C., on May 8, 1959.

—MSM

R

Radford, Arthur W(illiam)

(1896–1973) chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff

The son of an electrical engineer, Radford was born in Chicago, Illinois, on February 27, 1896. As a child, he moved with his family first to Riverside, Illinois, and then to Grinnell, Iowa. After failing to gain an appointment at West Point, he entered the U.S. Naval Academy at Annapolis at the age of 16. Upon graduating in 1916, he saw action as an ensign on the battleship South Carolina during World War I. Following the war, Radford trained as a naval aviator and served in a variety of assignments. He was attached to the Bureau of Aeronautics from 1921 to 1923 and was stationed with aviation units aboard the USS Aroostook, the USS Colorado, and the USS Pennsylvania from 1923 to 1927. Radford served as a fighter squadron commander on the carrier Saratoga from 1929 to 1931. After several more assignments, he commanded the naval air station in Seattle, Washington, from 1937 to 1940 and served as executive officer of the carrier USS Yorktown from 1940 to 1941. Then, he served briefly with the Office of the Chief of Naval Operations, after which he established a naval air station at Trinidad, British West Indies. He became director of aviation training in the Bureau of Aeronautics in December 1941. Promoted to captain in January 1942, he remained director of aviation training until April 1943. In July 1943, Radford was promoted to rear admiral and given command of Carrier Division Eleven. From December 1943 to March 1944, he served as chief of staff for Admiral John Towers, commander of the Pacific Fleet's air forces. He was assigned to Washington, D.C., as assistant to the deputy chief of naval operations for air from December 1943 to March 1944. Radford became commander of Carrier Division Six in November 1944, a position he held to the end of the war. After a brief stint as air commander of the Pacific Fleet, he was promoted to vice admiral in January 1946. He was given command of the Second Task Fleet, Atlantic, in February 1947 and appointed vice chief of naval operations in January 1948. Radford opposed the unification of the armed forces in 1947 and, in the fall of 1949, was a leading figure in the revolt of the admirals against the Truman administration's emphasis on strategic air power. In April 1949, he was promoted to full admiral and took command of the Pacific Fleet.

During the Korean War, Radford had responsibility for all naval operations. A vigorous anticommunist who declared that the United States would not be secure as long as communists controlled mainland China, the admiral gained the support of powerful congressional Republicans such as Senator ROBERT TAFT of Ohio. When, after winning the presidential election in 1952, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER made a trip to Korea, he met with Radford, who impressed him. Partly to placate the right wing of his party, Eisenhower selected Radford to be chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in May 1953.

Radford was one of the chief architects of the Eisenhower administration's so-called New Look in defense policy. The Korean War convinced Radford of the futility of engaging in conventional ground warfare. He also questioned the need to have American troops in western Europe when the United States had nuclear superiority over the Soviet Union. Based on these considerations, Radford, his fellow chiefs of staff, and Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES formulated a policy that stressed a reliance on air power, technology, and strategic nuclear weapons. Radford believed that the New Look had many advantages. First, American troops would not be called upon to fight unpopular wars, such as that in Korea. Second, having supersonic bombers armed with nuclear weapons ready to attack at any moment would deter Soviet and Chinese aggression. Third, the New Look enabled the administration to reduce defense budgets, since the weapons systems cost less than maintaining large numbers of conventional forces around the world.

Admiral Arthur Radford, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Critics of the policy argued that it meant a return to unilateralism. They also maintained that the threat of nuclear attack would prove ineffective against guerrilla warfare. Finally, they contended that the New Look did not provide a credible defense, because the United States would not be the first nation to use nuclear weapons in the event of hostilities.

Radford took a hard-line position toward Asian communism that was often at odds with Eisenhower's own policies. In March 1954, the French chief of staff, General Paul Henry Ely, requested immediate American aid to lift the communist siege of Dien Bien Phu in northern Vietnam. Eisenhower placed a series of conditions on American military assistance, including freedom for the associated states of French Indochina, British participation, and the involvement of at least some Southeast Asian nations. The French general went to Radford, who was more receptive, and they approved joint U.S.-French plans for an air strike against positions held by the Vietminh around Dien Bien Phu. Radford thought that Eisenhower might not be able to resist pressure to intervene as a French defeat became imminent.

On April 3, 1954, Dulles called a meeting at the State Department at which Radford outlined his plans for intervention to eight senior senators. The admiral had to admit that they did not have the unanimous support of the other chiefs and that the bombings could bring China into the war. The army chief of staff, General MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY, strongly dissented and maintained that the bombings would be inconclusive and might lead to the introduction of American troops. The senators shared Ridgway's skepticism toward the proposed operation. The following day, Radford met with Eisenhower, who rejected the admiral's proposal. Until the fall of Dien Bien Phu on May 7, Radford persisted in calling for the United States to intervene.

Radford took a similarly hard line when Chinese communist shore batteries began shelling the Nationalist-held islands of Quemoy and Matsu on September 3, 1954. Three days later, the joint chiefs, headed by Radford, voted three to one (with Ridgway dissenting) to recommend that Eisenhower authorize Chiang Kai-shek to bomb the mainland. If the Communists retaliated, the group suggested that U.S. forces be placed in the islands and that the United States join the bombing raids. Radford believed that war between the United States and Communist China was inevitable and that it would be better to fight China when it was weak than wait until it had grown in strength. Eisenhower, however, thought that the islands had little strategic value and wanted to avoid a general war with China. By late October, when the Chinese appeared ready to launch an invasion, the chiefs still operated on the assumption that the United States would strike the mainland when the assault occurred. Eisenhower instructed them to abandon that assumption. If the Chinese invaded Taiwan, he wanted the Seventh Fleet to take defensive action while he called an emergency session of Congress. The president wanted no strike against the Chinese mainland without first consulting Congress.

In January 1955, when the Chinese shelled the Tachen Islands (200 miles to the north of Taiwan), Radford once again urged the United States to bomb the mainland. Eisenhower rejected Radford's recommendation. In the spring of 1955, Eisenhower tried to defuse the crisis by suggesting that Chiang reduce the number of his troops on Quemoy and Matsu, a gesture that he hoped the mainland Chinese might reciprocate. Eisenhower sent Radford and Assistant Secretary of State Walter Robertson to present the plan to the Nationalist leader, who rejected it. In the end, however, the Communists reduced their shelling of the islands and, by the middle of May 1955, ended it.

Radford also took a hard line toward the Soviet Union and publicly opposed any attempt at a disarmament agreement with the Soviets. In May 1957, shortly before he retired, Radford dismissed the possibility with the comment, "we cannot trust the Russians on . . . anything." At a press conference, Eisenhower made a point of saying that "it seems to me that the more any intelligent man thinks about the possibilities of war today, the more he would understand you have got to work on this business of disarmament."

A man with a tough, no-nonsense manner, Radford remained a controversial figure throughout his career. Although acknowledged as a brilliant naval officer, his tendency to dominate those around him drew criticism, as did his tendency to portray his own views as those of the chiefs of staff.

Following his retirement in 1957, Radford served on government committees to study military aid and the merchant marine. He also served on the boards of directors of several corporations. Radford served as Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON's military adviser during the presidential campaign of 1960. Four years later, Radford again was an adviser to the Republican presidential candidate, Senator BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.). Radford died in Bethesda, Maryland, on August 17, 1973.

—MSM

Rand, Ayn

(1905–1982) writer

Born Alisa Zinovévna Rozenbaum in Saint Petersburg, Russia, on February 2, 1905, Rand lived through the Russian Revolution during her school years. She supported the February Revolution in 1917 but denounced the Bolshevik Revolution from the outset. Victory for the Bolsheviks brought the confiscation of her father's pharmacy and her family's financial and social ruin. In 1921, she entered the University of Petrograd where she read history and from which she graduated in 1924. That same year, she entered the State Institute for Cinema Arts to study screenwriting. She went to the United States in 1926 on a temporary visa to visit relatives in Chicago and never returned to Russia. Before long, she moved to Hollywood, where she found work as an extra, a filing clerk, office head of the wardrobe department, and a scriptwriter. She became a naturalized citizen in 1931.

Between 1932 and 1942, she produced two novels, three plays, and numerous movie scripts. She sold her first screenplay, Red Pawn, to Universal Studios in 1932. Her first stage play, staged in Hollywood as Woman on Trial, was later performed in New York as The Night of January 16th. She moved to New York in 1935, when her play began its run, and worked as a secretary for an architectural firm. Rand completed her first novel, We the Living, in 1933. It depicted the brutality of life under communist rule in the Soviet Union. Numerous publishers rejected it before the Macmillan Company published it in 1936. American reviewers and intellectuals responded coolly to the play's anticommunist message. She published a second novel, Anthem, in 1938.

Published by Bobbs-Merrill in 1943 after being rejected by 12 other publishers, her third novel, The Fountainhead, received generally unfavorable reviews but became a best seller. Set in an architectural firm, the book dramatized her own philosophy, which came to be known as objectivism. Rand held that all virtue stemmed from individual creativity and that the egotistical pursuit of rationally defined self-interest accounted for all great achievements. She maintained, however, that in the 20th century mass democracy, egalitarianism, and the altruistic ideals of Christianity all militated against individual genius. Rand identified the theme of The Fountainhead as “individualism versus collectivism, not in politics, but in man’s soul,” and its purpose as “a defense of egoism in its real meaning.”

The novel’s hero, Howard Roark, has so much talent and is such an individualist that his work, though brilliant, receives little recognition. He refuses to compromise his designs to satisfy clients and is eventually forced to take a job at a granite quarry. Upon his return to architecture, he is again thwarted by small-minded orthodoxy. When one of his designs is adulterated by mediocre minds, he dynamites the building. At his trial, Roark delivers an impassioned defense of the value of selfishness, the importance of creators, and the need to remain true to oneself. The jury acquits him.

Rand returned to Hollywood in 1943 to help write the screenplay for the film version of The Fountainhead. The movie, starring Gary Cooper and Patricia Neal, did not come out until 1949. When released, the film fared well at the box office, and Rand stayed in Hollywood to write screenplays for the Hal Wallis Studio.

A fervent anticommunist, Rand appeared before the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) in 1947 to testify about the discrepancy between her own experiences and the way the film Song of Russia (1943) portrayed life in the Soviet Union. She also produced a pamphlet, called Screen Guide for Americans, designed for distribution to writers in Hollywood. It advised them not to smear industrialists or denigrate the free enterprise system in their scripts.

Rand moved to New York in 1951, where she devoted herself to her next novel, on which she had been working since 1943. Published in 1957, Atlas

Shrugged tells the story of Dagny Taggart, a female railroad executive who, along with other creators, is hampered by government regulation and attempts to socialize major industries. A group of industrialists and other creators and innovators withdraw from a society dominated by social “parasites” and retire to a remote valley. The leader of this “strike of the mind,” John Galt, goes on the airwaves to explain the strike. As the economy crumbles, the government offers to make Galt the economic dictator, but he refuses, even after being tortured. In an armed confrontation, Taggart and other strikers rescue Galt and retreat to the valley. Eventually, facing a state of collapse, the country is forced to call them back to positions of responsibility and respect.

Rand asserted “that man exists for his own sake” and “that the pursuit of his own happiness is his highest moral purpose.” She advocated laissez-faire capitalism, which would guarantee free trade and, implicitly, the economic dominance of the creative elite. Philosophically, she placed total faith in reason. She held that “objective reality exists independently of any perceiver or of the perceiver’s emotions, feelings, wishes, hopes, or fears.” Further, the human mind was capable of grasping this reality and applying it to life. She rejected all religions because she thought that they limited individual capacities and impulses. “My philosophy,” she wrote in the appendix to Atlas Shrugged, “in essence, is the concept of man as a heroic being, with his own happiness as the moral purpose of his life, with productive achievement as his noblest activity and reason as his only absolute.”

Rand won a devout following for her ideas, and her novels continued to sell well. Her wide popularity gave her a platform to espouse her own ideology and to comment on political issues. After Atlas Shrugged, she turned to nonfiction to communicate her ideas. Usually identified as a conservative, she often differed from other theorists of the Right. Indeed, Rand and her followers often clashed with other conservatives, particularly those associated with WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY, JR., and his magazine, the National Review, which she called the “worst and most dangerous magazine in America.” Reviewing Atlas Shrugged in the National Review, WHITTAKER CHAMBERS called the book “sophomorism” and “remarkably silly.” Further, he asserted that it could be “called a novel only by devaluing the term.” Most disturbing to Chambers, however, was what he described as the book’s “antireligious gospel of philosophic materialism,” which he contended argued for the same godless system as the Soviet Union. Garry Wills, the scholar and journalist, claimed that Rand was not a conservative at all; her characters worked from “the first principle of historical Liberalism . . . the immediate perfectibility of man.” Because of intellectual differences and personal animosities, objectivism was not absorbed into the emerging conservative mainstream.

After 1960, Rand continued to write and expound on her philosophy in a number of books: For the New Intellectual (1961), The Virtue of Selfishness (1964), Capitalism: The Unknown Ideal (1966), Introduction to Objectivist Epistemology (1967), The Romantic Manifesto (1971), The New Left: The Anti-Industrial Revolution (1971), and Philosophy, Who Needs It? (1982). She held visiting lectureships at prestigious universities, including Yale, Princeton, and Columbia. Rand edited the Objectivist Newsletter from 1962 to 1965 and an expanded periodical, The Objectivist, from 1966 to 1971. She also edited the Ayn Rand Letter from 1971 to 1976. Through these publications, she expressed her own eclectic tastes (she loved both Rachmaninoff and Mickey Spillane). Her books and periodical writing elaborated on the ideas in her fiction; they also defended her fiction against critics. Throughout it all, Rand advocated individualism and capitalism while condemning religion.

She supported BARRY GOLDWATER’s campaign for the presidency in 1964. During the 1970s, she attracted followers among college students and became something of a cult figure among libertarians. Rand, however, spurned libertarians as a “random collection of emotional hippies-of-the-right who seek to play at politics without a philosophy.” She supported GERALD R. FORD for president in 1976 but opposed Ronald W. Reagan, whom she regarded as lacking a program or an “ideology of life.” Further, she wrote, since Reagan “denies the right to abortion, he cannot be the defender of any rights.”

However popular her novels, Rand probably would not have inspired a movement had it not been for Nathaniel Branden, whom she met in 1950 when he was a student at UCLA and wrote her a fan letter. In the mid-1950s, they became lovers, even though both were married. Later Branden became the spokesperson for Rand’s movement and her manager. In 1968, Rand learned that he had another lover and severed relations with him; she ordered her followers to do the same. The affair did not seem to disrupt Rand’s marriage to Frank O’Connor. The couple, who wed in 1929, remained married until his death in 1979.

Rand had major surgery for cancer in 1975 and died in New York City on March 6, 1982.

—MSM

Randall, Clarence B(elden)

(1891–1967) chairman, Commission on Foreign Economic Policy; special consultant to the president on foreign economic policy; special assistant to the president on foreign economic policy

The son of a shopkeeper, Randall was born in Newark Valley, New York, on March 5, 1891. He studied at the Methodist-affiliated Wyoming Seminary in Kingston, Pennsylvania, from 1906 to 1908 and then attended Harvard University, from which he graduated Phi Beta Kappa in 1912. After earning an LL.B. at Harvard in 1915, his high ranking in his class earned him an offer from the prestigious New York law firm, Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft. He turned down the offer and began practicing law with a cousin in Ishpeming, Michigan. His career was interrupted by service in the army during World War I. After enlisting, he served as a lieutenant and aide to a general in France. Randall returned to his practice after the war and in 1925 joined Inland Steel Company. After a visit to a coal mining camp in Wheelwright, Kentucky, where he found appalling conditions, Randall ordered that the camp be rebuilt to provide a higher standard of living. He became vice president of Inland Steel in 1930, president in 1949, and chairman of the board in 1953. Under his leadership, the company became, by 1952, the seventh-largest steelmaker in the United States.

During the postwar period, Randall served as a consultant on steel and coal to the Economic Cooperation Administration, created to implement the Marshall Plan. He also emerged as a leading spokesperson for the steel industry. While he frequently spoke against policies of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations that he regarded as "socialist" or "collectivist," he also insisted that industry respond to human needs. Early in his own career, Randall helped to draft Michigan's worker's compensation law. When President HARRY S. TRUMAN seized the steel mills in 1952, the leaders of the steel industry chose Randall as spokesperson for the nation's 92 steel companies. He became a national figure when he gave a speech carried on all television and radio networks in which he denounced Truman's action. The Supreme Court later declared Truman's seizure of the mills unconstitutional.

Randall became an important figure in the Eisenhower administration's attempts to encourage freer trade. In August 1953, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER appointed Randall to chair the 17-member Commission on Foreign Economic Policy, known as the Randall Commission. The commission's report, issued in January 1954, recommended that Eisenhower extend the reciprocal trade program for three years. It also advised a reduction of tariffs "on products which are not being imported or which are being imported in negligible volume" to 50 percent of the rates in effect on January 1, 1945, even without reciprocal concessions. Finally, it called for a reduction to 50 percent ad valorem any tariff rate in excess of that figure.

The Randall Commission also proposed a revision of foreign economic policy. It suggested giving grants to countries unable to maintain their own security while making loans to nations in need of economic aid. Although supporting the ban on exports to Communist China and North Korea as well as efforts to block trade in military materials with eastern Europe, the panel recommended increased trade with eastern Europe to "serve to penetrate the Iron Curtain and advance the day when normal relationships with . . . Eastern Europe may be resumed." Further, the commission's report argued, such trade would benefit the economies of western Europe.

Both foreign and domestic officials greeted the report with favor. Impressed with Randall's work, Eisenhower appointed him as a special consultant to the White House to help formulate trade legislation. Not all reaction was favorable, though. In March 1954, 17 economic experts at a conference on U.S. foreign economic policy held at Princeton University attacked the panel's recommendations. They charged that the report failed to consider long-term questions in American foreign economic policy, such as European integration, and they faulted it for ignoring the domestic recession and particular problems involved in American trade with underdeveloped nations.

Congress, too, proved reluctant to accept the commission's recommendations. Eisenhower proposed a three-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Act, instead of the usual one-year extension, and asked for authority to cut tariffs more deeply. Congress blocked the program in 1954. After a bitter struggle, Eisenhower signed legislation in 1955 that provided for the extension of reciprocal trade agreements and implementation of tariff cuts over a three-year period.

Randall retired as chair of the board of directors of Inland Steel in April 1956, but he continued to serve as a consultant to the government. In July, he was appointed special assistant on foreign economic policy, and he later became chair of the President's Council on Foreign Economic Policy. In that position, he criticized American business leaders for failing to act more aggressively to prevent Soviet economic penetration of underdeveloped nations. In May 1958, Randall proposed a liberalization of travel restrictions between communist and Western nations to ease tensions. Eisenhower applauded the recommendation as a "powerful influence on behalf of peace."

Randall continued to serve as a consultant to government during the administration of JOHN F. KENNEDY. From 1961 to 1963, he headed a presidential panel reviewing federal pay schedules and in 1963 became chairman of the State Department's advisory committee on international business problems. President LYNDON B. JOHNSON awarded him the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1963. Randall expressed his views in a number of books, including A Creed for Free Enterprise (1952), A Foreign Economic Policy for the United States (1954), Over My Shoulder (1956), The Communist Challenge to American Business (1959), The Folklore of Management (1961), and

The Executive in Transition (1967). After suffering a heart attack, Randall died in Ishpeming, Michigan, on August 4, 1967.

—MSM

Randolph, A(sa) Philip

(1889–1979) president, Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters

The son of a minister in the African Methodist Episcopal Church, A. Philip Randolph was born in Crescent City, Florida, on April 15, 1889. He graduated from the Cookman Institute (later Bethune-Cookman College) in Jacksonville, Florida, in 1911 and, frustrated by the economic limitations he faced in the south, joined the prewar migration of southern African Americans to New York City. He worked at various jobs while taking night courses in political science, economics, and philosophy at City College of New York. Randolph joined the Socialist Party soon after his arrival in New York and in 1917 cofounded The Messenger, which was, according to its slogan, the “only magazine of scientific radicalism in the world published by Negroes.” The magazine reflected the pacifism of its founders and opposed American participation in World War I. It also urged African Americans to demand better wages and working conditions in wartime industries. In addition, the publishers concluded that African Americans could achieve full citizenship rights only through force, either economic or physical. At this time, Randolph also began his lifelong association with the trade union movement. During World War I, he attempted to unionize black shipyard workers in Virginia and organized a small local for elevator operators in New York City.

During the 1920s, The Messenger began publishing the work of young black writers and poets and became an important voice of the Harlem Renaissance. In 1925, Randolph began a campaign to unionize the employees on Pullman sleeping cars. The Messenger became the official organ of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. After a 12-year struggle, the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters gained recognition from the Pullman Company in 1937. By that time, Randolph had emerged as one of the nation’s most prominent black leaders. He served as president of the National Negro Congress in 1935.

After World War II broke out in Europe and the United States prepared for the possibility of war, many Americans found work in defense industries. Discrimination, however, often barred African Americans from such jobs. In 1941, Randolph’s threat to organize a march on Washington by over 50,000 African Americans persuaded a reluctant President Franklin D. Roosevelt to issue an executive order banning racial discrimination in defense plants and government employment. The order also created a temporary Fair Employment Practices Committee (FEPC).

After World War II, the emerging cold war led President HARRY S. TRUMAN to ask Congress for a peacetime draft. Randolph turned his attention on desegregation of the armed services. His campaign, along with the defection of southern delegates from the Democratic convention in 1948, pressed Truman to issue an executive order ending segregation in the military.

When Randolph brought the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters into the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in 1935, many unions in the AFL excluded African Americans. Beginning that year, Randolph annually introduced a resolution at the AFL convention calling on the group both to devote more energy to organizing black workers and to expel member locals that continued to discriminate. Randolph’s eloquent words and resonant baritone voice failed to sway the delegates. Indeed, many delegates chose to leave the convention hall during Randolph’s yearly appearance at the podium. William Green and GEORGE MEANY, who succeeded Green as president in 1952, defended the AFL’s policy, established by Samuel Gompers, that left racial policies exclusively to the locals.

When JOHN L. LEWIS, president of the United Mine Workers and one of the few white leaders of organized labor to oppose racial discrimination, walked out of the AFL and formed the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), Randolph went with him. The AFL merged with the CIO in 1955, and the constitution of the new AFL-CIO contained a strong antidiscrimination provision. A vice president of the merged union, Randolph demanded immediate enforcement of the antidiscrimination policy. At the executive council meeting in 1956, he moved that the AFL bar the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, known for its discrimination against African Americans, until the union ended its racist policies. Meany, who preferred to work behind the scenes to end discrimination, opposed the motion. The executive council supported Meany's position.

Randolph's advocacy of racial equality repeatedly led him into conflict with the merged union's leadership. At the national convention in 1959, Randolph introduced a resolution to deny entry to the International Longshoremen's Association. Meany indignantly asked Randolph why he had not first discussed the proposal with the executive council. The president then reprimanded Randolph for not "playing on the team" and advised Randolph to sit "a little closer to the trade union movement and pay a little less attention to outside organizations." A few moments later, Randolph introduced another resolution calling for the expulsion of two railroad brotherhoods if they did not cease discriminating within six months. Meany, who supported gradual desegregation, opposed the time limit. He warned Randolph that integration might not be achieved in their lifetime. Randolph then introduced a third resolution calling for the expulsion of member unions charged with racism. Meany then exploded, "Who the hell appointed you the guardian of all the Negroes in America?" Randolph responded, "Brother President, let's not get emotional."

Meany's outburst publicized the problem of racism in labor unions. Although Randolph and Meany sought to downplay the incident, their rift persisted. In 1960, Randolph and other black unionists formed the Negro American Labor Council (NALC) to fight for change within the AFL, and Randolph became its first president. In October 1961, the AFL-CIO censured him for once again urging the union to take disciplinary action against segregated unions. Meany told the press, "We can only get moving on civil rights if he comes to our side and stops throwing bricks at us."

During the four years he held the presidency of the NALC, Randolph sought persistently to combat racism in the labor movement from within the AFL-CIO. This placed him in an increasingly sensitive position. The AFL-CIO's leadership took offense at Randolph's efforts to eliminate racist policies by member unions; younger militants in the black labor organization wanted to adopt a more confrontational posture toward the AFL-CIO and challenged Randolph's leadership. At its convention in 1961, the AFL-CIO effectively rescinded the censure of Randolph and passed a resolution in support of civil rights. In November 1962, Randolph opposed a campaign, sponsored by the NAACP, to decertify trade union locals that discriminated against minority workers. Randolph's position was that "we must carry out our fight within the house of labor."

Randolph worked closely with other civil rights leaders during the 1950s and 1960s. He was an organizer of the Prayer Pilgrimage in support of civil rights legislation in 1957. He sponsored a Youth March for Integrated Schools in both 1958 and 1959. In 1963, he was an organizer of the March On Washington, at which MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., delivered his famous speech proclaiming his dream of racial equality.

Nevertheless, Randolph took a different approach from most black leaders of that era. While King and ROY WILKINS agitated for civil rights, Randolph fought for the elimination of economic barriers faced by African Americans. A socialist and a dedicated trade unionist, he focused on economic solutions to America's racial problems.

Randolph enthusiastically supported LYNDON B. JOHNSON's equalize war on poverty and opposed American intervention in Vietnam because it diverted funds from programs designed to reduce or eliminate poverty. At the Democratic National Convention in 1964, Randolph supported a compromise, sponsored by Johnson, that would have allowed the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) two seats. The MFDP, which challenged the all-white delegation from Mississippi, rejected the compromise. By the end of the 1960s, younger, more militant members of the Civil Rights movement eclipsed Randolph, and some dismissed him as an Uncle Tom. In September 1968, an aged and ailing Randolph retired as president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. He died in New York City on May 16, 1979.

—MSM

Rankin, J(ames) Lee

(1907–1996) solicitor general

Born in Hartington, Nebraska, on July 8, 1907, Rankin attended public schools and earned his B.A. from the University of Nebraska in 1928. He received his LL.B. from the same institution in 1930. Upon graduating from law school, he joined a law firm in Lincoln, Nebraska, and became a partner in 1935. In the late 1930s, he developed an interest in Republican politics. In 1948, Rankin served as Nebraska manager for the presidential campaign of THOMAS E. DEWEY. Four years later, he chaired DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's election committee in Nebraska. After winning the presidency, Eisenhower appointed Rankin assistant attorney general in charge of the office of legal counsel, where Rankin worked under his friend and fellow Nebraskan, Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL.

Rankin served as chief adviser to Brownell in the formation of legal policy from 1953 to 1956. Since the Eisenhower administration had not yet appointed a solicitor general, Rankin appeared before the Supreme Court, in December 1953, as an amicus curiae in Brown v. Board of Education. Representing the U.S. government's position, he supported the position of the black plaintiffs that segregated public schools violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Supreme Court struck down segregated public schools in May 1954. In other matters, Rankin helped draft legal opinions on the questions of U.S. agricultural trade with the Soviet Union and on presidential succession. He also played an instrumental role in resolving conflicting claims by western states to the Colorado River.

Eisenhower announced Rankin's appointment as solicitor general in August 1956. Because of his role in Brown and his close identification with civil rights, many observers thought that southern senators might block his confirmation, but the Senate approved Rankin's nomination in May 1957. As solicitor general, Rankin had responsibility for all government briefs and arguments in cases before the Supreme Court. He also decided which cases the government would appeal; only the attorney general could overrule his decisions. During the Supreme Court term in 1956–57, Rankin argued for the government in several cases arising from congressional investigations of alleged communist activities. He argued unsuccessfully that the Court should sustain the conviction of John T. Watkins, an organizer for the United Automobile Workers, for contempt of Congress arising from his refusal to divulge the names of persons linked with communist activities. Later that year, he argued, again unsuccessfully, to uphold the conviction of Julius Shields under the Smith Act.

During 1957 and 1958, Rankin became embroiled in the dispute over whether the states or the federal government owned tidelands oil. In December 1957, Eisenhower reaffirmed his support for the Submerged Lands Act of 1953, which gave states jurisdiction offshore up to the three-mile limit. Eisenhower further stated that he hoped the Court would rule in favor of Texas's claims of ownership beyond that point. Rankin supported the opposing view, maintaining that the federal government was entitled to oil revenues from drilling beyond the three-mile limit. Two days after Eisenhower's statement, Attorney General WILLIAM P. ROGERS overruled Rankin and gave assurances that the Justice Department's final brief would not conflict with the president's position.

Rankin pressed for implementation of a court order desegregating Central High School in Little Rock, Arkansas. In August 1957, he argued that delaying desegregation on the basis of segregationist sentiment within the community would breed disrespect for the law and lead to violence. The Supreme Court upheld this view and ordered the immediate desegregation of Central High School. The following year, Rankin joined THURGOOD MARSHALL, the lead attorney for the NAACP's Legal Defense Fund, in urging immediate desegregation of Little Rock's remaining high schools. The Supreme Court again upheld the solicitor general's position. In March 1960, Rankin brought a challenge to a law passed by Alabama's state legislature that had redrawn the boundaries of Tuskegee, Alabama, effectively to exclude black voters. The Supreme Court struck down the law in 1961.

With the end of the Eisenhower administration, Rankin entered private practice in New York City. He represented the American Civil Liberties Union when it acted as a friend of the court in Gideon v. Wainwright (1962), in which the Supreme Court held that an indigent person accused of a crime had a right to be provided legal counsel at public expense. In 1963 and 1964, he served as general counsel to the President's Commission to Investigate the Assassination of President Kennedy (generally known as the Warren Commission). In December 1965, JOHN V. LINDSAY, the mayor-elect, named Rankin corporation counsel for New York City, a position he held from 1966 to 1972, when he resigned to enter practice with his son. Rankin also taught constitutional law at New York University Law School. He retired in 1978 and moved to Weston, Connecticut. In 1993, he moved to Los Gatos, California, where, beginning in 1995, he suffered a series of strokes. He died in Santa Cruz, California, on June 26, 1996.

—MSM

Rankin, Karl L(ott)

(1898–1991) ambassador to Taiwan, ambassador to Yugoslavia

The son of a clergyman, Rankin was born in Manitowoc, Wisconsin, on September 4, 1898. He grew up in Topeka, Kansas, and graduated from Mercersburg Academy in Pennsylvania in 1916. After serving in the navy during World War I, he attended the California Institute of Technology. He studied engineering at Zurich's Federal Polytechnic Institute in 1920 and 1921 and received a B.S. in civil engineering from Princeton University in 1922. After graduating, he served as a field engineer in Turkey and supervised construction for the Near East Relief in the USSR (Caucasus region) from 1922 to 1925. He managed a real estate development company from 1925 to 1927.

In 1927, Rankin began a career in the foreign service as assistant trade commissioner in Prague. During the 1930s and 1940s, he served as commercial attaché and counselor for economic affairs in various European capitals. He was in Brussels when the Nazis overran Belgium in 1940. That same year, he achieved the rank of consul. In 1941, he was in Belgrade when the Luftwaffe bombed the city. When the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor and invaded the Philippines in December 1941, Rankin was in Manila and was interned by the Japanese. After 21 months in detention, he was repatriated in an exchange of prisoners. He then served in Cairo and Athens (1944–45, 1947–49), Belgrade (1945–46), and Vienna (1946–47). In 1948, he became a career minister, the highest rank for nonpolitical appointees in the State Department. Rankin was transferred to the Far East in 1949, where he held the post of consul general in Canton, Hong Kong, and Macao. From 1950 to 1953, he was minister and chargé d'affaires at Taipei. In February 1953, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER named Rankin ambassador to Nationalist China (Taiwan).

As ambassador, Rankin supported the American commitment to defend Taiwan against an invasion by the Chinese Communists, but he opposed American aid to the Nationalist effort to maintain possession of the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu. As early as October 1953, he encouraged Chiang's government to formulate a mutual security pact with the United States, and in July 1954 he conducted negotiations for such an agreement. After Communist China began shelling Quemoy and Matsu in September 1954, Rankin attempted to minimize the islands' importance. When the Joint Chiefs of Staff recommended military action against Communist China over the incident, Eisenhower declined to take such action and pressed for the conclusion of a mutual defense pact with the Nationalists. Rankin supported the president's position. He reported to Washington that the Nationalist strategy was to "exaggerate the military danger" of a Communist conquest of Quemoy and Matsu as a means of gaining more American aid and warned the Nationalist foreign minister, George Yeh, against precipitating war with the mainland over the islands. The mutual security pact was finally signed in December 1954.

When Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES made a trip to Taipei in February 1955, Nationalist leaders told him how vital the islands were to Taiwan's defense. Rankin cabled the State Department that Yeh "may have exaggerated their importance." Rankin maintained that the loss of the islands would be "very serious but not necessarily disastrous." Significantly, Dulles, who advocated action against the mainland, failed to consult Rankin during his visit.

Rankin was not successful in cultivating the goodwill of the population of Taiwan. On May 24, 1957, he was mobbed during anti-American riots at the American embassy following the murder of a peeping tom by an American soldier. Thirty-three thousand Nationalist troops restored order the following day.

Rankin became ambassador to Yugoslavia in January 1958. He served at that post until 1961, when he resigned from the diplomatic corps. In 1964, he published his autobiography, China Assignment. He died in Kennebunk, Maine, on January 15, 1991.

—MSM

Rauh, Joseph L(ouis)

(1911–1992) lawyer, national chairman, Americans for Democratic Action

The son of a German immigrant who had established a business manufacturing shirts, Rauh was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on January 3, 1911. He graduated from Harvard College magna cum laude in 1932 and Harvard Law School, where he finished first in his class, in 1935. Rauh then served as law clerk at the Supreme Court, first to Justice Benjamin Cardozo and then to Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER. He also worked for several New Deal agencies. Commissioned a lieutenant in 1942, Rauh served on the staff of the army's Pacific Command and rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel. From 1946 to 1947, he was deputy to Wilson Wyatt, head of the Veterans Emergency Housing Program. In 1947, Rauh joined Wyatt and other liberals in leaving the Truman administration to protest what they regarded as its conservative direction.

Rauh was one of a group of liberals who, in 1947, formed Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) to advocate the expansion of New Deal welfare programs, federal regulation of the economy, and protection of civil liberties. At the same time, the ADA explicitly rejected "any association with communism or sympathizers with communism in the United States" and espoused an internationalist, anticommunist foreign policy. Rauh was selected chair of the ADA's executive committee that year, a position he held until he served as national vice chairman from 1952 to 1955. He was chairman from 1955 to 1957, after which he resumed the post of vice chairman.

During the Truman and Eisenhower administrations, Rauh supported liberal causes in his private law practice as well as in his activities with the ADA. His clients included WALTER REUTHER's United Auto Workers and A. PHILIP RANDOLPH's Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. Rauh represented Lillian Hellman, ARTHUR MILLER, John T. Watkins, and William Remington when they testified before the House Un-American Activities Committee. When Miller was indicted on charges of contempt of Congress in 1956 for refusing to identify former associates who had attended meetings of the Communist Party, Rauh represented him. Although Miller was convicted in trial court, a federal appeals court overturned his conviction. After Remington, an economist with the Commerce Department, was convicted of perjury for denying that he had been a member of the Communist Party, Rauh represented him on appeal. Rauh carried the case of Watkins, who had been convicted of contempt for refusing to disclose the names of persons who had been communists but were no longer members of the party, to the Supreme Court and in 1957 won a decision denying the right of the House Un-American Activities Committee to use its investigative powers simply for the purpose of exposure. Despite his aggressive defense of those accused of communism, Rauh refused to defend avowed communists.

As chief spokesman for the ADA during the Eisenhower administration, Rauh repeatedly attacked the administration for failing to pursue liberal goals. Never given to understatement, Rauh stated in 1954 that "Eisenhower has produced the saddest excuse for a legislative program since McKinley." The following year, he held the president personally responsible for heading "the most corrupt administration since Harding."

Although most of Rauh's rhetorical fire was directed at Republicans, Democrats were not exempt. In 1956, he accused Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) of bringing the Democratic Party "to the lowest point in 25 years" by imitating, rather than opposing, Eisenhower. Rauh also questioned ADLAI STEVENSON's credibility as the leader of the liberal wing of the Democratic Party. Stevenson's statement in 1956 that moderation "is the spirit of our times," which many regarded as a call for caution on civil rights, particularly distressed

Rauh, who wrote Stevenson and urged him to make a strong statement supporting school desegregation and condemning discrimination in voting. Stevenson responded by claiming that his position on civil rights was clear. Rauh replied, "Ike has the squatter's rights on the middle road. Let him have it."

At the Democratic convention in 1956, Rauh and the ADA lobbied for a plank in the platform calling for support of the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which struck down segregated public schools. One month before the convention, Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY (D-Minn.) promised to back Rauh, but the senator withdrew his pledge when his name emerged as a possible vice presidential candidate. Stevenson and the ADA's honorary chair, ELEANOR ROOSEVELT, also opposed Rauh's proposed plank, and it was not reported to the floor.

In 1960, the ADA's national board warned the Democratic Party that, to win the election, it had to nominate a liberal who would offer "a clear alternative to the reactionary Republican candidate." To accomplish this, Rauh's strategy was to stop Johnson. Rauh calculated that the candidacies of Humphrey and Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) had divided liberals in the party. Rauh supported Humphrey, the more liberal of the two candidates, and he worried that, if Stevenson entered the race, a three-way split among liberals would deadlock the convention and throw the nomination to Johnson. Rauh therefore publicly called on liberals to end their sentimental loyalty to Stevenson. When Humphrey withdrew from the race, Rauh endorsed Kennedy.

As he had in 1956, Rauh demanded a strong civil rights plank in the Democratic platform. In July 1960, he appeared before the platform committee to present the ADA's call for strong federal action to end all forms of racial discrimination. To his surprise, the delegates approved a plank far closer to his wishes than the one in the 1956 platform.

Kennedy's selection of Johnson as his running mate personally embarrassed Rauh, who had promised many supporters of Stevenson that their candidate would get the second spot on the ticket. Rauh denounced the choice of Johnson as a "double cross" of liberals and predicted that the Texan would be a disaster for the ticket. He joined a group of liberals in an abortive stop Johnson movement. When it failed, however, Rauh enthusiastically campaigned for the ticket.

During the 1960s, Rauh continued to serve as spokesperson for the ADA. Relations between the ADA and the Kennedy administration were not close. Rauh repeated his demands for civil rights measures and criticized the Kennedy administration for failing to prohibit the use of federal funds for the construction of racially segregated housing. He also opposed the Kennedy administration's bill to legalize wiretapping in certain instances. Beginning in 1964, Rauh served as the general counsel of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of national civil rights groups. At the Democratic convention in 1964, he represented the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party in its efforts to supplant the segregationist delegation from Mississippi. Rauh lobbied vigorously for the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the Fair Housing Act of 1968. He opposed the war in Vietnam and supported Senator EUGENE MCCARTHY's (D-Minn.) antiwar candidacy in 1968. During the administration of RICHARD M. NIXON, Rauh opposed the nominations of CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH and G. Harold Carswell to the Supreme Court. During the 1970s, he mobilized amicus curiae briefs supporting affirmative action in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke (1978). Rauh died in Washington, D.C., on September 3, 1992.

—MSM

Rayburn, Samuel T(aliaferro)

(1882–1961) U.S. congressman, Speaker of the House, minority leader

The son of a Confederate veteran and poor farmer, Rayburn was born in Roane County, Tennessee, on January 6, 1882. When he was five, the family moved to Fannin County in northeastern Texas, where his father bought a 40-acre cotton farm. Rayburn attended rural schools and left home to attend East Texas Normal College (later East Texas State Teachers College), where he earned his tuition by doing various chores at the college. After graduating in 1903, Rayburn taught at local schools. In 1906, he won election as a Democrat to the state house of representatives and held that seat from 1907 to 1913. In between legislative sessions, he studied law at the University of Texas. Rayburn was admitted to the bar in 1908, after which he began to practice law in Bonham, Texas. After being elected speaker of the Texas house in 1912, he became the youngest speaker in the history of Texas.

As a candidate for the U.S. House of Representatives in 1912, Rayburn advocated income and inheritance taxes, low tariffs, direct election of U.S. senators, and the right of recall at the state and local level. After winning the Democratic primary by a narrow margin, he easily carried the general election. He won reelection 24 consecutive times, during which time he never even had a Republican opponent. In Congress, Rayburn backed most of President Woodrow Wilson's domestic programs but offended organized labor, which had little influence in his predominantly rural district, by voting against child labor bills and opposing the nationalization of railroads. He became an ally of John Nance Garner, a fellow Texan and power in the House of Representatives. Rayburn served as Garner's campaign manager when the latter unsuccessfully sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 1932. After Franklin D. Roosevelt won the nomination, Rayburn served as Garner's representative in the negotiations that led Roosevelt to select Garner as his running mate.

Roosevelt easily won the election in November, and Rayburn subsequently supported most New Deal programs and played a major role in the passage of regulatory legislation. As chair of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee from 1931 to 1937, Rayburn sponsored the Federal Securities Act of 1933, the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, and the Rural Electrification Act of 1936. After becoming majority leader in 1937, he worked closely with Roosevelt to map out legislative strategy. In 1939, Rayburn began an unsuccessful effort to win a place on the national Democratic ticket in 1940. However, when the Speaker of the House, William B. Bankhead (D-Ala.), died in September 1940, Rayburn was unanimously elected to succeed him. Rayburn firmly supported all of Roosevelt's war measures, except gasoline rationing, which powerful oil interests in Texas opposed.

Rayburn was President HARRY S. TRUMAN's chief supporter in Congress and one of his closest advisers. With the notable exception of civil rights measures, Rayburn backed most of Truman's domestic program, including proposals for national health insurance, housing, education, and an increase in the minimum wage. As minority leader from 1947 to 1949, Rayburn opposed the Taft-Hartley Act, tried to limit Republican cuts in Truman's programs, and attempted to block tax reductions favoring higher incomes. In foreign policy, Rayburn supported the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan. Although he supported much of the New Deal and Fair Deal, colleagues regarded him as more of a centrist than a liberal. In 1947, Rayburn declined Truman's offer of the vice presidential nomination.

Rayburn became Speaker again after the elections of 1948. In January 1949, he succeeded in securing the adoption of the 21-day rule, a measure that reduced the power of the Rules Committee, which was dominated by conservative southern Democrats. A coalition of southern Democrats and conservative Republicans had been able to block the flow of legislation to the floor of the House. Two years later, however, the next Congress refused to adopt the 21-day rule. Rayburn often tried to forge compromises between the Truman administration and southern Democrats in Congress. In 1951, for example, he proposed a compromise solution to the controversy over whether the federal or state governments should control offshore oil. In doing so, he offended the oil interests, which favored state jurisdiction. Although inclined to search all possible avenues of cooperation with the Soviet Union, Rayburn reluctantly came to support Truman's policy of containment. In January 1951, he broke the record of Henry Clay for length of service as Speaker.

When President Truman announced in March 1952 that he would not seek reelection, Senator A. S. "MIKE" MONRONEY (D-Okla.) attempted to mount a campaign for Rayburn's nomination as a presidential nominee acceptable to both the north and the south. That strategy ran quickly into trouble. ALLAN SHIVERS, the Democratic governor of Texas and a political enemy of Rayburn, dominated the state Democratic convention and chose its delegation to the Democratic National Convention.

Without support from his own state, Rayburn had virtually no chance to win the party's nomination.

As the permanent chair of the national convention in Chicago, Rayburn used his power to gain the presidential nomination for Truman's candidate, ADLAI STEVENSON. Senator ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) had won some impressive victories in the primaries and led on the first two ballots at the convention. Kefauver's forces, sensing imminent victory, wanted a third roll call immediately. Rayburn, however, called a recess to enable Truman, who was en route to Chicago, to meet with key figures at the convention. Stevenson won the nomination on the third ballot.

During the 1950s, Rayburn worked with the Eisenhower administration to enact its foreign policy. As minority leader in the 83rd Congress, Rayburn backed the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and opposed efforts by conservative Republicans to cut $2 billion from the administration's foreign aid package in 1953. The following year, he opposed the Bricker amendment, which would have limited the president's power to make treaties.

On domestic matters, Rayburn and Eisenhower were both centrists and agreed on most basic issues. Although the Speaker generally supported Eisenhower's domestic initiatives, he sometimes opposed the administration. In 1953, he worked against a measure, backed by the administration, that would have stripped the Southwest Power Administration of authority to transmit electricity to Rural Electrification Administration cooperatives. The next year, he opposed a bill to free the stock issues of middle-size companies from the jurisdiction of the Securities and Exchange Commission and a tax cut that Democrats charged would primarily benefit corporations.

In the elections of 1954, Democrats regained control of Congress, and Rayburn once again became Speaker. During his previous tenure in that post, Rayburn had gained a reputation as one of the strongest Speakers in U.S. history. Speakers in the 19th century had maintained their power through the right to make committee assignments and sit on the Rules Committee, which controlled the flow of legislation from the committees of original jurisdiction to the floor. In the Progressive uprising against

Speaker Joe Cannon, sometimes called the Revolution of 1910, the Speaker lost those powers. Rayburn, however, was able to dominate the chamber through persuasion and informal influence, based in large measure on respect for his legendary integrity (he accepted no money from lobbyists, refused travel expenses for speaking tours, and went on only one congressional junket during his 48 years in Congress, for which he paid his own way), his lack of pretension, and his effectiveness as a conciliator of factional disputes. He exercised indirect control of the legislative process and committee assignments through his relationships with chairs of committees and subcommittees. Rayburn enforced party discipline through similar methods; only rarely did he use his power to influence committee assignments or in other ways advance or impede the careers of his colleagues. Although he claimed that he never asked a member to vote against his principles, the Speaker generally expected Democratic representatives to vote for legislation supported by their leaders. He famously advised freshmen representatives: "If you want to get along—go along."

With the Democrats in the majority after the elections of 1954, Rayburn and Eisenhower worked more closely than before. In 1955 and 1956, the Speaker again supported reciprocal trade and foreign aid bills supported by the administration. Although up to that point he had consistently opposed civil rights measures, Rayburn quietly lent his support to the administration's civil rights bill in 1956. Even though the great majority of southern Democrats in the House opposed it, the measure passed the lower chamber. Southern Democrats, however, blocked it in the Senate.

Rayburn came into conflict with some Democratic liberals in 1955 when he backed the Formosa Resolution, which gave the president authority to use U.S. troops in defense of Taiwan and the Pescadores in case of attack by the Chinese Communists. A number of representatives believed that congressional authorization was superfluous and that the resolution represented an effort by the administration to procure blanket approval for any actions it might take. The Speaker, however, contended that presenting a united front to the world should be the foremost consideration of Congress. The resolution passed the House by a vote of 410 to 3.

Rayburn again served as permanent chair for the Democratic National Convention in 1956. He actively promoted his protégé, Senate Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) for the vice presidential nomination. Toward that end, he helped Johnson wrest control of the party organization in Texas from Shivers. Despite Rayburn's strenuous objections, however, Stevenson, who once again captured the presidential nomination, left the choice of a running mate to the convention. The leading contenders included Kefauver and Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). On the second ballot, Kennedy was only 40 votes short of a majority when the Kentucky delegation asked for recognition to transfer its 30 votes from Senator ALBERT GORE (D-Tenn.) to Kennedy. Rayburn, however, recognized the Tennessee delegation, which switched its votes from Gore to Kefauver. This reversed the trend to Kennedy and enabled Kefauver eventually to win the nomination. Although Rayburn did not have a high opinion of Kennedy at the time, it was not entirely clear whether the Speaker's action was calculated to deny Kennedy the nomination.

After the elections of 1956, Rayburn and Johnson came under increasing fire from Democratic liberals for being too conciliatory toward Eisenhower and for not promoting comprehensive welfare legislation. In November 1956, PAUL BUTLER, the chair of the national party, formed the Democratic Advisory Council (DAC). Butler intended it as a vehicle to enable liberals to circumvent the Democratic leadership in the House and Senate in formulating the party's legislative programs. Rayburn and Johnson refused to join the group, and, without their participation, the panel had little influence.

In 1957, Rayburn cooperated with the administration to obtain passage of the first civil rights law since Reconstruction. The House passed the administration's proposals largely intact, but the Senate substantially weakened the measure. Rayburn accepted the Senate's watered-down version of the administration's civil rights bill and got it through conference committee and the full House. Rayburn again cooperated in passing the Civil Rights Act of 1960, aimed at protecting black voting rights.

In response to the obstructionism of the Rules Committee, liberals in the House formed the Democratic Study Group (DSG) in an effort to increase their influence. With the assistance of the minority leader, JOSEPH MARTIN (R-Mass.), Rayburn was able to pry some bills backed by the DSG from the Rules committee, which was chaired by the conservative HOWARD W. SMITH (D-Va.). Major legislation, however, such as a multibillion dollar housing bill, languished in the Rules Committee, and members of the DSG became increasingly impatient with the party's leadership.

Shortly after the Democratic sweep in the congressional elections of 1958, Representative CHET HOLIFIELD (D-Calif.), speaking for the DSG, demanded Rayburn's assistance in reestablishing the 21-day rule. The Speaker refused on the grounds that the inevitably bitter struggle over the rule would polarize the Democratic Party going into the presidential election of 1960. He promised, however, to induce the Rules Committee to report out all major bills sent to it during the 1959-60 congressional term. Rayburn did secure release of the housing bill in 1959 (which Eisenhower vetoed) but failed to keep his promise on a number of other bills, including area redevelopment and aid to schools.

Some liberal publications began to refer to Rayburn as an "Eisenhowercrat" in 1959. Rayburn's inability to force passage of liberal legislation resulted at least in part from the selection of Representative CHARLES HALLECK (R-Ind.) to replace Martin as minority leader in January 1959. Rayburn and Martin had maintained a cooperative relationship, but Halleck was more partisan and combative than his predecessor. He replaced two Republican moderates on the Rules Committee with more conservative members and was not inclined to use his influence on Rayburn's behalf.

Rayburn also assumed a more partisan stance. In the presidential year of 1960, the Speaker gave his support to a five-part package of social legislation, which the Eisenhower administration strongly opposed. Democrats intended, by introducing the legislative proposals, to focus on differences between the parties and provide the Democratic ticket with issues on which to run. It also appeased liberals in Congress, who had long agitated for more liberal and partisan leadership in Congress. Congress rejected bills providing for an increase in the minimum wage and more extensive coverage, health care for the aged under Social Security, federal aid for school construction, and housing programs. Eisenhower vetoed the one measure to pass Congress, federal loans and grants for redevelopment of economically depressed areas.

Beginning in 1959, Rayburn backed Johnson's bid for the presidency. He urged Johnson to enter the primaries, but Johnson believed that leaders in the House and Senate would provide him with the votes he needed from their states' delegations. Rayburn declined to serve once again as chair of the Democratic National Convention in order to serve as Johnson's floor manager and nominated Johnson at the convention. When Kennedy offered Johnson the vice presidential nomination, Rayburn at first urged his fellow Texan to reject it. Rayburn initially thought the office would be a political dead end but changed his mind after speaking with Kennedy. Rayburn campaigned heavily for the Democratic ticket in Texas, which Kennedy carried by a narrow margin of 46,000 votes.

In January 1961, Rayburn, with Kennedy's support, sought to gain control of the Rules Committee. On January 31, the House voted 217–212 to enlarge the panel from 12 to 15 members. The new members of the committee consisted of two Democratic supporters of the administration and one Republican. This gave liberals a majority on the committee and paved the way for the social legislation passed in the 1960s. Rayburn's modified version of Kennedy's minimum wage bill, tailored to meet objections of Republicans and southern Democrats, became the basis of legislation adopted in May 1961. Suffering from cancer, Rayburn flew home to Bonham, Texas, in August 1961 and died there on November 16, 1961. His 17 years as Speaker was the longest tenure in history.

—MSM

Reed, Daniel A(Iden)

(1875–1959) U.S. congressman; chairman, Ways and Means Committee

Born in Sheridan, New York, on September 15, 1875, Reed attended public schools and received an LL.B. from Cornell University in 1898. After being admitted to the bar in 1900, he practiced law in Chautauqua County. He served as an attorney for the excise department of the state of New York from 1903 to 1909. Reed then became the football coach at Cornell University from 1909 to 1918. He served as a member of the Special Food Conservation Mission to France and Britain in 1917 and 1918. Upon his return to the United States, New York's 43rd district elected him to the U.S. House of Representatives as a Republican in 1918. He won reelection 20 successive times, serving in the House from March 4, 1919, until his death in 1959.

During his first decade in Congress, his major concerns were education and serving the interests of New York State. In 1932, he obtained a seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee, where he emerged as a supporter of sound money and strict limits on federal spending. An advocate of reduced taxes, he authored a bill in 1950 to raise exemptions to $700 and reduce most excise levies by 10 percent to 20 percent.

When the Republicans won control of Congress in the elections of 1952, Reed became chair of the Ways and Means Committee. In the first year of the Eisenhower administration, he opposed the president on two tax bills. On January 3, he introduced a bill to advance the scheduled elimination of an 11 percent increase in personal income taxes, passed to help fund the Korean War, from January 1, 1954, to July 1, 1953. Eisenhower refused to countenance a tax cut until he had a balanced budget. Reed also attempted to block a bill backed by the administration to extend the excess profits tax on corporations, also passed during the Korean War, from June 30, 1953, to December 31, 1953. Eisenhower later recalled using "every possible reason, argument, and device" in an effort to persuade Reed. When that failed, the president exerted pressure on Republican members of Congress. On February 16, Ways and Means favorably reported Reed's bill to move up the elimination of the increase in income taxes, but, with the help of Speaker JOE MARTIN (R-Mass.), the administration succeeded in bottling up Reed's measure in the Rules Committee. The Ways and Means Committee began hearings on the measure to extend the excess profits tax in June. Reed remained adamantly opposed to the extension and rejected Eisenhower's personal appeals to allow a vote by the committee. The president and congressional leaders decided to circumvent Reed if necessary, and on June 25, the Rules Committee, at the behest of Martin, took the extraordinary step of reporting the bill to the House without a report from Ways and Means. Reed hinted at resigning from Congress in protest. The Republican leadership in the House avoided a showdown by postponing a vote by the House on the decision by the Rules Committee scheduled for June 29. On July 8, the Ways and Means Committee overrode Reed's objections and voted to report the bill providing for an extension of the excess profits tax. Reed then offered two compromise versions of the measure, both of which the Ways and Means Committee also rejected. Congress passed the administration's proposal, and Eisenhower signed it into law in July.

Reed also opposed the administration's reciprocal trade policy. In January 1954, Eisenhower asked for a three-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Old Guard Republicans, including Reed, opposed the measure, and the president settled for a bill providing for a one-year extension. Although Reed voted for the compromise measure, he condemned the principle of reciprocal trade. He cautioned against the danger of allowing cheap Japanese goods into the United States. Further, he warned, "the insatiable desire to promote exports at any cost has made it possible for our enemies to obtain from our own shores the war materials which they needed in order to wage aggressive war." In 1955 and 1958, when reciprocal trade bills included longer extensions and presidential power to cut tariffs, Reed voted against the measures.

When Democrats regained control of Congress in the elections of 1954, Reed adopted a more partisan role as a defender of the administration. In 1955, he attacked a proposal, supported by Democrats, to cut income taxes; he asserted that defense and other urgent spending made a reduction unwise. The following year, Congress voted a temporary increase in the statutory limit on the public debt for fiscal 1957. Noting that the limit was less than those for 1955 and 1956, Reed praised "the magnificent accomplishments of this Administration in putting the fiscal affairs of the nation in order." In 1958, he introduced a bill incorporating Eisenhower's suggestion that the states assume responsibility for federally financed programs in the areas of vocational education, waste-treatment facilities, planning for slum clearance, and repair of public facilities damaged in natural disasters.

Reed's record on civil rights was somewhat mixed. Although he was one of the few Republicans who opposed federal legislation to ban the poll tax, he did support antilynching legislation. During the Eisenhower administration, Reed voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

He died in Washington, D.C., on February 19, 1959.

—MSM

Reed, Stanley F(orman)

(1884–1980) associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court

The son of a physician, Reed was born in Minerva, Kentucky, on December 31, 1884. After attending local private schools, he earned a B.A. from Kentucky Wesleyan College in 1902 and a second B.A. from Yale University in 1906. He studied law at the University of Virginia, Columbia University, and the Sorbonne but never earned a law degree. Upon gaining admission to the Kentucky bar in 1910, he established a successful law practice in Maysville and Ashland. He spent nine years as a single practitioner and then became a partner in Worthington, Browning and Reed. During that time, he became active in Democratic politics. In 1912, he won election to the first of two consecutive terms in the Kentucky general assembly. After serving in the army during World War I, he returned to Maysville and his legal practice until 1929, when President HERBERT HOOVER appointed him general counsel to the Federal Farm Board. Hoover appointed him general counsel to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (RFC) in 1932. Reed remained at the RFC under the new administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt. In March 1935, Roosevelt named him solicitor general. As solicitor general, he defended major New Deal legislation before the Supreme Court. Although he won 11 of the 13 cases he argued before the nation's highest court, he suffered major defeats when the justices struck down the National Industrial Recovery Act in Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States (1935) and the Agricultural Adjustment Act in United States v. Butler (1936).

Roosevelt appointed him to succeed George Sutherland on the Supreme Court in 1938. Widely regarded as a liberal at the time of his elevation to the Court, Reed's career as a justice did not bear out that estimation. An advocate of judicial restraint, he believed that the judiciary should defer to the legislature and the executive unless their actions were clearly unconstitutional. In his early years on the bench, he voted to sustain federal economic regulations and social welfare laws. During the administration of HARRY S. TRUMAN, however, his commitment to judicial restraint and his own inclination to favor the power of the executive and the legislature led him to vote consistently to sustain the exercise of governmental authority, particularly in the area of internal security, at the expense of individual liberties. When the Court rejected the argument that Truman had constitutional authority to issue an executive order seizing privately owned steel mills in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer (1952), Reed joined Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON's dissent. In American Communication Association v. Douds (1950), Reed voted with the majority to sustain the noncommunist oath provision of the Taft-Hartley Act. He also voted with the majority to sustain the conviction of communist leaders under the Smith Act in Dennis v. United States (1951). Reed wrote for the majority in Carlson v. Landon (1952), which sustained the right of the government to jail alien communists and hold them without bail until the attorney general's office determined whether they could be deported.

During the Eisenhower administration, Reed continued to support the government's antsubversive efforts. When the majority ruled, in Peters v. Hobby (1955), that the Civil Service Commission's Loyalty Review Board had exceeded its authority by auditing on its own initiative a favorable judgment by a departmental loyalty board and ordering the dismissal of a consultant with the Public Health Service, Reed dissented. A year later, Reed wrote for the minority when the Court struck down Pennsylvania's antsubversive law on the ground that Congress had preempted the field (Pennsylvania v. Nelson [1956]) and dissented when the majority held that government employees could be dismissed as security risks only if they held sensitive positions (Cole v. Young [1956]).

In supporting judicial restraint, Reed generally sided with Justices FELIX FRANKFURTER and ROBERT JACKSON against the judicial activists and civil libertarians on the Court led by HUGO BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS. He interpreted the Bill of Rights narrowly. In United Public Workers v. Mitchell (1947), Reed wrote for the majority in a decision that rejected the argument of federal employees that the Hatch Act denied them rights guaranteed by the First Amendment. According to Reed, "It is accepted constitutional doctrine that fundamental human rights are not absolute. This court must balance the extent of the guarantees of freedom against Congressional enactment to protect a democratic society against the supposed evil of political partisanship by employees of the government." Writing for the majority in Adamson v. California (1947), Reed explicitly rejected Black's theory that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated the Bill of Rights and therefore applied it to the states. Perhaps Reed's fullest expression of his views came in Breard v. City of Alexandria, Louisiana (1951), in which he wrote that the First and Fourteenth Amendments "have never been treated as absolute. Freedom of speech or press does not mean that one can talk or distribute where, when and how he chooses." Similarly, in Poulos v. State of New Hampshire (1953), Reed upheld the conviction of Poulos for failing to obtain a license to conduct a religious service in a park. The Court, declared Reed, had never held that rights guaranteed by the First Amendment could not be regulated. Rather, it "had indicated approval of reasonable nondiscriminatory regulations by governmental authority that preserve peace, order and tranquility."

In criminal cases, Reed was reluctant to upset a conviction on the grounds that a confession had been coerced. He voted to do so only when presented with strong evidence of coercion. His opinion in Adamson v. California rejected the application of the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against self-incrimination to the states.

Reed's record with respect to civil rights was mixed. His Kentucky background notwithstanding, he voted to support black claims for equality of treatment in Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada (1938), Sipuel v. Oklahoma State Board of Regents (1948), Sewatt v. Painter (1950), and McLaurin v.

Oklahoma State Board of Regents (1950). Reed also wrote the opinion for the majority in Smith v. Allwright (1944), which struck down Texas's white primary. In District of Columbia v. John R. Thompson Co., Inc. (1953), Reed, despite some personal reservations, joined a unanimous Court in upholding a Reconstruction-era municipal statute banning discrimination in places of public accommodation in Washington, D.C. He balked, however, when it came to holding racial segregation itself unconstitutional. The first of what would be five companion cases consolidated under the heading Brown v. Board of Education reached the Court in the fall of 1952. These cases presented the Court with the issue of the constitutionality of segregation. Reed believed that segregation did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment so long as blacks received equal treatment. When the justices first discussed the cases in conference, Reed alone held that view. After a series of legal maneuverings and re-arguments, the justices met in early 1954 to vote on the cases. Reed apparently prepared to write a dissent. In the end, Chief Justice EARL WARREN persuaded Reed to make the Court's decision striking down segregated public schools unanimous by asking him whether a lone dissent by a southerner would be the best thing for the country.

Reed retired from the Court in February 1957. Assessing Reed's tenure on the bench, C. Herman Pritchett, a political scientist and analyst of the Supreme Court, described the justice as "a 'center judge,' occupying generally a middle position between the Court's conservative and liberal wings" but one who tilted to the right on cases involving civil liberties.

Following his retirement, Reed divided his time between Washington and his farm near Maysville. In November 1957, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER named him to chair the United States Civil Rights Commission created by the Civil Rights Act of 1957. Reed withdrew from the job in December, because he feared that his service in an investigatory and advisory post might lower public respect for the impartiality of the judiciary, of which he was still a member. Subsequently, he accepted numerous assignments to hear cases in the U.S. Court of Claims and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. With his health failing, he withdrew from all public activities in 1967 and retired to Huntington, New York, where he died on April 2, 1980.

—MSM

Reston, James

(1909–1995) journalist

Born in Clydebank, Scotland, on November 3, 1909, Reston emigrated with his parents to Dayton, Ohio, at the age of 11. When his parents became naturalized citizens, he automatically gained the same status. After graduating in 1932 from the University of Illinois, where he captained the Big Ten championship golf team, Reston returned to Ohio to begin his newspaper career as sports editor of the Springfield Daily News. After a brief stint as publicity director for the Cincinnati Reds, he joined the Associated Press in 1934 as a sportswriter based in New York. In 1937, the Associated Press sent Reston to London, where he covered sports and the British Foreign Office. Reston joined the London bureau of the New York Times on September 1, 1939, the day Adolf Hitler's armies marched into Poland. His coverage of the Nazi bombing of London and his account of the blitz in Prelude to Victory (1942) established him as one of the most promising reporters on the Times. He was assigned to the Washington bureau in December 1940. In late 1942, Reston took a leave of absence from the paper to work for the Office of War Information. He returned to the Times in 1944 to become the administrative assistant to Arthur Hayes Sulzberger, the paper's publisher. Reston went back to Washington as national correspondent in 1945; he became diplomatic correspondent in 1948.

In 1953, Reston succeeded ARTHUR KROCK as head of the Washington bureau. An astute judge of journalistic talent, Reston revitalized the bureau by hiring promising young reporters and nurturing them. He introduced a sense of informality in the bureau that was decidedly absent under his predecessor. His liberalism also contrasted with Krock's conservatism. In addition to his managerial responsibilities, Reston published his own column three times a week. Reston's observations on foreign affairs gained him national recognition. His articles combined realism with a strong sense of morality that derived from his strict Presbyterian upbringing.

By the time President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER and Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES came to power, Reston had moderated his earlier hard-line anti-Soviet views. Reston enjoyed a cordial personal relationship with Dulles and, by the journalist's own account, "spent more time with him than with any other secretary of state from the forties to the nineties." Dulles served as a source for Reston, but this did not prevent the columnist from frequently criticizing the secretary of state and the foreign policy of the Eisenhower administration. Reston was especially harsh after Dulles, in an interview with Life magazine in January 1956, explained that on three occasions he had taken the United States to the "brink" of war to face down communist aggression.

Although strongly drawn to Eisenhower's opponent in 1952, ADLAI STEVENSON, whose virtues Reston extolled in his column, the journalist, troubled by Stevenson's lack of decisiveness, voted for Eisenhower in that election. During Eisenhower's first term, Reston criticized the president for being "a symbol of the atmosphere of the time: optimistic, prosperous, escapist, pragmatic, friendly, attentive at moments of crisis and comparatively inattentive the rest of the time."

Reston detested Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) and his anticommunist antics. By his own later calculation, however, Reston and the Times were cautious in taking on the senator, particularly in the early days of his crusade against communists in government. By the spring of 1954, however, Reston openly attacked the junior senator from Wisconsin. In March 1954, Reston condemned the administration for "playing a waiting game" with McCarthy in the expectation that the American people would get bored with the senator or that he would discredit himself. Reston acknowledged the likelihood of the latter in particular. However, the columnist warned, McCarthyism would not likely disappear, irrespective of what happened to McCarthy. So long as the nation lived in fear of atomic war and remained "unadjusted to the terrible responsibilities of world leadership," new McCarthys would emerge to exploit the "fears and frustrations of the people." The senator from Wisconsin, asserted Reston, "did not create this situation; he merely exploited it." Moreover, McCarthy had already won "a considerable victory" in that he "has demonstrated, in the atmosphere of fear, that violence and deceit can be made to pay in American political life." The journalist claimed that McCarthy had already silenced many honorable men in Congress and elsewhere and seized control of a large part of the Republican Party. Worse still, Reston suggested, the junior senator from Wisconsin had become a model for rising young politicians on Capitol Hill. Reston concluded that, for a variety of reasons, Congress was unlikely to put a stop to McCarthy's nonsense; the responsibility therefore fell to the president.

When Eisenhower left office in 1961, Reston delivered an assessment of the president's eight years. "He was a good man in a wicked time; a consolidator in a world crying for innovation; a conservative in a radical age; a tired man in a period of turbulence and energetic action." In Eisenhower's own terms, however, Reston acknowledged that "he has had a successful administration;" the president had successfully avoided what he feared most—war and depression. Further, Eisenhower had broken the isolationist tradition of his party and presided over an era of prosperity. "Swift action" on his part blocked "Communist thrusts in Guatemala and in Lebanon." The United States helped end the Suez Crisis and avoided intervention in Hungary. The administration accepted truces in Indochina, Korea, the Formosa Straits, and Berlin. In those instances, Reston wrote, "nothing has been settled but nothing vital to the free world has been lost." In domestic affairs, Reston praised Eisenhower for consolidating the policies of the New Deal and the Fair Deal. In conclusion, wrote Reston, "President Eisenhower at least maintained enough power to deter the big war and the big depression, that was his . . . objective from the start."

Reston continued writing his column into the 1960s and 1970s. He stepped down as bureau chief in 1964 to concentrate on his column. In 1968, he became executive editor of the New York Times. After 13 months, he relinquished the position of editor in favor of spending more time on his column. His nationally syndicated column appeared regularly until 1987, at which point he became a senior columnist. He retired from the Times in 1989.

During his 50-year association with the Times, he won two Pulitzer Prizes (for reporting in 1944 and 1956) and was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1986. Reston published a collection of his columns, titled Sketches in the Sand, in 1967, and Deadline, a volume of memoirs, in 1991. He died of cancer in New York on December 6, 1995.

David Halberstam, whom Reston recruited to the Times, described Reston as “the dominant Washington journalist of the fifties.” No one had more high-level sources than Reston, and some critics charged that he treated them too kindly in print. Reston retorted that “hatchet men” could not get their calls returned, which left them only with their opinions. “I wouldn’t like that,” he concluded, “because my own opinions aren’t that good.” Reston’s column was at its best when breaking a story or working closely from his own reporting.

—MSM

Reuther, Walter P.

(1907–1970) president, United Automobile Workers

The son of an immigrant German brewery worker and union leader, Walter Reuther was born in Wheeling, West Virginia, on September 1, 1907. Raised in a tightly knit socialist family, he attended high school in Wheeling but left at 16 to go to work. After working as a handyman, he became an apprentice as a tool and die maker. Reuther moved to Detroit in 1927, where he became a skilled tool and die worker at the Ford Motor Company. He went to work on the night shift and earned a high school diploma from Fordson High School. He then enrolled in Detroit City College (later Wayne State University). The Great Depression politicized Reuther and his brothers, Victor and Roy. Reuther campaigned vigorously for Norman Thomas’s presidential candidacy in 1932. After that, he and Victor set out on a world tour, which included a 16-month sojourn as skilled workers in a Soviet auto factory. Returning to Detroit in 1935, Reuther plunged into labor organizing and socialist politics. In 1936, he became a full-time organizer for the United Automobile Workers (UAW). Although technically ineligible for membership in the UAW because he did not work in the auto industry, he was elected to its executive board when the union declared its independence from the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in 1936. Reuther played a significant role in the sitdown strikes that began in 1936 and in the establishment of UAW Local 174, of which he became president. Local 174 quickly came to represent 30,000 workers. Subsequently, the UAW became the largest union in the nation, and Reuther emerged as its most influential leader.

Like many other radical unionists, Reuther resigned from the Socialist Party in the late 1930s and endorsed the alliance between the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) and Franklin D. Roosevelt’s Democratic Party. In 1940, the Reuther brothers formed a caucus that fought for control of the UAW against a leadership coalition that included a small but influential communist group. With World War II underway and the United States contemplating the possibility of entering the war, Reuther proposed an aircraft production board, made up of representatives from government, industry, and labor, that would have exerted considerable control over production. Business leaders strongly opposed the plan. After the United States entered the war, Reuther initially backed the labor movement’s no-strike pledge but lent his support to wildcat strikes by UAW members. Immediately after the war ended, he led a dramatic 113-day strike against General Motors (GM). Reuther’s unprecedented demands for a wage increase without price increases and for union access to company books in order to prove that GM could afford such a concession earned him the allegiance of most noncommunist militants in the auto industry. It also earned him a wide following among left-liberals outside union ranks and led to his election as the president of the UAW in March 1946. Emerging as a leading spokesman for aggressive, politically oriented unionism, Reuther denounced the Truman administration and called for the formation of a labor party.

During the late 1940s, however, Reuther consolidated his control of the UAW and shifted away from radicalism and toward an acceptance of the existing structure of American politics and industrial relations. He became a power within the national Democratic Party and sought incremental social and economic advances for UAW members through collective bargaining. The contracts he signed with the auto industry in 1948 included a cost-of-living adjustment, determined by the general price index, and an annual "improvement factor," tied to increases in productivity.

In 1952, Reuther won election as president of the CIO. Early the following year, he reached agreement with GEORGE MEANY, president of the American Federation of Labor (AFL), to revive the dormant Joint AFL-CIO Unity Committee, a first step toward a merger of the two labor federations. As a precondition of unification, Reuther demanded a no-raiding agreement and serious action against racketeering in AFL unions. The AFL partially fulfilled these conditions by expelling the gangster-dominated International Longshoremen's Association in 1953 and agreeing to curb competition for bargaining rights where CIO unions had already won contracts. The willingness of many CIO leaders to unify on the AFL's terms, however, undermined Reuther's ability to win further concessions on these issues.

In February 1955, Reuther attended a meeting of the AFL Executive Council in Miami Beach, where he reached an agreement for a merger between the two large labor federations. A plan, drawn up by the CIO's counsel, ARTHUR GOLDBERG, won acceptance by both sides. Under Goldberg's proposal, the AFL retained both the presidency and the secretary-treasurership of the new organization. Reuther became one of 27 vice presidents and head of the Industrial Union Department. The merger became final in December 1955 at the founding convention of the AFL-CIO.

When the UAW and the Big Three automakers (GM, Ford, and Chrysler) entered contract talks in 1955, production was at record-breaking levels. Workers, however, endured annual layoffs during model changeovers. Reuther proposed a guaranteed annual wage for autoworkers and selected Ford as the target company for the union's campaign. Rather than risk a strike while its major competitor, GM, continued to operate, Ford offered a "supplemental unemployment benefit" plan (SUB), which called for the company to put five cents an hour into a fund that would be used to provide payments to laid-off workers. In combination with federal unemployment compensation, this guaranteed UAW members between 60 and 65 percent of their normal take-home pay for up to 26 weeks of a layoff. GM and Chrysler also accepted the SUB plan. Many at the time regarded the industry's adoption of the SUB as a stunning success for the UAW. However, Reuther's willingness to forgo a substantial wage increase antagonized skilled tool, die, and maintenance workers, who complained that their wage rates were falling behind the scales of AFL craft unions. Dissidents formed a rival organization, the Society of Skilled Trades, and petitioned the National Labor Relations Board for recognition in several plants. The UAW and the auto industry combined to block its efforts to win bargaining rights.

In 1957, Reuther proposed a shorter workweek without a reduction in pay. The timing was not propitious; a recession that year hit the auto industry hard, which reduced the UAW from 1.5 to 1.1 million members. Reuther concluded that the companies, which had nearly 1 million new cars in inventory, could afford to postpone production for an extended period, so he decided to avoid a strike. He therefore backed down on the demand for a shorter workweek and called instead for a profit-sharing plan. When the Big Three rejected that proposal, too, Reuther further reduced demands to improvements in the SUB, increases in pensions, and other fringe benefits. After four months of negotiations, during which union members continued to work without a contract, the UAW settled for what amounted to little more than a three-year renewal of the old contracts. The contracts signed in 1958 were the first in the UAW's history that did not include any major gains.

Under Reuther's leadership, the UAW became a dominant influence in Michigan's Democratic Party in the late 1940s. The influence of the UAW transformed a weak, relatively conservative state party into one of the most liberal and politically effective Democratic organizations in the country. The union mobilized Detroit's large population of autoworkers to help elect Governor G. MENNEN WILLIAMS for seven consecutive terms between 1948 and 1960 and to defeat two conservative Republican senators. During the 1950s, Reuther emerged as a leading voice for the labor-liberal coalition within the national Democratic Party.

In alliance with the NAACP and the Americans for Democratic Action (ADA), Reuther led an effort on behalf of a strong civil rights plank at the Democratic Convention of 1956. Despite his warning that the Democrats could not maintain the support of both southern segregationists and labor, Reuther pulled back from a floor fight over the platform. A strong supporter of ADLAI STEVENSON, he used his influence to prevent the Michigan delegation from backing AVERELL HARRIMAN at the convention and to win the AFL-CIO's endorsement for Stevenson in the general election.

An early and outspoken critic of corruption in the labor movement and an advocate of greater democracy within unions, Reuther parted company with most union leaders when he welcomed the investigation of racketeering in organized labor by the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, known as the McClellan Committee after its chair, Senator JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.). After the McClellan Committee's initial investigation of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Reuther called for the expulsion of that union from the AFL-CIO and played a major role in the formulation of codes of ethical practices for the AFL-CIO. In 1957, the UAW established a Public Review Board, consisting of seven prominent clergymen, lawyers, and professors, with authority to hear and make binding decisions on the appeals of union members against the UAW executive board.

Senators BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.), KARL MUNDT (R-S. Dak.), and CARL CURTIS (R-Neb.) urged the McClellan Committee to investigate the UAW. Over the objections of its chief counsel, ROBERT F. KENNEDY, the committee held hearings on the UAW between February 1958 and September 1959. The investigation focused on a prolonged strike by the UAW against the Kohler Company, a manufacturer of bathroom fixtures. Republican members of the committee tried to link the union to criminal activity and large-scale violence. They failed, however, to uncover corruption on a scale significant enough to equate the UAW with the Teamsters and other corrupt unions targeted by the committee.

Almost immediately after the merger of the AFL and CIO, differences in style and policies led to friction between Reuther and Meany. During the late 1950s, Reuther criticized Meany for what Reuther regarded as the AFL-CIO's complacency at home and its rigid anticommunism abroad. Reuther particularly took aim at Meany's unwillingness to curb jurisdictional raids by craft unions on industrial unions and his refusal to throw substantial resources into large-scale organizing drives. He further attacked Meany for holding meetings of the executive council at luxury hotels in Florida rather than meeting in the industrial cities of the North. With respect to foreign policy, Reuther objected to the government-supported, often clandestine overseas operations of Meany's aide, JAY LOVESTONE, who was head of the Free Trade Union Committee. These disagreements surfaced when top Soviet leaders visited the United States in 1959. Meany pointedly boycotted two union delegations led by Reuther that met with Soviet deputy premier Anastas Mikoyan and premier Nikita Khrushchev.

Generally regarded as the most influential labor leader at the Democratic National Convention in 1960, Reuther helped to deliver the nomination to Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). Although Kennedy's selection of Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) as his running mate shocked Reuther at first, he quickly fell into line behind the ticket and dissuaded the Michigan delegation from staging a floor fight over the nomination. Reuther also succeeded in preventing the AFL-CIO executive council from condemning Johnson.

During the 1960s, as local UAW leaders and rank-and-file members became more concerned with noneconomic grievances involving production standards and working conditions, Reuther encountered significant internal opposition to his policies. Recurrent wildcat strikes followed the negotiation of each companywide contract. At the same time, his disagreements with George Meany grew more intense. In 1968, Reuther formally withdrew the UAW from the AFL-CIO. The 60s were frustrating years for Reuther. Demands for civil rights, black power, and women's liberation joined the antiwar movement to replace Reuther and the labor movement at the cutting edge of social activism. Indeed, many of these movements regarded Reuther and his generation of labor leaders as obstacles or enemies. On May 9, 1970, Reuther and his wife were killed near Pellston, Michigan, when their chartered jet crashed on landing.

—MSM

Ribicoff, Abraham A(lexander)

(1910–1998) U.S. congressman, governor of Connecticut

The son of a Jewish immigrant from Poland who worked as a peddler and factory worker, Ribicoff was born in New Britain, Connecticut, on April 9, 1910. He grew up in a poor section of New Britain, where he attended public schools and worked delivering groceries and selling newspapers. After graduating from high school, he worked for a year at a factory that made zippers and buckles in New Britain to earn money to attend New York University. After a year, the company sent him to manage sales in its office in Chicago. He began taking night classes at the University of Chicago and, even though he had not completed a college degree, gained admission to the University of Chicago Law School, where he was editor of the law review. After graduating from law school in 1933, he returned to Connecticut, was admitted to the bar, and established a private practice in Hartford. In 1938, Ribicoff won election as a Democrat to the state's general assembly, where he served two terms and won acclaim from journalists as that state's "most able representative." From 1941 to 1943 and again from 1945 to 1947, Ribicoff served as a police court judge in Hartford.

Ribicoff won election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1948 and was reelected in 1950. Assigned to the House Foreign Affairs Committee, he helped to formulate the Australia-New Zealand-U.S. defense pact and the Philippine Security Treaty. Though generally known as a moderate and a supporter of the Truman administration, Ribicoff backed the Internal Security (McCarran) Act of 1950. Near the end of his second term in the House, he ran in an election to fill the unexpired Senate term of Brien McMahon (D-Conn.), who had died in July 1952. Ribicoff lost a close election to his Republican opponent, PRESCOTT BUSH, and, at the end of his term in the House, returned to private practice with his brother's law firm in Hartford.

In 1954, Ribicoff ran for governor against the Republican incumbent, John Davis Lodge. After a campaign in which he stressed the need to reform state government and increase state revenues, Ribicoff emerged the winner by 3,115 votes. His narrow victory and the fact that Republicans controlled the state legislature led Ribicoff to adopt a cautious, nonpartisan approach as governor. Avoiding new programs and reforms, he stressed administrative efficiency by eliminating or consolidating 20 state agencies. He held daily press conferences and kept state officials alert by calling department heads for information on questions he could not answer.

Ribicoff gained national attention in early 1956 with a campaign for highway safety that punished convicted speeders with automatic suspensions of their licenses for 30 days or more. As a result of the campaign and increased state spending for highway safety measures, traffic fatalities in Connecticut fell 11 percent from their level the year before. When Republicans complained that the penalties were too severe, Ribicoff derisively dubbed them the "pro-speeding" party.

Ribicoff's administration was so popular that it temporarily upset the normally close balance between Republicans and Democrats in Connecticut. Ribicoff won reelection by nearly 247,000 votes in 1958, and Democrats riding his coattails took control of the state legislature for the first time since 1876. The Democratic victory, however, brought little change in the customary caution of the governor, who often spoke of "the integrity of compromise." He did submit a bill to the legislature to eliminate Connecticut's outmoded system of county government, which had responsibility only for placing foster children and managing county jails. Passed by the legislature in May 1959, the bill transferred county functions to the state and abolished the county tax on cities and towns.

His record as governor brought him to prominence in the national Democratic Party, and Ribicoff increased his influence through his early support of the presidential aspirations of Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), with whom he became friends when they served together in the House. Ribicoff backed Kennedy's unsuccessful bid for the vice presidential nomination in 1956 and nominated Kennedy for the vice presidency at the convention. Along with John Bailey, the Democratic chairman of Connecticut, Ribicoff planned Kennedy's strategy in New England for the presidential race in 1960. Ribicoff served as Kennedy's chief spokesperson at the annual Governors' Conference in June 1960 and later that year was one of Kennedy's floor managers at the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles.

In return for his services during the campaign, Kennedy offered Ribicoff his choice of cabinet posts in the new administration. According to Kennedy's aides and biographers, ARTHUR SCHLESINGER, JR., and Theodore Sorensen, Ribicoff would have liked to serve as attorney general but thought it unwise for a Jewish official to preside over the prosecution of controversial civil rights cases in the South. He chose instead the position of secretary of health, education, and welfare (HEW) and resigned as governor at the end of 1960 to take up the post. Ribicoff spent much of his time as head of HEW advocating the administration's legislative programs for health care for the elderly and federal aid to education. Congress passed neither. Frustrated by a hostile Congress and a federal bureaucracy he considered cumbersome and unresponsive, he resigned his post in the cabinet in July 1962 and returned to politics in Connecticut. Ribicoff won election to the Senate in 1962 and was reelected by wide margins in 1968 and 1974. As chair of the Government Operations Subcommittee on Executive Reorganization, he gained wide attention for supporting motor vehicle safety standards, Medicare, federal aid to education, and environmental regulation. One of the most memorable moments of his career came in 1968, when he nominated Senator George McGovern (D-S. Dak.) for the presidency at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago. At a convention held amid protests against the war in Vietnam, Ribicoff accused Chicago's mayor, Richard Daley, of employing "Gestapo tactics" to suppress the protests. Daley shouted an epithet at Ribicoff from the floor, and turmoil broke out at the convention. In 1972, Ribicoff again nominated McGovern, who won the nomination but lost in a landslide to RICHARD M. NIXON. Ribicoff announced that he would not seek reelection in 1980.

After leaving the Senate, he joined the law firm of Kaye, Scholer, Fierman, Hays & Handler in New York City and resided in Cornwall Bridge, Connecticut. He died in New York City on February 22, 1998.

—MSM

Rickover, Hyman G(eorge)

(1900–1986) director of naval research, Atomic Energy Commission, director of nuclear propulsion, Navy Bureau of Ships

Rickover was born in Makow, in Russian Poland, on January 29, 1900. Fleeing poverty and anti-Semitism, his father emigrated to the United States and brought his family over in 1906. Rickover grew up in a Jewish area of Chicago, attended public schools there, and graduated from the naval academy in 1922. He served on the USS La Vallette and the USS Nevada before returning to Annapolis for a year at the naval postgraduate school, where he studied electrical engineering. He earned a M.Sc. in engineering from Columbia University in 1929. After attending submarine school in 1930, Rickover served on S-48, first as an engineer and then as executive officer. He served on the battleship New Mexico from 1935 to 1937, when he assumed command of the minesweeper Finch. Later in 1937, he became an engineering duty officer and served at the Cavite navy yard in the Philippines. In August 1939, he was assigned to the electrical section of the Bureau of Ships and became chief of the section in December 1940, a position he held throughout World War II and for which he received a Legion of Merit. Rickover left the electrical section in March 1945 to assume command of a planned naval repair base at Okinawa, but Japan surrendered before the base was completed.

After the war, the navy sent him to receive training in nuclear power at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, and to explore the possibility of using nuclear power for ship propulsion. The law that created the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) gave it a monopoly on the development of atomic energy. In February 1949, Rickover became head of a joint navy-AEC program to develop nuclear propulsion. Under Rickover's guidance, construction of the nuclear-powered submarine Nautilus began in June 1952 and was completed in January 1954. Between 1954 and 1959, the navy constructed three nuclear surface warships: the destroyer Bainbridge, the cruiser Long Beach, and the aircraft carrier Enterprise.

Despite his obvious ability, Rickover generated intense animosity. Although nuclear-powered ships offered many advantages over conventional ships, many naval officers opposed the construction of a nuclear navy, because the cost of constructing such ships was considerably higher than that of conventional ships. In the face of stiff opposition, Rickover fought hard for his nuclear ships. In addition, he assembled a crack staff for his nuclear projects during the 1950s and offended some in the service by prizing ability over rank. His incessant demands for high-quality work at low cost did not endear him to private industry, either. Further, his autocratic personal style won him no friends. His outspoken views and abrasive manner made him unpopular with his superiors, and Rickover was twice overlooked for promotion until an act of Congress promoted him from captain to rear admiral in 1953. He was promoted to vice admiral in 1958.

Rickover's experiences with personnel as well as his dissatisfaction with substandard workmanship by civilian contractors led him frequently to attack American education. In a series of public statements, he declared that U.S. students were ill prepared to meet the demands of an increasingly technological society. In February 1958, Rickover stated that, if necessary, he favored transferring money from the Defense Department to raise teachers' pay and improve education. He asserted that education was more important than defense expenditures and urged federal standards for teachers. He placed the blame for America's inadequate educational system principally on "professional educators" and warned Congress not to "make the mistake of strengthening the position of state boards of education." In 1959, he published Education and Freedom, which argued for higher standards, especially in math and science. The book also called for the establishment of national standards and warned that other nations provided their children with a better education. Particularly in the context of the cold war, Rickover asserted that America's inferior public schools placed the nation at risk. He wrote that "Education is the most important problem facing the United States today" and warned that "only the massive upgrading of the scholastic standards of our schools will guarantee the future prosperity and freedom of the Republic."

During the Kennedy administration, Rickover clashed with Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara over construction of a second nuclear-powered aircraft carrier, which Rickover strongly and unsuccessfully advocated. In the early 1960s, he also continued his public criticism of the American educational system. He published Swiss Schools and Ours: Why Theirs Are Better (1962) and American Education: A National Failure (1963). President LYNDON B. JOHNSON waived mandatory retirement for Rickover in 1964, which allowed the admiral to continue in the service. During the Johnson years, Rickover deplored the navy's acceptance of inferior materials, which he contended stemmed from the close connection between business and the military. Promoted to admiral in 1973, he remained on active duty until 1981 and retired on January 19, 1982. His interest in naval technology ranged widely. In 1976, he published a technical inquiry into the destruction of the battleship Maine, which led to the Spanish-American War. Rickover died in Arlington, Virginia, on July 8, 1986.

—MSM

Ridgway, Matthew B(unker)

(1895–1993) army chief of staff

The son of an army colonel, Matthew B. Ridgway was born in Fort Monroe, Virginia, on March 3, 1895, and raised on various army posts. Following his graduation from West Point in 1917, he spent World War I in the United States as a company commander and adjutant with the Third Infantry Regiment. From 1918 to 1924, he taught romance languages at West Point and became manager of the athletics program, during which time he was promoted to captain. He spent the interwar years serving in assignments in Central America, the Far East, and the United States. Promoted to major in 1932, he attended Command and General Staff School from 1933 to 1935, after which he served as assistant chief of staff for operations with the VI Corps. He attended the U.S. Army War College from 1936 to 1937 and was chief operations officer for the Fourth Army from 1937 to 1939. From 1939 to 1942, Ridgway was assigned to the war plans division of the War Department's general staff. While serving there, he was promoted to colonel. During World War II, Ridgway played an important role in the creation of army airborne units and, as commanding general of the 82nd Airborne Division, participated in the invasion of Sicily, the Italian campaign, and the invasion of Normandy. Ridgway became commander of XVIII Corps, which comprised three airborne divisions. His men were engaged in some of the heaviest fighting of the European campaign.

Ridgway received a promotion to lieutenant general in 1945 and, by the end of the war, was one of the army's most respected combat commanders. From 1945 to 1948, he briefly commanded U.S. forces in the Mediterranean theater and had extended assignments with the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations and the Inter-American Defense Board. In 1948, he was appointed head of the Caribbean command and the following year became deputy chief of staff for administration and training. After a brief stint as army deputy chief of staff, Ridgway commanded the Eighth Army during the Korean War. When President HARRY S. TRUMAN relieved General Douglas A. MacArthur, commander of the UN forces, in 1951, Ridgway replaced him. In 1952, he succeeded General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER as supreme commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) forces.

After assuming the presidency, Eisenhower appointed Ridgway army chief of staff in August 1953. Ridgway soon clashed with the administration over its "New Look" defense policy, which relied on technology, air power, and the nuclear deterrent. The administration's approach stemmed partly from a desire to reduce spending on defense and partly from a reaction to the Korean War. Cuts under this policy hit the army hardest. In 1954, Ridgway joined General JAMES M. GAVIN in protesting the New Look's cutbacks in the defense budget and reductions in army personnel. Instead, Ridgway called for a policy that provided for carefully measured responses to aggression with conventional forces in instances that did not warrant the use of nuclear weapons. Eisenhower regarded Ridgway's opposition to cuts in the army as "parochial," and relations between the two became strained.

In debates over military policy, Ridgway often served as a voice of moderation, countering the more belligerent policies of Admiral ARTHUR RADFORD, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. When the administration was considering a request from the French for U.S. military intervention in French Indochina during the spring of 1954, Ridgway opposed Radford's plan for air strikes. Ridgway doubted that the air power alone could achieve the objective and feared that, if bombing failed, there would be a strong temptation to send American ground troops. Ridgway ordered a team of experts to evaluate the situation in Indochina. Their subsequent report concluded that the United States was not ready to fight a guerrilla war of the type being carried on in the area. Eisenhower eventually decided against using military force to aid the French.

Ridgway also opposed Radford's recommendations after Communist China began shelling the Nationalist-held islands of Quemoy and Matsu in the fall of 1954. Radford and the majority of the Joint Chiefs argued that, although the islands had no strategic value to Taiwan, their loss would bring a collapse of Nationalist morale, which, in turn, would have implications for the defense of Asia. They therefore recommended that Eisenhower permit Chiang Kai-shek to bomb the mainland. If Quemoy were attacked, they urged that the United States intervene militarily. The only dissenter among the Joint Chiefs, Ridgway argued that it was not the military's responsibility to judge the psychological value of the island and urged restraint. Once again, Eisenhower decided against military intervention.

Frustrated by his constant disagreements with the president and other members of the Joint Chiefs and nearing the end of his term as army chief of staff, Ridgway retired from the army in June 1955 and became head of the Mellon Institute, an industrial research center. He held that position for five years. "Throughout my two years as Chief of Staff," he later recalled, "I felt I was being called upon to tear down, rather than build up, the ultimately decisive element in a properly proportioned fighting force." He published a volume of memoirs, Soldier, in 1956. A few days before his retirement, he expressed his views on the need for a "viable strategy for Cold War situations" to meet aggression in the "mountains of Greece and Korea or the jungles of Indochina."

After leaving the military, Ridgway continued to oppose the administration's emphasis on air power and the nuclear deterrent. He criticized what he regarded as the elevation of politics above the national interest. As a member of the Association of the U.S. Army, he worked for acceptance of his views on limited wars, which gained increasing support among congressional leaders and academic strategists. In a report of the association in 1960, Ridgway outlined a proposal for the reorganization of the army into a "mobile ready force" capable of fighting small wars. The plan eventually won acceptance as part of the Kennedy administration's "flexible response."

As the United States escalated its involvement in Vietnam during the 1960s, Ridgway was one of the military leaders, along with Gavin, who attempted to persuade the Johnson administration to limit American participation. In 1966, he argued that the government should maintain a middle course between unilateral withdrawal and all-out war. A member of the Senior Advisory Group on Vietnam, which met with President LYNDON B. JOHNSON during March 1968, Ridgway continued to stress nonmilitary options in the conflict. By 1970, he supported a planned withdrawal. In the 1970s, Ridgway opposed the volunteer army and the admission of women into the service academies. The Pentagon's decision in 1979 to order paratroopers to stop wearing the red beret infuriated him. President Ronald Reagan awarded Ridgway the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1986. Ridgway received the Congressional Gold Medal in 1991. He died in Fox Chapel, Pennsylvania, on July 26, 1993.

—MSM

Riesman, David

(1909–2002) sociologist

The son of a German-born professor of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, David Riesman was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on September 22, 1909. He attended William Penn Charter School and Harvard University, from which he graduated Phi Beta Kappa in 1931. He went to Harvard Law School, where he was an editor of the Harvard Law Review and received his LL.B. in 1934. Upon completing a law degree, Riesman received a fellowship that enabled him to spend an additional year studying with FELIX FRANKFURTER at Harvard Law School. Admitted to the bars of Massachusetts and the District of Columbia in 1935, he became a clerk to Supreme Court Justice Louis D. Brandeis. Riesman then practiced law in Boston and, from 1937 to 1941, was professor of law at the University of Buffalo. He took up a visiting research fellowship at Columbia Law School in 1941. During his career in academic law, he published several books and articles on human rights and employment law. From 1942 to 1943, he served as deputy assistant district attorney in New York County, after which he spent three years as an executive at the Sperry Gyroscope Company on Long Island. He joined the faculty of social sciences at the University of Chicago as a visiting associate professor in 1946. Three years later, he became a full professor.

In 1950, he published The Lonely Crowd. Riesman's thesis was that Americans had once been "inner-directed" people, who lived by internalized values. Postwar Americans, however, were becoming "other directed" people, who took their cues from peers and the mass media. Whereas radicals of the 1930s railed against selfishness and competition, Riesman was far more concerned about society's encroachments on the individual. As Riesman put it, the "problem for people" in postwar America was less the "material environment" than "other people."

The book argued that in societies with a stable population, an essentially static social order, and little technological change (such as medieval Europe), the dominant character type was "tradition-directed." Such people lived their lives by a set of rules "dedicated to a very large degree by power relations among the various age and sex groups, the clans, castes, professions—relations which have endured for centuries and are modified but slightly." Patterns of life were dictated by rituals, custom, and religious practices. In periods of technological advance, economic expansion, and social mobility, people developed a capacity to set goals for themselves, influenced by values implanted in childhood that stressed a belief in personal choice, initiative, individual responsibility, and achievement. These values guided individuals throughout their lives. Riesman characterized the people produced by such societies as "inner-directed." During periods when consumption overtook production, when scarcity gave way to abundance, the dominant character type became “other directed.” Such people desired to be part of a larger community to the extent that they constantly adjusted their values and morality to fit in with the group. “While all people want and need to be liked by some of the people some of the time,” wrote Riesman, “it is only the modern other-directed types who make this their chief source of direction.”

Riesman identified inner-direction as “the typical character of the ‘old’ middle class—the banker, the tradesman, the small entrepreneur, the technically oriented engineer.” Other-direction, he maintained, was “becoming the typical character of the ‘new’ middle class—the bureaucrat, the salaried employee . . . etc.” Perhaps, Riesman suggested, postwar affluence had produced a class whose economic progress had come so quickly that the social and psychological adjustments that would normally accompany such a development lacked the time to evolve.

Yale University Press printed 3,000 copies of The Lonely Crowd and had to order 13 additional printings before an abridged version, published as one of Anchor Books’s “quality paperbacks” series, appeared in 1953. According to a study conducted by Herbert Gans in 1997, The Lonely Crowd went on to sell more copies than any work of sociology before or since.

A boldly speculative work, The Lonely Crowd, written with Riesman’s assistants, Nathan Glazer and Reuel Denny, represented a marked departure from the statistically driven works that dominated sociology at that time and, as such, encountered skepticism from sociologists. On the other hand, it won praise from virtually all other quarters. The literary critic Lionel Trilling called it “one of the most interesting books I have read.” Irving Howe, the writer and literary critic, thought the book “often strikingly brilliant” and praised especially its description of the effects of other-directed values on Americans and American culture. Riesman appeared on the cover of Time magazine in September 1954. The Lonely Crowd became the first of a succession of books examining the American character, most of which focused attention on the power of the mass over the individual. Among those were C. WRIGHT MILLS’s White Collar (1951), DAVID POTTER’s People of Plenty (1954), WILLIAM WHYTE’s The Organization Man (1956), John Keats’s The Crack in the Picture Window (1956), and VANCE PACKARD’s The Status Seekers (1959).

Riesman left the University of Chicago in 1958 to join Harvard University’s Department of Social Relations. When it broke up, he joined Harvard’s new department of sociology, where he taught until his retirement. His other books include Faces in the Crowd: Individual Studies in Character and Politics (1952, based on a collection of interviews dealing with issues raised in The Lonely Crowd), Thorstein Veblen: A Critical Interpretation (1953), Individualism Reconsidered and Other Essays (1954), Constraint and Variety in American Higher Education (1956), Abundance for What (1964), The Academic Revolution (1968), The Perpetual Dream (1978), and On Higher Education (1980), which dealt with the rise of student power on college campuses.

In the 1950s and early 1960s, Riesman supported a number of liberal causes, most notably the antinuclear movement. He served as faculty adviser to Tocsin, a peace group at Harvard and Radcliffe, and was editor of The Correspondent, the journal of the Committee (later Council) of Correspondence, an association of antinuclear academics. Beginning with the student protests at the University of California at Berkeley in 1964, however, he opposed the student radicals of the 1960s. Riesman maintained that the establishment they hoped to destroy, however flawed, was a social web critical to a free society. In the late 1960s, he criticized the discipline of sociology for “becoming so politicized” that it was “hard to bring sober people into it.”

Never one to follow the crowd, lonely or otherwise, Riesman held a number of opinions that many regarded as heretical or merely eccentric. He maintained, for example, that no student should go to college less than 500 miles from home “without good reason.” He did not favor coeducation, because he thought it tended to produce students whose behavior conformed to accepted gender patterns. As Riesman saw it, young women influenced their male associates to choose careers compatible with domesticity.

Upon his retirement from Harvard in 1980, Riesman became professor emeritus and continued to reside in Cambridge. He died in Binghamton, New York, on May 10, 2002.

—MSM

Rivers, L(ucius) Mendel(1905–1970) U.S. congressman

The son of a small farmer who also owned a turpentine still, Rivers was born in Gumville, South Carolina, in Berkeley County, on September 28, 1905. Rivers's father died in 1914, and the boy moved with his mother to northern Charleston County. Rivers took odd jobs to help support his family. He attended public schools, where he excelled as an athlete and, after graduating in 1926, played semi-professional baseball. Rivers attended the College of Charleston from 1926 to 1929 and the University of South Carolina from 1929 to 1931. He graduated from neither institution but was admitted to the bar in 1932. After practicing law for a brief time, he ran unsuccessfully for the state legislature in 1932 but won a special election to fill a vacancy in the state legislature the following year. He served until 1936, when he took a position as a special attorney with the Justice Department.

In 1940, Rivers resigned from the Justice Department and ran against Alfred Von Kolnitz in the Democratic primary for a congressional seat that represented Charleston and vicinity. Rivers ran behind his opponent in Charleston but, thanks to his strong showing in rural areas, won the primary. In an overwhelmingly Democratic state, the general election was little more than a formality. For the next three decades, he served in Congress, usually facing only token opposition in his bids for reelection. Upon entering the House, Rivers received an assignment to the Naval Affairs Committee, which in 1947 was merged into the new Armed Services Committee. During his first years in Washington, he tended to support the Roosevelt administration, but he soon shifted to more conservative politics. He supported the Taft-Hartley Act and other restrictions on organized labor. An ardent segregationist, he opposed civil rights and antilynching legislation. In 1948, Rivers backed the presidential candidacy of Governor STROM THURMOND of South Carolina, who ran on the States Rights (Dixiecrat) ticket. As a member of the Armed Services Committee, he consistently backed large defense expenditures and a hard line in the cold war. In 1950, Rivers publicly urged President HARRY S. TRUMAN to threaten North Korea with the atomic bomb. He consistently supported antisubversive legislation.

Rivers backed DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the presidency in 1952. Nevertheless, he opposed the Eisenhower administration's cuts to defense spending. Rivers believed that military strength provided the only real guarantee of American security. Not only did he oppose reductions in defense spending, but he advocated substantially increased spending on the military throughout the 1950s. In 1955, he unsuccessfully offered an amendment to a supplemental appropriations bill that would have nearly doubled funds for navy public works. The following year, he backed a bill providing for a pay raise for the military. In 1960, Rivers headed a special subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee on military airlifts, which recommended an extensive program for modernizing the Military Air Transport Service (MATS). As a result, the military purchased more powerful airplanes to expand and update the MATS fleet.

From the beginning of his career in Congress, Rivers used his position on the Armed Services Committee to secure a vast array of military installations for his district. In 1955, he served as vice chair of a special subcommittee examining military land transfers. Shortly after that, he headed a special subcommittee investigating the Pentagon's property acquisitions. Between 1955 and 1960, the navy established a marine corps air station at Beaufort; the air force built a recreation center at Berkeley and an unmanned radar site at Parris Island. The army located a national guard office in Hampton and an army reserve installation in Charleston. Rivers's tireless efforts to locate military installations in his district once led CARL VINSON (D-Ga.), the chair of the Armed Services Committee and a close ally of Rivers, to remark, "You put anything else down there in your district, Mendel, it's gonna sink."

Throughout the Eisenhower administration, Rivers passionately defended segregation. He was highly critical of the Supreme Court's ruling in 1954 that declared segregated public schools unconstitutional. He signed the Southern Manifesto, which condemned the decision and urged all legal means to resist it. In addition, Rivers joined the White Citizens' Council, an organization formed to preserve segregation; he was the only member of South Carolina's congressional delegation to do so. In Congress, Rivers opposed every civil rights measure that came before the House in the 1950s and 1960s.

On occasion, however, Rivers supported social welfare measures opposed by the Eisenhower administration. In 1958, he voted for an increase in Social Security benefits that the president thought too costly. The following year, he backed two housing bills that Eisenhower vetoed because of their cost.

In 1960, Rivers supported a bill to cut the Cuban sugar quota in retaliation for the policies of Cuba's premier, Fidel Castro. During the floor debate on the bill, he urged further action. He urged his colleagues to "revise our sugar quota and take the next step tomorrow, and probably the ultimate step will be to occupy that island to save those people. Let us take that step. Our stature is dwindling. Let us build it up while time remains."

Rivers succeeded Vinson as chair of the Armed Services Committee in 1965. During that year, he clashed with President LYNDON B. JOHNSON and Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara over the closing of military bases and a pay raise for the military. Rivers failed in an attempt to secure congressional veto power over base closings but did succeed in doubling the military pay raise requested by the administration.

One of the strongest congressional supporters of the war in Vietnam, he called for the use of nuclear weapons in that conflict. Rivers's enthusiasm for weapons systems exceeded that of the most ambitious military officials in the Pentagon. He also regarded himself as the champion of the common soldier, which led him to take positions that sometimes brought him into conflict with military leaders. Unswerving in his support for the war in Vietnam, Rivers criticized the antiwar movement in the most vitriolic of terms. He continued to obtain military installations for his district, and, by the late 1960s, defense-related facilities accounted, according to reports, for more than one-third of the total payroll in the Charleston area. Never as consistent in his conservatism on domestic issues as he was in his support for the military and an aggressive foreign policy, Rivers supported a number of Great Society programs in the second half of the 1960s. He voted for housing subsidies, the food stamp program, antipoverty legislation, and mass transit. He continued, however, to oppose civil rights legislation.

An alcoholic, Rivers was a binge drinker. He remained sober most of the time but periodically embarked on unrestrained bouts of drinking. The columnist DREW PEARSON wrote that Rivers was a "security risk" and included an indictment of Rivers in his book, The Case Against Congress (1968). Rivers stopped drinking and remained sober the last two years of his life. He underwent open-heart surgery in Birmingham, Alabama, on December 11, 1970, and died of heart failure there on December 28, 1970.

—MSM

Roberts, C(harles) Wesley

(1902–1976) chairman, Republican National Committee

Born in Oskaloosa, Kansas, on December 14, 1902, Roberts attended public schools and Kansas State College before becoming part-owner and coeditor of three small-town newspapers in Kansas. After serving as campaign manager for the Republican gubernatorial nominee in 1936, he became the assistant chairman of the Kansas Republican State Committee in 1938. The following year, he became secretary to Governor Payne Ratner. After service as a major in the marines during World War II, he became chairman of the Kansas Republican Party in 1947. He resigned three years later to manage the successful senatorial campaign of FRANK CARLSON. Although he did not hold any office in the Republican Party of Kansas after 1950, he remained a powerful figure in Kansas's majority party. Together with Carlson and Governor Edward Arn, Roberts led the conservative, or "palace guard," wing of the state Republican Party, which engaged in bitter intraparty conflict with the more progressive "young Turks" faction, led by Lieutenant Governor Fred Hall and the aging Alf Landon.

Carlson was an early supporter of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's presidential candidacy, and, in 1952, he managed Eisenhower's preconvention headquarters in Washington. After the convention, Roberts became director of organization of the Republican National Committee. In January 1953, the outgoing chairman of the Republican National Committee, ARTHUR SUMMERFIELD, designated Roberts as his successor. The national committee immediately ratified the selection, and President Eisenhower expressed his "hearty approval."

Less than one month after he assumed office, the Kansas City Star reported that Roberts had received a commission of $11,000 for helping a fraternal order sell a hospital building to the state in 1951. Even though he held no official position in the state's Republican Party at that time, Roberts had used his connections as a state party leader to influence an appropriation by the state legislature. To add to the scandal, there was some question as to whether the state already owned the facility. Moreover, Roberts had failed to register as a lobbyist and failed to inform any state officials and legislators with whom he dealt that he represented private parties. Roberts responded that he had not acted as a lobbyist but as a "public relations counsel." Republican rivals in Kansas pressed the attack on Roberts. A special committee of the state legislature, on which the Arn faction had a majority, charged Roberts with having "deliberately and intentionally" violated the "spirit" if not the "letter" of the state's law requiring the registration of lobbyists.

Upon release of the committee's report, Roberts resigned as chairman of the Republican National Committee after what was described as a "heart to heart" talk with Eisenhower at the White House. He had filled the post for nine weeks. Eisenhower, who had campaigned vigorously against corruption in the Truman administration, issued a statement describing Roberts's move as "a wise one" and quickly named LEONARD HALL as Roberts's successor. Roberts returned to his newspapers and his insurance agency. In August 1953, the attorney general of Kansas announced that, although it left him with "a feeling of real frustration," he would not press criminal charges against Roberts because the latter's action "did not violate our statute as it now is written."

Roberts became a public relations consultant with Lehman Brothers in New York and then with Goodbody and Company. Later, he opened his own public relations company in Washington, D.C. Roberts died in Alexandria, Virginia, on April 9, 1976.

—MSM

Robertson, A(bsalom) Willis

(1887–1971) U.S. senator; chairman, Senate Banking and Currency Committee

Born in Martinsburg, West Virginia, on May 27, 1887, Robertson moved with his parents to Lynchburg, Virginia, in 1891. He attended public schools, after which he graduated from the University of Richmond in 1907 and from its law department in 1908. Admitted to the bar in 1908, he began to practice law in Rockbridge County, Virginia. Robertson served as a Democratic member of the Virginia senate from 1916 to 1922. During World War I, he served in the U.S. Army as assistant camp adjutant at Camp Lee, Virginia, and in the adjutant general's office in Washington, rising to the rank of major. Robertson served as the commonwealth's attorney for Rockbridge County from 1922 to 1928. He was commissioner of the state Commission of Game and Inland Fisheries from 1926 until 1932, when he won election to the U.S. House of Representatives. He was reelected six consecutive times.

In the House, Robertson established himself as a conservative who, according to the historian J. Harvie Wilkinson, "personified Spartan discipline, pioneer individualism, Puritan and Calvinist morality." Robertson voted against most New Deal measures and with the Roosevelt administration on foreign policy. Like HARRY BYRD, whose Democratic machine dominated politics in Virginia from the late 1920s to the middle of the 1960s, Robertson opposed racial integration, social welfare programs, and the growth of the federal government. Although part of the Byrd machine, Robertson was not personally close to Byrd himself. Indeed, he was not Byrd's first choice to fill the vacancy in the Senate created by the death of Carter Glass in 1946. Robertson, however, seemed less likely than Byrd's first choice to arouse the ire of the machine's opponents. Subsequently, Robertson won the election, entered the Senate on November 6, 1946, and was reelected to full terms in 1948, 1954, and 1960.

In the Senate, Robertson supported the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947 and voted against public housing. He did support President HARRY S. TRUMAN's seizure of the steel industry. In addition, he voted for aid to Greece and Turkey in 1947 and the Marshall Plan in 1948. He also strongly supported the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

In 1948, Robertson became convinced that General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER was the only potential candidate for the presidency who could unite the nation and deal with the Soviet Union. Accordingly, Robertson urged his southern colleagues to join him in persuading Truman to step aside and in drafting Eisenhower. His arguments failed to persuade other southern members of Congress. When it became evident that Eisenhower would not run as a Democrat in 1948, Robertson became the first significant officeholder in Virginia to announce his support for Truman. In 1951, however, Robertson advanced Eisenhower for the presidency. When it became clear that Eisenhower was a Republican, Robertson contacted Bernard Baruch, the influential financier, and asked him to work to make Eisenhower the Republican candidate in 1952.

During the Eisenhower administration, Robertson focused his attention on preventing the expansion of the federal government. He also supported conservative fiscal policies, particularly those designed to balance the budget. Those concerns led him to oppose the continuation of rent controls and the creation of a permanent Small Business Administration in 1953. While he favored the bill that established the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation in 1954, Robertson wanted to use the toll money collected on the waterway to reduce the national debt. In 1957, Robertson successfully opposed federal construction of a hydroelectric dam at Hell's Canyon, Idaho; the project, he believed, should be left to private developers. In 1958, he opposed accelerating the administration's interstate highway program as inflationary. Despite his fiscal conservatism, Robertson consistently supported high defense spending. In 1956, he was one of 13 members of the Senate Appropriations Committee who supported a $1.6 billion increase in the amount the House voted for the air force.

In 1956, Robertson headed a subcommittee that attempted to develop a legislative program for revising the U.S. banking code. At the request of the panel, the agencies involved in regulating banking submitted more than 175 proposed amendments. In December, a 27-member advisory committee filed a report that urged increased federal authority over interstate bank mergers and embodied more than 200 legislative recommendations. Finally, in 1960, Congress passed the Bank Merger Act, which prohibited mergers or consolidations of federally insured banks "without the prior written consent" of the appropriate supervisory agency.

Robertson became chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee in 1958. In that post, he emerged as the leading spokesman on fiscal matters for the conservative coalition of southern Democrats and Republicans. He cautioned that if the government's deficit of $12.9 billion continued to rise, foreign and domestic capital would flee the dollar. Robertson also warned against inflation but discouraged wage and price controls, which he believed ineffective. In 1959, he was the only member of his committee to support the administration and vote against an additional $1 billion in housing appropriations. Eisenhower vetoed this bill as too costly, and Robertson led the committee in rewriting it to meet the president's objections.

A committed segregationist, Robertson opposed the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954) that struck down segregated public schools. In 1956, he signed the Southern Manifesto, which denounced the decision as a "clear abuse of judicial power" and urged the use of all legal means to oppose it. When President Eisenhower nominated Solicitor General SIMON E. SOBLOFF to a seat on the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1956, Robertson opposed Sobloff's confirmation. He accused the solicitor general of "prejudice" against the South on the issue of segregation. Despite the efforts of Robertson and other segregationists, the Senate overwhelmingly confirmed Sobloff.

Robertson worried about the ability of southern members of Congress to maintain the influence they had exerted throughout the first half of the 20th century. He and Senator J. STROM THURMOND (D-S.C.) led an unsuccessful fight to keep Alaska out of the Union, because they feared its admission would dilute southern congressional strength.

Unlike Byrd, who maintained a resounding silence, Robertson at least nominally supported the Democratic national ticket in 1960. During the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, Robertson continued to oppose civil rights and social welfare legislation. Running for reelection in 1966, he was narrowly defeated by William B. Spong in the Virginia Democratic primary. Having lost the election, Robertson resigned early in order to give Spong seniority. After Robertson left the Senate, he was a consultant to the National Bank for Reconstruction and Development from 1966 to 1968, when he retired. He resided in Lexington, Virginia, until his death there on November 1, 1971.

—MSM

Robeson, Paul B(ustill)

(1898–1976) entertainer, political activist

The son of a Protestant minister who had been a slave until he ran away to join the Union Army at the age of 15, Paul Robeson was born in Princeton, New Jersey, on April 9, 1898. His mother, a schoolteacher of African, Indian, and English heritage, died when he was a child. In 1910, Robeson moved with his father to Somerville, New Jersey, where he attended public schools. He won a competitive scholarship to attend Rutgers College (later Rutgers University), where he was the lone African American in his class and only the third to attend the college. An outstanding student, he was on the varsity debate team, won class prizes in oratory each of his four years, won election to Phi Beta Kappa as a junior, and was valedictorian of his class. Robeson's athletic achievements equaled his academic performance. He earned a total of 12 varsity letters in baseball, basketball, football, and track. An outstanding end on both offense and defense, Robeson was twice named to the All-American team in football. After receiving his B.A. in 1919, he entered Columbia University Law School, where he supported himself by playing professional football. While in law school, Robeson became involved in the theater, largely through the influence of his wife, Eslanda. He made his professional debut on Broadway in 1922. Upon earning his LL.B. in 1923, he joined a law firm in New York City. Discrimination within the firm and in the legal profession generally led him to quit after a few months to pursue a career in acting. In 1924, he appeared in the lead role of two plays by Eugene O'Neill, The Emperor Jones and All God's Chillun Got Wings. In 1930, Robeson played Othello in London to great acclaim. In addition to his acting, he embarked on a career as a singer in 1925. Eschewing classical music in favor of African-American spirituals and folk songs, he went on concert tours, performed on radio, and made over 300 recordings. His bass baritone as well as his acting talent made him a star of several musicals, the best known of which was Show Boat. Robeson also appeared in 11 motion pictures, including The Emperor Jones (1933) and Show Boat (1936).

Introduced to socialism by George Bernard Shaw in 1928, Robeson became a prominent spokesperson for black aspirations and various left-wing causes. Dismayed by racism in America, he lived in Europe for most of the 1930s and returned to the United States only for concerts or roles in films. Robeson toured the Soviet Union in 1934 and was impressed by the warm reception he received as well as what he perceived to be an absence of discrimination based on class or race. After that, he returned to Moscow for extended stays and learned Russian. As the 1930s progressed, he actively opposed fascism, racism, and imperialism. In Britain, he gave benefit performances for refugees from fascist countries and for left-wing British groups. He went to Spain in 1938 to perform for Republican troops.

With the outbreak of World War II, Robeson returned to the United States, where he was outspoken in his criticism of American racism and his praise for the Soviet Union. The causes he supported included organized labor, the desegregation of professional baseball, and Pan-Africanism. Although Robeson's political activities attracted some criticism, it did not hurt his career, in large part because the Soviet Union and the United States were allies during the war. In 1943, he became the first African American to play Othello with a white supporting cast on Broadway. His performance received rave reviews. The following year, he received the Spingarn Medal, the highest award offered by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

After the war, however, he continued to praise the Soviet Union and to compare the United States unfavorably to the communist state. As American relations with the Soviet Union deteriorated, his position became increasingly unpopular. In 1946, he appeared before a committee of the state legislature of California and denied that he had ever been a member of the Communist Party. Subsequently, he refused to answer any questions about his political affiliations before investigating committees as a matter of conscience and constitutional right. Meanwhile, he continued to attack American racism and to defend the Soviet experiment. A founder of the Progressive Party, he campaigned for its nominee, Henry Wallace, in the presidential election of 1948. The following year, he pronounced it “unthinkable” that African Americans would “go to war on behalf of those who have oppressed us for generations against a country [the Soviet Union] which in one generation has raised our people to the full dignity of mankind.” That remark drew criticism from the press, including the black press, and most civil rights organizations. The House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) called black witnesses to refute Robeson’s contention and labeled him a “communist sympathizer.” A scheduled performance by Robeson at a music festival in Peekskill, New York, sponsored by the radical Civil Rights Congress, touched off rioting. In 1950, the State Department revoked Robeson’s passport because he had refused to sign a noncommunist oath, as then required. Robeson fought the decision in the courts for eight years; in the meantime, he could not leave the country. While his case was still pending, in 1958 the Supreme Court ruled in a similar case that the State Department could not withhold passports because of an applicant’s “beliefs and association,” and the State Department issued him a passport.

Throughout the 1950s, Robeson continued his strident attacks on American policy. He denounced the American involvement in Korea and what he described as the “genocide” of African Americans. The Soviet Union awarded him the Stalin Peace Prize in 1952, which provided further ammunition for his critics. The political controversies brought an end to his career. Robeson was blacklisted, and his income fell from more than $100,000 in 1947 to roughly $6,000 in 1952.

In 1956, HUAC called him to appear at hearings on the revocation of U.S. passports. He refused to answer most questions on constitutional grounds and used the platform to denounce racism and express his love for the Soviet people. Although HUAC threatened him with contempt, it took no action against him.

By the late 1950s, the emerging Civil Rights movement and the passing of the red scare opened the door for the rehabilitation of Robeson’s reputation. In 1958, he published Here I Stand, in which he once again declared his admiration for the Soviet Union and his belief in “the principles of scientific Socialism” but denied having ever “been involved in any international conspiracy.” The book urged a “Negro people’s movement,” which, he insisted, “must be led by Negroes.” Rejecting gradualism, he called for “mass action” of the “aroused and militant” black masses. In addition to the book, he gave a series of concerts, including sold-out performances at Carnegie Hall, and recorded an album. After the Supreme Court’s decision paved the way for the restoration of his passport, Robeson left for Europe to restart his career.

Although he returned to the Soviet Union to a rousing welcome, his time there was an unhappy one. Years of political attacks, the disruption of his career, and harassment by the government had taken its toll on his health and his state of mind. A circulatory ailment and emotional instability led to frequent hospitalizations. He attempted suicide, and excessive treatment with drugs as well as electroshock therapy probably caused brain damage. He returned to the United States in 1963, where he lived in seclusion until his death in Philadelphia on January 23, 1976.

—MSM

Rockefeller, Nelson A(Idrich)

(1908–1979) undersecretary of health, education and welfare; special assistant to the president; governor of New York

The son of John Davison Rockefeller, Jr., a businessman and philanthropist, Nelson Rockefeller was born in Bar Harbor, Maine, on July 8, 1908. His grandfather, John D. Rockefeller, was the founder of the Standard Oil Company and one of the richest men in the world. After graduating from Dartmouth College in 1930, Nelson Rockefeller worked in the family’s Chase National Bank. From 1935 to 1940, he served as a director of Creole Petroleum Company, an affiliate of Standard Oil that had substantial holdings in Venezuela. During that time, he developed an interest in Latin American affairs and became convinced of the need for massive economic assistance to that region for both humanitarian and commercial reasons. He became president of Rockefeller Center in 1938.

In 1940, President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Rockefeller coordinator of the Office of Inter-American Affairs, where he oversaw an economic and cultural program for Latin America. From 1944 to 1945, Rockefeller served as assistant secretary of state for Latin American affairs. After World War II, he founded the American International Association for Economic and Social Development, a private, nonprofit organization created to channel private capital from the United States to improve social and economic conditions in underdeveloped nations, particularly in Latin America. He also founded the International Basic Economy Corporation to promote economic development in Latin America. From 1950 to 1951, he advised President HARRY S. TRUMAN on the implementation of the Point Four program.

A liberal Republican, Rockefeller backed General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER in the presidential election of 1952. Three weeks after Eisenhower's victory, the president-elect appointed Rockefeller to chair the President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization. Following one of the committee's recommendations, Eisenhower in 1953 sought legislation to create a cabinet-rank Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) to replace the Federal Security Agency. When the department was created the following year, Rockefeller became its undersecretary. In that post, Rockefeller originated the Eisenhower administration's proposal for a federal health reinsurance plan to encourage private insurance companies to extend coverage to more people.

Rockefeller left HEW in 1954 to become special assistant to the president for cold war planning. He criticized what he regarded as a piecemeal approach and attempted to promote expanded long-range economic and military aid programs. His major initiative, known as "Open Skies," proposed that the United States and the Soviet Union each allow the other to make aerial inspections of nuclear installations, thus precluding the possibility of a surprise attack. Eisenhower presented the plan at the Geneva summit in 1955. Rockefeller's grand schemes encountered strong opposition from fiscal conservatives, such as Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE M. HUMPHREY and Undersecretary of State HERBERT HOOVER, JR. Humphrey blocked Rockefeller's path to the cabinet, and, at the end of 1955, a frustrated Rockefeller left Washington and returned to New York.

To promote the kind of comprehensive programs he favored, Rockefeller initiated the Special Studies Project of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund in 1956. The project brought together some of the best minds in the country to make policy recommendations in the areas of defense, education, and economics. HENRY A. KISSINGER, director of Harvard's Center for International Affairs, oversaw the study that produced the best known of these reports. Published in 1958 as "International Security: The Military Aspect," the report warned that the Soviet Union was advancing more rapidly than the United States in many crucial areas of military technology and that "if not reversed, this trend . . . will place the free world in dire jeopardy." The report criticized the Eisenhower administration's reliance on the nuclear deterrent, air power, and technology and argued for a more flexible defense policy. Toward that end, it urged a major increase in the defense budget as well as an ability and willingness to engage in conventional warfare. The report received considerable publicity in 1958, and Rockefeller used its recommendations and those of other reports done by the Special Studies Project to develop policy proposals in his subsequent political campaigns.

After his experiences in appointive federal positions, Rockefeller concluded that he had to win elective office to implement his ideas. In 1956, he began preparations to run for governor of New York. That year he became chair of the Committee on the Preparation of the State Constitutional Convention and, through that position, made contact with state and local party leaders. He won the Republican gubernatorial nomination with ease in 1958, but some prominent Republicans worried that Rockefeller's name and wealth might damage his prospects. However, the fact that W. AVERELL HARRIMAN, the incumbent governor and his opponent, was also the scion of a fabulously wealthy family minimized that problem. Few substantive issues separated the candidates. Rockefeller repeatedly charged that Harriman dealt with problems on a piecemeal basis and did not develop long-term goals. An enthusiastic and exuberant campaigner, Rockefeller also made extensive use of expert political technicians. In addition, he outspent Harriman by $1.8 to $1.1 million. In the end, Rockefeller won by more than half a million votes. He went on to win reelection three times.

During the first two years of his administration, Rockefeller laid the foundation for extensive social welfare programs. Early in 1959, he successfully procured from the legislature an increase in the state income tax to finance the programs on a pay-as-you-go basis, as mandated by the state's constitution. Later in the year, he appointed a three-member committee on higher education. In 1960, it recommended the establishment of a new state university with two new graduate schools and the transformation of the 11 state teachers' colleges into liberal arts schools. During Rockefeller's tenure as governor, the state university system expanded from 38,000 students on 28 campuses to 246,000 students on 71 campuses. In 1960, Rockefeller succeeded in establishing a State Housing Finance Authority, with a borrowing capacity of $2 billion, to encourage investment of private capital in housing for middle-income families. Rockefeller signed New York State's first minimum wage bill in 1960. It set the minimum wage at $1 an hour. That same year, he announced plans to build a $4 million fallout shelter in Albany to accommodate 2,200 employees. Rockefeller failed, however, to win passage of his plan for mandatory shelters in public and private buildings.

Rockefeller saw the governorship of New York as a stepping-stone to the presidency. Immediately after his election as governor, he set up a large campaign organization to seek his party's nomination. He endorsed liberal domestic programs, such as civil rights, expanded aid to education, and advocated federal reinsurance of private health insurance. In defense and foreign policy, he took a hard line, urging resumption of underground nuclear tests and calling for caution in the expansion of trade with the communist bloc.

To promote his presidential candidacy, Rockefeller went on a nationwide tour in the fall of 1959. Although he received a warm reception from the public and favorable treatment in the press, Republican leaders clearly favored Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON. After concluding that he could not wrest the nomination from Nixon, Rockefeller withdrew from the race in December 1959. Hoping to influence the Republican platform, he declined to endorse Nixon unqualifiedly and continued to express his views, particularly with respect to defense. Reflecting the conclusions of the report by the Rockefeller Brothers Fund's Special Studies Project, he stated that America's military position relative to the Soviet Union had been declining for 15 years and insisted upon the need for greater defense spending. In early July, Rockefeller met with CHARLES H. PERCY, the chair of the Republican Platform Committee, to discuss the preliminary draft of the platform and to press his views. Rockefeller wanted a dramatic increase in military spending, a stronger civil rights plank, federal aid to education, and programs to promote unity in the Western Hemisphere and among North Atlantic nations. Percy, who had laboriously crafted a skillful compromise that bridged the gaps in a deeply divided party, had no inclination to rewrite the platform at Rockefeller's insistence. On July 25, 1960, shortly before the Republican Platform Committee adopted its final draft, Rockefeller met with Nixon at the governor's apartment on Fifth Avenue in New York City. In what became known as the Treaty of Fifth Avenue, Nixon agreed to incorporate a number of Rockefeller's demands into the platform. The agreement outraged conservatives in the party, who decried the influence of the eastern, or liberal, wing of the party. Senator BARRY M. GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.) called it "the Munich of the Republican Party."

During the early and middle 1960s, Rockefeller established or expanded a large number of social welfare programs. He increased the state's minimum wage to $1.15 an hour, expanded state aid to education, and established programs to deter juvenile delinquency. In addition, he gained passage of civil rights legislation to ban discrimination in housing, lending, and places of public accommodation. A zealous advocate of fallout shelters, he signed a bill in April 1961 that granted up to $100 in real estate tax exemptions to homeowners who built shelters. In November of that year, he signed a bill that provided $100 million in state matching funds for schools and colleges that constructed fallout shelters.

The vast array of social welfare programs enormously expanded the state's budget. Rockefeller employed additional tax increases and voter-approved bond issues to provide funds for these programs. When the electorate began rejecting the bond issues, he created a system of over 40 quasi autonomous state authorities empowered to issue bonds and pay for them by imposing fees for the use of services provided by the state authorities.

Rockefeller easily won reelection in 1962. During the campaign, he promised no tax increases, but to meet the cost of his programs, he had to ask for a substantial tax increase in 1963. The request generated considerable resentment among voters.

After Nixon's defeat in 1960, Rockefeller emerged as the early front-runner for the nomination in 1964. His personal life became an issue after his divorce and remarriage. Nevertheless, he ran for the Republican presidential nomination in 1964 but lost to the far more conservative Goldwater, whom Rockefeller described as "an extremist." Rockefeller's refusal to endorse Goldwater in the general election infuriated the conservative wing of his party.

Rockefeller won reelection as governor in 1966 by a discouragingly narrow margin. He remained, however, the acknowledged leader of his party's liberal wing and made another try for the presidential nomination in 1968, only to lose to Nixon for a second time.

Faced with increasing criticism over his enormous expenditures in New York and the continuing hostility of Republican conservatives throughout the country, Rockefeller began moving to the right in the late 1960s. He supported the Nixon administration and served as Nixon's emissary to Latin America in 1969. When inmates at the state prison in Attica rioted and took hostages in 1971, Rockefeller refused to negotiate and ultimately ordered an assault on the prison. In 1973, he resigned as governor and established a study group called the Commission for Critical Choices for Americans. Some political observers believed that he intended to use the commission as a springboard for another presidential bid. At this point, his career took an unexpected turn. After Nixon was forced to resign the presidency in 1974 and Vice President GERALD R. FORD succeeded him, Ford nominated Rockefeller to fill the vacant office of the vice president. Congress confirmed him in December 1974. Rockefeller served only a little over a year in the office. As it became clear that Ronald Reagan intended to mount a campaign for the Republican nomination in 1976, the challenge from the right wing of the party made Rockefeller something of a liability for Ford. In November 1975, Rockefeller announced that he did not want to be renominated for the vice presidency. Upon leaving the vice presidency in January 1977, Rockefeller retired from politics. He devoted time to his business affairs and his art collection. Rockefeller died in New York on January 26, 1979.

—MSM

Rogers, William P(ierce)

(1913–2001) deputy attorney general, attorney general

The only son of a former bank director who was reduced to working at a management position at a paper mill after the bank failures of the Great Depression, Rogers was born in Norfolk, New York, on June 23, 1913. Raised by maternal grandparents after the death of his mother, Rogers spent his teen years in Canton, New York. After graduating as the class valedictorian at Canton High School, Rogers won a scholarship to attend Colgate University, where he earned his B.A. in 1934. He then went to Cornell Law School, where he edited the Cornell Law Review, was a member of the Order of the Coif, and graduated fifth in his class in 1937. He passed the bar later that year. After working briefly with the prestigious Wall Street firm of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft, he took a job as assistant district attorney under THOMAS E. DEWEY in 1938. As part of a 60-person team Dewey formed to prosecute organized crime in New York, Rogers worked on roughly 1,000 cases, largely involving bookmaking and racketeering. He left the district attorney's office in 1942 to join the U.S. Navy and served as a lieutenant junior grade aboard the USS Intrepid.

At the end of the war, Rogers returned to the district attorney's office, where he was chief of the bureau of special sessions under District Attorney FRANK HOGAN. The Republicans won control of Congress in the elections of 1946, and in April 1947 Rogers, a Republican, became counsel to the Senate Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program. In July, he became chief counsel. When that committee was succeeded by the Senate Investigations Subcommittee of the Executive Expenditures Committee in 1948, Rogers continued as counsel to the subcommittee. After the Democrats regained control of Congress in the elections of 1948, Senator CLYDE R. HOEY (D-N.C.), who had been impressed by Rogers's nonpartisanship, asked Rogers to remain.

While serving as committee counsel, Rogers became friendly with a freshman member of the House, RICHARD M. NIXON (R-Calif.), who, as a member of the House Un-American Activities Committee, was investigating charges that Alger Hiss had passed documents to the Soviets in the 1930s. Nixon told Rogers what he knew and asked Rogers to examine the files. After evaluating the evidence, Rogers advised Nixon to proceed. Rogers and Nixon became close friends, a relationship that continued after Rogers returned to New York in 1950 to practice law with Dwight, Royall, Harris, Koegel and Caskey.

Rogers followed Dewey in supporting DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's bid for the presidency in 1952. At the Republican National Convention, Rogers played an important role in the effort to persuade the Credentials Committee to seat delegates loyal to Eisenhower from Louisiana, Texas, Georgia, and Florida rather than those committed to Senator ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio). After Eisenhower secured the nomination, he chose Nixon as his running mate, and Rogers served as an adviser to Nixon during the campaign. When the New York Post, a Democratic newspaper, alleged that Nixon had a "secret" slush fund, Rogers helped ward off demands from Republicans that Nixon resign from the ticket. He also advised Nixon to present his case to the public and helped to arrange and prepare what became known as Nixon's Checkers speech, the favorable response to which kept Nixon on the ticket.

When Eisenhower assumed the presidency, Rogers became deputy attorney general. In that capacity, he served as chief liaison between the Justice Department and Congress. His responsibilities included drafting legislative proposals and lobbying for the administration's legislative proposals relating to the administration of justice. He was instrumental, for example, in obtaining passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1957. In addition, he had primary responsibility for developing lists of potential judicial nominees.

Rogers remained close to Nixon throughout the Eisenhower administration. In late 1953, he went with the vice president to a meeting with Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) in an effort to persuade the senator to pull back from his attacks on communists in government and thus prevent a split between the senator and the president. After Nixon heard of Eisenhower's heart attack in September 1955, he escaped the press and spent the night at Rogers's house, where the two discussed the problems of temporarily assuming presidential powers as well as the possibility of permanent succession should Eisenhower not survive. Rogers advised Nixon to "act scrupulously like a Vice-President—not like an Acting President." When Eisenhower suffered a small stroke in 1957, Rogers performed a similar role. After the Hungarian revolt in 1956, Rogers accompanied Nixon on a trip to Europe to visit refugees. Writing in the early 1960s, Nixon described Rogers as a "cool man under pressure" on whose "excellent judgment" he could rely.

When Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL resigned in October 1957, Eisenhower appointed Rogers to replace him. As attorney general, Rogers made enforcement of civil rights measures a major concern. Rogers maintained that his views on the matter did not differ in the slightest from Brownell's. Nevertheless, the more personable Rogers enjoyed better relations with southern members of Congress than did his predecessor. As provided for in the Civil Rights Act of 1957, Rogers set up the civil rights division of the Justice Department. He oversaw prosecution of cases involving the denial of black voting rights. In 1958, after defiance of a federal court order to desegregate Little Rock's Central High School had led to federal intervention in 1957, Rogers established a committee in the Justice Department to deal with the federal aspects of desegregation. In 1960, Rogers recommended stronger measures to guarantee black voting rights, which formed the basis for the Voting Rights Act of 1960.

Eisenhower's health problems brought the issue of presidential infirmity to the fore. In 1958, Rogers advocated a constitutional amendment that would have allowed the president to issue a written statement initiating and terminating the vice president's assumption of presidential powers. Rogers led the administration's attempt to persuade Congress to approve the measure and send it to the states, but Congress did not act on it.

An excellent administrator, Rogers initiated a number of reforms at Justice. He established a program to recruit top students from leading law schools for positions in the department. In 1958, Rogers instituted a special unit to combat racketeering. That organization was eventually integrated into the prosecutory arm of the Justice Department.

Rogers also convinced a reluctant Eisenhower of the necessity of instituting antitrust suits against General Electric and Westinghouse. During the spring of 1960, Rogers represented the administration on a goodwill trip to West Africa.

In 1960, Rogers acted as a policy adviser to Nixon's presidential campaign. After Nixon's loss to JOHN F. KENNEDY, Rogers rejoined his old law firm, which became Royall, Koegel, Rogers, and Wells, as a senior partner. His law practice thrived (his clients included the Washington Post Company and the Dreyfus Fund), but he interrupted it for occasional public service. In 1965, he became a member of the U.S. delegation to the UN General Assembly, and in 1967 he served as a delegate to the United Nations Committee on Southwest Africa. Although Rogers did not play an important role in Nixon's campaign for the White House in 1968, when Nixon won the election he appointed Rogers secretary of state. That fact that Rogers had only limited experience in foreign affairs led many to conclude that Nixon intended to call the shots in foreign policy. Rogers established good relations with Congress and proved to be a skillful negotiator. However National Security Advisor HENRY KISSINGER, was a more aggressive bureaucratic politician and claimed far more publicity than the secretary of state, who seemed very much in the background. Nixon excluded Rogers from negotiations with the Soviet Union that led to the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) and with the Chinese that led to the establishment of diplomatic relations. Rogers played a larger role in the Middle East. In 1969, he proposed a plan that called for Israel to withdraw from territories occupied since the 1967 war in exchange for a commitment to peace by Arab nations. Neither side accepted the plan. Rogers did succeed in obtaining a cease-fire agreement between Egypt, Jordan, and Israel. Analysts debated the extent to which Rogers influenced foreign policy. In part, this was because, as Rogers put it, he and the president thought "a lot alike." He did disagree, however, with the decision to invade Cambodia in 1970 without apparent effect.

After repeated clashes with Kissinger, Rogers resigned in 1973 and returned to Rogers and Wells (later Clifford, Chance, Rogers and Wells). In his later years, Nixon told an aide, Monica Crowley, that "the way I treated Rogers was terrible. . . . I regret that because Rogers was smart and a good man." Rogers returned once again to public service in 1986, when President Ronald W. Reagan asked him to head the investigation into the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger. Rogers continued to practice law until shortly before his death in Bethesda, Maryland, on January 2, 2001.

—MSM

Romney, George W(ilcken)

(1907–1995) chairman of the board and president, American Motors Corporation

Romney was born in a Mormon colony in Chihuahua, Mexico, on July 8, 1907. Although American citizens and monogamists, his parents had moved to Mexico with a group of Mormons when Congress outlawed polygamy in the 1880s. After Pancho Villa expelled American nationals, Romney returned with his family to the United States and lived briefly in Texas and Idaho before settling in Utah. He attended Latter-Day Saints University but left without completing a degree to serve for two years as a missionary in England and Scotland. Upon his return, Romney briefly attended the University of Utah before moving to Washington, D.C., where he attended George Washington University. He never did earn a college degree. In Washington, he worked as an aide to Senator David I. Walsh (D-Mass.) in 1929 and 1930. After working for the Aluminum Corporation of America from 1930 to 1931, he became a lobbyist for the aluminum industry from 1932 to 1938. In 1939, he began working as a lobbyist for the Automobile Manufacturers Association (AMA). During his years with the AMA, Romney became close friends with George Mason, an officer and later president of Nash-Kelvinator, Inc., manufacturers of automobiles and home appliances. Under pressure to groom a successor, Mason hired Romney as his assistant in April 1948 and made him vice president two years later. In 1950, Romney oversaw initial production of a small, low-priced car, the Rambler, which could go 35 miles on a gallon of gasoline. Sales proved sluggish through the first half of the decade, and the Nash division operated at a deficit. In January 1954, Nash-Kelvinator joined with Hudson Motor Car Company to form the American Motors Corporation (AMC). Mason headed the new corporation.

Upon Mason's death in late 1954, Romney became chairman, president, and general manager. When continued losses pushed AMC to the brink of financial ruin in 1956, Romney successfully negotiated a revolving bank credit of $45 million. In 1956–57, he headed off an attempted takeover of AMC by LOUIS WOLFSON, a stock manipulator.

As head of AMC, Romney risked the company's future on the production of small cars. He limited and finally ended production of AMC's full-sized Hudson and Nash models while continuing to promote the Rambler. In contrast the "Big Three"—General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler—marketed large models, which Romney derided as the "dinosaur in our driveway" and "gas guzzlers."

An economic recession in 1957–58 transformed Romney into an honored prophet. As aggregate automobile sales declined, AMC's production rose from 100,000 in 1956 to 500,000 in 1958 and a similar figure in 1959. For the next three years, the Big Three had to follow Romney's lead. Chrysler presented its own compact models in 1960 and abandoned its full-sized DeSoto. Ford lost millions on its Edsel.

A frequent critic of the auto industry, Romney appeared in 1958 before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, where he attacked "excess concentration of power in any form." The size of the Big Three and its accompanying advantages, he said, made the "barriers to entry" for prospective producers nearly prohibitive. As a consequence, he pointed out, it had "been 34 years since a new United States manufacturer has successfully entered the automotive industry." In addition, he claimed that smaller producers like AMC and Studebaker had "contributed relatively more basic product pioneering than their bigger competitors." Nevertheless, he charged, the Big Three had been slow to adapt their innovations. He offered the Rambler as an example. To remedy the situation, Romney recommended the dismemberment of General Motors into several fully autonomous companies.

In his testimony, Romney attacked the United Automobile Workers (UAW) and its president, WALTER REUTHER, with equal fervor. "Big labor," he told the antitrust panel, "represented just as great a threat to freedom in America as did the business monopoly." He denounced industrywide bargaining as unfair to smaller manufacturers and berated the UAW for wage increases that outpaced increases in productivity.

As a relatively inexperienced but independent-minded executive, Romney never had cordial relations with the UAW. Fearing a loss of managerial authority, he fought constantly with local leaders over productivity and once threatened to close a plant over the issue. Although AMC avoided costly, prolonged strikes in the 1950s, it also paid higher wages than the Big Three.

Beginning in 1959, Romney became involved in state politics. In June of that year, he led the formation of a nonpartisan committee, "Citizens for Michigan," which sought to revise the state constitution. In November 1960, voters approved the group's proposal for a constitutional convention, and Romney served as a delegate and vice president of the convention in 1961–62. He ran for governor in 1962 as a Republican and defeated the Democratic incumbent, John B. Swainson. Despite the opposition of the UAW, voters in 1963 approved the constitution drafted by the convention. The approval of the new constitution made Romney a national figure. Some Republican leaders looked at him as an alternative to NELSON ROCKEFELLER, the liberal governor of New York, and BARRY GOLDWATER, the conservative senator from Arizona, for the party's presidential nomination in 1964. After demonstrating some initial interest, Romney took himself out of the presidential race in May 1963. A moderate, he criticized the right-wing John Birch Society and forced the resignation of a Republican district leader who belonged to it. He also called on the Republican Party to support civil rights legislation and joined a march favoring open housing in June 1963. Romney won reelection in 1964 and election to a four-year term under the state's new constitution in 1966. By the end of 1966, Romney had emerged as the front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination in 1968. He proved, however, spectacularly inept in dealing with the national press. An early supporter of the war in Vietnam who had moved away from that position, he explained his change in thinking by stating that during a tour of Vietnam in 1965 he had been "brainwashed" by American officials. The remark proved disastrous and led many in the press to speculate that perhaps Romney did not have all that much grey matter to wash. He withdrew from the race two weeks before the first primary. The Republican nominee RICHARD M. NIXON, won the election and chose Romney to serve as secretary of housing and urban development. In that position, Romney found himself frequently at odds with Nixon. Romney pleaded unsuccessfully for an expansion of housing programs, federal programs to aid cities, and other domestic initiatives. In his frustration, he publicly criticized the administration's approach to housing and to inflation. Shortly after Nixon won reelection in 1972, Romney resigned his position in the cabinet. Romney became chairman and chief executive officer of the National Center for Voluntary Action, a non-profit organization he had helped form in 1970 to encourage greater voluntary participation by citizens in solving national problems. After leaving the cabinet, he retired from politics but did campaign for his son, Mitt Romney, who ran unsuccessfully in 1994 for the Senate seat held by Senator Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). George Romney died at his home in Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, on July 26, 1995.

—MSM

Rooney, John J(ames)
(1903–1975) U.S. congressman

The son of Irish immigrants, Rooney was born in New York City on November 29, 1903. He attended St. Francis Preparatory School and College. After earning an LL.B. from Fordham University in 1925, he practiced law in Brooklyn, until he was appointed assistant district attorney of Kings County, New York, by District Attorney William O'Dwyer in 1940. Rooney's relentless and effective prosecutions of illegal gamblers attracted the attention of the Democratic machine in Brooklyn, which chose him to run in a special election in June 1944 to fill a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives vacated by the death of the incumbent. Rooney won the election and entered the House as the representative of a constituency consisting of mixed ethnic and economic backgrounds. He won reelection without a serious challenge for almost 30 years.

Rooney built a reputation in the House as a liberal Democrat who usually voted with his party's majority on foreign and domestic policy legislation. While he remained largely unknown to the general public, behind the scenes he became one of the most powerful politicians in the United States. In 1946, he received an appointment to the House Appropriations Committee and to its Subcommittee on the State and Justice Departments, the Judiciary and Related Federal Agencies. From 1949 until his retirement in 1975, he served as chair of that subcommittee (except for two years, from 1953 to 1955, when Republicans controlled the House). The parsimonious Rooney rigorously scrutinized those departments whose budgets were subject to his committee's approval. His close examination of the most minute budgetary details struck fear in the heart of bureaucrats. The Saturday Evening Post described him as a master at "making an appropriations-hunting civil servant appear like a confidence man." Not only did he terrorize witnesses and dominate his own subcommittee, but the full Appropriations Committee and the House leadership rarely questioned his recommendations.

Although Rooney unquestionably saved taxpayers money by his budget slashing—in 1959 he claimed to have eliminated $1 billion in spending during the previous decade—he was frequently criticized for failing to perceive expenditures in terms of a larger, cohesive policy. In 1958, columnist JAMES RESTON described Rooney as a “powerful” but “negative” force in Congress. Reston referred specifically to a meeting with President Eisenhower during 1958, in which an advisory group of the Foreign Service Institute (FSI) revealed that 50 percent of the Foreign Service officer corps did not have a speaking knowledge of any foreign language. Indeed, many U.S. ambassadors could not speak the languages of the countries they served. The advisory group informed a startled Eisenhower that Rooney’s meager budget appropriations made adequate language training impossible. Rooney defended himself by citing examples of extravagance and waste by the FSI, and a group of State Department officials publicly supported him as a valuable inspiration for examining their own spending policies.

The State Department was often subject to Rooney’s most vigorous interrogations. The plain-speaking Brooklynite could be disdainful of the elite, “striped-pants” officials of the State Department who “don’t know what they’re talking about.” In 1955, he refused a request by the State Department for extra funds for ambassadors, calling the money “booze allowances for cookie pushers.” Officials claimed Rooney’s decisions kept people of moderate means out of ambassadorial service. After returning from an overseas tour in 1955, Rooney aimed his criticism at the United States Information Agency. He called the organization “futile” and charged it with being “more interested in propagandizing the American public than in combating Communism overseas.” In 1957, Rooney sponsored a bill to pare down appropriations for the United States Information Agency, claiming that its efforts during the Hungarian uprising had been “almost a complete failure.”

Unlike other agencies subject to Rooney’s budgetary control, the FBI did not suffer from verbal harassment and cuts in appropriations. The agency’s director, J. EDGAR HOOVER, and Rooney shared a mutual admiration and political philosophy. Hoover’s appearances before the subcommittee usually brought forth from the chairman praise for the FBI’s fiscal efficiency and open-ended questions intended to provide Hoover the opportunity to expound on his positions. Historian Sanford Unger claimed that Rooney was informed of some of the FBI’s more controversial counterintelligence activities. The FBI viewed his tacit approval of them as tantamount to congressional approval. Conversely, the FBI regarded a directive from Rooney as a congressional mandate. Critics charged Rooney with inadequate oversight of FBI operations and lax control over the money allocated to the agency.

Rooney’s voting record in the House reflected the varied constituency he served, which included substantial numbers of Jews, Irish Americans, African Americans, Hispanics, and immigrants from the Near East. Rooney voted in 1953 for increased immigration quotas, particularly for countries subject to communist oppression. A staunch defender of Israel, he supported the Eisenhower Doctrine, which permitted the president to use armed forces to aid Middle Eastern nations threatened by communism. He voted for the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960 as well as for the expanded public works bill of 1959.

Rooney supported the domestic policy programs of Presidents JOHN F. KENNEDY and LYNDON B. JOHNSON. He voted for Medicare, urban renewal, and child care measures. In foreign policy, he supported the war in Vietnam. Rooney survived challenges in the Democratic primaries in 1968, 1970, and 1972 by candidates who opposed his position on the war and his ties to the Brooklyn Democratic machine. In 1970 and 1972, Rooney’s campaign accepted illegal contributions from unions and shipping interests in his district. This led the courts to order a rerun of the Democratic primary in 1972. Pressure from the Democratic machine in Brooklyn helped persuade Rooney not to stand for reelection in 1974. Upon his retirement, he lived in Washington, D.C., until his death there on October 26, 1975.

—MSM

Roosevelt, (Anna) Eleanor (1884–1962) political figure

A daughter of the younger brother of Theodore Roosevelt, Eleanor Roosevelt was born in New York City on October 11, 1884. She was eight when her mother died, after which she was raised by her maternal grandmother. Her father died two years later. After receiving tutoring in her home, she went to finishing school in London. Returning to the United States at the age of 18, she made her debut in New York society. She also joined the National Consumers League and worked at the Rivington Street Settlement House. In 1905, she married her fifth cousin Franklin D. Roosevelt. They had a daughter and four sons. During the early years of her marriage, she encouraged her husband's political career. He won election to the state legislature in 1910 and became assistant secretary of the navy in 1913. When the United States entered World War I, Eleanor worked for navy relief, visited the wounded, and helped run a Red Cross canteen.

In 1918, Eleanor discovered that her husband was having an affair with her friend and social secretary, Lucy Mercer. She offered him a divorce, which he declined and agreed not to see Lucy Mercer again. Eleanor's discovery of the affair marked the end of marital intimacy; their relationship evolved into one of, as she put it, "just respect and affection." As she and her husband led increasingly separate lives, she threw herself into a series of social and political causes.

Franklin Roosevelt resigned as assistant secretary of the navy to run as the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 1920. Even the optimistic Franklin did not expect the Democratic ticket to win, and it did not. After polio paralyzed Franklin in 1921, Eleanor devoted herself to nursing her husband. While Franklin undertook the long and grueling process of therapy, Eleanor became involved in the Democratic Party and frequently stood in for her husband at party functions. His paralysis provided a public rationale for her activism. Eleanor developed her own interests in world disarmament, the creation of an international organization to keep peace, and the rights of women and minorities. She took leadership roles in the League of Women Voters, the Women's Trade Union League, and the Women's City Club. From 1924 to 1928, she served as finance chairman of the Women's Division of New York's Democratic State Committee. By 1928, she was head of the Women's Division of the Democratic National Committee. In that capacity, she campaigned for the Democratic nominee, Al Smith, who lost decisively to HERBERT HOOVER. Eleanor also took an active role in her husband's successful gubernatorial campaigns in 1928 and 1930.

After Franklin Roosevelt became president in 1933, Eleanor continued to champion social reform. She traveled thousands of miles to win support for New Deal legislation and was the New Deal's most forceful advocate of civil rights for African Americans. In 1935, she began a syndicated newspaper column "My Day," which she used first to discuss women's issues and, after 1939, to advance her views on public affairs. At the Democratic convention in 1940, her speech from the podium helped her friend Henry Wallace win the vice presidential nomination. After the United States entered World War II in December 1941, she served as assistant director of the Office of Civilian Defense, created by an executive order that gave the agency responsibility for providing for protection of civilians, organizing volunteer efforts, and maintaining morale. Critics lambasted several of her appointments (including a couple of close friends at substantial salaries) and some of her ideas, such as defense-related programs in drama and dance. She resigned in February 1942. Throughout the war, she traveled extensively, touring Britain and visiting American troops in the Pacific and Caribbean.

Shortly after her husband's death in 1945, Roosevelt returned to public life. She accepted an appointment as a U.S. delegate to the United Nations. In 1946, she served as chairman of the Commission on Human Rights and played a central role in drafting the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which the UN adopted in 1948. She left her post at the UN in 1953.

During the 1950s, Roosevelt traveled extensively to promote the UN and other causes. Under the auspices of the American Association for the United Nations, she delivered countless speeches defending the international organization and urging the United States to adopt the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. She also visited numerous countries, including India, Yugoslavia, and Poland. On these trips, she promoted increased cultural contacts to break down barriers between East and West.

In 1957, Roosevelt traveled to the Soviet Union. The most prominent American to visit that country since the early cold war, she received an invitation from Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev to meet with him in Yalta. At the meeting, the two candidly exchanged their views of the cold war, and Roosevelt raised the question of human rights, pointing particularly to the Soviet Union's refusal to permit its Jews to emigrate to Israel. She returned to the Soviet Union the following year and hosted Khrushchev in Hyde Park in 1959.

Roosevelt frequently criticized the Eisenhower administration's foreign policy. She objected to what she considered the administration's too heavy reliance on military aid to prevent the expansion of communism and advocated a greater emphasis on economic aid. In addition, she criticized what she regarded as Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES's unilateralism and often questioned his failure to use the UN in international crises.

Although sympathetic to the plight of European Jews during and after World War II, in private she expressed some anti-Semitic attitudes typical of her time and class. A strong supporter of Israel, she questioned the Eisenhower administration's decision to send arms to conservative Arab states, which she regarded as a threat to Israel's security. In 1956, she denounced Dulles's decision not to grant Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser a loan to build the Aswan Dam. The former first lady maintained that had the money not been withheld, Nasser would not have been forced to turn to the Soviet Union.

Roosevelt also objected to what she regarded as the administration's tacit position that equated neutralism with pro-communism. She argued that for a nation such as India to remain nonaligned and a democracy served the interests of the United States. As she saw it, India's first priority was social and economic development, not choosing sides in the cold war. The former first lady deplored congressional efforts to cut back on foreign aid to India in retaliation for its friendly relations with the Soviet Union.

Late in the decade, she maintained that the administration did not do enough to seek a nuclear test ban treaty. She suggested that the United States reduce its testing as a gesture to encourage the Soviet Union to agree to end testing.

In domestic policy, Roosevelt served as a leading voice for liberal Democrats and advocated extending the programs of the New Deal and Fair Deal. She supported the expansion of public housing and slum clearance, increased aid to the rural poor, and job training programs for the unemployed. Roosevelt remained a particularly vigorous proponent of civil rights and desegregation.

Roosevelt supported ADLAI STEVENSON for president in 1952 and 1956, and he frequently consulted her on important matters. She enthusiastically worked for Stevenson in the primaries in 1956 and defended him against liberals, including ROY WILKINS of the NAACP, who accused him of ambivalence on civil rights. She also worked tirelessly for him in the general election.

Following Stevenson's defeat, Roosevelt turned her attention to Democratic politics in New York. In conjunction with HERBERT LEHMAN and THOMAS FINLETTER, she helped organize a Democratic reform movement to unseat CARMINE DE SAPIO, the boss of the Tammany machine, as Democratic leader in New York County. In 1961, they succeeded in breaking his power.

Roosevelt favored Stevenson for the presidency in 1960 and made the speech seconding his nomination at the convention. She was initially cool toward the candidacy of Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). In a magazine article in 1958, she had criticized him for having been "evasive" with respect to Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). She also thought that Kennedy's father exercised too much influence over him. Once Kennedy claimed the nomination, however, Roosevelt supported him. After his election, Kennedy appointed her to advisory commissions on the status of women and on the Peace Corps. He also reappointed her as a delegate to the UN. She continued to write her columns and travel until her death at her home in New York City on November 7, 1962.

—MSM

Roosevelt, Kermit, Jr.

(1916–2000) Central Intelligence Agency official

The son of a banker and shipping line official and the grandson of Theodore Roosevelt, Kermit ("Kim") Roosevelt was born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, on February 16, 1916. He grew up in Oyster Bay, New York, graduated from Harvard in 1938, and then taught history at Harvard and the California Institute of Technology. During World War II, he served in the Office of Strategic Services and, after the war, joined its successor, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), where he became an expert on Middle Eastern affairs.

Roosevelt played an important role in the coup that overthrew Iranian premier Mohammed Mossadeq in 1953. In 1951, Mossadeq accepted the support of the country's Communist Party and nationalized the giant Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. The British withdrew their technical people, shutting down the world's largest oil refinery at Abadan, and took the position that any oil purchased from Iran was stolen, in effect imposing a de facto embargo on Iranian oil. The boycott devastated the Iranian economy but hardened Mossadeq's resolve. The young shah, Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, who had opposed nationalizing the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, attempted to dismiss Mossadeq in mid-1952, but rioting led by nationalists and Tudeh (Iran's Communist Party) forced the shah to reverse himself. In October 1952, Mossadeq broke diplomatic relations with the British.

Lacking the resources to drive Mossadeq from power, the British turned to the United States for help. The British made their approach through the CIA. In cooperation with the British Foreign Office, the American State Department and CIA decided to topple Mossadeq and reinstall a pro-Western government. The plan, known as Operation Ajax, involved using money from the CIA to buy the loyalty of Iranian army officers and a street mob. Roosevelt was chosen to direct the operation.

In July 1953, Mossadeq dissolved parliament and called for a plebiscite. In the meantime, he ruled by decree. Tudeh staged riots in Teheran. Mossadeq won 99.4 percent of the votes in the plebiscite on August 5. Three days later, the Soviet Union announced that it had entered negotiations to provide financial aid to Iran.

Roosevelt had arrived in Iran on July 19 with a large bankroll provided by the CIA. He met with officers of the Iranian army and the shah. After the plebiscite and the announcement of negotiations with the Soviets, Roosevelt organized demonstrations against Mossadeq. Amid antiroyalist rioting, led by Tudeh, the shah panicked and fled the country on August 16. During the next few days, Roosevelt organized demonstrations in favor of the shah and coordinated activities with the armed forces. On August 19, after several days of fighting in the streets, Mossadeq surrendered. The shah returned to the country and to power on August 22. A month later, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER awarded Roosevelt the National Security Medal in a closed-door ceremony.

Roosevelt was also involved in the unsuccessful attempt to persuade Egypt's president Gamal Abdel Nasser not to accept military aid from the Soviets. In mid-August 1955, Roosevelt was sent to Egypt. At the same time, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES sent Undersecretary of State GEORGE ALLEN to Egypt with a stern letter warning that the arms deal could hand Egypt over to the communists. Although Roosevelt's role remained unclear, it prompted some critics to charge that the CIA had undercut official U.S. policy.

Roosevelt resigned from the CIA in 1958 and became government relations director for the Gulf Oil Corporation. Gulf named him a vice president in 1960. Four years later, he formed his own corporation, Roosevelt and Associates, which specialized in assisting American firms with business interests in the Middle East. In 1975, a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee reported that Roosevelt had used his CIA contacts in Saudi Arabia and Iran in an effort to win government contracts for Northrop Corporation, a large aircraft manufacturer. Roosevelt retired in the late 1970s. In 1979, he published Countercoup: The Struggle for the Control of Iran, an account of his role in the overthrow of Mossadeq. Roosevelt died in Cockeysville, Maryland, on June 8, 2000.

—MSM

Rose, Alex

(1898–1976) president, United Hatters, Cap and Millinery Workers International Union; vice chairman, Liberal Party

The son of a prosperous tanner, Rose was born in Olesh Royz, Russian Poland, on October 15, 1898. Since Jews were largely excluded from universities, Rose left Poland at the age of 15, intending to study medicine in the United States. World War

I, however, cut him off from his parents' support, and he became a sewing machine operator in a millinery shop. In 1918, Rose, who had been active in the Labor Zionist Organization, joined the Jewish Legion of the British army, and served for two years in the Middle East. After his return to the United States, he defeated a communist-backed candidate for secretary-treasurer of his local in the Cloth, Hat, Cap and Millinery Workers Union (CHCMW). He became a vice president of the union in 1927 and retained that post when the CHCMW merged with the United Hatters of North America to form the United Hatters, Cap and Millinery Workers International Union (UHCMW) in 1934.

When Max Zaritsky, president of the UHCMW, died in 1950, the executive board appointed Rose president; later that year, he won election to the position. As president, he led a successful 45-week strike in 1953–54 against the Hat Corporation of America in Norwalk, Connecticut. Usually, however, Rose strove to work with manufacturers to bolster the industry's declining fortunes, particularly in the Northeast, where the union had its base. The settlement of an eight-day strike in the cap industry during July 1958 included an agreement by manufacturers and the union to join in promoting sales and in campaigning against less expensive imported and nonunion caps.

Rose believed that the job security of his union members depended on the health of their respective industries; in 1949, he wrote that "the class struggle is a thing of the past in my union." Under Rose, the UHCMW lent $250,000 to the Kartiganer Hat Corporation in 1954. The following year, a smaller loan to a hat firm in Baltimore enabled it to resume production. In 1958, the union began to invest in real estate in New York City's garment district to prevent millinery companies from being dispossessed or from sustaining large rent increases. The following year, the Merrimac Hat Corporation of Massachusetts faced liquidation, and the UHCMW purchased it to save the jobs of the company's workers. The company remained in business for a decade with Rose as its chairman of the board. It closed when it could not compete with inexpensive imports from Czechoslovakia.

Rose entered politics in 1936, when, joined by DAVID DUBINSKY, president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, and others, he helped to found the American Labor Party (ALP). The unionists established the party because they feared that the rivalry between the American Federation of Labor (AFL) and the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) would impede mobilization of the labor vote to support President Franklin D. Roosevelt's bid for a second term. Over time, however, Rose and Dubinsky became increasingly concerned at the communist influence in the party, and they withdrew from it in 1944. That same year, along with REINHOLD NIEBUHR, a leading theologian who had also left the ALP, they formed the Liberal Party as an anticommunist alternative. Rose became a vice chairman and key leader of the group. The ALP supported Henry A. Wallace, the Progressive Party's candidate in 1948, a decision that proved fatal to that party. The Liberals supported the successful candidacy of President HARRY S. TRUMAN.

The Liberal Party occasionally ran congressional candidates, but the major goal of the organization was to influence the policies of the New York Democratic Party by endorsing those of its nominees who met the Liberals' political standards. In 1954, for example, the support of Rose and the Liberal Party proved decisive in gaining the Democratic gubernatorial nomination for W. AVERILL HARRIMAN. Rose occasionally supported independent or Republican candidates, in part to maintain his leverage with the Democrats.

During the 1950s, the Liberal Party's program included reform of labor legislation in New York State, repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, a higher minimum wage, tax reform at both the state and national levels, antidiscrimination legislation, more federal aid for housing programs, and increased consumer protection through new and existing state and federal agencies. The party endorsed the basic objectives of American foreign policy in the cold war and offered strong support for the United Nations, which the party's state chairman, A. A. Berle, called "the only agency capable of restoring [international] stability."

In spite of the small size of his union, Rose also played an important role in national labor affairs. With other garment union leaders, he frequently petitioned the Eisenhower administration to raise the federal minimum wage. In 1957, he chaired a special committee of the AFL-CIO created to review a recommendation of the federation's Ethical Practices Committee to expel the Teamsters for corruption in its leadership. Behind the scenes, Rose sought unsuccessfully to reach an accord that would have allowed the Teamsters to remain in the AFL-CIO. In the end, he recommended to the AFL-CIO's convention that the Teamsters be expelled, and the convention endorsed that recommendation. When JAMES HOFFA mysteriously disappeared in 1975, Rose said, "If Hoffa had done what we told him to, the teamsters would still be in the federation, and he would still be alive." Rose advocated the establishment of a "labor FBI" by the federation to combat the kind of corruption found in the Teamsters.

Rose eschewed the AFL-CIO's official position of neutrality during the campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1960 and endorsed Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) not long after the senator won the Wisconsin primary in April. He and ARTHUR GOLDBERG, special counsel to the AFL-CIO, were the first important labor leaders to back Kennedy. Rose called the Kennedy campaign "a public referendum" on Jimmy Hoffa, a reference to the roles that ROBERT KENNEDY and John Kennedy played in the investigation of the Teamsters's leader. Another Kennedy supporter, WALTER REUTHER, president of the United Auto Workers, joined Goldberg and Rose as AFL-CIO liaison representatives at the Los Angeles Democratic Convention in July. The group objected vehemently to Kennedy's choice of Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) as his running mate but later helped rally other liberals to the national ticket.

Rose continued to play a dominant role in the Liberal Party through the 1960s and well into the 1970s. The party's chief accomplishment during this period was to help elect JOHN V. LINDSAY mayor of New York. By the 1970s, however, some within the party came to regard Rose as autocratic and out of touch with recent developments in politics, particularly the emergence of the women's movement. Whatever success the Liberal Party enjoyed, the UHCMW suffered, as increasing numbers of Americans went hatless and foreign competition ate into the remaining market. Rose's union shrank from almost 100,000 to 16,000. In the mid-1960s, the union proposed raising his salary from $20,000 to $30,000; Rose rejected the raise and cut his pay to $17,500, the lowest salary for the president of any international union in the country. He continued to draw that salary through the inflationary late 1960s and 1970s until his death in New York City on December 28, 1976.

—MSM

Rosenberg, Ethel G(reenglass)

(1915–1953) convicted espionage agent

Ethel Greenglass was born in New York City on September 28, 1915, and raised in poverty on Manhattan's East Side. While in school, she studied piano and sang in Hugh Ross's Schola Cantorum, in the Yiddish theater, and at small neighborhood gatherings. Upon graduating from Seward Park High School at 15, she went to work as a clerk for a shipping company. Four years later, she was fired after she organized a strike of 150 women workers. Subsequently, she found another job as a stenographer and became involved in union activities and various radical causes. She joined the Young Communist League and became a member of the American Communist Party. Ethel first met JULIUS ROSENBERG, the man who would become her husband, in 1936. They married in 1939, after which the couple initially lived with Julius's mother. In 1940, Julius took a position as a junior engineer with the Army Signal Corps. The Rosenbergs moved into an apartment in Knickerbocker Village in New York in 1942, and Ethel stayed at home with the couple's two sons.

Julius, who had been a member of the Communist Party, began spying for the Soviets in 1942. The following year, David Greenglass, Ethel's brother, was drafted into the army and assigned to the Manhattan Project at Los Alamos, New Mexico, as a machinist. Julius informed the Soviets of this development and, along with Ethel, approached David's wife, Ruth Greenglass, a devoted communist, about obtaining technical information through David. Ruth Greenglass, in turn, recruited her husband, who was also a loyal Communist.

In February 1945, the Army Signal Corps fired Julius on the ground that he had been a member of the Communist Party, a charge he denied. He then started a machine shop with David Greenglass, Ethel's brother. The business never did well, and the partners bickered.

In 1950, Klaus Fuchs, a German-born British physicist, was arrested in Great Britain and confessed to passing information about the atomic bomb to the Soviets. Harry Gold, the courier for Fuchs, was also arrested and confessed. Two members of Rosenberg's ring, Joel Barr and Alfred Sarant, fled to Europe and eventually to the Soviet Union, where they became leading computer scientists. In June 1950, Greenglass was arrested for spying for the Soviet Union. He confessed, implicating his wife and Julius Rosenberg. In July, the FBI arrested Julius Rosenberg on charges that he had been a central figure in a Soviet spy ring during World War II that had passed information on the atomic bomb to the Soviet Union. On August 11, Ethel was arrested for helping to transmit information about the atomic bomb to the Soviet Union during 1944 and 1945.

Gold and Greenglass pleaded guilty to charges of espionage, while the Rosenbergs and MORTON SOBELL maintained their innocence. Julius and Ethel Rosenberg went on trial for conspiracy to commit espionage rather than treason, because the USSR had been an ally of the United States at the time of the alleged acts. At the trial, which began on March 6, 1951, the U.S. government alleged that both Rosenbergs were operatives in an espionage ring that included Fuchs, a Russian diplomat, and two Americans, Harry Gold and Morton Sobell. Greenglass testified that he made drawings of precision molds for the bomb's high-explosive lenses and passed them to Gold, who then transmitted the information to the Soviets. Gold's testimony corroborated these allegations, and Greenglass's wife, Ruth Greenglass, testified that Ethel had typed the notes provided by David Greenglass. Ruth Greenglass had made the allegation for the first time only 10 days before the Rosenbergs' trial, and David had changed his testimony to support that of his wife. The Rosenbergs' lawyer, Emanuel Bloch, an attorney of no particular distinction who had little experience in criminal law, did not cross-examine Greenglass effectively and did not cross-examine Gold at all. After an unexpectedly short three-week trial, the jury returned guilty verdicts. Judge Irving Kaufman sentenced the Rosenbergs to the electric chair and Sobell to 30 years in prison. Greenglass and Gold received lesser prison terms.

The trial and its aftermath provoked impassioned responses. Many at the time believed that the evidence against the Rosenbergs proved their guilt beyond a shadow of a doubt; others held firmly to the belief that Julius and Ethel were victims of a political trial in a country swept by anti-communist hysteria. All over the world, people of various political backgrounds formed committees either to protest the Rosenbergs' death sentences or insist on their innocence. A primary vehicle for pro-Rosenberg sentiment in the United States was the Committee to Secure Justice in the Rosenberg Case. Many of the organizations supporting the Rosenbergs turned out to have been sponsored by communists and part of an orchestrated campaign of propaganda. These groups gained momentum for their cause when the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit rejected the Rosenbergs' first appeal in February 1952. Over the next few months, the Rosenberg Committee collected over $1 million, while international protests grew with each newly decreed date of execution.

By early 1953, a number of distinguished scientists were pleading for the Rosenbergs. Dr. Harold Urey, a nuclear chemist who had been involved in the development of the atomic bomb, derided Greenglass's testimony, declaring a man of Greenglass's abilities was "wholly incapable" of transmitting the complex mechanics of atomic weapons. Subsequent evidence proved Urey badly mistaken. ALBERT EINSTEIN joined Urey in a plea for clemency.

In late December 1952, Judge Kaufman rejected a motion for a reduction in the Rosenbergs' sentence, but he did grant a stay of execution to allow for a formal appeal for clemency to President HARRY S. TRUMAN, who declined to act on it. When President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER took office, he inherited the Rosenbergs' formal plea for clemency, which he rejected in February 1953. Eisenhower described his decision as a difficult one, but he believed that the evidence pointed clearly to their guilt. Their crime, he said in his formal rejection, "involved the deliberate betrayal of the entire nation and could very well result in the death of many, many thousands of innocent citizens.”

After Eisenhower refused clemency, the Rosenbergs’ lawyers, led by Bloch, worked feverishly in appellate courts and the U.S. Supreme Court to win reviews of the conviction and stays of execution. Public appeals reached a crescendo in June 1953 as the Rosenbergs’ third scheduled date of execution approached. The government of Poland offered the couple asylum. The president of France, Vincent Auriol, made a quiet plea for clemency to Eisenhower, as did Nobel Prize winners François Mauriac and Léon Jouhaux. In Italy, leftists were joined in the protests by the right-wing press and Pope Pius XII. Forty members of the British Parliament urged Eisenhower to stop the executions, and crowds in Israel accused the U.S. government of anti-Semitism (perhaps ignoring the fact that the judge and two lead prosecutors were also Jewish). In communist countries, pleas for the Rosenbergs were incorporated into vitriolic anti-American propaganda.

On June 15, the Supreme Court once again refused, by a five-to-four vote, to review the case; and marshals set June 18 as the date for the couple’s execution. On June 16, two lawyers who had had no previous connection with the defense appeared before Supreme Court Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS and argued that the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 had superseded the Espionage Act of 1917 and that the district court had improperly imposed the death penalty without the recommendation of a jury. Douglas held that the claim presented a substantial question of law and granted a stay of execution on June 17. Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL petitioned the Court to vacate the stay, and, on June 18, Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON took the highly unusual step of calling together the recessed Court to consider Douglas’s action. On June 19, after almost three hours of intense and emotional argument, the Court ruled that the Atomic Energy Act did not displace the penalties established by the Espionage Act. Moreover, since the actions that formed the basis for the conviction had taken place before passage of the Atomic Energy Act, any alleged inconsistencies with the penalties of the Espionage Act were irrelevant. President Eisenhower refused a second plea for clemency by the Rosenbergs, and on the evening of June 19, Julius and Ethel Rosenberg went to the electric chair at the prison in Ossining, New York, aware of an offer from the Justice Department to spare their lives if they confessed and cooperated in tracking down other spies. The Rosenbergs maintained their innocence to the end.

Their deaths touched off scattered emotional demonstrations—some of grief, some of satisfaction—around the world. Eight protest strikes were reported in Italy, while 400 demonstrators were arrested in Paris. In New York City, 5,000 people gathered to denounce the action and pray.

Public interest in the Rosenberg case continued during the ensuing decades. Numerous writers and researchers reopened the case. During the 1960s, amid growing distrust of the government and doubts about the cold war, several works weighed in on behalf of the Rosenbergs. In 1969, The United States v. Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, a play by Donald Freed, portrayed the couple as victims of blind injustice. Walter and Miriam Schneir raised evidentiary questions about the government’s case in their book, Invitation to an Inquest (1965). With the passage of the amended Freedom of Information Act in 1974, defenders of the Rosenbergs obtained the release of many, albeit heavily censored, documents from FBI files. While these documents raised questions about the fairness and legality of the trial, the information released in the mid-1970s did not support Julius’s innocence. The documents did suggest, however, that the government brought Ethel into the case in an attempt to force a confession from her husband. In 1983, Ronald Radosh, a historian formerly associated with the New Left, and Joyce Milton, a freelance writer, published The Rosenberg File, which strongly challenged the Schneirs’ evidence. Radosh and Milton concluded that the Rosenbergs had been guilty.

After the fall of the Soviet Union, the Russian government released documents that indicated that Julius Rosenberg had provided information to the NKVD. His main contact, Alexander Feklisov, met Julius on more than 50 occasions over a three-year period, beginning in 1942. Feklisov himself said that Julius had passed military secrets to him but never had important information about the atomic bomb.

In 1995, the National Security Agency released intercepted Soviet consular communiqués from the years 1942 to 1945, which had been decoded as part of the Venona project. The intercepted cable traffic provided conclusive evidence that Julius Rosenberg had been a Soviet agent, code named “Liberal,” and that he had actively engaged in espionage. More than that, he had supervised other agents. After the release of the Venona decrypts, even the Schneirs publicly conceded that Julius Rosenberg had been a Soviet spy. The Venona documents, however, contained no evidence that Ethel had directly engaged in espionage. Indeed, the fact that Soviet documents referred to her as “Ethel,” rather than a code name, would seem to indicate that the Soviets at least did not consider her a valuable asset. On the other hand, a cable from the Soviet consulate in New York in November 1944 described Ethel as “well developed politically” (which meant that she believed unquestioningly in the party line) and indicated that she “knows about her husband’s work.” Moreover, she played an active role in recruiting Ruth Greenglass.

In 2001, David Greenglass claimed that he had committed perjury and falsely implicated his sister to protect his wife and children. At this point, it seems safe to say that Julius Rosenberg was a Soviet spy and part of a ring that passed documents relating to the atomic bomb to the Soviet Union. Ethel Rosenberg’s direct involvement in espionage remains unproved, although she knew of and supported the activities of her husband and brother.

The execution of the Rosenbergs continues to be a contentious matter. The government did not want to execute them, the prosecutor did not recommend the death penalty, and no less an anti-communist than J. EDGAR HOOVER, director of the FBI, opposed the execution. The government used the threat of execution to press for a confession. Although the government knew the identity of the other members of Julius Rosenberg’s ring through the Venona intercepts, it did not want to reveal the existence of the Venona project. This accounts for the decision to bring in Ethel, who was clearly an accessory, and for sticking with the threat of execution. The option to cooperate with U.S. intelligence and save themselves remained open to the Rosenbergs until they were put to death.

The Rosenbergs, however, remained true believers. The letters they wrote to each other while awaiting execution read less like letters from people facing imminent death than activists or propagandists pleading someone else’s cause. The letters are replete with sloganeering references to “our social duty to our fellow man” and pledges to “take our stand with the people fighting for peace and right.” They make no reference to communism or the Communist Party; the Rosenbergs maintained the fiction to the end. In her plea to Eisenhower for clemency, Ethel even accused the United States of anti-Semitism for prosecuting the Rosenbergs. “The great democratic United States,” she wrote, “is proposing the savage destruction of a small unoffending Jewish family.” Ironically, at that very time, the USSR, the country for which the Rosenbergs chose to die, was engaged in a pogrom, as Stalin’s government rounded up Jews falsely accused of taking part in the “Doctors’ Plot.” Perhaps Sam Roberts, a reporter for the New York Times and author of The Brother: The Untold Story of Atomic Spy David Greenglass and How He Sent His Sister, Ethel Rosenberg, to the Electric Chair (2002), got it right when he wrote: “By martyring themselves,” the Rosenbergs “contributed more to the cause of world communism than they ever had as spies.”

—MSM

Rosenberg, Julius

(1918–1953) convicted espionage agent

The son of a garment worker, Rosenberg was born in New York City on May 12, 1918, and brought up on the Lower East Side. The product of a poor, Orthodox Jewish family, he received religious instruction at Downtown Talmud Torah and Hebrew High School in New York. He attended public schools and graduated from Seward Park High School. With the encouragement of Ethel Greenglass, whom he first met in 1936, he completed his B.S. degree in electrical engineering at the City College of New York in 1939. While there, he devoted himself to left-wing politics and organized the Steinmetz Society, an affiliate of the Young Communist League. Soon after graduating from City College, Julius married Ethel Greenglass. In 1940, he took a position as a junior engineer with the Army Signal Corps. His job involved inspecting electrical equipment manufactured by defense contractors in New York and New Jersey.

In 1942, he began working for the Soviet Union. According to Alexander Feklisov, Rosenberg's main Soviet handler, "Julius never accept[ed] any kind of compensation." Further, Rosenberg "was not just a valuable source himself," but "also the linchpin of a network" of growing importance. While acting as the on-site inspector for the army at Emerson Radio and Phonograph, Rosenberg stole a proximity fuse and passed it to the Soviets. (Rosenberg's theft of the proximity fuse was more valuable to the Soviets than the information about the atomic bomb that he later provided to them.) When Ethel's brother, David Greenglass, was drafted in 1943 and assigned to the technical support staff at the Manhattan Project, Rosenberg recruited his brother-in-law to collect information for the Soviets. The Army Signal Corps fired Rosenberg in March 1945, when a security check turned up information that he had been a member of the Communist Party, a charge he denied. At that point, the Soviets deactivated Rosenberg; although he continued to carry out occasional specific missions.

After losing his job with the Signal Corps, Rosenberg started a machine shop with David Greenglass and another brother of Ethel's, Bernie. The business achieved little success, and the partners bickered. Rosenberg and his wife were arrested in 1950 on charges of arranging to pass documents relating to the atomic bomb to the Soviet Union during World War II. He was executed in the prison at Ossining, New York, on June 19, 1953. See ETHEL ROSENBERG.

—MSM

Ross, Robert Tripp

(1903–1981) deputy assistant secretary of defense for legislative affairs, assistant secretary of defense for legislative and public affairs

Born in Washington, North Carolina, on June 4, 1903, Ross attended public schools and spent much of his early life working in drug stores. He got married after graduating from high school and left his job as a drug store clerk to try to sell real estate in Florida. A series of other sales jobs followed until finally Ross moved to New York City in 1929 and found work as a clerk in a pharmacy of a large hotel. Once described as a "pleasant, gregarious, outgoing man," by 1940 he was managing a large pharmacy in Jackson Heights.

In 1946, Ross ran successfully as a Republican for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives. He lost his bid for reelection in 1948, after which he became an officer in a company, owned by his second wife's family, that manufactured clothing and athletic equipment. Ross ran to regain his seat in 1950 but was again defeated. Upon the resignation of Representative T. VINCENT QUINN (D-N.Y.), however, Ross won a special election in February 1952 to fill the unexpired term. His campaign emphasized the issues of "crime, corruption and Communism" in the Truman administration. Ross lost his bid for reelection to a full term in November 1952 and in 1953 accepted the post of the New York State Republican Committee's representative in Washington, D.C.

Ross received an appointment as deputy assistant secretary of defense for legislative affairs in March 1954. Nearly one year later, he was promoted to assistant secretary of defense for legislative and public affairs. Controversy marked his tenure in that position. In late March 1955, Secretary of Defense CHARLES E. WILSON issued a memorandum directing that information released by the Defense Department make a "constructive contribution to the primary mission of the Department of Defense." Ross's rigid interpretation of Wilson's order elicited charges of censorship not only from congressional committees and reporters, but also from the secretaries of the armed services and even from members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The military officials protested that Ross censored their speeches to stifle all difference of opinion with the administration's defense policy.

In November 1955, Representative John E. Moss (D-Calif.), the chairman of the House Government Operations Subcommittee on Information, canceled a scheduled hearing on government information policies, largely because of Ross's refusal to cooperate. During the summer of 1956, the subcommittee issued a report charging that the Defense Department's policies were the "most restrictive" of any government agency. For his part, Ross consistently maintained that "security" was the only basis on which he withheld information.

Ross again clashed with Congress in October 1956, when he accused three powerful senators of bilking the public for free air transportation from Europe to the United States. On October 20, he announced that the air force was sending two 66-passenger planes to Europe at a round-trip cost of $20,000 merely to bring home Senators JOHN L. MCCLELLAN (D-Ark.), JOHN STENNIS (D-Miss.), and DENNIS CHAVEZ (D-N. Mex.). All three heatedly denied Ross's charges. They claimed they had arranged to return on scheduled military flights and that the administration charged them with seeking special treatment for no other reason than to embarrass the Democratic Party. When McClellan and Stennis subsequently arrived together from Madrid on a regularly scheduled military flight and demanded a retraction of the charges, Ross apologized and conceded that they had never requested special treatment.

Ross's most serious difficulties began in January 1957, when both the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, led by McClellan, and the House Government Operations Subcommittee, led by Representative CHET HOLIFIELD (D-Calif.), began investigations of conflict-of-interest charges leveled against him. The accusations stemmed from a contract for wind-resistant trousers, in the amount of $834,150, that the army had awarded to Wynn Enterprises of Knoxville, Tennessee, of which Ross's second wife was president. (Ross had been vice president, sales manager, and public relations director for the Knoxville branch, although he claimed to have resigned before running for Congress in February 1952.) The controversy gained momentum when the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union charged that the Southern Athletic Company, controlled by Herman D. ("Breezy") Wynn, Ross's brother-in-law, had received more than $4 million in government contracts over a two-year period despite repeated violations of federal labor law.

Appearing before the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, Ross denied any conflict of interest or violation of legal or ethical codes but admitted that he had arranged a conference between his brother-in-law, Herman Wynn, and a marine general. Ross maintained that this meeting only concerned the quality of some baseball uniforms produced for the marines by one of the Wynn companies. His appearance before McClellan's subcommittee seemed to have shaken Ross, and Holifield's subcommittee in the House was gearing up for hearings of its own.

Faced with the growing pressure of two congressional investigations, Ross resigned on February 14, 1957. Subsequently, McClellan conceded that Ross had probably done nothing illegal, but, as the senator put it, "whether he did anything improper is a matter of opinion." Subsequent hearings by the House Government Operations Subcommittee revealed that Ross had not severed all ties with companies owned by the Wynn family. Southern Athletic listed Ross as a vice president from 1952 to 1956. In fairness to Ross, he was apparently unaware that he had ever been an officer of the firm. Breezy Wynn attributed the annual reports listing Ross as a vice president to an "auditor's error."

Ross quickly secured an appointment as assistant commissioner of borough works in Queens, a position he held from March 1957 to January 1958. He served as vice president of the Merchandising Apparel Company from 1959 to 1968. Ross resided in Jackson Heights until his death there on October 1, 1981.

—MSM

Rossiter, Clinton L(awrence), III
(1917–1970) professor of government, Cornell University

Born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on September 18, 1917, Clinton Rossiter grew up in Bronxville, New York. He attended Westminster School in Simsbury, Connecticut, and Cornell University, from which he graduated in 1939. He then went on to earn an M.A. in politics from Princeton University in 1941 and a Ph.D. in constitutional law, also from Princeton, in 1942. During World War II, Rossiter served in the navy and saw action in the Pacific. Discharged with the rank of lieutenant, he received an appointment as instructor in political science at the University of Michigan in the fall of 1946. In 1947, he returned to Cornell as assistant professor of government and remained there for the rest of his career. He was promoted to associate professor in 1949 and became a full professor in 1954.

Rossiter quickly established himself as one of the leading interpreters of the American experience. His scholarly work concentrated on conservative thought, and Rossiter associated himself with moderate conservatism of the sort espoused by Edmund Burke, the 18th-century British political thinker. Rossiter's own writing was distinguished by an elegant, highly literary style. His early books included Constitutional Dictatorship: Crisis Government in the Modern Democracies (1948), which argued that, in times of crisis, democracies often turned to dictatorship, and The Supreme Court and the Commander in Chief (1951). Seedtime of the Republic: The Origin of the American Tradition of Political Liberty, published in 1953, described the American Revolution as an effort to conserve British liberties, motivated by a philosophy of ethical, ordered liberty. The book offered a laudatory analysis of American political institutions and traditions of freedom. Seedtime of the Republic received widespread acclaim; it won the Bancroft Prize and the Woodrow Wilson Award.

Conservatism in America (1955) traced the history of conservative thought in England and America. As Rossiter described it, "conservatism is full of harsh doubts about the goodness and equality of men, the wisdom and possibilities of reform and the sagacity of the majority. . . . In the final reckoning, however, it defends the desire for human liberty hardly less staunchly than it does the need for social order." The book acknowledged the limits conservatism faced in America, because the United States was "a progressive country with a Liberal tradition" and "a liberal [political] mind." Indeed, Rossiter contended that pure Burkean conservatism was "irrelevant" to America. Arguing that the Federalist Papers, rather than Burke's work, should serve as the principal source for modern conservatives, Rossiter criticized conservatives who rejected New Deal programs for engaging in a hopeless effort to return to the past. His stated goal was "to sober and strengthen the American liberal tradition, not to destroy it." Predictably, the work infuriated Russell Kirk and other conservatives.

Rossiter's own conservatism consisted of a desire for gradual, contained progress; a distrust of majoritarianism, of which he regarded McCarthy-ism as a deplorable example; and a commitment to leadership by an aristocracy of talent. During the 1950s, Rossiter backed civil rights, world peace, and the United Nations. Many conservatives, particularly those associated with National Review magazine, denounced Rossiter's views as virtually indistinguishable from those of liberals.

In The American Presidency (1956), Rossiter described the American presidency as "one of the few truly successful institutions created by men in their endless quest for the blessings of free government." The office, he argued, had served the American republic well. His Parties and Politics (1960) praised the two-party system's effectiveness in providing for peaceful change and articulating the majority will. In Marxism: The View from America (1960), Rossiter advocated peaceful coexistence with the Soviet Union, asserting that "we must not slide hopelessly into an apocalyptic view of the struggle between their system and ours, lest we slam the door forever on all hopes of an evolution in Communism that would make it possible for East and West to live together in a reasonably peaceful world."

Rossiter served as chair of his department from 1956 to 1959 and in 1959 was named John L. Senior Professor of American Institutions. He also held various positions outside his own university. From 1953 to 1960, he served as a consultant to the Ford Foundation's Fund for the Republic, in which capacity he headed a team of 10 scholars that produced a series of books on communist influence in the United States. In addition, Rossiter was a consultant to the Rockefeller Foundation from 1956 to 1958 and a contributor to the report of the President's Commission on National Goals, published in 1960.

In the early 1960s, Rossiter toured extensively throughout the world as a visiting lecturer for the State Department. He published Conservatism in America: The Thankless Persuasion in 1962. His Alexander Hamilton and the Constitution (1964) praised Hamilton for his role in creating an industrial society with an effective national government. In 1966, his 1787: The Grand Convention took issue with the idea that the Constitution represented a conservative step back from the democratic ideals of the Declaration of Independence. Rossiter asserted that the Constitution emerged logically from the aspirations expressed in 1776 and that it saved the infant republic from chaos. In 1966, Rossiter received an invitation to lecture at the Academy of Sciences of the Soviet Union. Cornell experienced widespread student unrest in 1969 and 1970. Rossiter initially joined a number of senior faculty in calling for a return to order. When the university's president, a close friend of Rossiter's, reached an accommodation with black students, however, Rossiter broke with his colleagues and supported the agreement. Rossiter died in at his home in Ithaca, New York, an apparent suicide, on July 11, 1970. His The American Quest, 1790–1860 (1971) appeared posthumously.

—MSM

Rovere, Richard H(alworthy)

(1915–1979) journalist

The son of an electrical engineer, Richard Rovere was born in Jersey City, New Jersey, on May 5, 1915. After attending public schools in New York City and Stony Brook School on Long Island, he earned his B.A. at Bard College in upstate New York, where he was editor of the school newspaper and became first a socialist and then a communist. After graduation in 1937, Rovere joined the staff of New Masses, a communist weekly, which, he said later, “consistently, indeed slavishly followed the Communist line.” “Like many others at the time,” he reflected, “I looked at brutal authoritarianism and saw discipline.” The signing of the Nazi-Soviet Pact in August 1939 deeply disillusioned Rovere, who quit New Masses and turned away from the Communist Party, which he had never officially joined. Over the next five years, he wrote as an anti-communist liberal for The Nation and, beginning in 1943, for Common Sense, the organ of the League for Independent Political Action. He clashed with other members of the staff and left Common Sense after less than a year. In 1944, he began writing for Harper's and the New Yorker.

Early in his association with the New Yorker, Rovere wrote mostly on nonpolitical topics. He contributed profiles of colorful individuals, some political and many not. His subjects ranged from New York politicians, such as Newbold Morris and Edward Flynn, to John Gunther (a journalist), Bruno Furst (a memory expert), and Henry Blackman Sell (an author and literary critic turned meatpacker). Based on the strength of a series of stories Rovere wrote about the campaign of 1948, in particular a widely read article he had written in Harper's on New York's governor, THOMAS E. DEWEY, the editors of the New Yorker hired Rovere as a regular political columnist. In the more than 30 years he wrote Letter from Washington (later Affairs of State), Rovere became one of the most respected and influential political journalists in America. Rovere covered Washington from New York; rather than breaking stories based on his own investigations, he wrote detached, analytical accounts of controversial topics. For the most part, his columns displayed little evidence of his younger polemical attitude. Rovere's reputation rested on the wit, distinctive style, and quality of his analyses.

Rovere's most vivid journalism dealt with personalities, and his language came closest to passionate when he wrote about the anticommunist crusader Sen. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). His pieces on McCarthy for the New Yorker mingled amusement, revulsion, and incredulity. Rovere described his first encounter with McCarthy, during which the senator offered a formidable stack of documents intended to prove a contention he had made. Rovere gradually realized that the papers were all either irrelevant, contradictory to the senator's own case, or useless.

In 1959, Rovere published a popular, controversial character study of McCarthy, Senator Joe McCarthy. Characterizing the senator as “in many ways the most gifted demagogue ever bred on these shores,” Rovere called McCarthy a “master of flim-flammy” and a “champion liar.” As Rovere saw it, McCarthy was not “totalitarian in any significant sense, or even reactionary. . . . If he was anything at all in the realm of ideas, principles, doctrines, he was a species of nihilist; he was an essentially destructive force, a revolutionist without any revolutionary vision, a rebel without a cause.” For all his talents as a demagogue, Rovere wrote, McCarthy “lacked the most necessary and awesome of demagogic gifts—a belief in the sacredness of his own mission.”

In Senator Joe McCarthy, Rovere described McCarthy's technique as the “multiple untruth.” According to Rovere, the multiple untruth “need not be a particularly large untruth but can instead be a long series of loosely related untruths, or a single untruth with many facets. In either case, the whole is composed of so many parts that anyone wishing to set the record straight will discover that it is utterly impossible to keep all the elements of the falsehood in mind at the same time." By boldly scattering falsehoods and distortions, McCarthy was able to stay ahead of the slow-moving process of factual refutation, while enjoying a full measure of publicity from his accusations.

The book's analysis of McCarthy was devastating. In McCarthy, Rovere found a rare case, "a true cynic and a true hypocrite." "Beyond mischief," wrote Rovere, "he never accomplished anything." Much as he characterized McCarthy as a mountebank, Rovere dismissed the man's cause as "a headlong flight from reality. It elevated the ridiculous and ridiculed the important." Rovere concluded his work: "McCarthy offered a powerful challenge to freedom, and he showed us to be more vulnerable than many of us had guessed to a seditious demagoguery—as well as less vulnerable than some of us feared."

Rovere wrote noteworthy assessments of the other major political figures of the time. He praised President HARRY S. TRUMAN for acting vigorously in the face of staggering crises, in which he showed "moral courage under pressure, even a kind of moral grace." Rovere supported Truman's intervention in Korea: "Aggression had at that moment to be resisted . . . had we failed to respond, the slave world would have been greatly emboldened, the free world greatly dispirited." In July 1953, Rovere cited the American intervention in Korea as "the turning point of the world struggle against Communism."

Rovere eulogized Senator ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) as a "man of character." In a less flattering portrait of Vice President RICHARD NIXON, Rovere wrote in 1955 that, although Nixon had taken many stands, "there is no discernible pattern to his commitments." Rovere was struck by "the flexibility that suggests an almost total indifference to policy. Nixon appears to be a politician with an advertising man's approach to his work. Policies are products to be sold to the public—this one today, that one tomorrow, depending on the discounts and the state of the market."

Rovere's collection of essays, Affairs of State: The Eisenhower Years, published in 1956, offered an appraisal of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's performance as president. In it, Rovere coupled praise for the president's foreign policy with criticism of his conduct of domestic affairs. Recognizing that "such challenges as he chose to meet he met well," he lauded Eisenhower for fulfilling the urgent tasks of holding together the Western alliance and saving Western civilization "in a spirit of decency and maturity." However, Rovere criticized the president's attitude toward the rest of the government as "neglectful." "Once Eisenhower has found a first-class automobile dealer, cotton broker, or razor manufacturer to head a department, he has acted as if the public interest has been satisfied and his own responsibility discharged." For Rovere, Eisenhower's program was nothing more than "a pastiche of pieties." Rovere concluded that Eisenhower's presidency had "left the country almost exactly as he found it."

In 1962, Rovere wrote a retrospective assessment of Eisenhower that took his second term into account. He found the second four years disappointing but reiterated his essential judgment. Eisenhower's "command decisions" in foreign affairs were "generally wise," while his responses to domestic problems were complacent and inadequate. Beginning in the late 1960s, some of Eisenhower's harshest critics, including left-leaning journalists Murray Kempton and I. F. STONE, reassessed Eisenhower and found much to praise in his conduct of the presidency. In 1971, Rovere published a rebuttal to their work, titled "Eisenhower Revisited—A Political Genius? A Brilliant Man?," in the New York Times Magazine. Acknowledging that "after the various agonies of the Johnson and Nixon years, Ike's record and behavior look increasingly attractive," Rovere nonetheless contended that, "with hindsight, we can see that practically all of the problems that bedeviled us in the sixties had been worsening in the fifties." Rovere contended that the increasingly popular characterization of Eisenhower as a "political genius" arose from the simple fact that the United States did not go to war while he was president, a circumstance Rovere attributed as much to luck as good management.

By the late 1950s, Rovere had established himself as a leading political commentator and expanded his activities well beyond his column for the New Yorker. He was a correspondent for Spectator (a British review of politics, literature, and the arts) from 1954 to 1962 and served on the board of editors of the American Scholar from 1958 to 1967. He taught at Columbia University from 1957 to 1959 and lectured at Yale University in 1972 and 1973.

In 1962, Rovere published The American Establishment and Other Reports, Opinions and Speculations. The title essay, which originally appeared that same year in Esquire, contained a satiric listing of those elite institutions and individuals most influential in American life. The public took the piece at face value, and it contributed a phrase to the language. During the 1960s, he also published The Goldwater Caper (1965) and Waist Deep in the Big Muddy: Personal Reflections on United States Policy (1968). The latter reflected his growing disgust with the Vietnam War, an enterprise that he thought threatened "all mankind," could "liberate no one," and became "daily more unconscionable." Rovere published a volume of memoirs, Arrivals and Departures: A Journalist's Memoirs, in 1976 and wrote his last regular political column for the New Yorker in August 1979. He died in Poughkeepsie, New York, on November 23, 1979. A posthumous book, Final Reports: Personal Reflections on Politics and History in Our Time, came out in 1984.

—MSM

Rowe, James H(enry), Jr.

(1909–1984) attorney

Born in Butte, Montana, on June 1, 1909, Rowe earned his B.A. from Harvard University and graduated from Harvard Law School in 1934. The following year, he clerked for Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. From 1935 to 1938, he worked for various New Deal agencies. Through the influence of Thomas Corcoran, one of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's aides and a top political fixer, Rowe landed a low-level job in the White House, as an assistant to Roosevelt's son, James. In 1939, Rowe became an administrative assistant to the president. Rowe went to the Justice Department in 1941 as an assistant attorney general. He served as a lieutenant in the navy in the Pacific from 1943 to 1945. After the war, he was a technical adviser to the International Military Tribunal that tried Nazi leaders at Nuremberg, Germany. He left government in 1946 to form a law firm in Washington with Corcoran. During the Truman administration, Rowe advised the president on how to deal with the Republican-dominated 80th Congress and helped plan strategy for the presidential campaign of 1948.

During the Eisenhower administration, Rowe advised such Democratic leaders as Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), ADLAI STEVENSON, and Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY (D-Minn.). Rowe was particularly close to Johnson, whom he urged to speak out in opposition to the administration's programs. The senator, however, preferred to cooperate with Eisenhower. Rowe served as an intermediary between Stevenson and Johnson. Beginning in 1954, he advised Stevenson to court Johnson; Rowe argued that Stevenson would need Johnson's help to win the Democratic presidential nomination in 1956. Rowe's advice paid off; after initial wavering, Johnson endorsed Stevenson.

Rowe initially supported Johnson for the presidential nomination in 1960. However, after Johnson assured him in 1959 that he would not be a candidate, Rowe supported Humphrey. The senator from Minnesota valued Rowe's advice, despite warnings from supporters that Rowe backed him only to divide liberals in the party. Humphrey's aides believed that Rowe intended to create a three-way deadlock between Stevenson, Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), and Humphrey, so that the convention would draft Johnson.

In late 1959, Rowe developed a strategy for Humphrey's upcoming campaign. Because Humphrey was relatively unknown outside the Midwest and had only limited funds, Rowe urged him to devote all his time to campaigning in selected primaries. With enough victories in the primaries, Rowe figured, Humphrey could obtain the votes of a minimum of 150 to 200 delegates and thus enter the convention as a strong candidate in a floor fight. Rowe's plan failed when Humphrey lost primaries in Wisconsin and West Virginia. Following the defeat in West Virginia, Rowe urged Humphrey to continue campaigning, but Humphrey withdrew from the race. Rowe then encouraged Johnson to seek the nomination. At the convention, Rowe served as Johnson's leading floor manager.

Rowe remained Johnson's confidant throughout the 1960s. In 1964, he was part of the inner circle that directed Johnson's presidential campaign. He was instrumental in convincing Johnson not to offer the vice presidential nomination to ROBERT F. KENNEDY and to chose Humphrey as a running mate. In late 1967, Rowe began planning Johnson's presidential campaign for 1968. Following the Tet offensive in February 1968, Rowe was a member of the Senior Advisory Group on Vietnam that urged Johnson not to escalate the war further. Johnson followed Rowe's advice and, at the end of March, announced that he was limiting the bombing of North Vietnam. The president surprised many people, including his close friend Rowe, by also announcing his withdrawal from the presidential race. Rowe managed Humphrey's unsuccessful campaign for the presidency in 1968. During the 1970s, Rowe continued to be active in Democratic politics. From 1965 to 1971, he was a member of Harvard's Board of Overseers. Rowe died in New York City on June 17, 1984.

—MSM

Rusk, Dean

(1909–1994) president, Rockefeller Foundation; secretary of state

The son of a country schoolteacher, small farmer, and Presbyterian minister, Dean Rusk was born in Cherokee County, Georgia, on February 9, 1909. At the age of three, he moved with his family to Atlanta, Georgia, where his father worked as a mail carrier. He started school in second grade, having taught himself to read from his brother's textbooks, and graduated from Boys' High School in Atlanta in 1925. He worked for two years in a law office and entered Davidson College in North Carolina in 1927. After graduating magna cum laude in 1931, he attended St. John's College at Oxford University as a Rhodes Scholar. There, he earned a master's degree in politics, economics, and philosophy in 1934. Later that year, Rusk became a professor of government at Mills College in California and in 1936 dean of the faculty. While continuing to hold his position at Mills College, he studied law at the University of California at Berkeley. A captain in the army reserve, Rusk was called to active duty in 1940. Not long before Pearl Harbor, he received a transfer to military intelligence and was assigned to the War Department. In 1943, he was promoted to major and assigned to the staff of General Joseph Stilwell. Rusk participated in the first and third Burma campaigns; he was appointed deputy chief of staff and promoted to colonel. Recalled to Washington in June 1945, he served as assistant chief of the Operations Division of General Staff of the War Department.

After his discharge in February 1946, Rusk joined the State Department as assistant chief of the Division of International Security Affairs. That summer, Rusk became special assistant to the secretary of war. He returned to the State Department in March 1947 as director of the Office of Special Political Affairs, where he was directly involved in policy concerning the establishment of the state of Israel. By 1950, Rusk had risen to deputy undersecretary. Rusk requested and received an appointment as assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs in March 1950. Although a demotion, it was the job he wanted. A dedicated anticommunist, Rusk supported American military intervention in Korea, although he opposed any invasion of China. Rusk left the State Department to become president of the Rockefeller Foundation in 1952.

As president of the Rockefeller Foundation during the 1950s, Rusk directed the distribution of about $250 million to developing nations in Asia, Africa, and Latin America to help them improve their methods of agriculture and promote health and social welfare. Under Rusk's leadership, scientists working for the Rockefeller Foundation promoted the green revolution by improving the yields of rice and producing new varieties of rust-resistant wheat. The foundation also funded research by the National Academy of Sciences in 1955 and 1956 on the health hazards of nuclear fallout. It later supported research by Cornell University, the University of Chicago, and the Social Science Research Council to ensure the safety of the peaceful use of atomic energy. In 1956, Rusk traveled to Hungary and Austria, where he directed the distribution of aid to Hungarian scholars and scientists after the failed Hungarian revolt.

As head of the Rockefeller Foundation, Rusk also played a role in protecting academic freedom. In 1954, the Republican majority on the House Special Committee to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations charged that the Rockefeller, Carnegie, Ford, and other foundations “directly supported ‘subversion’ by supporting attacks upon our social and governmental system and financing the promotion of socialism and collectivist ideas.” The three-member majority—Representatives B. Carroll Reece (R-Tenn.), Jesse P. Wolcott (R-Mich.), and Angier L. Goodwin (R-Mass.)—believed the foundations had “propagandized blindly for the United Nations,” had supported assignment of articles by the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences to communist and other leftist writers, and had promoted excessive moral relativism in research. To the committee’s majority, a striking example of this was the Rockefeller Foundation’s support of ALFRED KINSEY’s studies on sex. Responding to these charges, Rusk denied the Rockefeller Foundation was infiltrated by communists. He emphasized that the foundation would never try to control the type of research it funded and would fight any attempt by the government to use taxation to infringe on freedom of thought.

As secretary of state during the administration of President JOHN F. KENNEDY, Rusk generally played an advisory role. Kennedy chose Rusk over more prominent candidates because the president intended to shape his own foreign policy. Rusk later claimed to have had reservations about the invasion of Cuba and acknowledged that he had been excluded from the decision-making process and had been too deferential to the president. Initially, Rusk favored keeping the United States out of Vietnam, but after 1963 he came to support U.S. involvement. During the administration of LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Rusk played a leading role in formulating and defending American policy in Vietnam as the war escalated. After the Tet offensive in February 1968, Johnson announced that he would not seek another term, de-escalated the American military commitment, and entered into negotiations with North Vietnam. Rusk, who apparently disapproved of the talks, took little part in them. After leaving the government in January 1969, Rusk found that many elite universities would not even consider him for a faculty appointment. In 1970, he became Sibley Professor of International Law at the University of Georgia. After retiring from teaching in 1984, he published a volume of memoirs, As I Saw It, in 1990. Rusk died in Athens, Georgia, on December 20, 1994.

—MSM

Russell, Richard B(revard), Jr.
(1897–1971) U.S. senator; chairman, Armed Services Committee

The son of a lawyer and judge, Russell was born in Winder, Georgia, on November 2, 1897. He graduated from the Seventh District Agricultural and Mechanical School in Powder Springs, Georgia, in 1914, and from Gordon Military Institute in 1915 before earning a law degree from the University of Georgia in 1918. After serving in the navy for 79 days during World War I, during which time he never left Atlanta, Russell returned to Winder to practice law with his father. In 1920, he won election as a Democrat to the Georgia General Assembly; he served in that body from 1921 to 1931 and as its speaker from 1927 until 1931. In November 1930, Russell was elected governor. The following January, his father, the chief justice of Georgia, administered the oath of office. Having promised economy in government during his campaign, he reduced his salary, consolidated executive departments, bureaus, and commissions, and established a state purchasing department. He built highways and made efforts to improve education.

In November 1932, Russell won a special election to fill a vacancy in the U.S. Senate created by the death of William J. Harris (D-Ga.). Russell subsequently won election to a full term in 1936 and was reelected in 1942, 1948, 1954, 1960, and 1966. Early in his career, he supported most New Deal legislation and demonstrated particular enthusiasm for agricultural price supports, rural electrification, and farm loans. By the mid-1930s, Russell began to depart from the New Deal on labor legislation. He refused to support President Franklin D. Roosevelt’s plan to pack the Supreme Court. Throughout his career in the Senate, Russell opposed measures aimed at altering race relations in the South. He led filibusters against antilynching bills in 1935 and 1937. Whatever differences he may have had with Roosevelt over domestic policy, in the years preceding American entry into World War II, Russell backed the president's foreign policy. In the mid-1930s, Russell had opposed the World Court and voted for the Neutrality Act. By the end of the decade, he voted several times for funds to strengthen America's defenses. He supported an end to the mandatory arms embargo and the establishment of Selective Service in 1940 and voted for lend-lease legislation in 1941.

Russell quickly rose to prominence in the Senate based on his friendly manner, his ability to mediate differences, his honesty, his oratorical ability, and his parliamentary skills. Upon his arrival in the Senate, he managed to get appointed to the Appropriations Committee, perhaps the most powerful committee in the upper chamber. He also received appointments to other key committees, including Immigration, Manufactures, and Naval Affairs (from which he moved in 1947 to the newly created Armed Services Committee). In addition to serving on two of the Senate's most powerful committees, Appropriations and Armed Services, Russell was a member of the Democratic Policy Committee and the Democratic Steering Committee. In the 79th Congress, he chaired the Committee on Manufactures. By the second half of the 1940s, he had emerged as the leader of the southern caucus. Although a skilled debater, he gave few speeches on the Senate floor, preferring to work behind the scenes, but no one exercised more influence on his colleagues.

Like many southerners on Capitol Hill, Russell became an opponent of social welfare programs after the war. He did, however, serve as chief sponsor of the National School Lunch Act of 1946, which not only provided nutrition for schoolchildren but subsidized agriculture as well. In foreign policy, Russell rejected the idea that the United States should police the world. He nevertheless believed that the United States should receive special rights to bases that it had helped to build during World War II. As relations with the Soviets deteriorated, Russell supported the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan, the latter without much enthusiasm.

Russell resented the report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights, which recommended, among other things, the establishment of a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission and the abolition of segregation in the armed forces. He thought that the committee had gathered information intended to confirm the preconceived notions of its members. Truman's message calling for passage of some of the committee's recommendations alarmed Russell and other southerners in Congress. In March 1948, a group of 21 southern senators met and agreed to rally behind Russell's leadership to block any civil rights legislation.

Disillusioned with Truman, Russell was among the many Democrats of various political views who favored General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the Democratic nomination that year. When Eisenhower disavowed any interest in the presidency, Russell, as leader of the southern bloc in the Senate, permitted his name to be entered in nomination at the Democratic National Convention. A regional candidate, he received only 263 votes to Truman's 947½.

Russell led southern opposition to the inclusion of a strong civil rights plank in the Democratic platform in 1948. When the convention rejected the modest plank backed by Truman and proposed by the platform committee in favor of a stronger endorsement of civil rights, southern delegates walked out of the convention, bolted from the Democratic Party, and nominated South Carolina's governor, STROM THURMOND (D-S.C.), for the presidency on the States Rights Party (Dixiecrat) ticket. Russell did not join the Dixiecrats and, shortly before the election, gave Truman a pro forma endorsement. He took no part in the national campaign.

In 1951, Russell became chair of the Armed Services Committee, a position he held until 1953, when the Republicans gained control of the Senate. After the elections of 1954, the Democrats regained control of the upper house, and Russell resumed the chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee, which he held until 1969. Although strongly anti-communist, Russell did not believe that the United States could do much to prevent China from falling to the communists. He thought it unwise to base American foreign policy on undependable allies and opposed the use of American force abroad when the national interest did not clearly dictate it. For Russell, a strong military capability provided the best way to provide for America's defense. In 1951, he headed a joint investigation by the Armed Services Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee into Truman's dismissal of General Douglas MacArthur. Russell's impartial, restrained, and expeditious handling of the proceedings helped to defuse an explosive issue.

In 1952, Russell actively sought the Democratic presidential nomination. He presented himself as a conservative and declared that "I do not think this dangerous period is the time to strike out on new adventures that could lead this country down the road to socialism." In an attempt to broaden the base of his appeal, Russell advocated reform of the Taft-Hartley Act (even though he had voted to pass the law over Truman's veto). He remained, however, a sectional candidate and ran third on all three ballots at the national convention. His highest tally came on the second ballot, when he received 294 votes. Russell endorsed the party's nominee, ADLAI E. STEVENSON, in October but took little part in the campaign.

An intelligent, unpretentious, and courteous man, Russell devoted his life entirely to the Senate. He never married, worked long hours, and avoided the outward trappings of power. Russell was one of the most respected members of the Senate, and his colleagues regarded him as the embodiment of the best traditions of the upper chamber. Many observers believed that he would have become president had he not been a southerner at a time when the South's position on race diverged strongly from that of the rest of the country. Russell's unsuccessful presidential bid in 1952, which clearly demonstrated the limits faced by southern conservatives, somewhat embittered him. He subsequently decided to forgo any ambition for a national office role and devote his abilities, including his formidable parliamentary skill, to leading the powerful bloc of southerners who chaired committees and subcommittees in the Senate. In 1953, he passed over an opportunity to become minority leader and instead secured the position for his friend and protégé, Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.).

Throughout the 1950s, many informed political observers considered Russell the most influential member of the Senate. Russell used that influence to maintain high levels of price support for basic commodities. The antics of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) embarrassed Russell. McCarthy's coarse language, his reckless charges, and his abuse of witnesses who appeared before his committee appalled the dignified Georgian. Russell would not, however, support cutting off funds for McCarthy's committee, because he refused to interfere with the operations of a legitimately constituted committee of the Senate.

During the Eisenhower administration, Russell led the southern bloc in its fight against racial integration and measures designed to protect the civil rights of African Americans. Throughout his career, Russell refused to engage in race-baiting and opposed lynching and other forms of racist violence. He was nevertheless a dedicated white supremacist and fought vigorously against all federal efforts to intrude upon southern society. By the mid-1950s, however, Russell proved willing to make strategic compromises rather than engage in hopeless, die-hard obstruction.

When the Supreme Court struck down segregation in public schools (Brown v. Board of Education [1954]), Russell issued a statement calling the decision "a flagrant abuse of judicial power" that violated rights "plainly guaranteed" to the states by the Constitution. In 1956, Strom Thurmond drafted a Declaration of Constitutional Principles, more popularly known as the Southern Manifesto, attacking the Supreme Court's decision. When a number of moderate southern members of Congress refused to sign the manifesto, a committee headed by Russell produced a new draft that excluded some of the most inflammatory language. The final draft, largely written by Russell, declared that Brown had overstepped the Court's authority and called on southern states to use "any lawful means" to resist it. Nineteen senators and 77 members of the House signed the document.

That same year, the House passed legislation proposed by the Eisenhower administration. Parliamentary maneuvering killed the bill in the Senate. In 1957, the administration once again sent the measure to Congress, and it once again passed the House. Designed primarily to protect black voting rights, it also established a presidential civil rights commission and elevated the civil rights section of the Justice Department to the status of a division.

The most controversial provision granted the attorney general authority to file civil suits to further desegregation. Before the Senate considered the bill, Russell warned that it would be "vigorously resisted by a resolute group of senators." Johnson went to Russell and warned his mentor that a filibuster would damage the Democratic Party and might result in the loss of Congress. It would also most likely result in a change to the Senate's Rule 22, which provided for unlimited debate and required a two-thirds vote for cloture. Without control of the committee chairs and without even the threat of a filibuster, Johnson admonished, southerners would lose any ability to influence civil rights legislation, much less the ability to block it. In exchange for a promise not to filibuster, Russell and his allies extracted a promise to eliminate provisions giving the president power to use troops to enforce existing civil rights laws and permitting the attorney general to initiate civil action for injunctive relief in civil rights cases. They also added a provision guaranteeing a jury trial in contempt cases arising from interference with the exercise of the right to vote.

On August 24, Russell declared that southern leaders remained "unalterably opposed" to the bill. However, reflecting a recognition that the compromise was the best the southerners could hope to obtain, he added that "there was no collective agreement that we would undertake to talk the proposition to death." On August 28, Thurmond conducted a solo filibuster against the bill for a record 24 hours and 18 minutes before he physically collapsed. With Thurmond's theatrics out of the way, the Senate passed the bill (Russell voted against it), and Eisenhower signed the Civil Rights Act of 1957 into law. Russell contended that Thurmond's stunt could have created an "unparalleled disaster" by prompting an attempt by supporters of civil rights to revoke the concessions the southerners had obtained. Russell denounced Thurmond, asserting that "if I had undertaken a filibuster for personal political aggrandizement, I would have forever reproached myself for being guilty of a form of treason against the people of the South."

In 1960, Russell and 17 other members of the southern bloc managed, with the aid of a filibuster, to weaken legislation proposed by the administration designed primarily to strengthen the voting rights provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1957. Southerners succeeded in amending a plan for court-appointed referees to help African Americans register and vote so as to reduce the power of the referees. They also killed a provision enabling the federal government to pay half the costs incurred by local schools for desegregation and an amendment strengthening provisions prohibiting companies with federal contracts from engaging in discriminatory employment practices. As in 1957, Russell denounced the final version of the civil rights bill but did not attempt to block its passage.

As chairman of the Armed Services panel, Russell opposed attempts by the Eisenhower administration to cut the military budget; he also opposed the New Look, which was intended to save money and avoid another limited war by stressing nuclear deterrence over conventional forces. During Senate debate over a defense appropriations bill in 1955, Russell stated that General MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY had asserted that the cuts in the army's manpower proposed by the administration would "endanger national security." In spite of Russell's plea and his position as chair of the Armed Services Committee, he could not prevent reductions in defense spending.

Early in 1956, following indications that the Soviet Union had made significant advances in developing long-range bombers, Russell appointed Senator STUART SYMINGTON (D-Mo.) to chair a special five-member panel to investigate the state of American air power. The Democratic majority criticized defense cuts proposed by the administration and warned that the USSR might soon have superiority in the air. Later in the year, Russell joined a 13–12 majority on the Appropriations Committee in a vote to increase funding for the air force by $800 million more than the administration's request. After Secretary of Defense CHARLES WILSON described the increase as "phony," Russell, always jealous of congressional prerogatives, denounced the secretary for having "treated the Congress with disdain . . . at times almost with contempt." He charged that Wilson "has sought to intimidate the officers of the Armed Services from fully expressing their opinions to, and advising with, the Congress." The final bill signed by the president contained most of the increase in air force funding.

Russell often criticized what he regarded as excessive expenditures on foreign aid. While he did not oppose all foreign aid, he maintained that it should be temporary in nature and distributed sparingly. In fact, Russell never voted for a foreign aid bill after 1952. Throughout the Eisenhower administration, he objected to what he called throwing money around the world and insisted on careful scrutiny of the administration's requests for foreign aid. In 1957, Russell posed the major obstacle in the Senate to passage of the Eisenhower Doctrine and an appropriation for $200 million in economic aid to countries in the Middle East. He proposed that the economic assistance should be postponed until Congress made its annual study of the entire foreign aid program. His amendment, however, went down to defeat on the floor by a vote of 28 to 58.

In 1956, Russell, who had a close political and personal relationship with Johnson, backed Johnson's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination. Four years later, however, a rift developed between them over Johnson's efforts as majority leader to pass the civil rights bill in 1960. The rift widened when Johnson accepted the Democratic vice presidential nomination after the party's national convention had adopted a stronger civil rights platform than Russell could countenance. The friendship between Johnson and Russell, however, withstood the strains of politics; although Russell initially declined to back the national ticket, he gave his endorsement after Johnson made a personal appeal.

Russell remained a formidable figure during the 1960s, but a declining one. The election of 16 new Democratic senators, mostly liberals, in 1958 served to reduce Russell's power. He served on the Warren Commission, which investigated the assassination of President JOHN F. KENNEDY. Russell's adamant opposition to President Johnson's civil rights bills resulted in stinging defeats. A southern filibuster failed when the Senate invoked cloture to pass the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The next year, Russell proved unable to prevent passage of the Voting Rights Act. He opposed most of Johnson's Great Society but remained close to Johnson, who trusted the advice of the Georgian. Although Russell had misgivings about American involvement in Vietnam, he maintained that, since a commitment had been made, the United States should use all necessary military force to win the war. In 1969, Russell gave up his chairmanship of the Armed Services panel to become head of the Appropriations Committee. On January 21, 1971, during his seventh term in the Senate, Russell died of respiratory insufficiency in Washington, D.C.

—MSM

Rustin, Bayard

(1910–1987) civil rights leader

An illegitimate child raised by his Quaker maternal grandparents, Rustin was born in West Chester, Pennsylvania, on March 17, 1910. He attended public schools and studied at Wilberforce College, Cheney State Teachers College, and the College of the City of New York, but he never earned a degree. In 1936, he joined the Young Communist League because he believed that communists "seemed to be the only people who had civil rights at heart." He broke with the communists in 1941 when, after the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union, the Communist Party abandoned its opposition to World War II and subordinated social protest to the cause of defeating Germany. From then on, Rustin devoted himself to civil rights and pacifism.

Soon after breaking with the communists, Rustin joined the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), a nondenominational, pacifist religious group that opposed the war and racial injustice. His work brought him into contact with A. PHILIP RANDOLPH, the president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and a leading activist for black civil rights. In 1941, Rustin helped organize Randolph's March on Washington Movement, which demanded fair employment practices in the nation's burgeoning defense industries. Randolph postponed the planned march on Washington when President Franklin D. Roosevelt issued an executive order banning racial discrimination by defense contractors. Rustin opposed the decision to cancel the march and accused Randolph of compromising his principles.

In 1941, Rustin helped found the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and went to work for the organization as a field secretary. He went to prison from 1943 to 1945 for refusing military service in World War II. Upon his release, he became chairman of the Free India Committee and three years later went to India to study Gandhi's nonviolent protest. In 1947, Rustin participated in CORE's Journey of Reconciliation, the first Freedom Ride into the South. During that protest, he was convicted of violating segregation laws and spent weeks on a road gang in North Carolina. At about the same time, he became director of the Committee Against Discrimination in the Armed Forces. Pressure from that group contributed to President HARRY S. TRUMAN's decision to issue an executive order barring discrimination in the services in 1948.

Rustin resigned his post with CORE in 1953 to become executive director of the pacifist War Resisters League. His commitment to pacifism took him to many places around the world. He traveled to Britain in 1959 to help the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament organize its first march to "ban the bomb." In 1960, Rustin was arrested in France for protesting atomic tests in the Sahara.

From 1955 to 1964, Rustin served as chief tactician of the Civil Rights movement. In 1955, he helped MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., organize the bus boycott in Montgomery, Alabama, and Rustin played a significant role in the formation of King's philosophy of nonviolence. Rustin stressed the tactical as well as the moral advantages of nonviolent direct action. In October 1956, he wrote that "insofar as the Negro retains the nonviolent approach, he will be able to win white sympathy and frustrate the aims of the White Citizens Council [white supremacists]. . . ." If, however, white racists succeeded in provoking blacks to violence, Rustin contended, "Negroes will lose their moral initiative, liberals will become even more frightened and inactive and a deeper wedge will be driven between white and black workers." He also asserted that ongoing nonviolent direct action would exert immediate economic and social pressure on the South and was more important than "a one-shot performance at the polls in November."

In 1957, at King's request, Rustin drew up plans for the organization of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which advocated racial equality through nonviolent means. That year he also wrote a series of statements used by King and the Rev. RALPH ABERNATHY at a meeting with Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON. The statements included the assertions that federal action was necessary to end racial discrimination and that neither political party had been sufficiently active in promoting civil rights. They also demanded that President Eisenhower make an appeal to the nation on behalf of racial equality and that Nixon make a trip to the South and "speak out in moral terms" for civil rights in general and voting rights in particular.

Although committed to nonviolent direct action and civil disobedience, Rustin believed in the need to create alliances with white reformers, particularly sympathetic elements in the labor movement. Rustin emphasized the need for an interracial coalition of poor people, because he believed that gaining civil rights alone would not remedy the issue of poverty in the black community.

In June 1960, Rustin drafted a letter that King sent to both national parties proposing action on civil rights. It called on them to repudiate the segregationists within their ranks; to reduce, in accordance with the Fourteenth Amendment, the congressional representation of areas denying blacks the right to vote; to endorse explicitly the Supreme Court's 1954 school desegregation decision as both morally correct and the law of the land; and to oppose colonialism in Africa. The letter also urged Congress to include in the civil rights bill then under consideration a section empowering the federal government to bring suits on behalf of African Americans who had been denied civil rights and to frame the bill so as to place responsibility for the protection of black voting rights in the hands of the president rather than the southern courts. That same year, Rustin organized demonstrations at both the Republican and Democratic National Conventions.

Rustin served as chief planner of the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom that took place in August 1963. More than 250,000 people attended the rally to support civil rights legislation and to listen to speeches that included King's "I Have a Dream" speech. In 1964, Rustin organized a one-day boycott of public schools in New York City to demonstrate support for more rapid integration of New York's school system. With the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Civil Rights movement achieved its greatest success. At the same time, some younger activists turned to Black Power and rejected nonviolence. Rustin opposed black nationalism and calls for violence in the mid-1960s, calling instead for an alliance of organized labor, African Americans, and liberals under the umbrella of the Democratic Party. Black militants derided him as an Uncle Tom, and Rustin, in response, moved closer to his white allies. During a strike of teachers in New York City in 1968, Rustin supported the United Federation of Teachers against the demands of African-American militants who demanded community control of the schools. In 1964, Rustin became executive director of the newly created A. Philip Randolph Institute. In that post, he attempted to strengthen ties between African Americans and the trade union movement. Rustin also maintained strong ties with the American-Jewish community. His advocacy of harmony between the black and Jewish communities became a major emphasis of his later years, and he condemned growing anti-Semitism among African Americans. That and his strong support of the state of Israel were controversial among African Americans. Some African Americans accused him of greater devotion to white liberal, labor, and Jewish causes than to black causes. Months before he died, he acknowledged in an interview with the Village Voice that he was a homosexual. He had previously downplayed his sexual orientation because public knowledge of the fact would have limited his effectiveness on behalf of civil rights, pacifism, and other causes. Rustin died in New York City on August 24, 1987.

—MSM

Salisbury, Harrison E(vans)

(1908–1993) journalist

Born in Minneapolis, Minnesota, on November 14, 1908, Harrison Salisbury attended the University of Minnesota, where he began his career in journalism as editor of the student newspaper and a part-time reporter for the Minneapolis Journal. He graduated in 1930 and began his 18-year association with the United Press (UP, later United Press International). Beginning in St. Paul, Salisbury was successively assigned to the Chicago bureau in 1931, the Washington bureau in 1934, and foreign desk of the New York office in 1940. He went to Britain in 1943 as manager of UP's London bureau. From January to September 1944, he covered the Soviet Union and the war on the Eastern front. In late 1944, Salisbury returned to the United States to become UP's foreign news editor. In 1946, Salisbury published his first book, Russia on the Way, which compared the United States to a Soviet Union exhausted by the war.

Salisbury joined the New York Times as its Moscow bureau chief in 1949. For the next five years, he wrote about internal changes in the Soviet Union caused by Stalin's policies and the pressures of the cold war. Soviet authorities censored his dispatches, a fact that remained unknown in the United States at the time and led some to conclude that he was excessively sympathetic to the Soviet Union. Salisbury later criticized the Times for not printing a notice that the reports were subject to Soviet censorship. In September 1954, he requested a transfer from Moscow. After returning to the United States, Salisbury published 14 articles in a series titled "Russia Re-viewed," which detailed life in the Soviet Union and Stalin's terror. Salisbury won the 1955 Pulitzer Prize for his candid appraisal of life in the Soviet Union, including, as he later described it, "the drunkenness, the bureaucracy and the famine of goods, services and ideas after nearly 40 years of Bolshevism." The articles were published as a book, American in Russia, in 1954. The book included a large amount of narrative material on aspects of Soviet life that few Americans saw. He described the customs and attitudes of the diverse nationalities that made up the Soviet Union and made it clear that ethnic nationalism had not died with the Russian Revolution.

Salisbury took what he termed a "realistic position" on relations with the Soviet Union after Stalin's death. He believed in the possibility of coexistence with the Soviet Union. In his view, patience, common sense, and the application of a little "honey as well as vinegar to the critical joints" of the Communist regime might enable the two superpowers to survive in peace. He cautioned, however, that the United States had to remain militarily strong "for to be second best in a nuclear war was unthinkable folly." He saw a possible danger to improved relations when young Soviet army officers, with little contact with the West, came to power. Moreover, Salisbury believed the leadership of the Soviet Union displayed a new flexibility that the United States did not match.

Following his return to the United States, Salisbury worked as New York City correspondent for the Times. He remained one of the leading American experts on foreign affairs and lectured extensively on the topic. In 1957, he visited Bulgaria and Albania, nations virtually closed to most Americans. The following year, he became the second American reporter to travel through Mongolia since World War II. He returned to the Soviet Union in 1959 and again in 1961–62. The first of these trips produced To Moscow—and Beyond: A Reporter's Narrative (1960), which reported that life in the Soviet Union had improved under Nikita Khrushchev.

In the wake of the sit-in protests in 1960, the Times sent Salisbury to report on the racial situation in the South. He filed a story that the paper ran on its front page in which he described the fear and anxiety he found in Birmingham, Alabama. In it, he wrote that “every inch of middle ground has been fragmented by the emotional dynamite of racism, enforced by the whip, the razor, the gun, the bomb, the torch, the club, the knife, the mob, the police and many branches of the state’s apparatus.” City officials, including T. Eugene (“Bull”) Connor, sued Salisbury and the Times for libel. After dismissing the other cases, a lower court awarded damages to Connor in 1964, but the United States Court for the Fifth Circuit overturned that decision.

Salisbury served as director of national coverage for the Times from 1962 to 1964 and assistant managing editor from 1964 to 1972. A trip to China and countries sharing a border with it resulted in a series of articles and a book, Orbit of China (1967). Salisbury traveled to North Vietnam to inspect the consequences of American bombing campaigns there during 1966. He reported that what the administration of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON described as surgical bombing inflicted heavy casualties among civilians. Salisbury rewrote the articles into a book, Behind the Lines, published in 1967.

In 1970, Salisbury became the first editor of the Op-Ed page of the Times, which ran columns and articles by outside contributors to present a variety of views beyond those of the Times’s own columnists. He became associate editor in 1972, a year before he reached the age of mandatory retirement. After retiring from the Times, Salisbury continued to write, producing 11 more books, including Black Night, White Snow: Russia's Revolutions, 1905–1917 (1978), and The Long March: The Untold Story (1985). Salisbury happened to be in Beijing’s Tiananmen Square in June 1989 when the pro-democracy demonstrations broke out, and, although he left Beijing before the Chinese army attacked the protesting students, Salisbury reported on the experience in Tiananmen Diary: Thirteen Days in June (1989). He suffered a heart attack and died while riding in an automobile outside of Providence, Rhode Island, on July 5, 1993.

—MSM

Salk, Jonas E(dward)

(1914–1995) professor of epidemiology and preventive medicine, University of Pittsburgh

The son of Orthodox Jewish immigrants from Poland, Salk was born in New York City on October 28, 1914. After graduating from Townsend Harris High School, Salk received his B.S. from the City College of New York in 1934 and his M.D. from New York University in 1939. He began, in 1940, a two-year internship at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York City. In 1942, he won a research fellowship in epidemiology at the University of Michigan, where he worked with the celebrated microbiologist, Dr. Thomas Francis, Jr., and helped develop antiinfluenza vaccines using a killed virus to stimulate the production of antibodies. During and after World War II, Salk served as a consultant on epidemic diseases, first to the War Department and then to the secretary of the army. He was appointed professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Medicine and director of its virus research laboratory in 1947.

At the request of the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis (later the March of Dimes), Salk began research on a vaccine against poliomyelitis. Although other researchers, including Dr. Albert Sabin, had been working on a weakened (“attenuated”) live-virus vaccine, the National Foundation provided support for Salk’s efforts to develop a killed-virus vaccine. After developing techniques to confirm the theory that there were three varieties of the virus, Salk and his team set about developing a vaccine that could provide protection against all of them. Salk killed (“inactivated”) the polio viruses by exposing them to formaldehyde long enough so that the viruses could not cause paralytic polio but not so long that the viruses would be insufficiently potent to generate sufficient antibodies to provide immunity. Salk injected himself, his family, and members of his lab with the killed-virus vaccine. In 1952, Salk vaccinated residents of two institutions in Pennsylvania, the Polk State School and the D. T. Watson Home for Crippled Children. The subjects developed sufficient antibodies to protect against the disease, and none became ill. Salk formally announced the results of his trial in the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) in March 1953. Two days before the publication of his results in JAMA, however, Salk made public his results on a nationwide broadcast on CBS radio, which violated scientific decorum and earned him a reputation among many in the scientific community as a publicity seeker.

Dr. Jonas Salk receives a citation at a White House ceremony, April 22, 1955 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Sabin, Salk's leading rival, denounced the Salk vaccine as "insufficiently tested for mass trial" and "potentially unsafe." The National Foundation did a field test of Salk's vaccine in 1954. The massive trial involved over 1 million children in 44 states. More than 400,000 children received the vaccine; roughly the same number received placebos, and a third group was observed but not injected. Overall, more than 300,000 doctors, nurses, public health officials, teachers, principals, and volunteers participated in the trial.

Salk became a national hero in April 1955, when a team at the University of Michigan, headed by Francis, reported that the massive test of the vaccine had been a success. "The vaccine," declared Francis, "works. It is safe, effective, and potent." Released on the 10th anniversary of the death of Franklin Roosevelt (who had been crippled by polio as a young man), the report generated a national wave of excitement and relief. On April 23, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER awarded Salk a citation "for his extraordinary achievement."

Later that month, six pharmaceutical companies received federal licenses to manufacture and distribute the vaccine. Batches from Cutter Laboratories of Berkeley, California, however, had failed to eliminate the live polio virus, and 204 people were infected with the disease; most became paralyzed, and 11 died. Salk maintained that the laboratory had not precisely followed his instructions for killing the virus. The surgeon general of the United States temporarily halted the injections. After tightening safety standards for manufacturing the vaccine, the inoculations resumed.

The nationwide vaccination program also became the focus of political controversy. In May, the Eisenhower administration proposed that Congress appropriate $28 million in grants to states to vaccinate needy children. A rival proposal, introduced in June by LISTER HILL (D-Ala.), the chair of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, called for $135 million to provide free vaccines for all children. The American Medical Association (AMA) supported the administration's bill, while an official of the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis gave implied approval to Hill's proposal. Congress passed Hill's measure, and Eisenhower signed the bill in August.

The program was overwhelmingly successful. In June 1956, Salk told an AMA meeting that 100 percent prevention of polio was possible through the administration of vaccine booster shots. Between 1955 and 1967, paralytic polio cases averaged 2,000 a year, compared with 20,000 to 30,000 cases a year before the vaccine's widespread use.

Salk became a hero to the public, a symbol of the possibilities of modern science. Some in the scientific community, however, dismissed Salk as a capable but unoriginal researcher and a publicity hound. He did not win the Nobel Prize or election to the National Academy of Sciences.

During the late 1950s and early 1960s, Salk worked on a single vaccine to stimulate immunity to several viral diseases simultaneously. At the same time, Sabin continued to develop a live-virus vaccine that could be administered orally. In June 1961, the AMA adopted a resolution recommending the massive use of Sabin's oral live-virus polio vaccine, which offered "longer protection" than Salk's dead-virus vaccine. Salk challenged the recommendation, describing it as "questionable," but by the mid-1960s, the Sabin vaccine had replaced the Salk vaccine in the United States. However, other countries, including Canada, continued to use the Salk vaccine.

Salk founded and became director of the Salk Institute for Biological Studies in La Jolla, California, in 1963. The city donated land for the institute, and the March of Dimes provided funds to build it. Salk turned his attention to the role of the immune system in cancer and multiple sclerosis. In the late 1980s, he attempted to develop a vaccine against AIDS. He died in San Diego, California, on June 23, 1995.

—MSM

Saltonstall, Leverett (1892–1979) U.S. senator

The scion of one of Massachusetts's oldest, wealthiest, and most politically prominent families, Leverett Saltonstall was born in Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts, on September 1, 1892. Educated at private schools, he received a B.A. from Harvard College in 1914. After graduation from Harvard Law School in 1917 and service as a lieutenant in the field artillery during World War I (including six months in France), he returned to Boston, was admitted to the Massachusetts bar, and joined his uncle in the law firm of Gaston, Snow, Saltonstall, and Hunt. A Republican, Saltonstall first entered local politics in 1920 as an alderman in Newton, Massachusetts. In 1922, he won election to the lower house of the general court (the state legislature), in which he served for the next 14 years, the last eight as speaker. He ran unsuccessfully for lieutenant governor in 1936. Two years later, however, he defeated James Michael Curley, the former mayor of Boston, for the governorship. Although elected in a stunning upset, Saltonstall proved a popular governor. His administration reduced the state deficit by 90 percent, and he won reelection easily in 1940 and 1942. In 1944, Saltonstall won an election to fill the unexpired Senate term of HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., who had resigned to return to army service. He was elected to a full term in 1948 and reelected in 1954 and 1960.

In the Senate, Saltonstall was an effective legislator, whose strength lay in drafting legislation and negotiating in conference committee. Although he voted against much of President HARRY S. TRUMAN's Fair Deal legislation, Saltonstall's support for aid to Greece and Turkey, the Marshall Plan, and the North Atlantic Treaty earned him a reputation as a liberal. He also assiduously served the interests of his constituents. A strong supporter of civil liberties, he emerged as an early opponent of what he believed were the excesses of Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY's (R-Wis.) anticommunist campaign and vigorously opposed McCarthy's attacks on Secretary of State DEAN ACHESON and Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall.

Saltonstall rose rapidly to a position of party leadership. He served on the powerful Appropriations and Armed Services Committees throughout his career in the Senate and as Republican whip from 1949 to 1957. An internationalist in foreign policy, Saltonstall was not consistently liberal or conservative on domestic issues. Personally respected and a moderate within the Republican Party, he rose to leadership because he was acceptable to both wings of a bitterly divided party. Particularly on foreign policy, Saltonstall aligned himself with the internationalist, or liberal, wing of the Republican Party. This led him to urge General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to run for the presidency in 1952 and to play an active role in promoting the general's candidacy for the Republican nomination.

During the early years of Eisenhower's presidency, Saltonstall held the post of Republican whip. Considered the most liberal member of the party's leadership in the upper house, Saltonstall was more sympathetic to the administration's program during the Republican-controlled 83rd Congress (1953–55) than either Majority Leader WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) or HOMER FERGUSON (R-Mich.), chair of the Republican Policy Committee. Saltonstall strongly opposed the Bricker amendment, designed to limit the president's treaty-making powers. As chair of the Armed Services Committee in 1953 and 1954 and after that as ranking Republican on the committee, Saltonstall backed the administration's requests for foreign aid.

Saltonstall continued to oppose McCarthy during the 1950s but adopted a cautious approach toward motions to censure the Wisconsin Republican. Facing reelection in 1954, Saltonstall backed efforts to delay consideration of the Watkins Committee report, which recommended McCarthy's censure, until after the campaign. When the censure vote was taken in December 1954, however, he was the only member of the Republican leadership to vote for the motion.

Saltonstall became chair of the Republican Senate Conference in 1957, a position he held until he left the Senate 10 years later.

During the administrations of JOHN F. KENNEDY and LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Saltonstall maintained a moderately liberal voting record and a relatively low public profile. Pressure from the Massachusetts Republican Party, which supported the political aspirations of the state's African-American attorney general, Edward Brooke, led Saltonstall to retire from the Senate in 1967 in order to allow Brooke to seek his seat. Saltonstall retired to Dover, Massachusetts, where he lived until his death there on June 17, 1979.

—MSM

Sarnoff, David

(1891–1971) chairman of the board, Radio Corporation of America

Born to a poor Jewish family in Uzlian, a small village near Minsk in what is now Belarus, on February 27, 1891, David Sarnoff came to the United States with his family at the age of nine. The family settled on New York's Lower East Side. To help support his family, Sarnoff sold newspapers, made deliveries for a butcher, and sang in a synagogue. He attended public schools and took night classes at the Educational Alliance, a settlement house on the Lower East Side. Following his father's death in 1906, he quit high school to work as a messenger boy for the Commercial Cable Company.

During the next three decades, Sarnoff rose from messenger boy to chairman of the board of one of America's largest corporations. He took a job with the American Marconi Company as an office boy and rose to become a wireless telegraph operator. In his spare time, he studied all aspects of radio electronics. After several assignments as a wireless operator, he became manager of the Marconi wireless station located on the roof of the John Wanamaker department store. On April 14, 1912, Sarnoff picked up faint signals indicating that the Titanic had struck an iceberg and was sinking. Sarnoff alerted other ships and the press. He remained at his equipment for 72 hours, until he had the names of all the survivors. Rising rapidly through the ranks of American Marconi, Sarnoff received promotions to radio inspector, assistant chief engineer, and contract manager. He became the company's commercial manager in 1917. Two years later, British Marconi sold American Marconi to General Electric, which formed the Radio Corporation of America (RCA); soon after, Westinghouse joined the RCA alliance. Sarnoff became commercial manager of RCA.

Sarnoff became general manager of RCA in 1921. Early on, he recognized the potential of radio. In 1920, he wrote a memo in which he proposed bringing music into the home by wireless, thereby making radio a "household utility." The memo claimed that he had urged American Marconi to manufacture "radio music boxes" back in 1915. To provide programming and thereby increase the market for RCA radio receivers, he persuaded RCA to organize what proved to be the country's first successful commercial radio network, the National Broadcasting Company (NBC), in 1926. Sarnoff also engineered the purchase of the Victor Talking Machine Company, the nation's largest manufacturer of records and phonographs. He used the Victor facilities to manufacture units that combined a radio and a phonograph in the same set. Elected to RCA's board in 1927, Sarnoff became the company's executive vice president in 1928. He served as acting president in 1928, when the company's president, James G. Harbord, took a leave of absence to campaign for HERBERT HOOVER. RCA profited greatly from Sarnoff's vision, both through the manufacture of radio sets and through the sale of advertising time for NBC radio programs.

As the motion picture business retooled for sound, RCA entered the field with a recording process developed by General Electric. To secure a market, the company entered an agreement with the Keith-Albee-Orpheum chain of theaters in 1928 to form Radio-Keith-Orpheum (R.K.O.). Once again, Sarnoff's ability to envision the commercial potential of new communications technology served RCA well.

Sarnoff became president of RCA in 1930. That same year, the Justice Department filed suit against RCA for monopoly and restraint of trade. Sarnoff led the company's fight against the government's suit, and, in the end, agreed to a consent decree in 1932 that called for GE and Westinghouse to divest their stock in RCA and NBC. NBC became a wholly owned subsidiary of RCA. RCA agreed to license its patents to competitors. Through Sarnoff's skilled negotiations, RCA emerged as an independent company that owned two networks (NBC-red and NBC-blue), broadcast stations, facilities to provide ship-to-shore communications, manufacturing facilities, and experimental laboratories. It also owned Radio City, a new complex of buildings in midtown Manhattan. Sarnoff was president of the newly independent company.

Sarnoff became chairman of the board of RCA in 1947. That year RCA's income reached about $300 million. (RCA had earned $2 million in 1920, Sarnoff's first full year with the company.) Forbes magazine listed Sarnoff as one of America's "Fifty Foremost Business Leaders" in 1947.

As he had with radio, Sarnoff emerged early on as a leading promoter of commercial television, and RCA proved the ultimate beneficiary. In 1923, he predicted the advent of television and, seven years later, of color TV. When an engineer, Vladimir Zworykin, met with Sarnoff to explain his concept of an electronic camera, Sarnoff underwrote Zworykin's efforts to develop television. Beginning in the 1930s, long before TV became commercially feasible, RCA began investing heavily in television. It inaugurated regular telecasts at the 1939 World's Fair. However, technical problems and World War II interrupted the development of commercial TV until the late 1940s.

Sarnoff served with the Signal Corps during World War II. He had requested a commission with the U.S. Navy during World War I and been denied (he believed anti-Semitism was the reason). Commissioned a lieutenant colonel in 1924, Sarnoff became a full colonel in 1931. He was called to active duty in World War II, during which he worked for General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER and coordinated communications on D-day. He emerged from the war a brigadier general and from then on preferred to be called General Sarnoff. During the war, RCA lost a suit to block an FCC ruling that required RCA to divest itself of one of its radio networks. The company sold NBC-blue, which became ABC.

In the early years of television, RCA-NBC led the trade in profits and station access. The company got its black-and-white sets on the market in 1946. Sarnoff's unquestioned faith in television's eventual significance reflected his lifelong belief in research and development. By 1955, the corporation reported netting $1 billion from the sales, royalties, and services of television. RCA led the communications field in the number of patents granted. Between 1950 and 1961, Sarnoff committed an estimated $130 million to develop color TV. He also won a battle with CBS to establish the standards for color TV. In 1950, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) had approved a system developed by CBS that was not compatible with black-and-white televisions. Sarnoff, whose scientists at RCA were working on a color system compatible with black-and-white sets, objected. Sarnoff pressed the FCC to reverse itself, which it did in 1953.

Sarnoff did not limit his interest to radio and television. In the early 1950s, he engaged in a feud with Edwin Howard Armstrong over the development of FM radio and related patents. In 1958, RCA introduced the first stereo records. That same year, it entered electronic data processing, a field then effectively dominated by International Business Machines Corporation. In four years, RCA spent $100 million on the project. The investment illustrated Sarnoff's recognition of the technological links between communications research and fields unrelated to entertainment. It also marked the beginning of RCA's transformation into a conglomerate.

When Eisenhower became president, Sarnoff advised him on cold war strategy. As chairman of the Citizens Advisory Committee on Utilization of Manpower in the Armed Services, he recommended in February 1953 an "at least 10 percent" cut in the defense budget. The panel's report anticipated the administration's New Look defense policy. Sarnoff wrote long memoranda to government leaders on the use of technology for the military. He proposed the use of electronics to detect and even to intercept incoming missiles. Television, he argued, could become the "eyes of the top command" and enable commanders to coordinate military action on land, sea, and air. In 1955, Sarnoff recommended the creation of a cabinet-level propaganda chief, delegated to use mass communications to help the United States win the cold war. In that spirit, RCA's Sarnoff Research Center created special Radio Free Europe receivers, unbreakable and incapable of being jammed.

Sarnoff retired as RCA's chief executive officer in 1966 in favor of his son Robert, whom he had made president of NBC in 1955. Sarnoff remained as chairman of the board, but his involvement in management declined. After a prolonged illness, he died in New York City on December 12, 1971.

—MSM

Saulnier, Raymond J(joseph)

(1908–2009) chairman, Council of Economic Advisers
Born in Hamilton, Massachusetts, on September 20, 1908, Raymond Saulnier received a B.S. in economics from Middlebury College in Vermont in 1929 and an M.A. from Tufts University in 1931. He earned his Ph.D. at Columbia University in 1938, where he wrote his thesis on monetary theory. Saulnier joined Columbia's economics faculty in 1934 and served as an instructor at Columbia College until 1938, when he moved over to Barnard College as an assistant professor; he became a full professor in 1949. An authority on banking and mortgage finance, he published Industrial Banking Companies and Their Credit Practices (1940), Contemporary Monetary Theory (1941), Business Finance and Banking (1947), and Urban Mortgage Lending by Life Insurance Companies (1956). In 2000, reflecting on Contemporary Monetary Theory, Saulnier said: "At the time, the conventional wisdom was Keynesian, but I was persuaded that the great man overrated the antirecessionary effect . . . of the government spending and tax cuts he favored, and underestimated the capacity of an enterprise system to heal itself."

In 1946, Saulnier became director of the financial research division of the National Bureau of Economic Research, where his colleague at Columbia, Dr. ARTHUR BURNS, was director of research. When Burns went to Washington as chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers (CEA) in 1953, he named Saulnier a special consultant to the CEA. President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER appointed Saulnier to the council in April 1955 and named him to succeed Burns as chairman in November 1956.

According to Fortune magazine, Saulnier was "a trifle more conservative than Burns" and did not enjoy the "intimate kind of rapport" his predecessor had enjoyed with the president. Particularly at the outset of his tenure as chair of the CEA, Saulnier's influence in the economic policymaking councils of the Eisenhower administration did not equal that of Secretary of the Treasury GEORGE HUMPHREY or Eisenhower's personal economic adviser, GABRIEL HAUGE. Newsweek reported in March 1958 that politicians on Capitol Hill considered Saulnier to be less forceful than either Burns or the last chairman of the CEA under a Democratic administration, LEON KEYSERLING.

Nevertheless, Eisenhower depended on Saulnier for advice of a technical and predictive nature, and gradually the economist's counsel acquired greater weight in the White House. Most concerned with the stability of the business cycle, Saulnier was less inclined to regard inflation as the paramount economic problem than were Hauge, Secretaries of the Treasury George Humphrey and ROBERT ANDERSON, and the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, WILLIAM MCCHESENEY MARTIN. For most of 1957, he argued unsuccessfully against the Federal Reserve's “tight money” policy. In Saulnier’s view, the economic indicators called for a stimulus, but the Federal Reserve raised the rediscount rate in August from 3 percent to 3.5 percent. In November, however, faced with a deepening economic recession, the Federal Reserve lowered the rediscount rate. In the next few months, it also lowered bank reserve requirements in an effort to shore up the sagging economy by making money for lending more available.

Within the administration, Saulnier argued for a more stimulative fiscal policy against pressures from the Treasury and the Bureau of the Budget to reduce the budget. Eisenhower met with his top economic advisers in October 1957 and heard unanimous concern that the economy seemed to be sinking into a recession. Saulnier warned that federal revenues might fall short of predictions. “We must,” he urged, “take every measure to prevent a sharp decline in the economy.” As the 1957–58 recession worsened, Saulnier’s case against a budget surplus for fiscal 1959 appeared more persuasive. The Soviet Union’s launching of Sputnik in October 1957 spurred an increase in military spending, while Saulnier also succeeded in gaining more funds for the construction of schools and highways. He also favored lengthening the duration of unemployment insurance and stimulating private investment in housing through the provision of more liberal mortgage insurance by the government. In May, Saulnier reported at a cabinet meeting that the downward trend of the economy had abated but not yet flattened. Worried about the inflationary effect of a tax cut, Eisenhower, supported by Anderson, resisted reducing taxes. In April and May, unemployment began to drop, and, by June and July, industrial production, personal income, nonagricultural employment, and new home construction all increased.

In an interview with U.S. News and World Report in April 1959, Saulnier declared that the “cornerstone” of the Eisenhower economic program was a balanced budget for fiscal 1961. He maintained that tax reduction was desirable but not possible without a balanced budget. At the same time, he proposed a number of tax revisions: liberalized depreciation allowances for businesses, lower tax rates on high incomes, elimination of various excise taxes, and the institution of a manufacturer’s sales tax. In addition, Saulnier emphasized that, if the United States were to achieve a higher rate of economic growth, it needed to keep the money supply in check, hold down wage increases so as not to cause inflation, and push ahead with automation.

Despite the continuing threat of inflation, Saulnier rejected wage and price controls. “It is in the absence of controls,” he said, “that we have the freedom that gives our economy its dynamic quality. We don’t want to lose that quality in the process of trying to avoid cost and price inflation.” In August 1959, Saulnier stated that general price stability could be achieved only if, in industries “where productivity gains are especially rapid,” management cut prices and labor accepted raises less than the full productivity gain. The reference was generally understood to refer to the steel industry in particular. Saulnier, however, continued to reject any system of mandatory wage and price restraint.

Saulnier remained in his post until January 1961. Later that year, he resumed teaching at Barnard, where he remained until he retired from teaching in 1973 and became professor emeritus. In 1991, he published Constructive Years, an account of the economic policies of the Eisenhower administration. Saulnier remained active in politics and worked for Ellen R. Sauerbrey’s unsuccessful campaign for governor of Maryland in 1998. In early 2009, he cited the government’s contribution to the credit boom through its encouragement of lending, particularly through Fannie Mae, as a major cause of the recession. He died in Chestertown, Maryland, on April 30, 2009.

—MSM

Schine, G(erard) David

(1927–1996) chief consultant, Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Senate Government Operations Committee

The son of a wealthy hotel magnate, Schine was born in Gloversville, New York, on September 11, 1927. He attended Andover Academy and entered Harvard University in 1945. Shortly after Schine graduated in 1949, his father made him president of Schine Hotels, Inc., although his father retained operational control. The easygoing, handsome Schine was interested in a show business career and tried writing popular songs. He went to nightclubs, dated starlets, and indulged his tastes for expensive cars and cigars.

Schine also wrote a six-page pamphlet called "Definitions of Communism" that was printed privately and placed in every room in the Schine chain of hotels. In 1952, he met ROY COHN, an assistant U.S. attorney specializing in cases involving subversion. The young men became close friends and traveled the Manhattan social circuit together.

When Cohn became chief counsel for Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY'S (R-Wis.) Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations in January 1953, he brought Schine along as the panel's unpaid chief consultant. Although Schine's qualifications for conducting investigative work were unclear, he worked closely with Cohn in directing McCarthy's probes of alleged subversives in the International Information Administration, the Voice of America, and the State Department early in 1953.

In April 1953, Schine and Cohn went on an 18-day, seven-country tour of Europe on behalf of the subcommittee to determine if the State Department's overseas libraries contained pro-communist literature. Trailed by hostile European reporters, they blazed from city to city, called on diplomats, held press conferences, and collected documents. They received extensive coverage by the press, both in America and in Europe, almost all of it negative and some of it mocking. Critics of the two men charged them with immature and farcical behavior that damaged America's prestige abroad. Some of their actions undoubtedly made them seem callow. They referred to Commonweal as a "Communist Catholic magazine." One German newspaper reported that Schine chased Cohn, swatting him with a rolled-up magazine, through a hotel lobby in Munich. Journalists also claimed to have overheard them making snide remarks in public about alleged homosexuality among State Department employees. Their visits demoralized American embassies and consulates.

As a result of their activities and pressure exerted by McCarthy at home, the State Department ordered its libraries to remove works by "Communist, fellow-travelers, et cetera." That decision drew criticism from President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. In a commencement address at Dartmouth College in June 1953, Eisenhower urged the undergraduates not to "join the book-burners."

In July 1953, Schine received notice of his impending induction into the army. At that time, McCarthy was involved in an acrimonious investigation of alleged communist infiltration of the Army Communications Center at Fort Monmouth, New Jersey. McCarthy and Cohn interceded to prevent any interruption in Schine's duties as a member of the subcommittee's staff and made several unsuccessful attempts to get him an officer's commission or a job at the U.S. Military Academy. After Schine was inducted as a private in November, Cohn continued to exert pressure on his behalf, making numerous telephone calls to Schine's commanding officers and to army counsel JOHN G. ADAMS.

In January 1954, Eisenhower's chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS, urged the army to draft a chronology of the attempts by McCarthy and Cohn to secure preferential treatment for Schine. In March, after McCarthy had stepped up his attacks against the army, the chronology was released. The document revealed that Schine had received such privileges as exemptions from KP and barracks cleaning duties as well as regular weekend passes. On March 16, the subcommittee voted to investigate the army's accusations as well as a set of countercharges by McCarthy and Cohn. McCarthy alleged that the army was holding Schine "hostage" and that ROBERT STEVENS, the secretary of the army, had attempted to "blackmail" the committee into dropping the investigation of Fort Monmouth.

The subcommittee's hearings, known as the Army-McCarthy hearings, began in April. Late that month, the panel was presented with a photo of Schine and Stevens. It was apparently intended to suggest that Stevens made an effort to be friendly toward Schine in the hope that the subcommittee would drop its investigation of the army. The army's counsel, JOSEPH WELCH, produced an enlargement of the photo indicating that the image presented to the subcommittee had been cropped to exclude other individuals. Welch traced the cropping to a member of McCarthy's staff.

During the investigation, McCarthy admitted under cross-examination that Schine had no investigative experience to qualify him for a position with the subcommittee but said that Schine had worked on a plan for psychological warfare against communism. Senator HENRY JACKSON (D-Wash.) later ridiculed the plan, mocking its proposals for the use of pinups, billboards, and bumper stickers. Despite the fact that his case was a central theme in the hearings, Schine testified only briefly concerning the authenticity of the photograph that purported to show him alone with Stevens.

The hearings proved inconclusive as to whether McCarthy had used undue influence on behalf of Schine. McCarthy's conduct during the nationally televised hearings, however, led the Senate to censure him on December 2, 1954.

Before his discharge in 1955, Schine served with a military police unit in Anchorage and rose to the rank of corporal. Upon leaving the army, he served as president of the Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles, which was part of the chain owned by his father (who also owned theaters, radio stations, and real estate holdings). During the next two decades, he established a show-business management firm, a movie production company (he produced the Oscar-winning film, The French Connection), and a music publishing concern. He lived in Los Angeles, California, and died when a single-engine plane piloted by his son crashed shortly after takeoff from Burbank, California, on June 19, 1996.

—MSM

Schlesinger, Arthur M(eier), Jr.

(1917–2007) historian

The son of the distinguished American historian, Arthur Schlesinger, Sr., Arthur Bancroft Schlesinger was born in Columbus, Ohio, on October 15, 1917. Out of respect for his father, the younger Schlesinger, when in his middle teens, changed his name to Arthur Meier Schlesinger, Jr. Arthur Schlesinger, Sr., moved first to the University of Iowa and then, in 1924, to Harvard University. The younger Schlesinger attended Phillips Exeter Academy and Harvard College, from which he graduated summa cum laude in 1938. As a senior, he wrote an honors thesis on the 19th-century American thinker, Orestes Brownson. During a year at Peterhouse College of Cambridge University, he turned the thesis into a book, Orestes Brownson: A Pilgrim's Progress, which was published in 1939 to favorable reviews. After the year at Cambridge, Schlesinger returned to Harvard as a member of the prestigious Society of Fellows and began work on a book about the era of Andrew Jackson. During World War II, he worked in Washington for the Office of War Information and the Office of Strategic Services. Immediately after the war, he remained in Washington and worked as a freelance journalist. In 1945, he published The Age of Jackson, for which he won the Pulitzer Prize for history in 1946. The book challenged the then traditional interpretation, pioneered by Frederick Jackson Turner, which associated democracy with the frontier, and argued that the popular democracy of the Jacksonian era had its origins in the cities and workers of the Northeast. Schlesinger essentially cast the age of Jackson as an earlier version of the New Deal in which the people struggled to wrest control from the propertied interests, an interpretation that subsequent historians largely demolished.

In 1947, Schlesinger joined his father on the Harvard faculty. That same year, he helped organize the Americans for Democratic Action (ADA), an organization of anticommunist liberals who advocated a hard line in the cold war. During the postwar period, he wrote articles for numerous magazines and published The Vital Center (1949), a manifesto for cold war liberals. In it, Schlesinger called for a strong and realistic liberalism that rejected the notion that human nature was benign and society perfectible. "The Soviet experience," he wrote, "on top of the rise of fascism, reminded my generation rather forcibly that man was, indeed, imperfect." Accordingly, liberals should abandon the utopian solutions of the communist left. Following the ideas of political scientist De Witt C. Poole, Schlesinger suggested that the traditional linear political graph should be bent into a circle. The extremes of left and right, he maintained, shared many more characteristics than those that set them apart: "The totalitarian left and the totalitarian right meet at last on the murky grounds of tyranny and terror." In times of crisis, he argued, the right would turn to fascism and the left would turn to communism. Freedom rested in the "vital center." The political center he admired possessed a tough-minded realism, a commitment to freedom, and an "unconditional rejection of totalitarianism." Liberals, he reminded his readers, "have values in common with most members of the business community—in particular, a belief in free society—which they do not have in common with the totalitarians."

In 1952, Schlesinger took a leave of absence from Harvard to join ADLAI STEVENSON's campaign staff as a speechwriter. Although some on Stevenson's staff regarded Schlesinger as too liberal, Stevenson stood by him, and the two men developed a close friendship. After the campaign, Schlesinger returned to Harvard, where he became a full professor in 1954.

Schlesinger headed the research and writing group in Stevenson's campaign in 1956. He advocated emphasizing the idea that the Republican Party was the party of big business and special interests, while the Democratic Party represented the people. Since Eisenhower had established a reputation as a president of peace, Schlesinger recommended that Stevenson emphasize domestic over foreign policy issues.

Through his history and his journalism, Schlesinger repeatedly expressed liberal thinking on important issues in the postwar era. Like many liberals, his record on civil liberties during the early days of the cold war and the red scare was uneven. Although convinced that some sort of loyalty program was necessary, he found the procedures set forth in President HARRY S. TRUMAN's executive order "inexcusably defective." Schlesinger opposed Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wisc.) anticommunist crusade and in 1954 wrote a defense of J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER, the former director of the wartime Manhattan Project, who had been denied security clearance by the Eisenhower administration.

Schlesinger was often pessimistic in his assessment of the social changes of the decade. He believed that the economic advances since World War II had been bought at the price of communal disintegration and the loss of cultural diversity. He wrote often of the oppressive standardization of life in the new suburbs and of the emptiness of white-collar existence. Even though the so-called New Conservatives, led by RUSSELL KIRK, addressed the same issues, Schlesinger attacked their work. He insisted that in America conservatism meant a defense of business interests before all else. Partisan to the point of arrogance, he asserted that the idea of a conservative intellectual was a contradiction in terms. Schlesinger worked hard to create the image of the Democratic Party as a party of "creative liberalism," guided by intellectuals.

Throughout the 1950s, Schlesinger continued to pursue his work as a historian. From 1957 to 1960, he published three volumes of The Age of Roosevelt. The fruit of nearly 15 years of research, the unabashedly admiring work portrayed Roosevelt as a strong and innovative reformer as well as the enduring model of progressive leadership. The tensions he identified in American society of the 1930s bore a striking similarity to those he found in the age of Jackson. As had The Age of Jackson, the trilogy about Roosevelt associated American liberalism with a strong president who used his power in a pragmatic fashion. The book won praise for the power of its sweeping narrative.

Not satisfied to write history and polemics, Schlesinger remained active in the political arena. Schlesinger, who had backed JOHN F. KENNEDY's unsuccessful bid for the Democratic vice presidential nomination in 1956, shifted his support from Stevenson to Kennedy in 1960 and was a key figure in winning the support of the ADA and the liberal intellectual community for Kennedy. Although many ADA members accused him of being a traitor, Schlesinger himself did not regard his shift as a dramatic one. He wrote in 1960 that "in his eight years as titular leader Stevenson renewed the Democratic Party. . . . Kennedy today is the heir and the executor of the Stevenson revolution."

During the campaign for the general election, Schlesinger joined Kennedy's campaign staff and published Kennedy or Nixon: Does It Make Any Difference?, a short book that favorably contrasted Kennedy with his Republican opponent, Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON. Much of the book compared the two candidates' personalities. Schlesinger alleged, improbably, that if Nixon were elected, the country would "sink into mediocrity and cant and payola and boredom." He argued, more plausibly, that Nixon "lacks taste." After the election, Kennedy appointed Schlesinger special adviser to the president. In that capacity, Schlesinger concentrated on Latin American affairs. After a trip to South America with George McGovern, director of the Food for Peace Program, Schlesinger returned and, at Kennedy's request, prepared a white paper on Cuba that endorsed the Cuban revolution against Fulgencio Batista but condemned the direction in which Fidel Castro had taken it. Although he was close to the source of power at the Kennedy White House, the degree of his influence was debatable. After the assassination of Kennedy, Schlesinger served briefly in the administration of LYNDON B. JOHNSON but felt shunted aside; he left in January 1964.

In 1965, Schlesinger published, A Thousand Days: John F. Kennedy in the White House, a work that earned him the Pulitzer Prize for biography. The work celebrated Kennedy's youth, vigor, and what Schlesinger regarded as his unsentimental, pragmatic liberalism. The admiring portrait presented Kennedy as an agent of progressive change at home and abroad. It also glorified what Schlesinger considered to be the sophistication of the policy makers in the administration. Schlesinger became Albert Schweitzer Professor of the Humanities at the City University of New York in 1966. He at first defended, though not uncritically, the Johnson administration's conduct of the war in Vietnam. By 1966, however, he moved to a measured opposition. In The Bitter Heritage: Vietnam and American Democracy, published late that year, he argued for an end to the war because of its "ugly side-effects" at home. He favored an immediate halt to the bombing of North Vietnam and a gradual de-escalation. Although he moved closer to the burgeoning opposition to the war, he opposed the New Left, which attacked the entire direction of American foreign policy since World War II. In October 1967, he published an article in Foreign Affairs attacking the New Left, or revisionist, historians of the early cold war. Not satisfied with intellectual engagement, he remained involved with ROBERT F. KENNEDY, whom he initially advised not to challenge President LYNDON JOHNSON in the 1968 primaries. Once Kennedy entered the race for the nomination, however, Schlesinger strongly supported him. After Kennedy's assassination, Schlesinger threw his support to McGovern.

During the early 1970s, Schlesinger was a leading academic critic of the Nixon administration. In 1973, he published The Imperial Presidency, which attacked the growing centralization of power in the executive branch. Schlesinger was less impressed with strong presidency when it was held by someone with whom he disagreed. He traced the expansion of presidential power to distortions created by the cold war and nuclear weapons.

Robert F. Kennedy and His Times, published in 1978, presented Robert Kennedy as his brother's heir and someone who, like his brother, had developed the potential for greatness as a leader but was killed before he could realize that potential. In his unstinting efforts to celebrate Robert Kennedy, he even found some nice things to say about the McCarthy committee, for which Kennedy had been minority counsel. Schlesinger did, however, acknowledge that Kennedy had played a larger role in attempting to overthrow Castro than that which had been portrayed in A Thousand Days.

A prolific writer who claimed never to have been troubled by writer's block, Schlesinger continued to publish regularly over the next two decades. The Cycles of American History (1986) argued that the country alternated between periods of liberalism, in which it turned toward government and social causes, and periods of conservatism, in which it turned against government and toward private gratification. In 1991, he published The Disuniting of America, an attack on multiculturalism. In it, he condemned the rise of political correctness and rejected identity politics that he believed threatened to divide the country. He advocated the traditional American melting pot as a preferable model. Several black scholars in particular attacked the book and its author in highly personal terms. Schlesinger retired from teaching in 1994. His last book, War and the American Presidency (2005), was an unbridled attack on the war in Iraq. Schlesinger published A Life in the Twentieth Century (2000), the first volume of a planned two-volume memoir. He never completed the second volume, but an edited volume of his diaries from 1952 to 2000 was published in 2007.

Schlesinger died in New York City on February 28, 2007. One might dismiss Schlesinger as a partisan whose presentist concerns marred his historical judgment. On the other hand, one could argue that he did what historians have always done; he explained to the American people their past in a way that made sense to them.

—MSM

Schwartz, Bernard

(1923–1997) chief counsel, Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight of the House Commerce Committee

Born in New York City on August 25, 1923, Bernard Schwartz completed seven years of study in four by simultaneously attending the City College of New York, where he earned a B.S. in 1944, and New York University, from which he received an LL.B. in the same year. He went on to earn an LL.M. at Harvard in 1945 and a doctorate from Cambridge University in 1947. Schwartz joined the faculty of New York University Law School in 1947 and, over the next few years, wrote numerous articles and books on the Supreme Court and administrative law. During the early years of the Eisenhower administration, he served as counsel to the Second Hoover Commission on Executive Branch Reorganization and the House Government Information Subcommittee. In March 1957, Schwartz, at age 33, became chief counsel to a subcommittee of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, known as the Special Committee on Legislative Oversight.

Created in February 1957 at the urging of House Speaker SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.), this Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight was charged with investigating improper influence by regulated industries on federal regulatory agencies and political pressure on those agencies. To chair the subcommittee, OREN HARRIS (D-Ark.), chair of the Commerce Committee, appointed Representative Morgan M. Moulder (D-Mo.). Under Schwartz's direction, the subcommittee's staff concentrated on six of 20 government agencies: the Civil Aeronautics Board (CAB), the Federal Power Commission (FPC), the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC), the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), and the Federal Communications Commission (FCC).

Schwartz encountered obstruction from various agencies and from within Congress. For a monthlong period ending on October 17, 1957, the chair of the CAB, James R. Durfee, denied Schwartz's staff access to pertinent records. Schwartz also came under congressional criticism for sending the 38 commissioners a detailed questionnaire inquiring about personal gifts, loans, and other favors presented by companies subject to the regulators' authority. "Never before," Representative Joseph O'Hara (R-Minn.) complained, "has any congressional investigating group started out by assuming everyone was crooked."

In January 1958, Schwartz submitted a memorandum urging a sweeping investigation of the FCC. The subcommittee declined to undertake the sort of investigation Schwartz recommended, and someone leaked the memo to DREW PEARSON, the newspaper columnist. Schwartz later admitted to leaking the memo to the New York Times, but claimed that he did so only after the story had appeared in Pearson's column. The memo accused several members of the FCC, including its chair, JOHN DOERFER, of official misconduct and improper fraternization with the industry. Specifically, Schwartz charged them with billing the government for expenses paid for by broadcasting figures, accepting gifts and loans, and discussing matters pending before the agency with the parties involved. As a result of these relationships, the memo alleged, the agency exhibited "a most disturbing inconsistency" in its awards of station licenses. In testimony before the subcommittee on February 3, Doerfer denounced what he considered Schwartz's irresponsible tactics in investigating the commission and leaking the memo. At the hearing, it came out that Doerfer had accepted reimbursement from a television station and the National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters for a trip and then submitted travel vouchers to the government for the trip. Doerfer attributed the double reimbursement to a mistake. It also turned out that he had received travel expenses and honoraria for speeches to broadcasting groups at several resorts. Further, he received partial reimbursement for one of the trips from the government. Nevertheless, the hearings established neither illegality nor impropriety on Doerfer's part.

Schwartz's investigative tactics and his treatment of witnesses before the subcommittee came under heavy fire. Southern Democratic and Republican members resented Schwartz's method of cross-examining Doerfer and disapproved of his leak to the Times. On February 10, the panel voted seven-to-four to dismiss Schwartz. Chairman Moulder, two other Democratic members, and one Republican voted against his removal. Moulder resigned as chairman in protest, and Harris assumed the post. Schwartz immediately accused Harris, most subcommittee members, and later Speaker Rayburn of seeking "a bipartisan whitewash." Schwartz repaid the loyalty of Moulder with the comment that "he [Moulder] turned out to be a weak man."

The day following his ouster, Schwartz made a series of sensational charges against leading officials in the administration. He declared that FCC Commissioner RICHARD A. MACK was guilty of conflict of interest in granting a license to a TV station in Miami. He also added the names of New York's former governor, THOMAS E. DEWEY, and the president's chief aide, SHERMAN ADAMS, to his list of influence peddlers.

Not content with that, Schwartz took documents he had been working on, which he eventually gave to Senator WAYNE MORSE (D-Oreg.). The subcommittee subpoenaed Schwartz to detail his accusations. It also demanded and received the "working papers" Schwartz had given to Morse. Before the subcommittee in mid-February, Schwartz presented additional materials strongly suggesting unlawful action by Mack and improper ones by Adams in his dealings with regulatory agencies.

Schwartz also revealed that he had secretly wiretapped an interview with Mack in 1957. The wiretapping, together with Schwartz's headline-catching list of influence peddlers, caused some liberal journals and politicians—and a great many Republican ones—to criticize Schwartz's investigative methods, which several compared to those of Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.). The liberal New Republic described Schwartz as "unprincipled"; Senator Morse called for an end to all government wiretaps.

Schwartz's appearance before the subcommittee received extensive coverage by the national news media and forced further investigations. Once hopeful of restricting the subcommittee's activities, Harris pursued Schwartz's allegations. After Schwartz's testimony, Attorney General WILLIAM ROGERS ordered the FBI to investigate Mack; and, after appearing before the subcommittee, Mack resigned. By September, the once-powerful Sherman Adams had quit his job at the White House. The cumulative effects of the subcommittee's hearings, which lasted well into 1958, seriously damaged the Republican Party's already bleak prospects for the congressional elections in November. New legislation enacted in 1960 revised commission procedure.

Schwartz returned to New York University in 1963 as Edwin D. Webb Professor of Law, a position he held for nearly 30 years. Schwartz was best known as a legal scholar, whose work ranged from the Napoleonic Code to federal regulatory agencies. His most important writings, however, dealt with the Supreme Court and the justices who served on it. He wrote The Supreme Court: Constitutional Revolution in Retrospect (1957), a five-volume Commentary on the Constitution of the United States (1963–68), Swann's Way: The School Busing Case and the Supreme Court (1986), and Behind Bakke: The Supreme Court and Affirmative Action (1988). He compiled The Unpublished Opinions of the Warren Court (1985), The Unpublished Opinions of the Burger Court (1988), and The Unpublished Opinions of the Rehnquist Court (1996). Published in 1996, Decision: How the Supreme Court Decides Cases sold more copies than any of his other titles. In addition to his books on the Court and its decisions, Schwartz published Super Chief, a comprehensive biography of Chief Justice EARL WARREN, in 1983. Schwartz retired from New York University in 1992. He then accepted an appointment as Chapman Distinguished Professor of Law at the University of Tulsa, where he remained until his death in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on December 23, 1997.

—MSM

Scott, Hugh D(oggett)

(1900–1994) U.S. congressman and senator

Born in Fredricksburg, Virginia, on November 11, 1900, Scott graduated from Randolph-Macon College in 1919 and received a law degree from the University of Virginia in 1922. That same year, he was admitted to the bar and began to practice law in Philadelphia. From 1926 to 1941, he served as assistant district attorney in that city. Scott won election as a Republican to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1940 and again in 1942. He resigned from the House to serve in the navy from 1944 to 1946, rising to the rank of captain in the naval reserves. Scott returned to the House in 1947 and served for 12 more years. A consistent internationalist, he supported the Lend-Lease Act in 1941, aid to Greece and Turkey in 1947, and the Marshall Plan. In 1948, THOMAS E. DEWEY, the Republican presidential nominee, chose Scott to chair the Republican National Committee, a post Scott held until 1949.

A moderate Republican, Scott supported public housing, rent control, and abolition of the poll tax. On other issues, he adopted more traditional Republican positions. He supported lower taxes and the Taft-Hartley Act (1947), which labor unions regarded as antilabor. As a member of the more liberal, internationalist wing of the party, Scott opposed the selection of Senator ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio) as the party's presidential nominee in 1952 and was an early participant in the draft Eisenhower movement. In February 1952, Scott was among 19 representatives who wrote to Eisenhower urging him to seek the GOP nomination. During the presidential campaign, Scott chaired Eisenhower's headquarters committee.

In the mid-1950s, Scott and Representatives KENNETH KEATING (R-N.Y.) and JACOB JAVITS (R-N.Y.), all moderate to liberal members of the House from the Northeast with urban constituencies, favored civil rights legislation. Their urging contributed to the administration's decision to submit civil rights legislation to Congress in January 1956. The next month, Scott and Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR. (D-N.Y.), announced that a group of House members was determined to bring legislation protecting the right to vote before the House. In May 1957, Scott joined a majority on the Rules Committee that favored reporting a civil rights bill. On the floor, he opposed a southern attempt to weaken the bill by guaranteeing a jury trial to persons violating court orders protecting voting rights.

Over the opposition of the Republican machine in Pennsylvania, Scott won the Republican nomination for a seat in the Senate in 1958 and defeated Governor GEORGE LEADER in the general election. As a senator, Scott continued to stand toward the left of his party, voting to override the president's veto of a housing bill in 1959 and the veto of an area redevelopment bill in 1960. In March 1960, he was among 16 senators who signed a cloture petition in an unsuccessful effort to end a southern filibuster of what became the Civil Rights Act of 1960.

Although Scott's voting record was significantly more liberal than those of most Republicans on Capitol Hill, he frequently served as a partisan spokesman in Congress. In 1955, Democrats criticized the tax cuts of the previous year as tailored to the interests of big business and called for a $20 personal income tax credit. Scott denounced the proposal as a "gimmick . . . [to] buy the votes of the American people at 20 bucks a head." Five years later, he attacked Democratic senatorial opposition to the nomination of LEWIS STRAUSS as secretary of commerce, describing it as "a well-planned attempt at legislative lynching."

In 1962, Scott attempted to make the Republican Party in Pennsylvania more attractive to liberal voters by successfully promoting Representative William Scranton for governor. Two years later, Scott led an effort to block BARRY M. GOLDWATER, a conservative senator from Arizona, from gaining the Republican nomination for the presidency. Toward that end, Scott urged Scranton to enter the race against Goldwater. Nevertheless, when Goldwater won the nomination, Scott supported the national ticket. Scott continued to support civil rights for African Americans; he voted for civil rights acts in 1964, 1965, and 1968. He backed New York's liberal governor, NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER for the Republican nomination in 1968. When RICHARD M. NIXON won the nomination, however, Scott campaigned for him.

In September 1969, Scott became minority leader in the Senate. During the Nixon administration, his voting record became more conservative; he nevertheless coauthored the Voting Rights Act of 1970. Scott split with the administration and opposed the nomination of CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH to the Supreme Court (a decision Scott later regretted). The following year, he supported the president's nomination of G. Harrold Carswell (another decision Scott came to regret). Moreover, although he had supported the war under the administrations of JOHN F. KENNEDY and LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Scott became decidedly more dovish during the Nixon administration. During the Watergate scandal of 1973–74, Scott initially supported the president. The minority leader urged Nixon to release tape recordings of conversations in the Oval Office in the belief that they would exonerate the president. Nixon resisted, but after the courts ordered the release of the tapes and they revealed Nixon's participation in a cover-up, Scott informed the president that he could not survive impeachment proceedings. Compromised by his defense of President Nixon and by charges that he had received illicit contributions from the Gulf Oil Corporation (something for which the Senate Ethics Committee cleared him of any wrongdoing), ing), Scott did not seek reelection in 1976. Scott practiced law in Washington, D.C., from 1977 to 1987. He died in Falls Church, Virginia, on July 21, 1994.

—MSM

Seaborg, Glenn T(heodore)

(1912–1999) associate director, Lawrence Radiation Laboratory; chancellor, University of California, Berkeley; member, President's Science Advisory Committee

Seaborg was born in Ishpeming, Michigan, on April 19, 1912. At the age of 10, he moved with his family to a suburb of Los Angeles. After receiving his B.A. from the University of California at Los Angeles in 1934, he went on to earn his doctorate in chemistry from the University of California at Berkeley in 1937. Seaborg became a research associate at Berkeley in 1937. He was appointed an instructor of chemistry in 1939 and promoted to assistant professor in 1941. His studies of atomic structure led to the discovery of numerous new isotopes of common elements by 1940. Seaborg's major achievement, however, was the extraction of plutonium, a new element with fissionable properties, from uranium. In 1941 Seaborg's team transmuted an isotope of uranium into a new element, plutonium 239, by bombarding it with neutrons. The achievement contributed to the development of the atomic bomb. During World War II, Seaborg worked on the Manhattan Project as section chief of the metallurgical laboratory at the University of Chicago. His unit separated enough plutonium to be used in experiments at the laboratories at Los Alamos, New Mexico. Eventually, Seaborg's team produced enough to be used to build two atomic bombs, including the one dropped on Nagasaki, Japan. Seaborg was among seven scientists working on the bomb who, in June 1945, sent a report to the secretary of war calling for a demonstration of the atomic bomb in an uninhabited place before its use in warfare. Known as the Franck Report, this statement forecast a dangerous atomic arms race and urged international control of nuclear weapons in the postwar period.

After the war, Seaborg returned to Berkeley in 1946 as a full professor. He was head of the nuclear chemistry research section at the Lawrence Radiation Laboratory from 1954 to 1958 and associate director from 1954 to 1961. His research proved the existence of several transuranium elements, and in 1951 he won the Nobel Prize in chemistry. Seaborg was also a member of the Atomic Energy Commission's (AEC) General Advisory Committee (GAC) from 1946 to 1950. He was out of the country and did not attend a meeting of the GAC, held in October 1949, where members of the committee, including its chair, J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER, declared their opposition to a crash program to develop the hydrogen bomb. Seaborg had indicated his support for the project in a letter sent to Oppenheimer earlier that month. "Although I deplore the prospect of our country's putting tremendous effort into the H-bomb," wrote Seaborg, "I must confess that I have been unable to come to the conclusion that we should not." In 1950, President Truman ordered the AEC to develop the weapon.

Seaborg's letter became a point of contention in the Oppenheimer security hearings in 1954. Responding to charges that the scientist had been disloyal, President Eisenhower ordered Oppenheimer's security clearance suspended in late 1953, pending a hearing. The charges were based on Oppenheimer's prewar associations with pro-communist groups and his postwar ambivalence toward the development of the hydrogen bomb. At the AEC's security hearing in April, all the scientists who had served on the GAC with Oppenheimer in 1949 testified on Oppenheimer's behalf except Seaborg. The hearing revealed conflicting evidence concerning whether or not Oppenheimer had informed other members about Seaborg's letter supporting the project. Citing Oppenheimer's conduct, the testimony regarding Seaborg's letter, as well as other incidents, the board ruled, two to one, to maintain the suspension.

Seaborg became chancellor of the Berkeley campus in 1958. The following year, Eisenhower appointed him to the President's Science Advisory Committee.

President JOHN F. KENNEDY appointed Seaborg head of the AEC in 1961. The following year, Seaborg offered Oppenheimer a new hearing, which the latter declined. As chair of the AEC, Seaborg advocated resumption of U.S. nuclear tests after the Soviet Union resumed testing in 1961. Nevertheless, he supported the nuclear test ban treaty in 1963, which banned aboveground testing. Indeed, the treaty was a disappointment to Seaborg, who had hoped for a comprehensive ban. While the AEC's role expanded greatly in the late 1960s, it drew frequent criticism from those who considered its safeguards against atomic accidents inadequate. In 1971, Seaborg resigned as its chair and returned to the University of California. In 1983, President Ronald Reagan appointed Seaborg to serve on the National Commission on Excellence in Education. The final draft of the report did not satisfy Seaborg, because he thought it did not adequately portray the urgency of the situation. He stated that deficiencies in education made the United States a "nation at risk." His comments led to the drafting of a new introduction and gave the report its famous title. Demonstrating his concern with the quality of science education, he became a professor in Berkeley's graduate school of education in 1983. The recipient of many awards and honors, Seaborg received the Enrico Fermi Award of the AEC, the Priestly Medal of the American Chemical Society, and (in 1991) the National Medal of Science. He died in Lafayette, California, on February 25, 1999.

—MSM

Seaton, Frederick A(ndrew)

(1909–1974) assistant secretary of defense for legislative affairs, administrative assistant for congressional liaison, deputy assistant to the president, secretary of the interior

Born in Washington, D.C., on December 11, 1909, Seaton was raised in Manhattan, Kansas, where his father, a former secretary to Senator Joseph L. Bristow (R-Kan.), owned and published two newspapers. Seaton attended public schools and Kansas State Agricultural College (later Kansas State University) from 1927 to 1931. Upon graduation from college, he became associate editor and business manager of Seaton Publications of Manhattan. While continuing his career in journalism, Seaton became active in the Young Republicans Club beginning in 1932 and served as vice chair of the Kansas Republican State Committee from 1934 to 1937. During the presidential campaign of 1936, he served as secretary to Alfred M. Landon, the Republican nominee. In 1937, Seaton moved to Nebraska and became publisher and general manager of the Hastings Daily Tribune. He bought KHAS Radio in Hastings and acquired radio stations in Manhattan and Coffeyville, Kansas. Perhaps his most powerful outlet was Western Farm Life Magazine, which eventually grew to 160,000 subscribers in 10 states. Seaton served in Nebraska's state legislature from 1945 to 1949. He was Nebraska state chairman for HAROLD STASSEN's unsuccessful bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 1948. Upon the death of Senator Kenneth S. Wherry (R-Neb.), Governor Val Peterson appointed Seaton to fill the vacant seat in December 1951. Seaton did not stand for election to the vacancy and served until November 4, 1952.

During the presidential campaign of 1952, Seaton served on DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's campaign staff as a deputy to SHERMAN ADAMS. He was involved in formulating the campaign's strategy in the wake of RICHARD NIXON's Checkers speech. After the campaign, Seaton returned to Kansas to run his growing media business, which by this time included a television station.

In September 1953, Eisenhower appointed Seaton an assistant secretary of defense. At that post, he persuaded Secretary of Defense CHARLES E. WILSON to hold weekly press conferences and improve relations between the Defense Department and Congress. In February 1955, Seaton joined the White House staff as the president's administrative assistant for congressional liaison. He was promoted to deputy assistant to the president in charge of patronage and liaison in June.

After DOUGLAS MCKAY resigned as secretary of the interior, Eisenhower was anxious to mollify tensions within the department generated by McKay's controversial personnel policies and abrasive personality. Therefore, he offered the position to the even-tempered Seaton in May 1956. The appointment drew widespread approval, and Seaton's friendly, open-door policies soon established him as a popular figure within the department.

Seaton vigorously pursued McKay's policies in the area of developing national parks. Attendance at parks reached record highs during his tenure. Spending on the park system increased substantially, more than half a million acres were added to the system, and a 29th national park was established on the island of St. John in the Virgin Islands.

Seaton also followed McKay's initiatives with respect to Native Americans. Termination, a policy designed to end federal relations with the tribes, encountered opposition from many tribes. The product of a variety of motives, termination initially amounted to a program of forced assimilation. The federal government also placed greater emphasis on relocating Native Americans to the cities. In an effort to ease economic pressures on reservations and to accelerate assimilation, Indians who relocated were provided with housing and jobs. Seaton also launched educational programs, providing courses on the reservations as well as vocational training for those from 18 to 35 years old. In addition, he fostered the development of job opportunities near the reservations. By 1958, problems associated with termination and protests from various tribes led the administration to halt the policy of termination without the consent of the affected tribe.

While McKay had supported the use of private enterprise to develop resources whenever possible, Seaton promoted joint federal/private cooperation. He endorsed teamwork projects in the Trinity River division and San Luis unit of the Central Valley Project in California, and he promoted the Fryngpan Arkansas Project in Colorado, construction of which began in fall 1956. Seaton continued the hydro-generating program in the Pacific Northwest. In 1959, facilities for 5.8 million kilowatts were either under construction or scheduled for completion by 1969. For fiscal 1960, the Bureau of Reclamation planned a $9 million program of construction involving 59 projects.

Seaton made protection of wildlife a major goal of the department. In 1958, he sponsored the duck stamp amendment, raising from $2 to $3 the fee for duck stamps (used as hunting licenses). The proceeds went to the acquisition of additional national refuges for waterfowl. He also prohibited the leasing of oil and gas reserves on refuges except for the purposes of drainage. That same year, Seaton promoted amendments to the Coordination Act of 1946 designed to further wildlife conservation. Under the original act, agencies and groups constructing water projects were required to include features to prevent harm to wildlife. The amendments went further and ordered agencies to consider ways of enhancing and developing new fish and wildlife resources. The measure was one of the most important conservation bills of the postwar era.

Development of resources remained another major priority. In 1958, Seaton detailed for a Senate internal affairs subcommittee a plan for federal subsidization of domestic protection of copper, lead, zinc, and other minerals. He furthered the construction of a $12 million helium extraction plant, completed in November 1959. The secretary also administered the mandatory import controls on crude oil, which Congress passed in 1959 and were designed to nourish domestic production and development.

Seaton led the drive in the White House and Congress that resulted in statehood for Alaska in 1958 and Hawaii in 1959. Some Republicans singled out the secretary as a possible vice presidential candidate in 1960.

Seaton left government in January 1961 and returned to the Seaton Publishing Company. In 1962, he ran for governor of Kansas, unsuccessfully challenging the Democratic incumbent, Frank B. Morrison. Seaton then returned to his business, which included eight newspapers, radio stations, and television stations in Nebraska and Kansas. He lived in Hastings until his death in Minneapolis, Minnesota, on January 17, 1974.

—MSM

Service, John S(tewart)

(1909–1999) Foreign Service officer

The son of American missionaries, Service was born in Chengdu, China, on August 3, 1909. After spending his early years in China, where he attended a boarding school in Shanghai, he returned with his family to the United States in 1924 and graduated from high school in Berkeley, California. He graduated from Oberlin College in 1931 and spent a year doing graduate work in art history. In 1933, he passed the Foreign Service examination but did not receive an official appointment until 1935. After serving as a Foreign Service clerk at the U.S. consulate in Kunming, China, he was named language attaché at the embassy in Beijing in 1936. He was posted to Shanghai in 1938. As the Japanese army advanced, Service relocated in 1941 to the wartime Nationalist capital at Chungking, where he served as political officer. After meeting with Mao Zedong in 1944, Service wrote a memo praising the Communist leader and describing the Nationalist government as corrupt and ineffective. His views got back to the Nationalist government and angered the China lobby in the United States. Service was called back from China in 1944 and returned to Washington. He went back to China as an adviser to the army. Once again, however, his views got him in trouble. A letter urging the United States to support the Communists in order to reduce casualties in an expected allied invasion, however, outraged Roosevelt's personal envoy, General Patrick J. Hurley, who sent Service back to Washington.

In 1945, Service was arrested and charged with passing confidential material to Phillip Jaffe, editor of Amerasia, a leftist scholarly magazine dealing with Asia. The FBI had recorded (without a warrant) a meeting in which Service briefed Jaffe about U.S. policy toward China and gave him reports that Service had written criticizing the government of Chiang Kai-shek. Service himself had classified some of the reports he gave to Jaffe as secret. Acknowledging that he had committed an "indiscretion," Service defended himself, claiming such practices were normal. Rather than engaging in espionage for the Soviets, it seems that Service improperly leaked government information in the hope that it would influence American policy. He believed that a civil war was inevitable in China and that the corruption and incompetence of the Nationalist government doomed it to failure. Therefore, he maintained, the United States should establish friendly relations with the Communists. A grand jury declined to indict him, although it handed down indictments in two related cases, and Service was reinstated in the State Department that same year.

During the next six years, Service faced a series of investigations by the State Department and its loyalty board, some prompted by Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) charges that the department was harboring disloyal Americans. In each case, the loyalty board cleared Service. The undersecretary of state also reviewed the loyalty board's findings and approved them. In addition, a Senate committee found that Service had simply written the "facts as he saw them." On December 13, 1951, however, the loyalty review board of the Civil Service Commission audited the departmental proceedings. The loyalty review board found "reasonable doubt as to his loyalty" and recommended dismissal. Secretary of State DEAN ACHESON did so the following day, basing his action on the McCarran rider to the State Department appropriation bill of 1947 that gave the secretary of state absolute discretion to remove from office any employee when he deemed it in the national interest.

Service decided to challenge the constitutionality of Acheson's action. In 1956, a federal district court ruled that the loyalty review board had no authority to audit favorable decisions by departments and ordered that doubts of Service's loyalty be stricken from his record. The court also held that, under the McCarran rider, Acheson had a right to discharge Service and therefore refused to order his reinstatement.

On January 17, 1957, by a vote of eight to zero, the Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's ruling that the loyalty review board had no authority to review decisions favorable to the accused. The Court further held that, under State Department regulations, Acheson had no right to overrule the final decision of the undersecretary of state and, in doing so, had violated Service's rights. The Court then returned the case to the lower court, which reinstated Service to the State Department with all back pay. The decision, along with others handed down on "Red Monday," marked a significant shift from the Court's willingness to grant the government wide latitude in the interests of national security to a concern for the rights of individuals.

Service returned to work in September 1957 and was assigned to make a survey of how the department could save money in shipping the household goods of Foreign Service officers sent to new posts. In 1959, he was transferred to Liverpool, England, as consul. Service retired three years later and earned a master's degree from the University of California at Berkeley. He became library curator at the Center for Chinese Studies at the University of California at Berkeley. In 1971, he visited Communist China. He died in Oakland, California, on February 3, 1999.

—MSM

Shanley, Bernard M(ichael)

(1903–1992) special counsel to the president, presidential appointments secretary

Born in Newark, New Jersey, on August 3, 1903, Shanley studied briefly at Columbia University in 1925 and then attended law school at Fordham University, from which he graduated in 1928. From 1929 to 1952, he practiced law in Newark, New Jersey. During World War II, he served in the army, rising to the rank of captain. After the war, he returned to his law practice and held directorships in several insurance companies. From early in his career, he was actively involved with the Republican Party in New Jersey and served as chairman of the New Jersey Republican Committee for an Effective Assembly and of the executive committee of the Republican National Committee.

A longtime supporter of HAROLD STASSEN, Shanley became national chairman of the Stassen for President Volunteer Committee in late 1951. However, by the Republican National Convention of June 1952, Shanley had switched his support to DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, and he worked for the Eisenhower campaign during the general election campaign.

On the recommendation of SHERMAN ADAMS, who had worked closely with him during the campaign, Shanley was appointed White House special counsel in January 1953. The following month, he became involved in the administration's debate over possible revision of the Taft-Hartley Act. Secretary of Labor MARTIN DURKIN wanted substantial changes to Taft-Hartley. Reflecting the views of organized labor, he wanted, among other things, to eliminate the right-to-work provision and to permit secondary boycotts. SINCLAIR WEEKS, the secretary of commerce, opposed such changes. Along with GERALD D. MORGAN, assistant congressional liaison, Shanley produced a position paper attempting to reconcile differences between Durkin and Weeks. It detailed what the administration needed to attract labor votes without losing support from the National Association of Manufacturers, a powerful, traditionally Republican business organization. The Shanley-Morgan draft included many of Durkin's proposals and called for substantial revisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, especially of its more antilabor sections. However, Senator ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio) died the day that Eisenhower planned to submit the proposals to Congress, and the administration agreed that it would be impolitic to send the amendments to Congress on the day that the sponsor of the original act died. In addition, Taft's death greatly dimmed any prospect for passage of the proposed amendments. Without Taft's prestige and his influence, particularly with the Republican Right, the amendments had little chance of passing. Moreover, the election of Senator WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) to replace Taft as majority leader made passage even more unlikely. In addition, Weeks mobilized an effective campaign against the proposals within the administration, and they were never sent to Capitol Hill. When Durkin resigned in September 1953, he accused Shanley and Morgan of sabotaging their own reform proposals as well as his own efforts to revise the statute.

Shanley later performed public relations assignments for the Eisenhower administration. In November 1953, Eisenhower handed Shanley the task of dealing with protests from the press about the administration's policies and public utterances. Shortly thereafter, Shanley embroiled himself in controversy when he implied that 1,456 government employees who lost their jobs had been dismissed as "subversives." In February 1954, Shanley admitted that his statement had been an "unfortunate mistake" and apologized. Nevertheless, ADLAI STEVENSON took the opportunity to denounce the Republican Party and the Eisenhower administration for using McCarthyite tactics in the "deception." Although Shanley and others had declared them to be traitors and subversives, Stevenson said, the only concrete fact was that the government reluctantly admitted it found "only one alleged active Communist" in all its security investigations.

In January 1955, Shanley assumed the post of appointments secretary following the resignation of THOMAS E. STEPHENS. Shanley resigned that fall to resume his law practice but returned to the White House in January 1956. In November 1957, Shanley again resigned to seek the Republican senatorial nomination from New Jersey. The following April, he lost to Winthrop Kean in the primary.

Shanley returned to his law practice and remained politically active in the 1960s. He was appointed to the Republican National Committee in 1960, serving until 1964. He won the New Jersey Republican senatorial nomination in 1964 but lost the general election to Democrat HARRISON WILLIAMS. In 1968, he became vice chairman of the Republican National Committee for the northeastern region and remained on it until the year he died. His law firm, Shanley and Fisher, grew into one of the largest in New Jersey; at the time of Shanley's death, it had 140 lawyers. He resigned as Republican national committeeman in 1992. Shanley died in Bernardsville, New Jersey, on February 25, 1992.

—MSM

Sheen, Fulton J(ohn)

(1895–1979) clergyman

Born in El Paso, Illinois, on May 8, 1895, Peter John Sheen early on adopted his mother's maiden name and used it throughout his life. After completing high school at Spalding Institute in Peoria, Illinois, in 1913, he began lengthy and distinguished university training at St. Viator College of Illinois, receiving his B.A. in 1917 and M.A. in 1919. He studied at St. Paul's Seminary in Minnesota in 1919 and was ordained as a priest the same year. Sheen earned a Bachelor of Sacred Theology degree and a Bachelor of Canon Law degree from Catholic University in 1920, and a Ph.D. at the University of Louvain in 1923. After studying at the Sorbonne, he earned an S.T. D. from the Collegio Angelico in Rome in 1924. Sheen briefly taught theology at St. Edmunds College in Ware, England, and published his doctoral dissertation as God and Intelligence in Modern Philosophy (1925). It won considerable acclaim and established its author as a leading Catholic philosopher. The University of Louvain awarded Sheen the Agrégé en Philosophie, making him the first American to receive the prestigious degree. He served briefly in 1925 and 1926 as curate of St. Patrick's Church in a poor parish in Peoria, Illinois. In 1926, Sheen accepted appointment to the philosophy department of Catholic University, a position he held until 1950.

Early in his career, Sheen became one of the most popular spokesmen for Catholicism in America. He lectured at Catholic universities and accepted invitations to speak at churches nationwide. He also wrote many books and articles during the 1930s and 1940s, and a few of the books sold well. His effectiveness as an orator led Catholic officials to choose him in 1930 to appear as the featured speaker on the weekly radio program "Catholic Hour," carried by NBC and sponsored by the National Council of Catholic Men. The program was intended to make the doctrines of the church more familiar to Americans. Sheen became extremely popular; he drew an estimated audience of 4 million listeners.

Made a papal chamberlain in 1934 and elevated to monsignor the following year, Sheen became known during the 1930s and 1940s not only as an articulate preacher who brought many converts to the Catholic church—including prominent ex-communists Elizabeth Bentley and Louis Budenz—but also as a firm anticommunist who supported Generalissimo Francisco Franco in the Spanish civil war. During World War II, Sheen's sermons combined piety with patriotism. Along with his message of anticommunism (he denounced America's wartime alliance with the Soviet Union), he taught that social reform derived from spiritual regeneration and advocated the church's program of Catholic Action as a middle ground between capitalism and communism. After the war, he opposed any concessions to the USSR or relaxation of the cold war. In Communism and the Conscience of the West (1948), he held the "Western world" responsible for communism and urged it to repent and return to Christianity.

During the postwar religious revival, Catholicism worked its way into the American religious mainstream, and Sheen played a major role in that development. In 1950, he was named the national director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, an international Catholic organization that distributed funds for missionary activities. Consecrated auxiliary bishop of New York in 1951, Sheen continued to spread his message through a variety of media. A prolific writer, he published a number of books, including Peace of Soul and Life of Christ, as well as two newspaper columns ("Bishop Sheen Writes" and "God Love You").

Many Catholics expected him to rise to greater prominence in the church hierarchy, but while bringing converts to the church he made enemies among its officials. Described by a biographer, Rev. D. P. Noonan, as a "consummate egocentric," Sheen could, according to Noonan, "captivate, inspire, persuade and stimulate" on the one hand and "belittle, antagonize, and alienate" on the other.

Launched in 1951, Sheen's television program, "Life Is Worth Living," won consistently high ratings on the DuMont and ABC networks. Airing at 8:00 on Tuesday evenings opposite the comedian Milton Berle's popular entertainment show on NBC, Sheen was the only competitor ever to challenge Berle, at times drawing a larger audience than the man known as Mr. Television. At its peak, Sheen's program drew 10 million viewers, including large numbers of Protestants and Jews. After DuMont folded in 1955, Sheen moved his program to ABC. Speaking before a live audience, Sheen appeared in full liturgical regalia, and his almost hypnotic gaze, his reassuring smile, and his calm, though theatrical, delivery captivated his viewers. Noonan described Sheen's program as "not a dogmatic one, but a mixture of common sense, logic and Christian ethics" that did not attempt to proselytize for Catholicism. Presented through anecdotes and moral lessons, Sheen's subjects ranged from war, motherhood, psychiatry, teenagers, death, and democracy to the divine sense of humor. A recurring theme was communism and the danger it posed to the United States. He based discussions on Franz Kafka's The Trial, Fyodor Dostoyevsky's The Brothers Karamazov, St. Augustine's Confessions, and St. Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologica. All were presented in a comforting, nonintimidating manner, and Sheen frequently supplemented his unscripted discussions with jokes solicited from friends or derived from books of humor. Sheen received an Emmy Award in 1952, and the program was honored with the Freedom Foundation Award the next year. Describing him as "America's best known Roman Catholic priest," Time magazine put Sheen on its cover in 1952. Sheen's program went off the air in 1957 but resumed in 1959 and continued until 1965. Printed transcripts of the programs were compiled in five volumes, titled Life Is Worth Living and published between 1953 and 1957. The individual volumes repeatedly appeared on the best-seller lists. Bishop Sheen returned all revenues connected with the program to the Society for the Propagation of the Faith.

Like many other Catholics in the United States during the 1950s, Bishop Sheen believed that communism posed the most ominous threat to freedom and that Christianity and the church constituted the most powerful force opposing it. Never timid about pointing to what he believed was communist subversion, he, in 1952, accused American communists of having attempted to infiltrate the Catholic priesthood in 1936. At the same time, he professed not to sympathize with the methods of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.).

Sheen continued to write books and syndicated columns in the late 1950s and 1960s. He also participated in the Second Vatican Council. His expected promotion in the church did not materialize, because, at least many believed, he had incurred the disfavor of the archbishop of New York FRANCIS SPELLMAN. After refusing Spellman's offer of a bishopric in New York City, he received an appointment from Pope Paul VI as bishop of Rochester, New York, in 1966. Sheen had little previous experience as a parish leader, and he shocked his conservative congregation by determinedly introducing the reforms of Vatican II, his ecumenical overtures to the community, and his advocacy of a variety of liberal political causes. Not only did he focus attention on the poor of the inner cities, but in 1967 he became the first major Catholic figure to urge a total and immediate withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam. He later modified his position and supported President RICHARD M. NIXON's policy of Vietnamization. In 1969, Sheen resigned his bishopric in Rochester and became titular archbishop of Newport, Wales. Thereafter, he made occasional appearances on television and radio programs and contributed to national and religious magazines. He died in New York City on December 9, 1979.

—MSM

Shivers, Allan

(1907–1985) governor of Texas

The son of a prominent judge, Allan Shivers was born in Lufkin, Texas, on October 5, 1907. He grew up near Woodville, Texas, and moved with his family to Port Arthur, Texas, where he graduated from high school in 1924. Shivers entered the University of Texas but dropped out after a year to work at an oil refinery. He returned to the University of Texas in 1928 and received his B.A. in 1931. Soon after graduating, he passed the state bar exam, although he did not complete his LL.B. at the University of Texas until 1933. After receiving his law degree, he returned to Port Arthur and opened a law office. In 1934, Shivers won election as a Democrat to the state senate, where he focused his attention on defending his state's ownership of tidelands oil and gas properties claimed by the federal government. He held his seat in the state senate until 1947. From 1943 to 1945, he served in the army and was assigned to the Allied military government in North Africa, Italy, France, and Germany. Discharged from the army as a major, Shivers returned to Texas and managed his father-in-law's business enterprises, including a substantial citrus farm. In 1946, Shivers won election as lieutenant governor. Reelected with the incumbent governor, Beauford H. Jester, in 1948, Shivers became governor in July 1949, when Jester died of a heart attack. Shivers easily won election in November 1950. As governor, he reorganized state government to make it more efficient and expanded state services, funding them by pushing tax increases through the state legislature. His administration increased appropriations for retirement benefits for state employees, aid for the elderly, teachers' salaries, roads, and bridges. It also provided funding for private charity organizations. A strong believer in states' rights, the governor continued to assert Texas's claim to tidelands oil, which put him at odds with the administration of HARRY S. TRUMAN. When Truman vetoed a bill that would have vested ownership of tidelands in the states, Shivers broke with the national Democratic Party.

During the presidential campaign of 1952, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER stated that he favored state control of offshore oil deposits, and Shivers endorsed him for president. Conservative Democrats, or "Shivercrats" as they came to be called, helped Eisenhower win 53 percent of the vote in Texas that November. Shivers won reelection at the same time, running on both Republican and Democratic tickets.

Shivers made public comments harshly critical of the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which struck down segregation in public schools. His actions, however, were more moderate. In August 1955, he appointed an advisory committee on segregation to recommend ways of preventing integration. Yet Texas passed no legislation impeding voluntary compliance with the Court's decision, and the state offered assistance in implementing locally developed desegregation plans. By the end of 1955, 84 districts in Texas had desegregated, more than the rest of the southern states combined.

During the mid-1950s, however, Shivers found himself losing his political base. In 1954, the governor faced a challenge for renomination from the liberal RALPH YARBOROUGH and was forced into a bitter runoff. Charges of corruption and malpractice in his administration further embarrassed the governor (a scandal in the Veterans Land Board was particularly harmful), even though he was never implicated in any of the scandals.

Faced with declining popularity, Shivers seized the idea of interposition to unite his followers. Conceived to obstruct the Brown decision, the theory of interposition maintained that each state had a right to interpose itself between the federal government and the state's citizens if a federal law or court decision was contrary to the Constitution. By extension, opponents of Brown argued for consolidating public school authority under state government instead of local school boards, thus placing the "sovereignty of the state" between local school officials and federal courts. In February 1956, Shivers called on the state Democratic Party to conduct a referendum on interposition and, if the voters endorsed it, to place the doctrine in the party platform. The following month, the governor promoted an interposition plank for the Democratic national platform. This led to a conflict over control of the state delegation to the Democratic National Convention in 1956. In May, a moderate coalition led by Representative SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.) and Senator LYNDON JOHNSON

(D-Tex.) ousted Shivers as party leader and wrote a statement denouncing interposition but supporting states rights. The state convention named Johnson its favorite son candidate for president.

Although Johnson and Rayburn wrested control of the state delegation from Shivers, the issue of interposition did not go away. In July, the white supremacist Citizens' Councils, with Shivers's support, forced a statewide referendum on three propositions to maintain segregation, one of which called for interposition. All three received heavy approval. The large vote for segregation reinforced Shivers's stand. In the fall of 1956, under the guise of maintaining order, Shivers used Texas Rangers to block federal court orders to admit African-American students to schools in Mansfield and Texarkana. President Eisenhower took no action on the matter. According to Eisenhower's attorney general, HERBERT BROWNELL, "there was no Court-ordered plan to desegregate and obviously no violation of a Court order and no rioting that got beyond the capability of local authorities." Therefore, Brownell "advised President Eisenhower that we did not have requisite Federal jurisdiction to enter the Mansfield case."

Shivers endorsed Eisenhower for president in 1956, and the president carried Texas in November. Shivers had announced in March that he would not run for a fourth term. The governor threw his support to a moderately conservative Democrat, PRICE DANIEL, who defeated Yarborough for the Democratic nomination and went on to win election as governor. In late 1956, the advisory committee Shivers had appointed returned 21 proposals to maintain segregation. They came too late for his signature and awaited action by the new administration.

After completing an unprecedented seven-and-a-half years as governor, Shivers retired from politics in January 1957. He returned to private life and managed his business interests. He served as chairman of Western Pipe Line, Inc., a large construction concern, Austin National Bank (later InterFirst Bank Austin), and Texas Commerce Bank. In addition, he remained active in public affairs. Shivers was president of the United States Chamber of Commerce and served as chair of the advisory board of the Export-Import Bank of the United States.

In 1973, he was appointed to a six-year term as a member of the board of regents of the University of Texas, which he chaired for four years. Shivers died of a massive heart attack in Austin, Texas, on January 14, 1985.

—MSM

Short, Dewey

(1898–1979) U.S. congressman; chairman, Armed Services Committee; assistant secretary of the army for civil-military affairs

Born in Galena, Missouri, on April 7, 1898, Short attended public schools and Marionville College in Missouri. He began campaigning for Republican candidates at age 18. He served in the infantry during World War I, after which he received a B.A. from Baker University in 1919 and a Bachelor of Sacred Theology from Boston University in 1922. He studied theology and philosophy at Heidelberg University, the University of Berlin, and Oxford University and took law courses at Harvard. Short became a professor of ethics, psychology, and political philosophy at Southwestern College in Winfield, Kansas, in 1923, and pastor of the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church in Springfield, Missouri, in 1927. He won election as a Republican to the U.S. House of Representatives from Missouri in 1928. Although he lost his bid for reelection in 1930 and ran unsuccessfully for the Republican nomination for a Senate seat in 1932, redistricting enabled him to return to the House in 1934.

Short strongly objected to the New Deal's concentration of power in the federal government. In 1935, he unleashed a verbal tirade against the New Deal that attracted national attention. Time magazine ran a story about the speech.

In 1939, Short became the second-ranking Republican on the Military Affairs Committee. After a trip to Europe, he became a leading isolationist and was proposed as a vice presidential candidate at the 1940 Republican National Convention. Short maintained his distrust of foreign entanglements and opposed lend-lease in March 1941. Following World War II, he urged the United States to build Pacific bases to counter Soviet aggression and predicted that Korea would be a "hot spot." Short became ranking Republican on the Armed Services Committee in 1949 and supported creation of the Department of Defense during the 80th Congress (1947–48). In September 1952, he urged that UN forces in Korea go “all the way” to the Yalu River and end the division of that country.

After Republicans gained control of Congress in the elections of 1952, Short became chair of the Armed Services Committee. The Korean War occupied most of the first six months of his term. In January, Short dismissed charges brought by Representative CLARE E. HOFFMAN (R-Mich.) that the army had staged a useless Korean raid to impress visitors. While President Eisenhower tried to set the stage for peace talks in April, Short urged that negotiations be delayed until the communists permitted international inspection of prison camps. When a truce was signed in July, Short stated that military victory would have been possible if the army had not been restricted.

In May 1953, Eisenhower conferred with Short over his proposed budget for 1953. The president stressed the fact that it gave the air force $20 billion, “more than 40 percent of all defense funds,” as part of an effort to build 120 combat wings by July 1955. After the conference, Short announced that the administration did not deserve “full credit” for the buildup. He and other members of Congress had originally proposed increasing the number of combat wings to 143 by July 1955. Nevertheless, Short supported Eisenhower’s budget.

Short became involved in the debate over the defense reorganization bill drafted by the administration and sent to Congress in April. The plan was intended to streamline and improve the Department of Defense by making the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff responsible for the staff’s work and giving him tenure power over personnel. Short initially opposed the plan as possibly leading to a “military dictatorship,” but BRYCE HARLOW, of the White House congressional liaison staff, persuaded him to support it. With the backing of Short and the ranking Democrat on the committee, Representative CARL VINSON (D-Ga.), the reorganization plan was approved by the House and went into effect in June 1953.

Short attempted to calm American fears of nuclear attack in April 1954 by announcing that U.S. A-bomb defenses were “in pretty good shape” and saying it was “silly” to talk of evacuating large cities. He counseled moderation in July when Senate Majority Leader WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) stated that the United States should quit the UN if Communist China were admitted. The Democratic leadership supported Knowland, but other senators and Short announced that they opposed withdrawal.

The Democrats regained control of Congress in the elections of 1954, and Short lost his chairmanship. In June 1956, he opposed an $800 million supplemental increase in air force funds proposed by a House-Senate conference committee and opposed by the administration. Short objected to the increase on the grounds that the air force lacked facilities and manpower to make efficient use of the extra money and that it would lead to an unbalanced budget. The additional funding was nevertheless approved.

Short lost his seat in the House to Democrat Charles H. Brown in November 1956. The following February, Eisenhower nominated him to be assistant secretary of the army for civil-military affairs. The Senate confirmed his selection in March. In August 1957, he declared that decreased purchases of weapons by the armed services due to inflation would not seriously impair American defenses. In 1959, Short told a subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee that charges of enlisted men being used to perform menial chores for officers were exaggerated. He retained his post until the end of the Eisenhower administration.

After leaving government, he lived in Washington, D.C., where he died on November 19, 1979.

—MSM

Shuman, Charles B(aker)

(1907–) president, American Farm Bureau Federation

Born in Sullivan, Illinois, on April 27, 1907, Shuman grew up on a family farm, attended public schools, and earned a B.S. from the University of Illinois College of Agriculture in 1928. The following year, he earned a master’s degree in agronomy from the University of Illinois. He joined the American Farm Bureau Federation in 1929 and became increasingly active in farm organizations during the 1930s. He said that in those years he “learned about bureaucracy.” Although a Democrat, he opposed many of Franklin D. Roosevelt's agricultural policies. Shuman became a member of the board of directors of the Illinois Agricultural Association in 1941 and its president in 1945. In the latter year, Shuman also became a director of the American Farm Bureau Federation (AFBF).

Albert B. Kline, president of the AFBF, retired in 1954, and Shuman was unanimously elected to succeed him. The largest general farm organization in the United States, the AFBF had a membership of over 1.6 million farm families, concentrated mainly in the midwest. Originally, the AFBF supported the New Deal's agricultural policies. By the late 1930s, however, it became increasingly hostile to the New Deal. With the start of World War II, the AFBF broke with the agricultural policies of the Roosevelt administration. The election of Kline as president in 1947 reflected the organization's break from the New Deal. Under Shuman, the AFBF continued to oppose New Deal farm policies. By the 1950s, critics charged that the AFBF represented large commercial farmers. In response to such charges, Shuman said that "we represent either big or little farmers. We're a cross section of the entire farm population." However, observers noted that the AFBF membership included many farmers whose substantial holdings inclined them to oppose government controls. In contrast, members of the next two largest farm organizations, the National Farmers Union and the National Grange, tended to own small and medium-sized farms.

As an advocate of the free enterprise system, Shuman generally favored the policies of the Eisenhower administration's secretary of agriculture, EZRA TAFT BENSON. In Shuman's first year as president of the AFBF, he strongly backed Benson's proposal for flexible price supports for basic farm products. For Shuman, it represented a feasible, gradual method of returning American agriculture to the free market. When, in 1955, Democrats and some farm organizations called for a return to rigid price supports at 90 percent of parity, Shuman characterized the plan as a "backward step" that would "wreck this economy" and further depress declining agricultural income.

Shuman applied his philosophy of free enterprise and his opposition to government interference even more consistently than Benson. In September 1955, he rejected Benson's plan for the government to purchase pork to support its price. Instead, Shuman proposed a program calling for promotion to increase the use of pork and lard and to develop export markets (including in the Soviet bloc). Shuman and the AFBF consistently viewed the expansion of foreign markets as a superior strategy to government price supports as a means of increasing farm income.

For the most part, however, Shuman found the policies of the Eisenhower administration congenial. He overcame his aversion to government interference in agriculture in January 1956, when he told the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee that Benson's plan for a soil bank, which intended to reduce overproduction by having the government pay farmers to remove acreage from cultivation and use it to plant soil-building crops, was a "step in the right direction." Congress eventually passed a bill that included some, but not all, of the AFBF's recommendations. In both 1956 and 1958, Shuman supported Eisenhower's vetoes of farm bills that sought to restore high price supports. Eisenhower signed legislation supported by the AFBF that allowed farmers to file for refunds of federal tax on gasoline used on farms, added more funding for school milk programs, and provided more funding for the eradication of brucellosis.

Throughout the 1960s, Shuman was highly critical of the agricultural policies of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. He especially opposed Democratic efforts to impose strict marketing controls. The owner of a farm that produced corn, cattle, and soybeans, Shuman left the AFBF in 1974 but remained active on the boards of a number of agencies and companies, including the Export-Import Bank, the Economic Development Administration, the Illinois Power Company, and the Chicago Mercantile Exchange.

—MSM

Shuttlesworth, Fred L(ee)

(1922–) president, Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights; secretary, Southern Christian Leadership Conference

Born in Mount Meigs, Alabama, a small agricultural community, on March 18, 1922, Shuttlesworth grew up near Birmingham, Alabama, where he attended public schools and was the valedictorian of Rose-dale High School. After high school, he worked as a handyman and moved to Mobile, Alabama, and worked at the Brookley Field Air Force Base. Although raised a Methodist, he joined a Baptist congregation and became a minister. After attending Cedar Grove Seminary, Shuttlesworth received a B.A. from Selma College in 1951 and a B.S. from Alabama State College in 1952. While attending Selma College, he began preaching in 1948 at two rural churches near Selma. Later that year, he moved to the First Baptist Church of Selma. The strong-willed, some would say arrogant, Shuttlesworth clashed with the deacons and resigned in December 1952. He spent four months as a guest preacher until, in March 1953, he became pastor of Birmingham's Bethel Baptist Church. There Shuttlesworth began to involve himself in civil rights causes. He led an unsuccessful attempt in 1955 to get African Americans placed on the local police force. He joined the NAACP, and when the organization was outlawed in Alabama in 1956, he helped establish the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights (ACMHR) to continue the fight for black equality in Birmingham. Shuttlesworth was elected its first president.

Called the Johannesburg of America by some African Americans, Birmingham was governed in the late 1950s by officials who firmly opposed any attempts at desegregation. As leader of the movement to desegregate the city, Shuttlesworth headed many attempts to end segregation in local public facilities. In early December 1956, Shuttlesworth attended the Institute on Nonviolence and Social Change, sponsored by the Montgomery Improvement Association, the group, led by MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., that conducted the boycott of Montgomery's city buses. He returned to Birmingham and set about applying the lessons he had learned at the institute. On December 20, 1956, shortly after the Supreme Court had declared segregation on local transportation unconstitutional in a case arising from the Montgomery bus boycott, Shuttlesworth called on the city commissioners to end segregated seating on Birmingham's buses. A bomb made from six sticks of dynamite destroyed his home on Christmas night, injuring the church's deacon and two of Shuttlesworth's children. Shuttlesworth was uninjured and the next day led roughly 250 African Americans onto local buses, where they sat in the seats reserved for whites. Following the arrest of 21 African Americans, Shuttlesworth called off the demonstrations until the segregation law could be tested in the courts. The 21 African Americans were convicted in January 1957, and the ACMHR appealed. In October 1958, just before a scheduled federal court hearing on the law, the city commission repealed the statute and passed a new one authorizing the bus company to establish its own segregation rules. Shuttlesworth then helped organize a test of this new ordinance. Thirteen African Americans were arrested on October 20 for sitting in seats reserved for whites, and Shuttlesworth himself was arrested the next day for having incited the protest. The ACMHR initiated a legal challenge to the new law the next month, and a federal district court ruled the new ordinance unconstitutional in December 1959.

Shuttlesworth also tried to desegregate the waiting rooms at Birmingham's railroad terminal in March 1957. That September he tried to enroll four black children, two of them his own, at a white high school. A mob savagely beat him outside the building, and the children were refused admission. Shuttlesworth filed a suit challenging Alabama's pupil placement law, passed in 1955 with the intent to forestall school desegregation. In November 1958, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the statute was not unconstitutional on its face. An attempt to dynamite Shuttlesworth's church in June 1958 failed only because a volunteer guarding the church found the bomb and moved it into the street before it exploded. The church sustained broken windows and cracked plaster. In late 1959, the ACMHR filed suit to desegregate Birmingham's parks. During the spring of 1960, Shuttlesworth aided student sit-ins in Birmingham and was arrested for his participation. In 1961, he served as the main contact in Alabama for the Freedom Rides and coordinated activities that saved the freedom riders after a mob attacked them in Anniston.

Along with Martin Luther King, Jr., Shuttlesworth helped organize the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) in 1957. He was elected its secretary and became one of King's top aides in the SCLC. He spoke at the prayer pilgrimage in Washington, D.C., in May 1957. The city commissioners of Montgomery, Alabama, sued Shuttlesworth, three other black ministers, and the New York Times for libel in April 1960 because of an ad placed in the Times criticizing municipal officials. At trial, the jury returned a verdict for L. B. Sullivan, one of the commissioners, in the amount of $500,000. In a landmark decision, the Supreme Court overturned the $500,000 judgment against the defendants in March 1964 (New York Times v. Sullivan).

Combative, stubborn, and blunt, Shuttlesworth antagonized colleagues in the Civil Rights movement as well as his opponents. He became pastor of the Revelation Baptist Church in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1961, but remained president of the ACMHR and a leader of Birmingham's movement for integration. Shuttlesworth suggested and then took a leadership role in a major antisegregation campaign in Birmingham in the spring of 1963. He invited King to come to Birmingham to participate in the campaign to desegregate the city. During those demonstrations, Shuttlesworth was hospitalized after water from a fire hose slammed him into a wall. He participated in other desegregation campaigns sponsored by the SCLC and remained a key aide to King during the 1960s.

Shuttlesworth became pastor of the Greater New Light Baptist Church in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1966 and in 1988 became director of the Shuttlesworth Housing Foundation, created to assist low-income families in obtaining housing. In 2004, he became president of the SCLC but resigned in November 2004, less than a year later, alleging that the vice chairman was guilty of financial neglect and personal improprieties. Shuttlesworth complained that "deceit, mistrust and a lack of spiritual discipline and truth have eaten at the core of this once-hallowed organization."

—MSM

Smathers, George A(rmistead)

(1913–2007) U.S. senator

The son of a judge and Democratic leader in New Jersey who moved to Florida for his health, George Smathers was born in Atlantic City, New Jersey, on November 14, 1913, and moved to Miami with his family at the age of six. He attended public schools and received his B.A. in 1936 and LL.B. in 1938 from the University of Florida. After gaining admission to the bar in 1938, he began to practice law in Miami. A protégé of Senator Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), a strong supporter of the New Deal, Smathers became assistant U.S. district attorney in 1940. He joined the marine corps in 1942, served for 39 months in the Pacific, and was discharged a major in 1945. After the war, he briefly prosecuted war frauds for the government as a special assistant to the U.S. attorney general. With the aid of Pepper, Smathers won a seat in the House of Representatives in 1946 and reelection in 1948.

Although regarded as a "Pepper man" in the House, Smathers turned sharply to the right when he challenged his mentor for the senatorial nomination in 1950. The Florida primary attracted national attention in what was viewed as the first major test of the communist issue in the elections of 1950. Smathers attacked his opponent, who had long advocated friendlier relations with the USSR and had spoken before organizations later characterized as communist front groups, as a communist sympathizer bent on entangling the state in "the spiraling spider web of the Red network." The most important issue in the campaign, however, was the New Deal-Fair Deal tradition itself, with which Pepper was closely identified. Backed by a coalition of powerful business interests that opposed Pepper's liberal stands on taxes and labor legislation, Smathers appealed to upper-income voters, including many Republicans, with a program of economic conservatism and opposition to what he called "creeping socialism" in Washington. Smathers defeated Pepper by 60,000 votes and went on to win the general election in November. He won reelection in 1956 and 1962.

As a senator during the 1950s, Smathers was a conservative on social and economic issues, an outspoken defender of racial segregation in the South, and a foe of civil rights legislation. He became a close aide to Senate Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) and a powerful member of the small group of senators, known as the Senate establishment, who made committee appointments and could often decide the fate of legislation. Johnson placed him in charge of the Senate Democratic Elections Committee in 1956, where he used his position to disburse campaign money to conservatives and build important political connections among influential southern senators. Smathers's power was enhanced still further when he served as acting majority leader in Johnson's absence.

During the Eisenhower administration, Smathers used his influence on Capitol Hill to promote bills that advanced the interests of oil companies and railroads, some of which were clients of his law firm. He was one of the leading backers of the successful drive in 1953 to vest control of the oil-rich tidelands with the state governments and not the federal government. As chairman of the Commerce Committee's Surface Transportation Subcommittee, Smathers introduced the Transportation Act of 1958. The measure aided financially pressed railroads by granting them loan guarantees for the purchase of new equipment and making it easier for them to discontinue unprofitable passenger services.

When he served in the House, Smathers met and befriended Representative JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). In 1959, Smathers became the head of the committee directing Kennedy's presidential campaign in the South. However, Smathers frequently failed to give his support to measures supported by the administration after Kennedy was elected, despite their friendship. Some suggested that, rather than ideology, his voting patterns reflected a desire to aid his law firm's clients and his campaign contributors. After Johnson became president, Smathers remained a powerful force in the Senate and frequently advised the president. He opposed the nomination of THURGOOD MARSHALL to the Supreme Court and the Civil Rights Act of 1964. After the enfranchisement of some 300,000 African Americans in Florida in 1964, however, Smathers became more liberal on many domestic issues. Although he voted against adding Medicare to the amendments to Social Security in 1964, when the entire bill, including Medicare, came to the floor, Smathers voted for it. He also supported the Voting Rights Act of 1965. His attempts to satisfy his constituents and his continuing efforts to aid the associations and businesses that supported his campaigns resulted in a sometimes contradictory voting pattern during the Johnson administration. Smathers remained a powerful force in the Senate during the 1960s, but toward the latter part of the decade, as many of his business dealings became known, he became the target of frequent charges of influence peddling. Claiming poor health, he did not seek reelection in 1968. After leaving the Senate, Smathers stayed in Washington, where he practiced law and established a lucrative lobbying practice that represented a powerful alliance of rail, trucking, and water transportation interests. He served on the board of directors of Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., and Aerodex, a defense contractor. Smathers died on a private island near Miami, Florida, on January 20, 2007.

—MSM

Smith, Earl E. T.

(1903–1991) ambassador to Cuba

The son of a prominent New York family, Smith was born in Newport, Rhode Island, on July 8, 1903. After attending Yale University from 1926 to 1928, he became a founding member of Paige, Smith & Remick, an investment brokerage firm, in 1920. He remained with the firm until the late 1930s. President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Smith to the Office of Production Management, later the War Production Board, in 1941. Smith served in the U.S. Air Army during World War II and was discharged as a lieutenant colonel. During the 1950s, he actively entered Republican politics, serving from 1954 to 1955 as chairman of the Florida State Finance Committee and from 1954 to 1956 as a member of the Republican National Finance Committee.

In June 1957, Eisenhower appointed Smith ambassador to Cuba. Smith had no diplomatic experience and did not speak Spanish, but he did have personal ties to Cuban political and business leaders developed over frequent trips to Cuba in the previous 30 years. Justifying his appointment, Smith said he "knew Cuba well and . . . felt I could judge the thoughts and moods of the Cuban people."

Smith's appointment marked an official change in the attitude of the State Department toward the government of General Fulgencio Batista. During the early years of the decade, the United States had supported the Cuban dictator, but by 1957 the State Department, aware of growing opposition to the repressive regime among broad segments of the Cuban population and within the United States, abandoned this policy. The outgoing ambassador, Arthur Gardner, had supported Batista uncritically; Smith was instructed to adopt a position of neutrality in the conflict between the government and the leftist rebels led by Fidel Castro.

Smith's initial activities as ambassador reflected the change in policy. Arriving in Cuba in mid-July, he quickly created an image that differed markedly from that of his predecessor. In a press conference on July 24, he said, "We have nothing substantial to make us believe [that Castro's movement] is red-inspired." After witnessing the Cuban police attack a group of Cuban mothers demonstrating against Batista's regime, Smith issued a statement deploring the "excessive police action." The statement concerned Eisenhower, who thought it unwise for an "ambassador to make statements about local conditions." Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES told the president that Smith's reaction was "technically incorrect"; nevertheless, Dulles thought that Smith's indiscretion was "a human thing to do."

As the revolt in Cuba progressed, the State Department remained divided over which side to support. Smith, however, became increasingly anti-Castro. He believed that Castro's movement was infiltrated by communists, that Castro would fail to honor international obligations or foreign investments, and that communists would benefit from the overthrow of Batista. Smith advised Washington to support Batista, who had promised to hold fair elections, at least until an alternative to Castro could be found. In early 1958, the Batista government used U.S. military equipment to quell disturbances in Cienfuegos in violation of a military assistance agreement with the United States signed in 1951. Moreover, in bombing rebel positions, Batista's air force inflicted heavy civilian casualties. In reaction, the anti-Batista faction in the State Department convinced the administration to end arms shipments to the dictator in March 1958. Smith vigorously opposed the action, which he maintained only weakened the chances of eventual constitutional order in Cuba. Smith's diplomacy came apart in November 1958, when Batista rigged the election to ensure a victory for his chosen candidate, Dr. Andrés Rivero Aguero. Although disappointed by the fraudulent elections, Smith considered Rivero Aguero preferable to Castro and unsuccessfully urged the Eisenhower administration to recognize him. In December 1958, Smith, under instructions from Washington, reluctantly informed Batista that "the United States will no longer support the present government of Cuba."

Although the Eisenhower administration opposed Castro's movement, it remained unconvinced that Castro was a communist or that he posed a threat to the United States. On December 31, 1958, Batista fled Cuba, and Castro took power. Whatever its misgivings about the new regime, the Eisenhower administration was prepared to try to establish a working relationship with it. The State Department quickly extended recognition to the new government. At the urging of Undersecretary of State CHRISTIAN HERTER, Eisenhower reluctantly replaced Smith with Philip W. Bonsal, the ambassador to Bolivia and a career diplomat who had long advocated social and economic reform in Latin America. Eisenhower accepted Smith's resignation on January 20, 1959.

During hearings before the Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws in 1960, Smith charged that the Central Intelligence Agency, officials in the State Department, officials connected with the U.S. embassy in Cuba, and "segments of the press" had contributed to Batista's downfall. Acknowledging that the Batista government "was overthrown because of corruption, disintegration from within," he maintained that "we helped overthrow the Batista dictatorship which was pro-American only to install the Castro dictatorship which is pro-Russian." Smith published an account of the Cuban Revolution in his book, The Fourth Floor (1962), in which he argued that Castro's victory was a disaster for both Cuba and the United States and one that could have been avoided.

After his resignation from government service, Smith returned to his business interests. He became director of the Bank of Palm Beach and Trust Corporation and the U.S. Sugar Corporation. President JOHN F. KENNEDY offered him a position as ambassador to Switzerland, which Smith declined because Switzerland managed American interests in Cuba. He remained active in Republican politics and was a member of the Republican platform committee in 1960 and 1980. Smith served as mayor of Palm Beach from 1971 to 1977. President Ronald W. Reagan appointed him to the Presidential Commission on Broadcasting to Cuba in 1982. Smith died at his home in Palm Beach, Florida, on February 15, 1991.

—MSM

Smith, Gerald L(yman) K(enneth)

(1898–1976) national director, Christian Nationalist Crusade

The son of a poor farmer and evangelical preacher, Gerald L. K. Smith was born in Pardeeville, Wisconsin, on February 27, 1898. Raised in small towns in Wisconsin, he graduated from Viroqua High School, where he was a champion debater, and in 1918 from Valparaiso University in Indiana. At the age of 19, Smith heard a spiritual call and became a minister in the Disciples of Christ Church, the same denomination for which his father and grandfather preached. In 1929, he moved to Louisiana for his wife's health and took a position as minister of the Kings Highway Christian Church in Shreveport. Smith's popularity as a preacher helped double the church's membership. He proved an adept fundraiser and began a series of local radio broadcasts.

Smith was also active as a social reformer and union organizer. From his arrival in Louisiana, Smith had admired Huey P. Long. Smith developed a personal relationship with Long when the preacher urged the governor to support legislation to protect homeowners from foreclosures on their mortgages. After Long won election to the U.S. Senate, Smith periodically visited him in Washington. When Long returned to Louisiana, Smith was a constant companion. Smith's political activities brought him into conflict with his congregation and, facing the prospect of dismissal, he resigned. After briefly associating himself with William Dudley Pelley, a fascist who openly based his organization on Adolf Hitler's Nazi Party, Smith joined Long's staff. When, in 1934, Long launched the "Share Our Wealth" crusade, a populist movement to redistribute income and build public projects, Smith became an organizer for the Share Our Wealth Society. Smith's oratorical skills won the admiration of no less an authority than H. L. Mencken, who called him "the greatest rabble-rouser since Peter the Hermit" and "the champion boob-bumper of all epochs." Smith's intense devotion to Long eventually made even "the Kingfish" uncomfortable.

Following Long's assassination in September 1935, Smith appointed himself Long's successor and scrambled to maintain control of the Share Our Wealth movement, but he encountered opposition from other members of the Long machine, most of whom despised him. Immediately after Long's assassination, Smith made sensational charges of conspiracies, and several days after the funeral, his opponents had him arrested for incitement to riot and deported from Louisiana. Unlike Long, who had avoided race baiting, Smith moved the Share Our Wealth movement in the direction of white supremacy. In fact, however, he was leading a movement that no longer existed. He had no funds or base of support. Indeed, he lacked access to the organization's mailing lists or even an office.

Looking for a new movement, Smith then affiliated himself with Dr. Francis E. Townsend, a doctor from California who proposed generous pensions for old people, providing they retired and spent the pensions. This, Townsend argued, would both take care of the elderly and, by increasing purchasing power, end the depression. An ardent opponent of President Franklin Roosevelt, whom he characterized as "Franklin Delano Jewsvelt," Smith joined with Townsend and Father Charles Coughlin, a priest who had a huge radio following for his anti-Semitic ravings, to found the Union Party in 1936. The party nominated William Lemke, a member of Congress from North Dakota, for president. Lemke received fewer than a million votes. After the failure of the Union Party, Smith moved to Detroit and founded the Committee of One Million, a racist, anti-Semitic, and isolationist organization. Following the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Smith, in 1942, founded a racist, pro-fascist paper The Cross and the Flag, which soon found its way onto the Attorney General's list of seditious publications. He also founded the America First party and ran for the U.S. Senate in 1942; he finished a distant third. Smith formed the Christian Nationalist party and ran for president as its candidate in 1944, 1948, and 1956. A fringe candidate, he failed to get on the ballot in most states. Smith founded the Christian Nationalist Crusade in 1947 to realize his dream of “a white, Christian America.” Its platform called for “deportation of Zionists,” the breakup of “Jewish Gestapo organizations,” the deportation of blacks to Africa, and the dissolution of the United Nations.

After the war, Smith toured the nation giving anti-Semitic harangues, for which he drew large crowds. He supported Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY’s (R-Wis.) crusade against communists in government. In 1952, Smith denounced Republican presidential candidate DWIGHT EISENHOWER as “a Swedish Jew” and hence unfit for office. That year, he supported General Douglas MacArthur for president. Vice President RICHARD NIXON’s humble Protestant beginnings and anticommunism appealed to Smith. Running for reelection in 1956, Nixon received Smith’s unsolicited support, which he immediately disavowed.

Smith denounced the Supreme Court’s decisions banning segregation in public schools and asserting constitutional protection for works he deemed pornographic. On many occasions, he demanded that “the pro-criminal, pro-Communist, pro-pornographic Supreme Court must be impeached.” He castigated Congress as “impotent, insipid and cowardly” when it passed civil rights legislation in 1957 and that same year called Senator McCarthy’s death “murder.” Smith characterized himself as “the persecuted victim of a gang of international character assassins” that had destroyed McCarthy, dismissed MacArthur during the Korean conflict, and campaigned to “destroy” the House Un-American Activities Committee.

As the 1950s progressed, Smith devoted himself increasingly to writing. He continued to publish The Cross and the Flag and began a newsletter for his followers. Moving his home base to Los Angeles in 1953, he fulminated against the welfare state, desegregation of the races, and fluoridation of water. Continually appealing for funds from his followers, Smith amassed a fortune by the end of the decade. Some observers speculated that Smith was motivated purely by financial gain. “Religion and patriotism, keep going on that, it’s the only way you can really get them het up,” he said, “and then a fellow like myself . . . will have the people with him hook, line and sinker. I’ll teach them how to hate.”

Smith’s views became even more extreme and his popularity declined in the late 1950s. In 1964, he moved to Eureka Springs, Arkansas, where he erected a seven-story statue of Jesus, the Christ of the Ozarks. He added a Bible museum and a Christian art gallery. In 1968, he began staging an anti-Semitic passion play that aroused considerable controversy. Smith’s entrepreneurship and aggressive fund-raising enabled him to maintain lavish homes in Los Angeles, Tulsa, and Eureka Springs. He died in Los Angeles, California, on April 15, 1976.

—MSM

Smith, H. Alexander

(1880–1966) U.S. senator

The son of a physician, Smith was born in New York City on January 30, 1880. He attended Cutler School in New York City, graduated from Princeton University in 1901, and earned his law degree from Columbia University in 1904. After gaining admission to the New York bar, he suffered an attack of tuberculosis and in 1905 moved to Colorado to regain his health. He opened a law practice there and also pursued interests in mining, public utilities, railroads, and real estate. Deeply influenced by his Princeton professor Woodrow Wilson’s idea of an international organization to prevent wars, Smith joined the League to Enforce Peace. When the United States entered World War I, Smith worked for the Federal Food Administration as HERBERT HOOVER’s assistant. After the war, he participated in Hoover’s European relief program. Smith then returned to Princeton in 1919 as the university’s executive secretary, where he supervised the modernization of the curriculum. He held that post until 1927, when he became a lecturer in the Department of Politics. In 1932, Smith resumed the practice of law with a prestigious New York law firm.

A lifelong Republican, Smith worked for the election of Hoover as president in 1928 and 1932. In 1934, he became the treasurer of the Republican Party of New Jersey and seven years later was elected state party chairman. He was a member of the Republican National Committee from 1942 to 1943. Campaigning on a platform that stressed acceptance of the country's increasing role in world affairs, Smith won election to fill a vacant seat in the U.S. Senate from New Jersey in 1944. He was reelected in 1946 and 1952.

In the Senate, Smith continued to support U.S. involvement in world affairs. He backed American entry into the United Nations and supported the Truman administration on most issues relating to foreign policy, including aid to Greece and Turkey and the Marshall Plan. On the question of policy toward China, however, he broke with the president. Smith joined such supporters of the Nationalist government as Senator WILLIAM KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) in advocating all-out aid to the Nationalists in the civil war against the Communists. When the Nationalist government fell in 1949, Smith joined the so-called China bloc in the Senate that pressed the government to refuse to recognize the Communist regime and to oppose its entry into the UN.

Smith maintained his militant stand on China throughout the Eisenhower administration. He was a member of the steering panel of the Committee of One Million, founded in 1953 to prevent the admission of Communist China to the UN. The following year, he traveled to Taiwan and returned to the United States reporting that Chiang Kai-shek urged the United States to give him the "green light" for an invasion of the mainland. In January 1955, Smith said he would favor a UN blockade of the mainland as a last-ditch action to free U.S. prisoners of war held by the Communists. During the Quemoy and Matsu crisis of 1958, when Communist China renewed shelling the Nationalist-held offshore islands, the senator said the United States should definitely fight to prevent Communist seizure of the islands.

Smith was troubled by the way Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) conducted his anticommunist crusade. While he never publicly attacked McCarthy, he did express support for Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH'S (R-Me.) Declaration of Conscience and did take to the floor of the Senate to defend Ambassador Philip C. Jessup, one of McCarthy's targets. Known as a conciliator in the Senate, Smith sought to moderate calls to censure McCarthy in 1954. On June 15, Senator RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.) announced that within two weeks he would introduce a resolution to censure the Wisconsin Republican. The measure would state that McCarthy's conduct was "unbecoming a member of the United States Senate . . . contrary to senatorial tradition, and tended to bring the Senate into disrepute, and such conduct is thereby condemned." One week later, on July 31, Smith proposed that the Senate discard the Flanders resolution in favor of one providing for a special committee of three Republicans and three Democrats, with Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON as ex-officio chairman, to study "problems created by the fact that there had been infiltration of Communists and others security risks into sensitive positions and the method and procedures employed in exposing and eliminating such security risks." Smith's plan never got off the ground. The following week, Smith, in a television interview, said that the move to censure "had embarrassed" his efforts to get McCarthy to go to Eisenhower with an "offer to work with the government and not against it." Smith, however, voted for the condemnation of the senator in December 1954.

In general, Smith supported the foreign policy of the Eisenhower administration. He differed more frequently with Eisenhower on domestic matters. Smith believed in voluntary desegregation of schools ("You'll never do it with paratroopers," he said.), the right of states to pass right to work laws, and that an expanding national government posed a threat to individual freedom. Quiet, thoughtful, and deeply religious, Smith believed that reform had to come from a spiritual awakening, rather than a coercive central government.

Smith decided not to seek reelection to the Senate in 1958. He then served as special consultant to the secretary of state from 1959 to 1960. In 1959, he attended the Colombo Conference at which he proposed an ambitious American foreign aid program for Asia. Smith then retired from public life. He died in Princeton, New Jersey, on October 27, 1966.

—MSM

Smith, Howard W(orth)

(1883–1976) U.S. congressman; chairman, House Rules Committee

Born in Broad Run, Virginia, on February 2, 1883, Smith attended the Bethel Military Academy and received his Bachelor of Laws degree from the University of Virginia in 1903. After graduating, he practiced law in Alexandria and invested in real estate. He was assistant general counsel to the Alien Property Custodian in 1917 and 1918 and commonwealth attorney of Alexandria from 1918 to 1922. He served as judge of the Alexandria Corporation Court from 1922 to 1928 and judge of the 16th Circuit Court of Virginia from 1928 to 1930. Elected as a Democrat to the House of Representatives in 1930, he won reelection 17 consecutive times before failing to gain the Democratic nomination in 1966.

Judge Smith, as he preferred to be called, established a conservative record in the House. He consistently opposed civil rights legislation and what he regarded as excessive federal spending. By the late 1930s, he became a member of the conservative coalition of southern Democrats and conservative Republicans who resisted the programs of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. The president and labor unions unsuccessfully attempted to defeat Smith in the Democratic primary in 1938. During the 1940s, he became known principally as the author of the Smith Act (1939), which gave the government the right to prosecute anyone advocating the violent overthrow of the U.S. government, and of the Smith-Connally Wartime Labor Disputes Act (1943), which was passed during World War II and limited the right to strike during national emergencies.

In 1955, Smith became chair of the Rules Committee. Often called the "third house" of Congress, this panel determined the length and manner of floor debate on a bill and whether the House should enter into conference with the Senate if the two bodies passed different, but similar, bills. Polls taken by legislators and journalists consistently ranked Smith as one of the most powerful men on Capitol Hill—second only to House Speaker SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.). Smith was often called "the traffic cop of the House" (a term he resented), because he controlled what bills his committee should vote on and whether they should proceed to the floor. He used the Rules Committee's power, its universal reach, and its byzantine procedures to obstruct measures that would have increased Social Security coverage, public housing, and the minimum wage.

Smith used all his legislative skill to block civil rights legislation. He bragged that he had defeated every civil rights measure introduced since the early 1930s. In March 1956, he joined 100 other southern members of Congress in signing the Southern Manifesto. This declaration denounced the Supreme Court's 1954 public school desegregation decision and pledged to fight it through every lawful means. Smith introduced it into the House, where he presented a fiery defense of states rights against federal usurpation of local power. He said that he had "a sacred obligation" to warn his fellow Americans that the decision contravened the Constitution.

In 1956 and 1957, Smith attempted to prevent passage of a civil rights bill backed by the Eisenhower administration. A bill passed the House in 1956, only to die in the Senate. Supporters reintroduced the measure the following year. In August 1957, the House leadership called a meeting with Smith to clear the way for the full chamber to consider the measure. Smith, however, could not be found in Washington. His office finally informed the public that he had needed to return to one of his dairy farms because a barn had burned down. Rayburn humorously stated he knew that Smith would have done anything to prevent a vote on the bill, "but I never suspected he would resort to arson." Smith delayed committee consideration of a civil rights bill for over a month and was finally forced, as a result of a petition from his own committee, to hold hearings. He then arranged for a large number of opponents to testify before his panel in a further attempt to stall the bill. However, because the administration and leaders in the House favored the measure, Smith finally was forced to report it favorably to the House floor. The House passed the bill in June, and it became the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

In 1960, Smith almost succeeded in killing the central portion of another civil rights bill, which provided for voting referees to enroll black voters. He and his fellow southern Democrats supported an amendment supported by liberals in the hope that Republicans would then join them in voting down the whole section. The amended segment of the bill was voted down. However, the Republicans offered a new plan that was similar to the original version. Ultimately, Smith could not prevent passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1960.

A fiscal conservative who opposed the expansion of federal government spending, Smith was more successful in blocking or slowing down legislation related to housing and education. During the last days of the 85th Congress (1957–58), Smith avoided holding hearings on a dozen major bills, including relief to depressed areas and mineral subsidies, by simply disappearing. He returned after a week, saying “he had had some hay on his farm that needed tending.”

In April 1956, the Supreme Court ruled that states had no power to punish persons for advocating the forcible overthrow of the federal government. Smith disagreed with the decision and introduced legislation giving the states the right to pass their own acts. The measure failed.

Smith’s power began to decline in the 1960s. During the Kennedy administration, Speaker Sam Rayburn engineered reforms that enlarged the Rules Committee and changed its procedures, effectively reducing Smith’s power. This paved the way for civil rights and liberal legislation that the aged congressman opposed. After LYNDON B. JOHNSON became president, Smith attempted to kill what became the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by adding an amendment barring sex discrimination. The measure passed with Smith’s amendment. As a result of reapportionment, he lost the primary election in 1966. Smith then resumed his practice of law and tended to his dairy farms. He died in Alexandria, Virginia, on October 3, 1976.

—MSM

Smith, Margaret Chase

(1897–1995) U.S. senator

The daughter of a barber, Margaret Chase was born in Skowhegan, Maine, on December 14, 1897. After graduating from Skowhegan High School in 1916, she taught in a local primary school. In 1917, she began working as a switchboard operator and later as an executive of the local telephone company. Beginning in 1919, she worked in the circulation, advertising, and editorial departments of the Skowhegan Independent Reporter, a weekly newspaper. She left the paper after eight years to become office manager of a local textile mill. In May 1930, Chase married Clyde Harold Smith, a wealthy and prominent Republican 23 years her senior who served in the U.S. House of Representatives from 1936 to 1940. When Representative Smith died in 1940, Margaret Chase Smith won a special election in June 1940 to fill his seat. She was reelected in November 1940, 1942, 1944, and 1946.

In the House, Smith supported military preparedness and an internationalist foreign policy. She voted for the Selective Service Act in 1940 and Lend-Lease in 1941. Later, she voted with the six other congresswomen to defeat the House proposal withdrawing half of the funds for day-care facilities for wartime factory workers. After the war, she continued to support a strong military. Appointed to the new Armed Services Committee in 1947, she fought for the Woman’s Armed Services Integration Act of 1948, which improved the status of women in the military. On purely domestic matters, Smith demonstrated a strong independent streak. Although strongly supported by Maine’s organized labor movement, she voted with other Republicans to override President Truman’s veto of the Taft-Hartley bill in 1947. She had backed the Dies Committee’s investigation of un-American activities in 1945 but did not support the establishment of a permanent House Un-American Activities Committee in 1950.

Smith decided to run for an open seat in the U.S. Senate in 1948 and became the first woman to hold a seat in that body without first having been appointed to it. She won reelection in 1954, 1960, and 1966. In the Senate, Smith became one of the first senators to condemn Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY’s (R-Wis.) anticommunist crusade. She had served with McCarthy on the Executive Expenditures Committee, and they had become good friends. She came to realize, however, that the documents McCarthy often distributed did not support his charges. On June 1, 1950, she made a speech introducing a Declaration of Conscience, a statement attacking McCarthy that she and six other senators had signed. In that speech, she declared that “the greatest deliberative body in the world . . . has . . . been debased to the level of a forum of hate and character assassination sheltered by the shield of congressional immunity.” She concluded that she did not “want to see the Republican Party ride to victory on the four horsemen of calumny—fear, ignorance, bigotry, and smear.” McCarthy responded by sneeringly referring to the signers of the Declaration of Conscience as “Snow White and the Six Dwarfs.” Subsequently, McCarthy supported her opponent in Maine’s Republican primary of 1954, but Smith won by a margin of five to one. That December, Smith voted in favor of censuring the Wisconsin Republican. Perhaps because of these efforts, Lee Mortimer and Jack Lait implied in their book, U.S.A. Confidential, that Smith was pro-communist, an allegation that led Smith to bring a successful suit for libel in 1956. She was awarded $1 million.

An independent senator, Smith joined Republicans in supporting the reduction of funds for the Tennessee Valley Authority and voting for state ownership of offshore oil in 1953. She also backed civil rights legislation supported by the Eisenhower administration in 1957 and 1960. However, Smith voted for the Democratic depressed areas bill in 1959, despite Eisenhower’s opposition. She also voted against LEWIS L. STRAUSS, Eisenhower’s nominee for secretary of commerce, in 1959. Another demonstration of her independence came when she proposed a constitutional amendment in December 1960 providing for the direct nomination and election of the president and the vice president and the elimination of the electoral college.

As an active member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Smith chaired a five-member subcommittee in 1953 to investigate a shortage of ammunition in Korea. Maintaining her support for a strong military, she voted with the Democrats, over Republican objections, for an additional half million dollars for the air force beyond Eisenhower’s request in 1956.

During the administrations of JOHN F. KENNEDY and LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Smith was one of only a few Republicans who generally supported the domestic policies of those administrations. On the other hand, she accused the Kennedy administration of lacking the will to use nuclear weapons when necessary and opposed the nuclear test ban treaty in 1963. The ranking Republican on the Armed Services Committee after 1967, Smith consistently voted for expenditures for the Vietnam War. She answered 2,941 consecutive roll calls in the Senate until a hip operation in 1968 forced her to miss a vote. During the Nixon administration, she opposed the Safeguard antiballistic missile system and the supersonic transport. In 1970, she stated that those on the radical Left who advocated violence and shouted down their opponents posed at least as great a threat as McCarthy and the radical Right had in the early 1950s. Smith was defeated for reelection in November 1972. She died at her home in Skowhegan on May 29, 1995.

—MSM

Smith, Walter Bedell

(1895–1961) undersecretary of state

A descendent of 18th-century settlers, Smith was born in Indianapolis, Indiana, on October 5, 1895. From early childhood, he wanted to be an army officer. A talented but indifferent student, he lacked the record or influence to gain an appointment to West Point. He became a private in the Indiana National Guard in 1911, while attending St. Peter and Paul’s School. Within a year, he became company sergeant and in 1916 went with his unit to participate in the expedition to Mexico. When the United States entered World War I, he went to officer training school and was deployed to France as a second lieutenant. After being wounded in action along the Marne, he was assigned to the Bureau of Military Intelligence in the War Department, the first of a series of staff positions in which he demonstrated exceptional skills as a manager. Promoted to first lieutenant during the war, he received a regular army commission after the passage of the National Defense Act of 1920. During the 1920s, Smith was assigned to the Bureau of the Budget and in 1929 went to the Philippines, where he received his promotion to captain. Advancement came gradually during the interwar years, but at the infantry school Smith impressed Major Omar N. Bradley and General George C. Marshall. He also attended command and general staff school and the Army War College. When George C. Marshall became chief of staff, he named Major Smith to be assistant to the secretary of the general staff. Smith’s loyalty, competence, and willingness to accept responsibility greatly impressed Marshall. Promoted to lieutenant colonel and then to colonel, Smith became secretary to the general staff in September 1941. He was a brigadier general in 1942, when he became General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's chief of staff. Promoted to major general, Smith oversaw Eisenhower's headquarters and managed the staff. Brusque and irascible, Smith's personality differed markedly from that of the genial and generally conciliatory Eisenhower. The two men developed a close relationship and made a formidable team. Smith served as Eisenhower's sounding board, trusted confidante, and troubleshooter. He helped to plan and coordinate the invasions of North Africa and Italy, and in 1943 he negotiated the surrender of Italy. Promoted to lieutenant general in early 1944, Smith helped plan the invasion of France later that year. Eisenhower assigned him responsibility for negotiating the surrender of Nazi Germany. Immediately following World War II, Smith served as the chief of staff of the American occupation forces in Germany. He returned to Washington in January 1946 as chief of the Operations and Planning Division of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

In February 1946, President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed Smith ambassador to the Soviet Union, an experience he later described in his book My Three Years in Moscow (1950). His time in the Soviet Union turned Smith into a hard-line cold warrior. He returned home in 1949 to resume his military career as commander of the first army. In September 1950, Truman appointed him head of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

Smith resigned from the CIA in 1953 to become undersecretary of state. Because JOHN FOSTER DULLES focused on formulating policy and traveling abroad, Smith held the major responsibility for administering the State Department. He expected to function as a close adviser to Eisenhower and to have substantial influence on the administration's foreign policy, but Dulles's centralization of decision making in his own hands frustrated Smith's expectations.

In spring 1954, Smith headed the National Security Council's Special Committee on the United States and Indochina, formed to study the American response to the deteriorating situation in French Indochina. By that time, the French had concluded that without massive American aid the beleaguered fortress of Dien Bien Phu would fall to the Viet Minh. The committee issued a report advocating equipping and training an effective force drawn from the people of the associated states and recommending the creation of a mutual Asian defense treaty, underwritten by the major Western powers, to protect Southeast Asia from further communist aggression. The report contributed to the decision to create the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization later that year.

Desperate to maintain the post at Dien Bien Phu, the French chief of staff, General Paul Henry Ely, asked Eisenhower for direct American military intervention in March. In early April, Eisenhower held a meeting with five of his most trusted advisers to discuss Indochina. Smith, joined by Dulles and Admiral ARTHUR W. RADFORD, argued for American military intervention, if the conditions Eisenhower had set were met. Those conditions involved the use of a multinational force, including Asian forces from the Philippines and Thailand, and French guarantees of independence for the associated states.

In an interview with CBS television on April 11, Smith explained the importance of Indochina for American strategy and economic interests in Asia. If this area fell to the communists, he predicted, the other free states would fall like dominoes to the enemy. Many observers considered Smith to be one of the leading hawks in the administration.

With the opening of the Geneva Conference on Korea and Indochina on April 26, and the fall of Dien Bien Phu on May 7, 1954, Smith privately conceded that Vietnam would be partitioned into a communist-controlled northern zone and a Western-dominated southern area. Smith succeeded Dulles as head of the U.S. delegation to the Geneva Conference. He was instructed to play a passive role and not approve any settlement that would turn territory over to the communists. He announced that the United States "took note" of the Geneva settlement on July 24 that temporarily partitioned Vietnam until free elections could be held.

Smith resigned from the State Department in October 1954 and became vice president of the American Machine and Foundry Company. He continued to serve as an unofficial adviser to Eisenhower and Dulles on disarmament matters, was appointed to a committee to study mutual security, and served on a number of corporate boards. He also wrote a second book, Eisenhower's Six Great Decisions: Europe 1944–1945, published in 1956. Smith died in Washington, D.C., on August 9, 1961.

—MSM

Smylie, Robert E.

(1914–2004) governor of Idaho

Born in Marcus, Idaho, on October 31, 1914, Robert E. Smylie graduated from the College of Idaho in 1938 and earned a law degree at George Washington University in 1942. Following service in the coast guard during World War II, he practiced law and became active in Republican politics in Idaho. He became deputy attorney general in 1947. Later that year, the attorney general, Robert Ailshie, died, and the governor of Idaho appointed Smylie to complete Ailshie's term. A year later, Smylie won election to the office and served until 1954. In office, he became deeply involved in the controversy over private versus federal development of a hydroelectric dam in Hell's Canyon on the Snake River.

During the early years of the Eisenhower administration, Smylie emerged as a prominent critic of federal development of hydroelectric power. He opposed the federal plan for a high dam, because he feared that the loss of state control of water rights would result in the diversion of water to neighboring states and because the giant dam would despoil the scenic Hell's Canyon area. Smylie favored the private development of three smaller dams spread along the Snake River. He faced opposition from other governors in the Northwest, powerful members of Congress from Idaho, and Oregon's senator WAYNE MORSE (Ind.-Oreg.), who argued that the dam was necessary for a cheap hydroelectric power system throughout the Northwest. In 1954, Smylie ran for governor of Idaho on a plank opposing the dam. In a state more concerned with water rights than cheap electrical power, Smylie won the election by 50,000 votes.

As governor, Smylie continued to oppose the dam. In hearings before the Senate Interior Committee in April 1955, he testified that federal development would be "tragic" and called for its "swift rejection," declaring that "75 percent of the people of Idaho" agreed with his position. A year later, in July 1956, the Senate killed the bill that would have authorized a federal hydroelectric plant at Hell's Canyon.

Smylie went on to serve two more terms as governor. During his last term, he obtained passage of a sales tax to support local schools, extended the state's parks and recreation program, and established a water resources board. He opposed gambling in Idaho, but the state legislature passed a measure providing for pari-mutuel betting over his veto. Smylie opposed Senator BARRY GOLDWATER'S (R-Ariz.) bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 1964. After Goldwater won the nomination, Smylie supported him only reluctantly. After Goldwater's devastating defeat, Smylie attempted to oust Dean Burch, a supporter of Goldwater, as head of the Republican National Committee. Burch subsequently resigned. Smylie's more activist agenda and his opposition to Goldwater earned him the ire of conservative Republicans in Idaho, and he lost the 1966 Republican nomination to Don Samuelson, a relative unknown. After his term expired, Smylie retired to his legal practice in Boise. He served as trustee, chair of trustees, and acting president of the University of Idaho. Smylie died in Boise on July 17, 2004.

—MSM

Sobell, Morton

(1917–) convicted espionage agent

Born in New York City on April 11, 1917, Sobell attended City College of New York, where he was friendly with JULIUS ROSENBERG, Joel Barr, Alfred Sarant, and Max Elitcher. After graduating in 1938, he moved to Washington, D.C., to work for the navy Bureau of Ordinance. He earned an M.A. in electrical engineering from the University of Michigan in 1942, returned briefly to the navy, and then moved to Schenectady, N.Y., to work for the General Electric Company. Later, he and his family returned to New York City, where he did research for the Reeves Instrument Company, which held government contracts for classified work.

In 1950, following the arrests and confessions of Klaus Fuchs, a British physicist who had worked on the Manhattan Project, and his courier, Harry Gold, the Soviets alerted key members of Rosenberg's espionage ring. Two of them, Barr and Sarant, fled to Europe and later to the Soviet Union. Sobell fled with his family to Mexico, where he was arrested in August 1950 and turned over to American authorities, who charged him with conspiracy to commit espionage. Although not accused of activities related to espionage at Los Alamos, he was tried with Julius and ETHEL ROSENBERG. At the trial, evidence against him fell into two areas: testimony that he was involved in an espionage apparatus with the Rosenbergs and charges that he and his family took flight to Mexico in order to avoid his own arrest. The case against Sobell depended heavily on the testimony of Elitcher, another alleged conspirator, a former communist, and a former friend of Sobell, whom Rosenberg had recruited in 1944. Elitcher had been a high school friend of Sobell and a college classmate of Sobell and Julius Rosenberg. Sobell had invited Elitcher to join the Young Communist League (the branch was organized by Julius Rosenberg). Elitcher testified that he had accompanied Sobell on a trip to deliver material to Julius Rosenberg. He also testified that Sobell and Rosenberg had attempted to recruit him to the Communist Party and to espionage and that Sobell had asked him for classified pamphlets relating to an antisubmarine device the navy Bureau of Ordinance was developing. Lawyers for the defense did not effectively discredit Elitcher's testimony. Letters Sobell wrote from Mexico and reports of his activities there also proved damaging to him. He used a variety of aliases and, after the arrest of the Rosenbergs became public on July 18, he cashed in his family's return airplane tickets and attempted to book passage to Europe on a ship. Later, he maintained that he had been kidnaped in Mexico and delivered illegally to FBI agents at the border. Sobell was found guilty, along with the Rosenbergs, and given a maximum 30-year sentence.

From the moment of his arrest, Sobell steadfastly asserted his innocence. Many who believed the Rosenbergs had been unjustly convicted also believed that Sobell had suffered abuse at the hands of the law. In fact, many people who thought the Rosenbergs guilty still claimed that he had not received a fair trial. After the execution of the Rosenbergs, money and legal efforts that had been devoted to their defense was used to aid the Committee to Free Morton Sobell (an organization led by his wife, Helen).

On the advice of his lawyers, Sobell never testified on his own behalf during the original trial. In 1953, he regretted that action. He submitted to the Court of Appeals (which had previously upheld his conviction by a 2-1 vote) an affidavit detailing his activities before he left the United States and after he arrived in Mexico. Again he denied any involvement in espionage and challenged the government to verify his own account of events. The court rejected his appeal. Sobell learned of the rejection from a cell in Alcatraz Federal Penitentiary, where he had been transferred in late 1952. His supporters charged that the government placed him in one of the nation's most notorious prisons in order to induce him to confess to nonexistent crimes.

In 1957, the Supreme Court refused for the eighth time to review Sobell's case. The following year, he was transferred from Alcatraz to the Atlanta Penitentiary, a medium security facility. In 1963, he moved to a prison in Springfield, Missouri, for medical treatment, and in 1965 he was transferred to the federal facility in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania.

President JOHN F. KENNEDY received an appeal for clemency on behalf of Sobell that included the names and statements of MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., Senator LEE METCALF (D-Mont.), REINHOLD NIEBUHR, scientist Harold Urey, and historian Maxwell Geismar. Kennedy declined to grant clemency.

In 1962, Sobell became eligible for parole; but it was refused. After serving 17 years and 9 months in prison, he was released in 1969 with time off for good behavior. He again faced court proceedings in 1971, when his parole board denied him permission to attend anti-Vietnam War demonstrations or speak before a communist-sponsored group. Sobell filed suit, charging violation of his constitutional rights. Terming the parole board's reasons for denial "silly," a federal judge decided for Sobell. In 1974, Sobell wrote On Doing Time, a book describing the background of his case and his experiences in federal prisons. He returned to school to update his education and training and then worked as an engineer in medical electronics. In their book, The Rosenberg File (1983), Ronald Radosh and Joyce Milton concluded that "though by no means the complete innocent he has always publicly claimed to be, Morton Sobell was a peripheral figure in Rosenberg's espionage ring." Sobell continued to maintain his innocence, even after release of the Venona intercepts in 1995, which appeared conclusively to identify him as a Soviet spy. In Engineering Communism: How Two Americans Spied for Stalin and Founded the Soviet Silicon Valley (2005), Steven T. Usdin, a writer on science policy, argued convincingly that Barr, Salant, and Sobell passed to the Soviets technology that proved "extremely valuable to the USSR, especially during the early years of the cold war." In September 2008, Sobell admitted to an interviewer that he had been a spy.

Sobeloff, Simon E(rnest)

(1894–1973) U.S. solicitor general, court of appeals judge

The son of Russian Jewish immigrants, Sobeloff was born in Baltimore, Maryland, on December 3, 1894. At the age of 12, he went to work in the law office of William F. Broening. After serving as a page in the U.S. House of Representatives, he attended Loyola College in Baltimore from 1911 to 1912 and graduated from the University of Maryland School of Law in 1915. While still in law school, Sobeloff clerked for the chief judge of the supreme bench of Baltimore and was admitted to the bar in 1914. After graduating, he began to practice law. Over the next 25 years, Sobeloff established a successful private legal practice, which was frequently interrupted by his appointment to public positions. He served as assistant city solicitor in Baltimore (1919–23), as deputy city solicitor (1927–31), and as U.S. attorney for Maryland (1931–34). Although he returned to private practice in 1934, he continued public service in a number of capacities. He remained on the unemployment commission and served as labor arbitrator for the garment industry in Baltimore. An outspoken opponent of racial discrimination, Sobeloff testified before Congress in support of a federal antilynching bill in 1934. The following year, Judge Eugene O'Dunne appointed him to investigate the failure of the Baltimore Trust Company.

Sobeloff was a close friend and adviser of THEODORE ROOSEVELT MCKELDIN, a rising liberal Republican politician, and when McKeldin became mayor of Baltimore in 1943, he chose Sobeloff as city solicitor. After the Democrats won the city elections in 1947, the new mayor prevailed on Sobeloff to remain as city solicitor. Later in the year, Sobeloff returned to private practice, but he continued to serve as counsel to the Baltimore Housing Authority and as a legal consultant to the mayor. Sobeloff took an active role in McKeldin's campaign for governor of Maryland in 1950. After McKeldin won the election, Sobeloff served as "first minister" in the governor's "kitchen cabinet," and McKeldin appointed Sobeloff to head a special commission on the reorganization of state government. In April 1952, McKeldin and Sobeloff went to Paris to urge General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to seek the Republican nomination that year. That summer, Sobeloff wrote the speech with which McKeldin nominated Eisenhower at the Republican National Convention. Eisenhower won the Republican nomination and went on to defeat ADLAI E. STEVENSON in the general election. In December 1952, McKeldin appointed Sobeloff chief judge of the Maryland court of appeals, the state's highest court.

Eisenhower nominated Sobeloff to be solicitor general of the United States in January 1954, and the Senate confirmed the nomination on February 25. As solicitor general, Sobeloff represented the federal government before the Supreme Court and decided which cases to appeal from lower to higher federal courts. In 1955, Sobeloff presented the government's case regarding the implementation of Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which held segregated public schools unconstitutional. In that decision, the Court had called for further argument on how to implement its ruling. The solicitor general proposed a plan that gave local school boards primary responsibility for developing desegregation plans, which would then be reviewed by the district courts. The government's plan further recommended that the Supreme Court should instruct district judges to approve programs for gradual integration as long as they made a prompt and reasonable start toward desegregation. At the same time, Sobeloff contended, district courts should be instructed not to let local officials frustrate the process of school desegregation. In its decision of May 31, 1955, known as Brown II, the Supreme Court unanimously adopted a position very similar to that put forward by Sobeloff, but it did not include the government's suggestion of a 90-day deadline for school districts to propose an acceptable plan to desegregate.

Swearing-in of Simon E. Sobeloff as solicitor general of the United States, February 25, 1954 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Sobeloff split with the administration over the issue of internal security. He overruled attorneys who wanted to appeal a district judge's dismissal of the indictment of Owen Lattimore, a professor at Johns Hopkins and expert on Asia who had been indicted for perjury after his testimony before a congressional committee. Sobeloff came into direct conflict with the administration over the case of John P. Peters, a professor of medicine at Yale University who had been a consultant to the U.S. Public Health Service until dismissed as a security risk under the Truman administration's loyalty program. After Peters was cleared by the agency's loyalty board, the Civil Service Commission Loyalty Review Board reviewed the matter and recommended Peters's dismissal. The board refused to reveal the source or nature of the information it had against Peters, and the doctor challenged the board's procedures in court. Skeptical about the evidence against Peters and dissatisfied with the procedures, Sobeloff proposed that the government confess error. When the administration decided to press the case, Sobeloff refused to argue the government's position. Although Sobeloff defended the government's position in other loyalty and security cases, he refused to do so in this instance because he considered the board's methods a violation of due process. Assistant Attorney General WARREN E. BURGER argued for the government. The Supreme Court decided the case in Peters's favor in June 1955 but did so on narrow, technical grounds.

On July 14, 1955, Eisenhower nominated Sobeloff to a judgeship on the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, which included Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina. Southern Democratic senators, led by Olin D. Johnston (D-S.C.), opposed the appointment because of Sobeloff's opposition to segregation and his participation in the Brown case. They managed to prevent action on the nomination until Congress adjourned. Eisenhower resubmitted the nomination in 1956. After a long and bitter confirmation battle, the Senate finally approved Sobeloff's nomination on July 16, 1956, by a vote of 64-19. The only opposition came from southern Democrats and four right-wing Republicans (JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY [R-Wis.], WILLIAM JENNER [R-Ind.], HERMAN WELKER [R-Idaho], and JOHN J. WILLIAMS [R-Del.]) who resented his role in the Peters case. Sobeloff was sworn in as a circuit court judge on July 19 and became chief judge of the Fourth Circuit in March 1958.

During his 17-year tenure on the Fourth Circuit, his opinions broke new ground in criminal justice reform, legislative reapportionment, and civil rights. In the many school desegregation cases heard by the Fourth Circuit in the late 1950s, Sobeloff voted regularly to sustain district court orders mandating the admission of black pupils to previously all-white schools. In September 1958, he refused to stay three such desegregation orders for Warren County, Charlottesville, and Norfolk, Virginia. Governor J. LINDSAY ALMOND, JR., closed the schools in those districts, in accordance with the state's "massive resistance" laws. Sobeloff sat on the three-judge federal court that held the Virginia school closing laws unconstitutional on January 19, 1959. Token school desegregation followed shortly thereafter in several Virginia communities.

In other types of cases, Sobeloff consistently demonstrated a concern for protecting individual rights, and he gained recognition as a forceful advocate of civil libertarian principles. He was highly regarded by fellow jurists and lawyers, who respected his legal learning, his clear and vigorous legal prose, and his judicious approach to cases.

Sobeloff led the Fourth Circuit away from the position that the Supreme Court had mandated desegregation, not integration. During the 1960s, he became frustrated with the slow pace of school desegregation and demonstrated increasing willingness to overturn evasive local laws as well as to insist on full and immediate, rather than partial and gradual, compliance with Brown. He resigned as chief judge in December 1964 when he reached the mandatory retirement age of 70, but he remained a fully active member of the court. His last opinion in a civil rights case was a dissent in Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education (1970), in which he voted to uphold the first use of court-ordered busing to achieve integration. The Supreme Court adopted his position the following year. Sobeloff became a senior circuit judge in 1971 and died in Baltimore on July 11, 1973.

—MSM

Sparkman, John J(ackson)

(1899–1985) U.S. senator; chairman, Senate Select Small Business Committee; chairman, Housing Subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee

The son of a sharecropper, Sparkman was born in Morgan County, Alabama, on December 20, 1899. He worked his way through college and law school. After enrolling at the University of Alabama in 1916, he enlisted in the U.S. Army in 1918 and later joined the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. He returned to the University of Alabama and earned a B.A. in 1921, an LL.B. in 1923, and an M.A. in history and political science in 1924. Admitted to the bar in 1925, he established a law practice in Huntsville, Alabama. In 1936, he won election to the House of Representatives, where he supported most New Deal programs. He was particularly interested in the creation of the Tennessee Valley Authority, which played a major role in the development of northern Alabama, the region he represented.

In 1946, Sparkman won a special election to fill a Senate vacancy created by the death of Senator John H. Bankhead (D-Ala.). He was reelected in 1948, 1954, 1960, 1966, and 1972. Unlike most southern Democrats, Sparkman supported President HARRY S. TRUMAN's Fair Deal. As a member of the Joint Committee on Housing and as chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee's Housing Subcommittee, he played a key role in the passage of almost all housing legislation during the late 1940s, the 1950s, and the early 1960s. He voted against overriding Truman's veto of the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947 and consistently supported the Small Business Administration. In foreign policy, he backed aid to Greece and Turkey, the Marshall Plan, and the North Atlantic Treaty.

A strong segregationist, Sparkman refused to support Truman's civil rights program. He opposed the inclusion of the controversial civil rights plan in the 1948 Democratic platform and supported STROM THURMOND's candidacy on the States Rights Party (Dixiecrat) ticket. Following the election, he helped bring the southern insurgents back into the Democratic Party.

At the Democratic National Convention in 1952, Sparkman played an important role in crafting a civil rights plank that appeased both supporters of civil rights and segregationists. Sparkman declared that the plank "represents as near a meeting of the minds as we can work out." Impressed by Sparkman's work on the platform, ADLAI STEVENSON, the presidential nominee, chose Sparkman to be the Democratic Party's vice presidential candidate in 1952. In choosing Sparkman, Stevenson hoped to retain the loyalty of the South and to satisfy liberals, many of whom accepted Sparkman because of his support for New Deal and Fair Deal legislation. During the campaign, Sparkman made 400 speeches and traveled 36,000 miles. He defended the party's ambiguous civil rights plank, which called on the federal government to "exercise the powers vested in it by the Constitution" to end discrimination in employment and protect African Americans from intimidation. Nevertheless, he refused to commit himself to aid efforts to curb Senate filibusters or back a fair employment practices commission.

Sparkman spent a large portion of his campaign defending the Truman administration against charges of corruption and of tolerating subversives in government. Attempting to counter accusations that Truman had been soft on communism,

Sparkman quoted a 1945 statement by Republican candidate DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER that "nothing guides Russian policy so much as the desire for friendship with the U.S." Sparkman added that "there are more Communist infiltrators from Eisenhower's own Columbia University than from any other school in the U.S." He criticized the Republican candidate for associating with Senators WILLIAM JENNER (R-Ind.) and JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), the two major critics of Eisenhower's former commander General George C. Marshall. Sparkman expressed confidence that America would not "stomach a crusade" that included such men. When the Republican candidate for the vice presidency, RICHARD NIXON, faced charges that he had a secret political fund, Nixon noted that Sparkman employed his wife on his Senate staff. The Alabama senator angrily replied that his wife earned "every dollar she got."

Following the defeat of the Democratic ticket, Sparkman returned to the Senate as one of the most respected leaders of the Democratic Party. He played a leading role in the controversy over Eisenhower's nomination of CHARLES BOHLEN as ambassador to the Soviet Union in 1953. The Republican right, led by McCarthy and Jenner, contended that the diplomat had been involved in the alleged "sell-out of Eastern Europe" during the Yalta Conference and implied that the State Department was covering up evidence of disloyalty found in his security record. Sparkman and Senator ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) were chosen to review the record. After examining the files, the two men informed the Senate that Bohlen had no subversive ties. The nomination was then confirmed.

As one of the senior members of the Foreign Relations Committee, Sparkman frequently criticized the administration's diplomacy. In spring 1954, he charged that the Geneva Conference on Indochina, which partitioned Vietnam, was a surrender of Southeast Asia to the communists. During the Quemoy-Matsu crisis in the fall of the same year, Sparkman warned that a possible blockade of the mainland, contemplated by some members of the administration, would invite war. He labeled Eisenhower's handling of the Suez Crisis in 1956 the worst diplomatic disaster in memory. In 1957, he did support the Eisenhower Doctrine, which gave the president the right to use troops to aid Middle Eastern nations threatened by communists. At the same time, however, Sparkman argued that economic help was more important in ensuring political stability in the area.

As chair of the Senate Small Business Committee and the Housing Subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, Sparkman supported federal aid for small businesses and increased government spending on housing. He lobbied for corporate income tax relief and the establishment of a federally insured loan program to help small businesses. During the recession of 1958 and 1959, Sparkman advocated an ambitious housing program to stimulate the economy and improve the housing of the poor. He charged that the administration had abandoned the plan, set up during the Truman years, to provide decent housing for all. In March 1958, he introduced an emergency housing bill designed to stimulate residential construction. The legislation gave the Federal National Mortgage Association $1 billion to buy Federal Housing Association and Veterans Administration insured mortgages and extend Veterans Administration mortgages and loan programs. The president signed the bill, with some reluctance, in April. The following year, Sparkman submitted an ambitious omnibus housing bill that focused on urban renewal and the stimulation of construction of rental as well as private housing units. However, the majority leader, Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.) oversaw the introduction of major cuts on the Senate floor in an effort to avoid a presidential veto. Despite the cuts, Eisenhower vetoed the bill as too costly.

During the Eisenhower administration, Sparkman continued to oppose civil rights for African Americans. He joined 100 other southern members of Congress in signing the Southern Manifesto, which denounced the Supreme Court's decision striking down segregated public schools and pledged to reverse it by "all lawful means." Sparkman opposed civil rights legislation in 1957 and 1960. In 1957, he supported successful attempts to weaken the administration's civil rights bill by deleting authority for the attorney general to file civil suits to further desegregation and by including a proposal to provide a jury trial for those charged with contempt for violating court orders protecting black voting rights. In 1959, he voted against modifying Rule 22, which dealt with the procedures for filibusters.

Sparkman remained active in national Democratic politics during the 1950s. In early 1956, he endorsed Stevenson's presidential candidacy. In March, the Democratic National Committee requested that the senator respond to Eisenhower's announcement that he would seek a second term in spite of his recent illness. Sparkman raised the possibility that Eisenhower would be a part-time president and that much power would be delegated to appointed officials. This, he said, would demote the office of president and play havoc with the separation of powers under the Constitution. He urged his audience to "think carefully" before "allowing such a fundamental change."

In the 1960s, Sparkman opposed Medicare and Medicaid as too costly. He supported the war in Vietnam and attacked antiwar protestors for treasonously obstructing the American military effort. During the late 1960s and early 1970s, Sparkman became one of the most powerful Democratic senators. He assumed the chair of the Banking Committee in 1967, and in 1975 he succeeded Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.) as head of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Sparkman did not stand for reelection in 1978. He died in Huntsville, Alabama, on November 16, 1985.

—MSM

Spellman, Francis Cardinal

(1889–1967) Roman Catholic archbishop of New York

The son of a grocery store proprietor, Spellman was born in Whitman, Massachusetts, on May 4, 1889. After attending public schools and graduating from Fordham College in New York in 1911, he entered the seminary and was sent to the North American College in Rome. Awarded a doctorate in theology and ordained a Roman Catholic priest in 1916, he returned to Boston, first as a pastor (from 1916 to 1918) and then as a member of the staff of the diocesan newspaper, The Pilot. Spellman became a member of the chancery staff in 1922 and archivist of the archdiocese in 1924. He went to Rome in 1925, where he was named director of the Knights of Columbus playgrounds in Rome and appointed an official of the congregation for the Extraordinary Affairs of the Church. Named auxiliary bishop of Boston in 1932, Spellman clashed repeatedly with the archbishop. His close relationship with the new pope, Pius XII, led to Spellman's appointment as the archbishop of New York in 1939. With the outbreak of World War II, Spellman played a central role in establishing a diplomatic relationship between the United States and the Holy See in Rome. In late 1939, he was named vicar for U.S. armed forces. After the United States entered the war, Spellman took on the role of mobilizing Catholic support for the war effort. Pius XII named him a cardinal in 1946.

After the war, Spellman, a theological conservative, became a determined and outspoken enemy of communism. He also emerged as one of the most powerful clergymen in America. During the postwar period, as Catholics moved rapidly into the middle class and took a more prominent role in national politics, his influence increased. A successful fund-raiser, he built churches and schools in New York and helped finance Catholic missionary work abroad. The cardinal also distributed money for relief of refugees from communist-controlled areas. As vicar-general of the U.S. armed forces, he visited American troops around the world and was often identified with the interests of the American military.

Spellman opposed communist expansion in Eastern Europe and Asia. During the Eisenhower administration, he was particularly concerned about preventing a communist takeover of Indochina. In a speech given before the American Legion National Convention in August 1954, Spellman condemned the Geneva Accords of July 1954, which partitioned Vietnam. He labeled the truce "taps for the buried hopes of freedom in Southeast Asia," and he warned that it was a further step toward the communist goal of total world domination. On a visit to South Vietnam in January 1955, he brought with him a check for $100,000 to help the refugees who had fled from the North. In that same year, with the assistance of Joseph Kennedy, Spellman helped influence the Eisenhower administration to support South Vietnam's premier, Ngo Dinh Diem.

The cardinal also supported the pro-American government of Syngman Rhee in South Korea.

Beginning in 1951, Spellman flew to Korea each Christmas to offer encouragement to American soldiers stationed there. In January 1956, he described Korea as "the most difficult theater of defense against atheistic forces."

Opposed to any attempts toward peaceful coexistence with the Soviet Union, Spellman feared that any lack of vigilance on the part of the United States would lead to a communist takeover. In September 1959, one week before the Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev arrived on a visit to the United States, the cardinal summoned the archdiocese to participate in an hour of prayer for America. Moscow did not take Spellman's attacks in silence; he was often a target for Soviet invective.

Spellman's anticommunism led him to embrace Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY'S (R-Wis.) anti-communist crusade and to defend him against his critics. In an address in Brussels, delivered in October 1953, the cardinal rebuked European critics of McCarthyism and said that Americans would not be dissuaded from their determination to root out communist subversives. In April 1954, during a communion breakfast at which McCarthy was present, Spellman complimented the senator for his exposure of communists. The cardinal continued his support of the senator even after the Senate voted to condemn him in December 1954.

A vigorous opponent of what he considered to be pornography, Spellman called on Catholics to boycott several motion pictures. In December 1956, the cardinal, in one of his rare addresses from the pulpit of St. Patrick's Cathedral, denounced a film called Baby Doll and exhorted Catholics to refrain from viewing it.

During the 1960s, Spellman participated in the Second Vatican Council and was elected one of its 10 presidents. The most active American prelate at the proceedings, he played an instrumental role in securing an official declaration on religious liberty. At home, the cardinal became involved in the battles surrounding federal aid to education and the Supreme Court's decision banning organized prayer in the public schools. His strong support of the Vietnam War brought him into conflict both with Pope Paul VI and with Catholic antiwar activists in the United States. Despite their disagreement, Pope Paul refused Spellman's offer in October 1966 to resign as archbishop because of his age. The cardinal died in New York City of a stroke on December 2, 1967.

—MSM

Stanley, Thomas B(ahnson)

(1890–1970) governor of Virginia

Born on July 16, 1890, near Spencer, Virginia, and raised on a small tobacco farm, Thomas Stanley received a degree in accounting from Eastern Business College in Poughkeepsie, N.Y. He established a furniture manufacturing firm in conservative southern Virginia in 1924. The town that grew up around it bears his name. Stanley won election to the Virginia House of Delegates in 1930 and became its speaker in 1942. A member of the conservative Byrd organization that dominated Virginia politics, he won a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives in 1946. Reelected twice, he opposed a large part of President HARRY S. TRUMAN's Fair Deal legislation.

At the request of Senator HARRY BYRD (D-Va.), Stanley resigned from Congress to run for governor in 1953. Campaigning on a platform that pledged the continuation of the poll tax, a pay-as-you-go balanced budget, and an adherence to the Byrd machine's conservative principles, he beat back the Republicans' strongest challenge of the century.

As governor, Stanley became embroiled in the controversy that followed the Supreme Court's decision striking down segregated public schools. In response to the decision, Stanley initially counseled moderation and announced he would work toward a plan acceptable to Virginians while obeying the Court's edict. At the same time, he set about subverting the Court's decision. He summoned black leaders to Richmond and asked them to reject integration. They refused. Segregationists mobilized, and members of the state legislature demanded that the governor take a more forceful position in opposition to the Court's decision. Even more important, Byrd pressed the governor to take a stronger stand against desegregation. In June 1954, Stanley announced he would "use every legal means at my command to proclaim resistance to the court order" and promoted repeal of the state's constitutional provision requiring that the state maintain a public school system.

With segregationist sentiment hardening, in August he appointed a Commission on Public Education to study the problem. The panel, weighted with political regulars and conservatives, was headed by state senator Garland Gray, a leading member of the Byrd organization and a militant segregationist. In January 1955, the Gray Commission, as the panel became known, issued a preliminary report. It declared that the majority of Virginians opposed racial integration of public schools and advised the governor that the commission would develop a program to prevent it. In November 1955, the Gray Commission recommended legislation that vested authority for pupil placement with local school boards. It also proposed legislation exempting children assigned to integrated schools from compulsory attendance laws. Finally, the commission recommended that parents who objected to their children attending integrated schools be eligible for tuition grants to help their children attend private schools. Stanley praised the plan and convened the state legislature to approve the tuition grants. This required amending the state's constitution, and a referendum was scheduled for January 1956. Voters overwhelmingly approved the amendment, and Byrd interpreted the results as total endorsement of segregation.

During the early months of 1956, segregationist forces gained momentum within the state. Powerful leaders in the Byrd organization, including Stanley, demanded a showdown with the Supreme Court and a rejection of what they termed its illegal demand for desegregation. Along with other leaders of the Byrd organization, Stanley adopted interposition, a doctrine that called on states to interpose their authority between their citizens and unconstitutional decisions of the Supreme Court. Stanley called a conference of southern governors at Richmond, Virginia, in January 1956, at which he endorsed a resolution calling on states to interpose their sovereignty between the federal government and local school boards to prevent desegregation. Virginia's general assembly adopted an interposition resolution in February 1956.

In July, Stanley reversed himself, rejecting the local-option features of the Gray Commission's report as conducive to integration. Rent with internal dissension, the commission also rejected its own report. Stanley convened a special session of the legislature in August 1956. He recommended 13 anti-integration bills, including a controversial proposal empowering the governor to close integrated schools. The state would provide funding for the private education of students and for the salaries of teachers and principals displaced by the closing of their schools. The legislation permitted city councils of closed schools to petition the governor to reopen the schools but denied state funding to integrated schools. The state legislature enacted the governor's anti-integration program. The program led to the actual closing of some schools in the state and was eventually struck down by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals.

After his term as governor expired in January 1958, Stanley returned to his furniture manufacturing business. He was director of First National Bank of Bassett, Virginia, and chaired a commission to study state and local taxes. Stanley died in Martinsville, Virginia, on July 11, 1970.

—MSM

Stanton, Frank

(1908–2006) president, Columbia Broadcasting System

The son of an industrial arts teacher, Stanton was born in Muskegon, Michigan, on March 20, 1908. He grew up in Dayton, Ohio, and received his B.A. from Ohio Wesleyan in 1930. He earned a M.A. (1932) and Ph.D. (1935) in psychology from Ohio State University. While in graduate school, Stanton invented a device that could be installed inside a radio receiver to keep track of what programs it played. This so impressed an executive at the Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS) that he offered Stanton a job in the research department. As director of research at CBS between 1938 and 1945, he worked closely with and helped support the work of sociologist Paul Lazarsfeld, a pioneer in public opinion calculation and social statistics. Stanton became vice president and general manager of CBS in 1945 and president in 1946. Although the chairman of CBS and its founder, William F. Paley, remained the ultimate arbiter of power, Stanton administered the network at a time of its expansion into television. Stanton saw the potential of television earlier than Paley did; although, for his own part, Stanton cared little for show business and discounted RCA's huge investments in color TV. Under pressure from advertisers and pressure groups, Stanton approved requiring employees of CBS to take an oath of loyalty to the U.S. government. He also created a security office to investigate the political leanings of employees.

Unlike Paley, Stanton maintained a high visibility. In May 1954, during the Senate hearings on UHF-VHF stations, Stanton defended VHF (Channels 2–13) against charges made by the struggling UHF station operators. (CBS owned five VHF stations in five of the largest markets.) He attacked PAY-TV saying television could not long survive “half fee, half free.” An articulate and forceful speaker, he repeatedly defended the national networks whenever Congress proposed regulating them. To critics of TV program content, both in the Congress and elsewhere, Stanton countered that “a program in which a large portion of the audience is interested is by that very fact . . . in the public interest.”

Like its competition, CBS had standardized its TV programming by the late 1950s. Predominantly live shows gave way to film. I Love Lucy, a CBS program, set an industry pattern for situation comedy, as did The Honeymooners, which CBS won away from the doomed DuMont network.

In the 1950s, CBS News, once the industry leader, lost ground to the National Broadcasting Company (NBC). See It Now, coproduced by EDWARD R. MURROW, began to lose sponsors and lost its regular time slot after the 1954–55 season. Unlike DuMont and the American Broadcasting Company, CBS did not cover the Army-McCarthy hearings. Stanton later tried, unsuccessfully, to secure broadcast rights to the Senate hearings on McCarthy's censure.

In 1959, following revelations that producers had rigged the popular quiz show, The $64,000 Question, Stanton forced the executive in charge of the program to resign and canceled other quiz shows on the network. The quiz show scandals greatly embarrassed the national networks, whose chief executives actually had exerted less control over the programs than had the shows' individual producers and advertisers. Interestingly, opinion surveys showed a general indifference to the affair, but Stanton and his fellow broadcasters feared that the episode might result in greater government regulation. In May 1959, he announced that, henceforth, CBS would exercise far greater authority in program operation. He also pledged to revise the news division by presenting regular prime-time one-hour documentaries. "We are determined," he said, "to press the [television] medium to its fullest development as an informational force." In October he canceled all quiz programs and programming "conceits," such as canned applause and laughter.

Stanton played a leading role in bringing about the presidential debates of 1960. Long opposed to the equal time section of the Federal Communications Act of 1934, he continually argued that its literal interpretation compelled networks to offer equal access to candidates of every minor party. Congress suspended the equal time rule in August 1960, and Stanton personally devoted great attention to producing the debates between Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) and Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON. After the debates in September, Republicans criticized CBS for placing too much light on the pale face of their candidate. Stanton's arrangements, however, greatly pleased Kennedy.

In December 1960, President-elect Kennedy offered Stanton the directorship of the United States Information Agency. When Stanton declined the post, Kennedy appointed Murrow. In 1971, CBS broadcast an investigative report, titled "The Selling of the Pentagon," that covered a $30 million campaign by the Defense Department to improve its image. The House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee demanded that CBS turn over material cut from the program. Stanton refused to comply, and the committee cited him for contempt. The full House, however, voted down the citation. Stanton remained president of CBS until 1971 and stayed on as vice president until his retirement in 1973. After leaving CBS, Stanton became chairman and chief operating officer of the American Red Cross. He also served on the boards of the Rockefeller Foundation, the Carnegie Institution, and the Harvard board. He died in Boston on December 24, 2006.

—MSM

Stassen, Harold E(dward)

(1907–2001) director, Mutual Security

Administration; director, Foreign Operations

Administration; special assistant to the president for disarmament

The son of a farmer, Stassen was born in West St. Paul, Minnesota, on April 13, 1907. Hard-driving and persistent, he graduated from high school by the age of 15 and entered the University of Minnesota in 1922. He worked at a variety of jobs, including stints as a grocery clerk and a Pullman car conductor, to help finance his education. After receiving his B.A. in 1927, he entered the University of Minnesota Law School, where he received his law degree in 1929. Stassen also found time to organize and become the first chairman of the Minnesota Young Republican League.

Upon graduating from law school, Stassen and a classmate opened a law office and established a thriving private practice. Stassen also entered politics, campaigning successfully in 1929 for county attorney of Dakota County, Minnesota, an office he occupied from 1930 to 1938. In 1938, with the support of the Young Republicans, Stassen overcame strong opposition from the incumbent, Elmer A. Benson, and the old guard of the state's Republican Party to win election as governor of Minnesota. Chosen to give the keynote address at the Republican National Convention in 1940, he was reelected governor in 1940 and again in 1942. In 1943, Stassen resigned his office to go on active duty in the U.S. Naval Reserve. Entering the navy as a lieutenant commander, he served on the staff of Admiral William F. Halsey in the Pacific. He left the navy as a captain.

In 1945, Stassen was a delegate to the San Francisco conference that led to the formation of the United Nations. After that, he directed his efforts toward an eventual presidential bid. He was the first to enter the race for the Republican nomination in 1948. In his yearlong campaign, Stassen ran on a platform espousing progressive Republicanism in domestic affairs and international cooperation in foreign policy. Stassen wanted a system of modern capitalism whose strength and stability would rule out any serious economic depression and which would also be responsive to human needs. He opposed the isolationist wing of the Republican Party and believed that the United States should be willing to face war if necessary to overcome totalitarianism. After some early primary wins, Stassen lost the nomination in 1948 to THOMAS E. DEWEY.

Four years later, Stassen again ran for the Republican presidential nomination. General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's campaign staff, of which Stassen himself was a central figure, believed that Stassen's candidacy would be a useful tool to draw delegates from Senator ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio), Eisenhower's major opponent. They also assumed that Stassen would switch his delegates to Eisenhower during the convention.

When the Republican National Convention convened, however, Stassen remained hopeful of his own nomination. He resisted all pressures within his Minnesota delegation to declare for Eisenhower. At the conclusion of the first ballot, when he received the votes of only 19 delegates, Stassen withdrew his name for the nomination and advised his delegates to support Eisenhower. Minnesota's shift provided Eisenhower with a narrow majority. Stassen opposed the selection of RICHARD M. NIXON as Eisenhower's running mate. After allegations surfaced that Nixon had maintained a "secret" political fund, Stassen wrote a letter to Eisenhower suggesting that he drop out of the race and that EARL WARREN replace him.

After Eisenhower won the election, he appointed Stassen director of the Mutual Security Program, a post he held from 1953 to 1955. In that capacity, he headed the foreign aid program and pushed the administration for increased emphasis on economic aid. In January 1955, Stassen supported agricultural expert WOLF LADEJINSKY, dismissed from his job at the Agriculture Department by Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON as a security risk. At the behest of Eisenhower, Stassen gave Ladejinsky a position in the Foreign Operations Administration comparable to the one he had lost and released a detailed statement explaining why he had cleared Ladijinsky on the security charges.

In March 1955, Eisenhower, disturbed by the prospect of an arms race with the Soviet Union, created the position of special assistant to the president for disarmament, with cabinet rank, and named Stassen to fill the post. The former governor was to develop and negotiate a plan for disarmament with the Soviet Union. In response to a Soviet offer, Eisenhower suggested a plan called Open Skies at the Geneva summit conference in July. He offered to swap military blueprints with the Soviets and suggested that the United States was willing, if the Soviets were, to allow complete aerial surveillance and photography to prevent a surprise attack.

Over the next two years, Stassen worked to develop this general statement into a specific proposal and attempted to get powerful forces within the administration to accept disarmament. Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, in particular, opposed any accommodation with the Soviet Union on the issue. He feared that, because the New Look focused on strategic nuclear weapons as America's primary deterrent, any arms limitation agreement would jeopardize U.S. security. Stassen, on the other hand, believed that as the two superpowers reached nuclear parity, the United States must begin serious arms control discussions with the Soviets. Stassen was particularly anxious to stop nuclear testing while the United States had the numerical and technological advantage.

During the 1950s, Stassen remained active in Republican politics. In 1956, the liberal Stassen mounted a campaign to replace Nixon as the vice presidential nominee. On July 23, he suggested that the governor of Massachusetts, CHRISTIAN A. HERTER, would make a stronger candidate. Stassen said "the negative side" of the Eisenhower-Nixon ticket was most apparent in polls of "the best informed and the younger voters." He maintained that Nixon would only decrease support for the party. He pointed to the findings of private polls that showed an Eisenhower-Herter ticket would run 6 percent stronger than an Eisenhower-Nixon ticket. In these public pronouncements, Stassen insisted that he was acting "as an individual and not as a representative of the President." Stassen also asked his supporters not to advance his own name for the vice presidential nomination.

Almost every major figure in the Republican Party rallied to Nixon's side. The former governor of New York, THOMAS E. DEWEY, regarded Nixon's renomination as "all settled." Senator BARRY GOLD-WATER (R-Ariz.) suggested that the GOP give Stassen a “transfer” to the Democratic Party for “trying to create dissent in an otherwise harmonious” party. On August 22, Stassen had a private meeting with Eisenhower. Immediately thereafter, Stassen made a public statement of his decision to give Vice President Nixon his “full support” and called upon the GOP to “close ranks” for the campaign.

In 1957, the United States and the Soviet Union outlined tentative proposals at meetings held in London under the direction of a subcommittee of the UN Disarmament Commission. The United States proposed an end to nuclear testing with an elaborate system of on-site inspections to ensure compliance. The Soviet Union, on the other hand, opposed inspection, believing secrecy would help it compensate for U.S. superiority in nuclear weapons. In addition, it called for a halt to the use of hydrogen bombs long before a cutoff in fissionable material production, a step that would inhibit use of the superior U.S. Air Force. The USSR also asked for aerial inspection of Europe outside the Soviet Union.

The tacit intention to include West Germany under the provision for aerial inspection immediately provoked the German chancellor Konrad Adenauer, a friend of Dulles, who demanded reassurance that his nation’s interests would not be endangered. Dulles gave that reassurance and effectively blocked Stassen’s further efforts to form a mutually acceptable accord with the Soviets.

During the London Conference, Stassen made a diplomatic blunder that led to his fall from grace in the eyes of the administration. After Eisenhower met with his advisers on disarmament, he authorized Stassen to return to London with a “talking paper” that proposed to offer the Soviets a moratorium on testing in exchange for future limitations on the production of nuclear weapons. Other elements of the paper included an aerial inspection scheme, a plan to prohibit the use of nuclear weapons except in defense or retaliation in case of nuclear attack, and a clause calling for the devotion of future production of fissionable material to peaceful purposes. Eisenhower stressed the tentative nature of the talking paper and told Stassen to show it to the British and French and get their approval before presenting it to the Soviets. Without any prior consultation with America’s allies, Stassen gave the paper to the Soviets, who announced that the United States and the Soviet Union were near an agreement. The British prime minister Harold Macmillan opposed any test ban; the British had just exploded their first hydrogen bomb and wanted to conduct more tests. A furious Macmillan complained directly to Eisenhower.

The president reprimanded Stassen for the “acute embarrassment” his action had caused. Stating publicly that the unanimous assent of the allies would be necessary for any agreement, Dulles himself went to the conference to present the Western position. His usefulness at an end, Stassen resigned his post in February 1958.

After leaving the government, Stassen practiced law in Philadelphia and remained active in politics. In 1958 and 1966, he lost races for the Republican gubernatorial nomination in Pennsylvania. In 1960, he opposed Richard Nixon’s nomination for the presidency at the Republican National Convention. Eight years later, Stassen ran for the presidency on a peace platform calling for the de-escalation of the war in Vietnam. His repeated campaigns for the Republican presidential nomination made him a standing joke and provided fodder for late night talk shows on television. He died in Bloomington, Minnesota, on March 4, 2001.

—MSM

Stennis, John C(ornelius) (1901–1995) U.S. senator

The son of a prosperous farmer, Stennis was born in Kemper County, Mississippi, on August 3, 1901. Raised in rural Mississippi, he received his B.A. from Mississippi Agricultural and Mechanical College (later Mississippi State University) in 1923 and his LL.B. from the University of Virginia in 1927. He maintained a law practice while serving in the Mississippi House of Representatives from 1928 to 1932 and then won election to the position of district prosecuting attorney, which he held from 1932 to 1937. Appointed to a circuit court judgeship in 1937, he sat on the bench for a decade. Stennis won a special election in 1947 to fill the seat in the U.S. Senate left vacant by the death of Theodore Bilbo (D-Miss.), the noted segregationist demagogue. In a race to replace Bilbo, Stennis, a calm, genteel, and dignified southerner, downplayed the race issue but made clear his support for a "reasonable and proper segregation." He won reelection in 1952, 1958, 1964, 1970, 1976, and 1982.

Once in the Senate, he aligned himself with fellow conservative southern Democrats in opposing civil rights and much social welfare legislation. In 1948, he opened a filibuster of an anti-poll tax bill. He voted for the Internal Security Act of 1950 and the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act of 1952. In foreign policy, Stennis supported most of President Truman's policies to contain the Soviet Union, including the Marshall Plan in 1947 and the North Atlantic Treaty in 1949. A protégé of Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL (D-Ga.), Stennis received appointments to the Armed Services Committee and the Appropriations Committee.

Stennis often opposed the Eisenhower administration's foreign policy, voting to limit foreign aid and opposing American troop commitments abroad. Although he had originally supported the Marshall Plan, he voted to lower its budget, and in 1953 he backed reduced foreign aid to western Europe. In 1956 he again voted for cuts in President Eisenhower's proposals for foreign aid and military assistance. Stennis opposed the U.S. Mutual Defense Treaty with Korea in 1954, arguing that the United States was "stretching-out" its commitments so thinly that it might not be able "to deliver." Instead of a formal treaty, he proposed a "firm declaration of assurances" that the United States would "stand by Korea under present conditions."

Stennis advocated a cautious policy toward American military involvement in Vietnam. In 1954, he warned against sending American technicians to Indochina because he thought it might provoke renewed fighting in Korea. When French forces were besieged by the communists at Dien Bien Phu that spring and the French government pleaded for U.S. military assistance, Stennis worried that the Western allies would again be content to have the United States assume the burden of the fighting. He stated that he could not think of any circumstances in which "our land troops should go into Indochina and be committed in this war area." When Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) warned that a French or U.S. military victory there was impossible, Stennis called it "the finest statement I have heard on this subject."

Respected by his fellow senators for his personal integrity, Stennis was selected in 1954 to sit on the Senate Select Committee to Study Censure Charges, chaired by Senator ARTHUR WATKINS (R-Utah). The six members of the committee assembled in fall 1954 to study a resolution censuring Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) for his conduct in carrying out his investigations of Communists in government. Although strongly anticommunist, Stennis believed that McCarthy had violated traditional Senate standards of prudence and fairness. For him the issue was "one purely of political morality in senatorial conduct," not partisan or ideological conflict. In joining the committee's unanimous vote to recommend censure, Stennis rejected what he described as McCarthy's "slush and slime as a proper standard of senatorial conduct." He warned his colleagues that "something big and fine will have gone from this chamber" if it condoned the behavior of the senator from Wisconsin. The Senate censured McCarthy in December, by a vote of 67-22.

During the 1950s, Stennis was one of the Senate's most prominent opponents of civil rights legislation. An acknowledged authority on Senate procedures, he often used this knowledge to dilute or delay legislation through filibuster and manipulation of other parliamentary measures. In 1956, he joined 100 other southern members of Congress in signing the Southern Manifesto, which assailed the U.S. Supreme Court's decision striking down segregated public schools. While basing its attack on legal grounds, the group made it clear that its members would oppose any federal attempts to desegregate schools. Stennis voted against the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. In 1959, he supported a proposed constitutional amendment to grant states and localities the right to decide questions of school desegregation. Some observers believed Stennis to be trapped by a constituency that favored segregation. Others, like Aaron Henry, a civil rights activist, saw Stennis as "shrewd and sophisticated in promulgating segregation" and perhaps more dishonest for doing so.

Stennis opposed most social welfare legislation. He supported only limited federal aid to education, despite the fact that Mississippi schools remained among the poorest in the nation. In 1960, he opposed raising the national minimum wage from $1 to $1.25 and the same year voted against a plan to provide medical benefits to the elderly through Social Security funds.

As a member of the Armed Services Committee, Stennis generally supported the military's budget requests and opposed the Eisenhower administration's New Look, which increased reliance on air power and the nuclear deterrent while reducing military spending. In the late 1950s, Stennis joined other Democratic senators who accused the Eisenhower administration of allowing a missile gap to develop. Claiming the United States was behind the USSR in numbers of missiles, he urged more intense research and production in the missile program. During partisan wrangling over a supposed "deterrent gap" in 1960, Stennis championed the B-70 bomber as "essential" to U.S. security.

Despite his earlier reservations about intervening in Indochina, Stennis provided important support for Presidents John F. Kennedy and LYNDON B. JOHNSON as they escalated the American involvement. Although he had earlier opposed a unilateral American effort, he believed that, once engaged, the United States had to uphold its commitment with a full military effort. After the Tet offensive, Stennis began to have doubts about American policy. In 1969, Stennis became chairman of the Armed Forces Committee.

Stennis's reputation for personal integrity drew him into some of the messiest political situations of his era. In 1967, Stennis chaired an investigation of Senator THOMAS DODD (D-Conn.) that resulted in Dodd's censure for misuse of congressional funds. During the Watergate scandal, President RICHARD M. NIXON came under pressure in 1973 to release the tape recordings of conversations in the Oval Office. He released transcripts of the recordings, but demands for the tapes continued. As a compromise, Nixon offered to let Stennis, as the representative of Congress, listen to the tapes and verify the White House transcripts of them. Opposed by the special prosecutor and members of Congress, the compromise collapsed. Although he refrained from race baiting, Stennis opposed civil rights measures throughout his tenure in the Senate. Toward the end of his career, he moderated that position somewhat. He used his position on the Appropriations Committee to direct large amounts of federal funding to his state. In September 1987, Stennis announced that he would not run for reelection in 1988. Upon his retirement, he moved to Starkville, Mississippi, where he was involved with the John C. Stennis Institute of Government and the John C. Stennis Center for Public Service at Mississippi State University. He died in Jackson, Mississippi, on April 23, 1995.

—MSM

Stephens, Thomas E(dwain)

(1903–1988) presidential appointments secretary

Born in Ireland on October 18, 1903, Stephens graduated from St. Lawrence University in 1932 and received a law degree from Brooklyn Law School. He then served as assistant corporate counsel for the city of New York, beginning in 1938 representing the city at the state legislature in Albany. In 1936, Stephens began private practice with the firm of Lord, Day and Lord. He left in 1938 to become administrative assistant to the president of the New York City Council. During World War II, he served in Europe as a major in the army air corps. After the war, he became active in national Republican politics as director of the campaign division of the Republican National Committee in 1945 and 1946. He worked as a tactician for THOMAS E. DEWEY's successful campaign for the Republican presidential nomination in 1948; during the general election, he served as assistant to the Republican national campaign manager. After working as administrative assistant to Senator JOHN FOSTER DULLES (R-N.Y.) in 1949, he served as secretary of the New York State Republican Committee from 1950 to 1952. He joined DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER's presidential campaign during the primaries and became an aide to Eisenhower during the general election.

On the advice of SHERMAN ADAMS, President Eisenhower appointed Stephens appointments secretary with the title of special counsel in January 1953. Stephens's new position involved little formal counseling. Instead, he dealt with many small but significant details of the White House routine, choosing speaking invitations for the president and coordinating security arrangements with the Secret Service. He also arranged and logged Eisenhower's appointments. More informally, Stephens was the staff's chief comedian and practical joker. Eisenhower relied on his "genius for breaking up a tense discussion with exactly the right comment."

Stephens also contributed to the Eisenhower administration as a political adviser. He possessed shrewd political instincts and was a thoroughly perceptive judge of people. Eisenhower believed Stephens to be one of his most "politically astute" aides, and the president's reliance upon his appointments secretary as a "rock of good sense and sound judgment" gave Stephens more influence than most people in Washington realized.

Although ill health and the need to resume private law practice forced Stephens to resign as appointments secretary in January 1955, he continued to advise Eisenhower and on occasion to perform some duties for the White House. He worked on Eisenhower's reelection campaign in 1956 and served as an advance man at the Republican National Convention. With the resignation of Stephens's replacement, BERNARD SHANLEY, Stephens resumed his old post as appointments secretary in March 1958. When Eisenhower left office in January 1961, Stephens announced his intention to enter business. Two years later, however, he returned to politics, helping coordinate operations for the manager of NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER's campaign for reelection as governor of New York. In 1964, Stephens participated in Rockefeller's unsuccessful presidential bid and KENNETH B. KEATING's losing battle to retain his U.S. Senate seat. Four years later, Stephens again aided Rockefeller's unsuccessful presidential campaign and Senator JACOB K. JAVITS's (R-N.Y.) victorious bid for reelection. Stephens died in Clearwater, Florida, on May 15, 1988.

—MSM

Stevens, Robert T(en Broeck)

(1899–1983) secretary of the army

Born in Fanwood, New Jersey, on July 31, 1899, Stevens graduated from Phillips Academy in Andover, Massachusetts, in 1917. He served as a second lieutenant in the field artillery during World War

I. After the war, he earned a B.A. at Yale in 1921. He then entered the family textile business (J. P. Stevens and Co., founded in 1813 by Nathaniel Stevens). Stevens worked in manufacturing and merchandising before becoming president in 1929. In 1933, he was an administrative representative in the industry section of the National Recovery Administration. From 1934 to 1953, he was the director of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. In 1940, he was appointed to head the National Defense Advisory Commission. During World War II, he served as a colonel in the office of the quartermaster general and handled the procurement of textiles for the army. After the war, he returned to J. P. Stevens as chairman of the board.

President-elect Eisenhower appointed him secretary of the army in December 1952. When the nomination was sent to the Senate Armed Services Committee, the majority of the committee asked Stevens to dispose of his stock in companies that did business with the Defense Department. Stevens promised that he would sell all holdings except his stock in the J. P. Stevens Co., frankly citing sentimental reasons for the exception. The committee refused to permit the exception, and Stevens agreed to sell the stock totaling $1.4 million.

While in office, Stevens was called upon to answer charges that budget cutbacks were impairing the army's effectiveness. In response to a special Senate inquiry into alleged shortages of ammunition in Korea, Stevens, in March 1953, assured the senators that production and supply were increasing rapidly. In July of that year, he told a subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee that the proposed cut of about $1 million from the estimates presented by HARRY S. TRUMAN would not adversely affect the army's current combat effectiveness.

In the summer of 1953, Stevens began a tense, yearlong ordeal when Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), chairman of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, launched a probe into possible communist infiltration of the army. McCarthy's attack focused on the army signal corps laboratories at Fort Monmouth, New Jersey. On November 16, he promised "evidence of actual stealing of classified materials" at Monmouth, a claim that contradicted the findings of an inquiry by the army, which maintained that there was no evidence of "current" spying. The subcommittee met with opposition from army officers, who refused to reveal the names of officials who had given security clearances to people suspected of communist connections. In his first encounter with McCarthy, Stevens, whom the senator termed "a fine, naive, not-too-brilliant" Republican businessman, appeared conciliatory. He promised to review the problem and indicated a desire to cooperate with the subcommittee. The matter was eventually dropped.

In January 1954, a new investigation brought Stevens and McCarthy to loggerheads. Dr. IRVING PERESS, a dentist and a member of the left-wing American Labor Party, had been inducted into the army in October 1952. A month later, in accordance with the automatic provisions of the Doctor Draft Act, Peress was promoted to the rank of major. When given a loyalty questionnaire, he refused to answer any questions regarding his political beliefs. In December, the army bureaucracy had discovered Peress's refusal, and the adjutant general ordered Peress discharged within 90 days. The army then gave him an honorable discharge. Infuriated, McCarthy insisted that Peress should have been court-martialed. On February 2, Peress asked that his discharge become effective immediately, and the army followed the path of least resistance. McCarthy demanded to know the identity of Pentagon officials who had promoted Peress and then ordered his discharge. In testimony before the subcommittee on February 18, General RALPH W. ZWICKER refused to reveal the names of those involved. Thereupon, McCarthy asserted that Zwicker, a highly decorated officer who had served with distinction in World War II, was "not fit to wear that uniform." Stevens directed Zwicker to refuse to appear for further questioning and denounced McCarthy's behavior as unwarranted. The secretary of the army announced that he would personally testify.

Stevens's order brought the senator and the administration into open conflict over what constituted the proper relation between the executive and legislative branches of government. In an effort to head off a major dispute, Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON and WILTON ("JERRY") PERSONS, Eisenhower's congressional liaison, arranged for a lunch meeting between the Republicans on the subcommittee and Stevens. At the meeting on February 24, Stevens agreed to cooperate with McCarthy if the senator accorded proper respect to the army's personnel. After the lunch, Senator KARL MUNDT (R-S. Dak.) read a "memorandum of understanding" between the army and the subcommittee, in which Stevens agreed to permit officers to appear before the subcommittee and to give it the names of those involved in the promotion and discharge of Peress. It seemed as though Stevens had capitulated completely; the press reported the meeting as an abject surrender to McCarthy. Nixon, Stevens, Deputy Attorney General WILLIAM ROGERS, Eisenhower's press secretary, JAMES HAGERTY, and several others worked out a statement, revised and approved by the president, claiming the secretary had in no way departed from his principle that army personnel were not to be "brow-beaten or humiliated." It further declared that Stevens had received assurances from members of the subcommittee along those lines. After Senator EVERETT N. DIRKSEN (R-Ill.) failed to get the Republicans on the subcommittee publicly to assure respectful treatment of officers, Stevenson read the statement at a press conference.

The army then took the offensive against McCarthy. On March 11, 1954, Stevens released a report stating that McCarthy and ROY M. COHN, the subcommittee's counsel, had intervened and even made direct threats to army officials in an effort to assure favored treatment for G. DAVID SCHINE, a former consultant to McCarthy's subcommittee who had been drafted into the army in November of the previous year. Stevens issued the report to each Republican member of the panel and to the press. Embarrassed and caught off guard, McCarthy labeled the report "blackmail" and, in addition, accused Stevens of trying to divert his attention to an investigation of the air force and navy. Cohn charged that it was a subterfuge to halt the probe of alleged subversives at the Monmouth laboratories.

McCarthy's Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee voted to hold hearings on the charges and countercharges. The nationally televised probe began on April 22, 1954, and continued until June 17. Most of the examination was devoted to petty haggling interrupted by McCarthy's calling, "point of order, Mr. Chairman!" In the words of historian Charles Alexander, "Even the closest followers could make little sense of the confused proceedings." Stevens himself had only a minor role in the hearings. The public's attention focused on the dramatic clashes between McCarthy and the army's chief counsel, JOSEPH WELCH. The hearings revealed McCarthy at his most boorish and ruthless and contributed to his downfall in December 1954. Assessing Stevens's role in the senator's political demise, the New York Times wrote that "[Stevens's] courage and persistence . . . was the beginning of McCarthy's own downfall as a power in the Senate."

Stevens resigned from his post on July 20, 1955, for what he termed "compelling personal consideration" and returned to the presidency of J. P. Stevens and Company. From 1963 to 1964, he was president of the American Textile Manufacturers. Stevens died in Edison, New Jersey, on January 31, 1983.

—MSM

Stevenson, Adlai E(wing)

(1900–1965) Democratic presidential candidate

Born in Los Angeles, California, on February 5, 1900, Stevenson was the grandson of Adlai Stevenson, vice president in Grover Cleveland's second term, and the son of Lewis Stevenson, a businessman who was active in Illinois Democratic politics. The younger Adlai Stevenson attended the Choate School in Wallingford, Connecticut, and graduated from Princeton University in 1922. At the insistence of his father, Stevenson went to Harvard Law School, but he flunked out after his second year. He worked for his family's newspaper in Bloomington, Illinois, and studied law at Northwestern University, receiving a J.D. degree in 1926. The following year, Stevenson joined Cutting, Moore & Sidley, an old and established law firm in Chicago.

Stevenson became special counsel to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in 1933 and the following year transferred to the Federal Alcohol Control Administration as assistant general counsel. More a loyal Democrat than an ideologically devoted New Dealer, he returned to his law practice in Chicago in 1935. Six years later, Stevenson went back to Washington as special assistant to Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox. In 1945, Stevenson became special assistant to Secretary of State Edward Stettinius. Later in the year, he was appointed U.S. minister and representative to the Preparedness Commission for the United Nations. He was senior adviser to the American delegation to the first session of the UN General Assembly, which opened in London in January 1946. Stevenson served as an alternate delegate at subsequent sessions in 1946 and 1947.

Needing a respectable candidate to improve the party's image, Chicago's political boss, Jacob Avery, urged Stevenson to run for governor of Illinois in 1948. Stevenson then ran as a reform candidate against what he charged was the scandal-ridden administration of the Republican incumbent, Governor Dwight H. Green. Stevenson defeated Green by 572,000 votes, the largest plurality in Illinois history.

Stevenson's accomplishments as governor included a reform of the state police force that substituted a merit system for political appointments, a doubling of state aid to schools, an increase in unemployment compensation and pensions for the aged and blind, and a 10-year road building program. The Illinois legislature declined to approve his proposals for establishing a fair employment practices commission, imposing greater restrictions on gambling, reforming the criminal justice system, and revising the state's constitution. Stevenson vetoed a bill requiring a loyalty oath, claiming that it infringed upon the right of free speech and the presumption of innocence.

From the time of his election as governor, Stevenson was mentioned as a possible Democratic presidential candidate for 1952. After Senator ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) won the New Hampshire primary, President HARRY S. TRUMAN decided not to run and offered Stevenson his endorsement. Stevenson persistently said that he did not want to be a presidential candidate and would run for another term as governor. Some observers believed that he really did not want the nomination. Others claimed that he did not want to be associated with the unpopular Truman administration and thought he could win the election only if nominated by a popular draft. The success of Kefauver, whose committee in the Senate held widely publicized investigations into organized crime, in the early primaries alarmed Democratic city bosses, and they found an alternative in Stevenson.

Despite Stevenson's refusal to encourage a national movement on his behalf and his assertions that he would not even accept a draft, a Stevenson-for-President movement began to form in February 1952. In order to get the nomination, he had to defeat not only Kefauver but Mutual Security Director W. AVERELL HARRIMAN and Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL (D-Ga.), who had also announced their candidacies for the nomination. In July, at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, Stevenson ran second (with 273 votes) to Kefauver (with 340 votes) on the first ballot. But no candidate came close to the 615 1/2 votes needed for nomination. After Kefauver made only minor gains on the second ballot, Stevenson was selected on the fourth. He chose Senator JOHN SPARKMAN (D-Ala.), a segregationist who had supported much of the New Deal, as his running mate.

In his acceptance speech, Stevenson appealed for an issue-oriented campaign based on thought rather than emotion. His comment, "Let's talk sense to the American people," became for many the trademark of his campaign. Liberal intellectuals in particular came to admire what they perceived to be the thoughtful, analytical, and urbane witty character of his speeches and his minimization of traditional campaign ballyhoo. In fact, Stevenson's speeches contained more rhetoric than substance.

If some liberal intellectuals swooned, to many others Stevenson's style smacked of uncertainty, indecisiveness, and a lack of fighting spirit. President Truman, for one, complained that Stevenson's campaign was not aggressive. Stevenson was overheard early in the Democratic National Convention saying to the Illinois delegation, "I do not dream myself fit for the job [of President]," a comment that reinforced the impression of uncertainty. Moreover, Stevenson was a moderately conservative Democrat, who remained uncomfortable with organized labor and minorities.

Furthermore, Stevenson's campaign was haunted by the record of the beleaguered Truman administration. He supported the president's major domestic and foreign policies, including

Adlai Stevenson arriving at the White House, February 17, 1953 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Truman's conduct of the stalemated war in Korea. The Democratic nominee stated that the fight against communism was a long and difficult one and that only persistence, not miracles, could end the conflict on favorable terms. On October 24, his Republican opponent promised to go to Korea. Stevenson contended that this promise was a grandstand play without meaningful content, but many observers believed that it clinched the election for Eisenhower.

On the domestic front, Republicans had a field day reminding voters of the scandals that marred the Truman administration. They also attempted to link Stevenson to their charge that the Truman administration was soft on communism and had allowed subversive elements to penetrate the national government. On October 10, Senator RICHARD M. NIXON (R-Calif.), the Republican vice-presidential nominee, denounced Stevenson for having testified favorably regarding the character of Alger Hiss at the latter's trial for perjury in 1949 and called Stevenson a “graduate of DEAN ACHE-SON’s spineless school of diplomacy.” On October 27, Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), who had repeatedly impugned Stevenson’s patriotism, said that if he could board Stevenson’s campaign train with a club, he might be able to make a “good American out of him.”

Stevenson also had the misfortune to run against a popular war hero, General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. Nothing Stevenson did could combat Eisenhower’s overwhelming, nonpartisan popularity. Contrary to Stevenson’s stated hope, the campaign did not center around a clear-cut debate over issues. Stevenson opposed McCarthyism, calling for “free enterprise for the mind,” and took a cautious position in favor of civil rights for African Americans. However, Stevenson’s supporters and many independent observers contended that Eisenhower won support across the political spectrum by presenting himself as a trustworthy father figure who stood above not only parties but issues. Eisenhower won a substantial victory in the popular vote (33.9 million to 27.3 million) and swept the electoral college by 442 to 89. Eisenhower even made inroads into the Solid South, capturing the southern states of Virginia, Florida, and Texas as well as the border states of Oklahoma and Tennessee.

In March 1953, Stevenson began a six-month tour of the Far East, Middle East, and Europe. Upon his return, he wrote a series of articles for Look magazine. He stated that, in the cold war, “anti-Communist preaching wins few hearts.” The United States, he said, had to promote economic development in backward countries and live up to its ideals by rejecting McCarthyism and opposing Western colonialism.

As its most recent presidential candidate, Stevenson was the unofficial national voice of the Democratic Party, and in that capacity he remained in the public eye. At the Democratic National Committee’s Southern Conference in March 1954, he denounced McCarthyism, stating that “it is wicked and it is subversive for public officials to try deliberately to replace reason with passion; to substitute hatred for honest difference.” He also attacked the New Look defense policy recently announced by Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES, which relied on the use of strategic nuclear weapons as the primary defense against Soviet attack and expansion. Stevenson warned that the Soviet Union also had massive retaliatory power and that implementation of the plan “would certainly mean World War III and atomic counter-retaliation.” In 1955, he opposed the Formosa resolution sponsored by the administration on the grounds that it committed the Senate to support almost any action the president might choose to protect Nationalist China against Communist Chinese attack, including defense of what he believed were the strategically worthless islands of Quemoy and Matsu. In a radio address on April 11, Stevenson warned that the United States might lose allies if it went to war over those islands.

During the period between the elections of 1952 and 1956, Stevenson criticized the Eisenhower administration and the state of American society. According to Stevenson, while the American standard of living was high, the people had little sense of purpose beyond the acquisition of material goods. Warning against complacency and conformity in a speech at Smith College, he attacked the theory of education whose main purpose was the production of citizens “who can fit painlessly into the social pattern.” Stevenson’s admirers regarded such comments as an extension and deepening of his political criticism of President Eisenhower, whose alleged blandness and lack of creative ideas or strong commitments they blamed for the emphasis on conformity.

By the summer of 1955, Stevenson believed that he was the best available candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1956. On November 15, 1955, he formally announced his candidacy. Stevenson emphasized what he believed to be the excessive influence of business interests on the Eisenhower administration. On the issue of race, he hoped to reconcile the northern and southern wings of the party by taking a moderate stand on civil rights. Thus, he advocated gradualism in the enforcement of the Supreme Court’s decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which declared segregated public schools unconstitutional, and expressed the hope that southern moderates would be able to implement the ruling without the use of federal force. His major opponents, Kefauver and Harriman, who was by then governor of New York, took a more liberal position on civil rights.

After Stevenson received a surprisingly low write-in vote in the New Hampshire primary in March 1956 and suffered a stunning defeat at Kefauver's hands later in the month in the Minnesota primary, he altered his customary campaign style. Kenneth S. Davis, Stevenson's biographer, wrote: "Gone from his prepared talks were the witticisms that had sparked from his speeches of '52; gone was the evident reluctance to campaign for the presidency as though it were a popularity prize. The new Stevenson was bussed by pretty girls in California, donned cowboy boots in Arizona, carried a stuffed alligator and thumped a bass fiddle in Florida and everywhere shook hands by the hundreds, the thousands." He went on to win successive primaries in Illinois, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Alaska, Alabama, the District of Columbia, Oregon, Florida, and California. Stevenson won the nomination on the first ballot at the Democratic National Convention in August. He then surprised the convention by allowing it to choose his running mate; the delegates selected Kefauver.

In the general election rematch with Eisenhower, Stevenson continued to deviate from his 1952 campaign style. He followed a brutally crowded schedule, concentrating on key states, counties, and wards. Some of his speeches reflected the haste with which they were written. At his worst, Stevenson suggested that Eisenhower, who had suffered a heart attack, might not live through a second term, which would make Nixon the president. The Democratic nominee also engaged in a personal attack on the president's brother, Milton Eisenhower. Although disturbed by Stevenson's more traditional style of campaigning, his supporters comforted themselves with the thought that the candidate raised provocative ideas. Addressing the American Legion convention on September 5, Stevenson stated that the draft could be ended in the "foreseeable future," because the modern armed forces needed technically skilled specialized personnel serving for long periods rather than partly trained men enlisted for brief terms. Eisenhower denounced the suggestion as "incredible folly" that led "down the road of surrender." Republicans ridiculed Stevenson for claiming to know more about military matters than the president, who had spent a career in the military and commanded the European theater during World War II.

On October 15, during a nationwide television appearance, Stevenson suggested that the United States unilaterally halt further testing of H-bombs in the hope that the Soviet Union would reciprocate. (He had made a similar proposal the preceding April.) Stevenson argued that such a cessation could be a first step toward nuclear disarmament or at least toward a halt to the poisoning of the atmosphere with radioactive fallout. He contended that any subsequent Soviet H-bomb explosions could be detected and that the United States could then resume its tests. The administration believed that testing could not be monitored adequately without on-site inspection in the countries participating in a moratorium, and it therefore opposed any unilateral halt. Stevenson's suggestion became a political debacle when Soviet premier Nikolai A. Bulganin, in a letter to President Eisenhower on October 21, backed the Democratic candidate's proposal and called for a test suspension without inspection.

Eisenhower had not lost his nonpartisan appeal since 1952, and he now spoke with the authority of an incumbent. Furthermore, Stevenson's controversial proposals probably cost him votes. He was defeated even more soundly in 1956 than in his first presidential bid, receiving only 73 electoral votes to Eisenhower's 457. Eisenhower extended his inroads into the South, capturing Oklahoma, Kentucky, Tennessee, Texas, Louisiana, Florida, and Virginia. The incumbent received 35.6 million votes to Stevenson's 26.0 million.

In late November 1956, Stevenson joined with National Democratic Chairman PAUL BUTLER in establishing the Democratic Advisory Council. It was created to serve as a national voice for the party. Stevenson played the leading role in drawing up the council's statements and papers. In addition, he continued to speak throughout the country after his second defeat, and his speeches gained national attention. In fall 1957, the administration decided to invite Stevenson to help draw up an American program for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and participate in the forthcoming NATO conference in Paris. Stevenson decided not to attend the conference but agreed to work on the program. He stressed the importance of programs to improve living conditions in backward countries and stated in one of his memoranda that “if the Atlantic Community had multilateral economic and trade development plans it would mean a lot more to many people than its purely military anti-Communism does now.” However, his views had little influence on the American position at the conference, which stressed military might in deterring the spread of communism.

During the summer of 1958, Stevenson visited the Soviet Union and met with Soviet premier Nikita S. Khrushchev. Stevenson concluded that the current leadership of the USSR was more sensitive to public opinion than Stalin and was more pragmatic than ideological. Therefore, he believed, the Kremlin would seriously weigh the desire of the people in the Soviet Union and throughout the world for peace.

Stevenson repeatedly declined to seek a third presidential nomination in 1960. Early in that year, however, liberals in the Democratic Party, led by George Ball, THOMAS FINLETTER, and Senator MIKE MONRONEY (D-Okla.), formally organized a draft Stevenson movement. Stevenson made no effort to stop it. The strategy of the movement was to try to prevent any of the active candidates from winning on the first ballot and then, according to Kenneth Davis, “stampede the Convention in much the same way as the Wilkie amateurs had stampeded the Republican Convention of 1940.”

That strategy came apart when Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) defeated Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY (D-Minn.) in the West Virginia primary and severely damaged hopes for a deadlocked convention. Despite demonstrations by thousands of enthusiastic Stevenson supporters outside the convention hall and a tumultuous 20-minute demonstration inside, Kennedy won the nomination on the first ballot at the July gathering. Stevenson received the votes of only 79 1/2 delegates and finished fourth.

Although many people regarded Kennedy as an idealistic young man who represented a continuation of the Stevensonian tradition in the Democratic Party, Stevenson and a number of other Democratic liberals regarded the party's nominee as a cold, ambitious politician without a strong commitment to principles. Kennedy, like many others, regarded Stevenson as indecisive and prissy. Whatever his misgivings about the Democratic nominee, Stevenson disliked Vice President Nixon, the Republican nominee, far more. Stevenson's support of Kennedy induced many Democratic liberals such as ELEANOR ROOSEVELT to give their wholehearted support to the senator from Massachusetts.

During the primary campaign, Kennedy had indicated that he would give Stevenson a high post in his administration. Stevenson expected to be appointed secretary of state, but instead Kennedy offered him the post of ambassador to the United Nations. A disappointed Stevenson accepted it. In April 1961, Stevenson was not informed about the American role in the Bay of Pigs invasion, and he denied American involvement before the Security Council. Upon learning the truth, he was enraged. Stevenson's advocacy of concessions and negotiations during the Cuban missile crisis of 1962 earned him a reputation as a dove in an administration of hawks. Subsequently, his influence in the administration, which had never been great, declined, and he was forced to defend policies that he had no role in formulating. Stevenson retained his post under President LYNDON B. JOHNSON, hoping to have a larger role in the formulation of policy; he was to be disappointed again. Stevenson died of a heart attack in London on July 14, 1965.

—MSM

Stewart, Potter

(1915–1985) associate justice, U.S. Supreme Court

Stewart was born in Jackson, Michigan, where his family was vacationing, on January 23, 1915. He came from an affluent and prominent family in Cincinnati; his father served as mayor of the city and chief justice of the Ohio Supreme Court. Potter Stewart grew up in Cincinnati and attended the Hotchkiss School in Lakeville, Connecticut. Stewart graduated from Yale in 1937, and, after a year studying international law at Cambridge University in England, he entered Yale Law School, from which he graduated in 1941. Stewart went to work with a firm on Wall Street, but, after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, he joined the navy as an officer and saw action in the Atlantic and Mediter-ranear. After the war, he worked with a Wall Street law firm and then returned to Cincinnati in 1947. There, he joined a leading law firm and entered politics. Stewart served as a city council member from 1950 to 1953. President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER appointed him to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in April 1954. Stewart soon emerged as a leading federal circuit judge, admired for his closely reasoned and well-written opinions.

Mentioned as a possible Supreme Court nominee as early as 1957, Stewart was appointed to the high court when HAROLD BURTON retired in October 1958. Stewart began serving on the Court under a recess appointment that month. The Senate confirmed his nomination in May 1959, by a vote of 70–17, with the opposition coming from southern Democrats who disliked Stewart's position on civil rights.

Throughout his career on the nation's highest bench, he adopted a moderate, pragmatic approach. He tended to favor First Amendment rights, particularly free speech and religion, as well as the equal protection of African Americans and other minorities. He also strongly favored guarantees of the right to counsel. At the same time, he tended to support state criminal laws. Stewart often functioned as a swing justice, who moved between the Court's liberal and conservative wings. During his first term, for example, he joined the majority in two cases in which a closely divided Court upheld the contempt convictions of witnesses who had refused to answer questions or produce information for congressional and state anticommunist investigations. Later the same month (June 1959), however, Stewart voted to overturn a federal industrial security program because Congress had never authorized certain of the procedures used.

Stewart tended toward a policy of judicial restraint, but he was willing to intervene if government violated procedural rights or encroached too greatly on individual liberties. In general, however, he preferred to overturn government action on the narrowest possible grounds. In Bates v. Little Rock (1960), Stewart spoke for the majority to void the convictions of two officials of the Arkansas NAACP who had refused to give their membership lists to local authorities. The Court held that the forced disclosure would cause an unwarranted intrusion into the right of free association. Stewart's opinion for the Court in Shelton v. Tucker (1960) ruled unconstitutional an Arkansas law requiring public school teachers to list all organizations to which they had belonged in the past five years. Such a requirement, Stewart held, was too extreme an infringement on free association. Stewart demonstrated his concern for First Amendment rights in Kingsley Picture Corporation v. Regents (1959). Writing for the majority, he overturned a ban imposed by the regents of the University of the State of New York on the showing of the film Lady Chatterley's Lover.

Justice Stewart had a special concern for the right to counsel and wrote two opinions for the Court in February and June of 1959 overturning convictions in which the defendant had been denied counsel. On other criminal rights issues, however, he was a moderate. In March 1959, for example, he voted to hold that persons tried for the same offense in federal and state courts had not been subjected to double jeopardy.

Stewart found himself in dissent more often once a clear liberal majority emerged on the Court in the early 1960s. He voted with the liberals in many cases involving the right to counsel, civil rights, and obscenity, but he opposed them on most criminal rights issues (including Miranda v. Arizona [1966], in which the Court held that an accused had to be informed of his rights), on legislative reapportionment, and in many loyalty-security cases.

Whichever side he came down on, his opinions won praise for their concise, lucid, and literate style. Stewart was one of the Court's great phrasemakers. In Braunfield v. Brown (1961), Stewart dissented from a decision upholding the constitutionality of a Sunday closing statute. "Pennsylvania," wrote the justice, "has passed a law which compels an Orthodox Jew to choose between his religious faith and economic survival. . . . It is a choice which I think no State can constitutionally demand." An obscenity case, Jacobellis v. Ohio (1964), led Stewart to craft his most memorable phrase. The Court overturned the conviction of a theater manager for showing the French film, Les Amants. In a concurring opinion, Stewart wrote: "I shall not today attempt further to define the kinds of material I understand to be embraced within [the term hard-core pornography]; and perhaps I could never succeed in intelligibly doing so. But I know it when I see it, and the motion picture involved in this case is not that.” At that point, Stewart believed that states could ban hard-core pornography but not other sexually explicit material. A few years later, he came to the conclusion that judges should stay out of obscenity cases except when the obscenity was advertised salaciously or pandered to children (Redrup v. New York [1967]).

In 1969, amid speculation in the press that he might be elevated to the chief justiceship to succeed EARL WARREN, Stewart paid a call on President RICHARD M. NIXON. He told Nixon that history indicated that it was unwise to promote an associate justice.

Stewart voted to strike down state death penalty statutes in Furman v. Georgia (1972), because they were unevenly applied. In another of his most frequently quoted turns of phrase, Stewart wrote: “These death sentences are cruel and unusual in the same way that being struck by lightning is cruel and unusual.” Ultimately, however, he supported the constitutionality of the death penalty.

One of his most significant opinions came in Jones v. Mayer Co. (1968). That decision revived long-dormant legislative protections for African Americans against discrimination in housing. He also voted to uphold stronger enforcement of fair employment statutes but argued for color-blind applications when he saw affirmative action programs leading to racial quotas.

Stewart retired in 1981. After that, he continued to sit for several years as a judge on federal courts of appeals. He died in Hanover, New Hampshire, on December 7, 1985.

—MSM

Stone, I(sidor) F(einstein)

(1907–1989) journalist, editor, publisher

The son of Jewish immigrants from Russia, Isidor Feinstein (he legally changed his name to I. F. Stone at the age of 30) was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on December 24, 1907. His family moved in 1914 to Haddonfield, New Jersey, where his parents owned a dry goods store. During his high school years, he worked for the Haddonfield Press and the Camden (New Jersey) Evening Courier. He attended the University of Pennsylvania, where he studied philosophy but left in 1927 before the end of his junior year. While in college, he wrote for the Philadelphia Inquirer and the Philadelphia Record. Upon leaving college, Stone became an editorial writer for the Camden Evening Courier. A member of the Socialist Party’s New Jersey State Committee, Stone did publicity work for NORMAN THOMAS’s presidential campaign in 1928. Soon afterward, he divorced himself from partisan political activity to pursue a career in journalism.

In 1931, Stone became an editorial writer for the Philadelphia Record. He argued that conventional liberal solutions were inadequate to rescue the nation from the depression. Though an advocate of centralized authority and planning, he criticized what he considered to be President Franklin D. Roosevelt’s “fascist” tendencies. In 1933, Stone became the chief editorial writer for the staunchly pro-Roosevelt New York Post. In 1937, he changed his legal name to I. F. Stone and published his first book, The Court Disposes, in which he supported Roosevelt’s plan to enlarge the Supreme Court. Stone became associate editor of The Nation in 1938; two years later, he moved to Washington to become the magazine’s capitol editor. He continued to work at The Nation but in 1942 began writing as well for the liberal newspaper PM.

He published Underground to Palestine (1946), based on his experiences with a group of slightly over 1,000 Jewish survivors of Hitler’s death camps as they ran the British naval blockade to immigrate to Palestine. “If those ships were illegal,” he wrote, “so was the Boston Tea Party.” Two years later, he published another pro-Zionist book, This Is Israel. When PM folded in 1949, Stone joined the New York Daily Compass.

Stone criticized the Truman administration’s anticommunist foreign policy from a leftist perspective. In November 1947, he denied that the Soviet Union maintained its rule in eastern Europe only by brutal terror and asserted that the planned economies of that region brought benefits to industrial and agricultural workers. The following year, he supported the Progressive Party’s presidential candidate, Henry A. Wallace, who urged accommodation with the USSR. Stone refused to accept the American government’s explanation of the causes of the Korean War, and in his Hidden History of the Korean War (1952), argued that the United States and South Korea had provoked the North Korean invasion of South Korea. Stone's critics contended that he cast U.S. policy in the worst possible light and Soviet policy in the best possible light.

After the Daily Compass folded in 1952, Stone began publishing I. F. Stone's Weekly, an independent radical newsletter, in January 1953. Stone maintained the autonomy of the publication by rejecting advertising. He did all the research, reporting, and editing, while his wife managed the newsletter's business affairs. A staunch opponent of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.), Stone wrote in April 1953 that "no one is doing so much to damage the country's prestige abroad and its power to act effectively at home." However, he did not spare McCarthy's foes, stating in March 1954 that they accepted his underlying premise that communism was an evil conspiracy against the peace and stability of the world. "To acquiesce in the delusions which create a panic," Stone wrote, "is no way to stem it."

After visiting the Soviet Union in 1956, Stone alienated many of his leftist subscribers and friends with his scathing assessment of that country and its society. Workers there, he asserted, were "more exploited than in Western welfare states." The Soviet Union, he wrote, "is not a good society, and it is not led by honest men." For all his criticism of the United States, he acknowledged that "there are very few countries in which you can spit in the eye of the Government and get away with it. It's not possible in Moscow."

Stone regarded Eisenhower as a lackadaisical chief executive who was indifferent to the responsibilities of his office. In March 1959, he described the president as "a cardiac case whose chief interest is in getting away from his job as often as possible for golf and bridge." Stone was one of the few prominent journalists who attacked the administration's foreign and domestic policies from a radical point of view. In January 1958, he charged that Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES sought to promote the arms race to force the USSR to increase its arms budget and thus maintain poverty and increase domestic tension within the Soviet bloc. During March 1959, Stone wrote that the Berlin crisis demonstrated that leaders in the United States and the USSR believed in "their sacred right to consign millions to death if they so choose."

Stone praised the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which struck down segregated public schools. On a number of occasions, he attacked the Eisenhower administration for not vigorously investigating the lynching of blacks in the South, and in May 1958 he chided the president for urging black leaders to be patient in the face of the slow pace of integration. In August 1958, Stone warned that if African Americans were not assimilated into American society, they might become embittered and turn from integration to racist nationalism.

In addition to his dissident views, Stone was known for turning up facts that would otherwise have gone unnoticed. He pored over official documents for information. A critic of the U.S. insistence upon on-site inspection as a condition for the cessation of nuclear tests, Stone discovered in 1958 that the Atomic Energy Commission's first underground test had been detected 2,600 miles away.

In 1961, Stone regarded President JOHN F. KENNEDY as a promising liberal, but, in December 1963, he wrote that Kennedy "was no more than an enlightened conservative, cautious as an old man for all his youth, with a basic distrust of the people." He defended the Warren Commission report on Kennedy's assassination, which concluded Lee Harvey Oswald had acted alone. Stone was an early and relentless critic of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's policies in Vietnam, and, as a result, during the mid- and late 1960s, his newsletter became increasingly popular. In 1964, his account of the Gulf of Tonkin incident, based on a close reading of official documents, undermined the government account of events.

Fiercely independent, Stone infuriated virtually all of his readers at some point. He deplored the turn to violence by the New Left and black militants in the late 1960s. For all his commitment to free speech, he refused to defend pornography. After the Arab-Israeli war of 1967, he called on Israel to compensate Arab refugees and to turn over the occupied territories to create a Palestinian state.

As Stone's health failed, he changed his newsletter to a biweekly in 1968. He ceased publication of the newsletter in December 1971 but continued to write for The Nation and the New York Review of Books. Stone taught himself classical Greek and published The Trial of Socrates in 1988. It was his best-selling book and his last one. He died in Boston, Massachusetts, on June 18, 1989.

—MSM

Strauss, Leo

(1899–1973) philosopher

Born in Kirchhain, Germany, on September 20, 1899, Strauss was raised in a Jewish household that observed the ceremonial laws but was little concerned with Jewish knowledge. His father and uncle operated a farm supply and livestock business they inherited from their father. He attended the Kirchhain Volksschule and the Rektoratsschule, a private, Protestant institution, before enrolling at the Gymnasium Philippinum in 1912. After graduating in 1917, Strauss began the summer session at the University of Marburg but was conscripted into the German army during World War I, serving from July 1917 to December 1918. German universities allowed students to switch freely from one to the other, and Strauss attended Marburg, Frankfurt am Main, and Berlin before receiving his doctorate in 1921 at the University of Hamburg. After a postdoctoral year at the University of Freiburg-im-Breisgau that began in 1922, Strauss took a position at the Academy of Jewish Research in Berlin. His first book, Spinoza's Critique of Religion as the Foundation of His Science of the Bible, was published in 1930. Strauss received a Rockefeller fellowship in 1932 and went to Paris, where he studied medieval Jewish and Islamic philosophy. After extending his Rockefeller fellowship for a second year, he decided not to return to Germany, where the Nazis had come to power. He moved to Britain in 1934 and found temporary employment at the University of Cambridge. While in Britain, he published Philosophy and Law: Contributions to the Understanding of Maimonides and His Predecessors (1935) and The Political Philosophy of Thomas Hobbes (1936).

Unable to find permanent employment in Britain, he moved to the United States in 1937. After briefly holding a position as a research fellow at Columbia University, Strauss held a tenuous position at the New School for Social Research from 1938 to 1948. He became a U.S. citizen in 1944. Despite financial difficulties, he managed to remain productive, publishing On Tyranny in 1948. Strauss became a professor of political science at the University of Chicago in 1949. For the first time in his life, he held a secure position and earned a salary that sustained a comfortable standard of living.

Strauss combined a commitment to historical tradition with a suspicion of innovation. After leaving Germany, Strauss, who was trained in Jewish and Greek philosophy, did expand his interests to include the 17th-century philosopher Thomas Hobbes. His later writing demonstrated a concern with natural law and natural rights. He elaborated on those concerns in Natural Right and History (1953). Strauss believed that the highest American principles, expressed in the Declaration of Independence, had been eroded, by a variety of forces, including the positivist tendency of political science.

Strauss believed that the true message of a text could be discerned through close reading and the application of principles and reason. While the average reader would understand a text in one way ("exoteric"), the careful and properly educated reader would grasp its true ("esoteric") meaning. As Strauss put it: "The real opinion of an author is not necessarily identical with that which he expressed in the largest number of passages." Strauss demonstrated this idea with his own innovative reading of classical texts. In Persecution and the Art of Writing (1952), he put forward the possibility that philosophers wrote esoterically to avoid persecution by the state or religious authorities.

Moreover, he posited a correlation between reading well and leading the good life. His application of classical philosophy to politics offered an alternative to the "value free" social science of his day. Through argument and practice, he made a case for the history of political thought, which had fallen out of favor in political science, a discipline enamored with the scientific methodologies of behaviorism. Strauss traced the turning point in political philosophy to Machiavelli. By denying the certainty of a God who punished wrongdoing, Machiavelli rejected Christian virtue, which was upheld by the belief in such a God. Since virtue was unattainable, Machiavelli taught that political order had to be based on humans as they existed and therefore had to take into account their mediocrity and their vices. Against this, Strauss proposed to restore ancient philosophy as a legitimate political critique. He argued for the need to understand the ancient philosophers from their own perspective and then to apply that understanding to modern political affairs.

Strauss remained deeply suspicious of liberalism, which he believed intrinsically led to relativism and ultimately to nihilism. Its commitment to toleration meant that liberalism was unable to distinguish “timeless wisdom” from “mere opinion.” Further, he regarded mass rule as conducive to mediocrity. Strauss’s early writings demonstrated the extent to which his intellectual development was shaped by his experience as a Jew living in Germany’s Weimar Republic. During those years, he observed a liberal state so tolerant that it tolerated communists and Nazis who eventually destroyed it.

Strauss was interested in the investigation of ultimate truths, which he referred to as “first things.” In a lecture delivered in 1967, “Jerusalem and Athens,” Strauss considered at length whether reason or revelation represented a road to truth. As he saw it, until the modern era, the central question of the Western tradition was whether the Bible or “first philosophy” provided the key to the highest life.

For many years, the standard interpretation of Strauss was that, although drawn to Jerusalem (revelation), he ultimately chose Athens (reason). His most significant work consisted of studies of classical political thought, including The City and Man (1964) and Studies in Platonic Political Philosophy (1983), and Strauss won a deserved reputation as a creative and sophisticated interpreter of Plato and his school.

In the 1990s, however, a German edition of Strauss’s collected works made available his early writings, which contained substantial consideration of Jewish issues, and the State University of New York Press published the first volumes of a planned multivolume translation of Strauss’s writing on Judaism. Once again, his experience as a German Jew who lived through the early 20th century and the Weimar period proved formative. Strauss concluded that assimilation, the 19th-century liberal answer to the Jewish question, had failed. Liberalism, or assimilation, he maintained, demanded effectively renouncing Jewishness as the price of equal citizenship. That price, he argued, was too high. In addition, since the 1890s, central Europe had experienced a rise of virulent anti-Semitism, and liberal societies had proved unable and unwilling to protect their Jews against persecution. Strauss considered carefully other Jewish responses to modernity. During his late teens, Strauss embraced Zionism as a pragmatic response to the situation. Ultimately, however, he concluded that Zionism was consistent with the ethos of modern liberalism. A secular movement, it avoided the question of Jewish authenticity. As was the case with so many of his generation, World War I shattered Strauss’s confidence in reason and the prospects for a peaceable resolution of the Jewish question. He rejected the notion, advanced by the German philosopher Hermann Cohen (1842–1918) and widely discussed during Strauss’s days as a student, that Judaism was a religion of reason and as such was the basis of modern rationalism. Strauss concluded that such an approach stripped Judaism of all intrinsically religious content. If, therefore, reason did not provide the answer, perhaps revelation did.

Strauss held the Robert Maynard Hutchins Distinguished Service Professorship at Chicago until 1969, when he moved to Claremont Men’s College (later Claremont McKenna College) in California. In 1970, he moved to St. John’s College in Annapolis, Maryland, where he was the Scott Buchanan Distinguished Scholar in residence until his death in Annapolis on October 18, 1973.

—MSM

Strauss, Lewis L(ichtenstein)

(1896–1974) chairman, Atomic Energy Commission

The son of an executive who worked for a wholesale shoe manufacturer, Strauss was born in Charleston, West Virginia, on January 31, 1896. Raised in Richmond, Virginia, he attended public schools. Strauss wanted to become a physicist but his father suffered financial reverses and could not afford to send his son to college. Instead, Strauss went to work in his father’s business. When the United States entered World War I, Strauss served as HERBERT HOOVER’S personal secretary in the U.S. Food Administration. After the war, Hoover went to Paris to run the American Relief Administration, and Strauss went with him. Strauss then joined the leading Wall Street banking house of Kuhn, Loeb and Company in 1919 and became a partner in 1929. He worked for Hoover's presidential campaign in 1928 and also became active in philanthropic and cultural affairs, especially within the American Jewish community. A member of the U.S. Naval Reserve since 1925, Strauss was ordered to active duty early in 1941 and assigned to the Bureau of Ordnance. During World War II, he coordinated production and procurement of ordnance. In 1944, he went to work for Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal, where he focused on economic reconversion. At the end of the war in 1945, President HARRY S. TRUMAN made him a rear admiral, an honor only rarely extended to reservists.

In 1946, Truman appointed Strauss to a three-year term on the newly created Atomic Energy Commission (AEC), a civilian agency formed to oversee nuclear development. During the late

Lewis L. Strauss, chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission and acting secretary of commerce (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

1940s, Strauss joined EDWARD TELLER in advocating the immediate development of the hydrogen bomb as a means of maintaining American military supremacy over the Soviet Union. Other members of the commission, including its head, David Lillenthal, and its general advisory committee, headed by J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER, opposed development of the hydrogen bomb. They argued that work on the weapon should be restricted to the theoretical level for technical, strategic, and moral reasons. Truman sided with Strauss and ordered the AEC to proceed with development of the hydrogen bomb in 1950. Strauss left the AEC later that year.

In March 1953, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER named Strauss chairman of the AEC. The following year, he became involved in the Oppenheimer security hearings. In late 1953, Oppenheimer, then an AEC consultant, had his security clearance suspended following charges relating to his prewar association with left-wing groups and his ambivalence about developing the H-bomb. A special AEC security board found Oppenheimer "loyal" but voted two to one to deny him clearance in April, based on the fact that he had associated with communists and lied about it. Oppenheimer then appealed his case to the full AEC. The commission ruled four to one in May to withhold clearance. Strauss was among the majority, which stated that the decision was based on "proof of fundamental defects in [Oppenheimer's] character." Ironically, Strauss had made every effort to persuade Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) not to attack Oppenheimer, because he thought that it would generate support for Oppenheimer in the scientific community, but some people compared him to McCarthy.

Strauss also became embroiled in the Dixon-Yates contract, which exploded into a major political controversy in 1954–55. The Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) proposed building a new steam plant at Fulton, Tennessee, to supply power to the city of Memphis. The consumption of TVA power by the AEC's installations at Paducah meant that the city of Memphis would face a shortage of electricity within four years. Eisenhower, who preferred the private development of power, could not see the justification for the federal government to pay for a plant to supply power to a particular city. He ordered JOSEPH DODGE, the director of the Bureau of the Budget, and Strauss to explore the possibilities of having private industry build the plant. A private combine headed by EDGAR DIXON, president of Middle South Utilities, and EUGENE YATES, chairman of the board of the Southern Company, organized the Mississippi Valley Generating Company to build a plant that would supply power to the TVA to replace the power the TVA sold to the AEC. Strauss enthusiastically endorsed this plan, describing it as "fair" and "a splendid example" of private enterprise serving public interests. After the Dixon-Yates proposal received approval from the AEC, TVA, and Bureau of the Budget, Eisenhower approved it. The contract was signed in October. Congressional Democrats, however, denounced it as an attempt to curb the TVA. Four months later, a Senate investigation revealed that Adolphe Wenzell, the consultant to the Bureau of the Budget who had recommended the plan, was a member of the bank that was to finance the Dixon-Yates plant. As a result of this disclosure and the decision of the city of Memphis to build its own municipal power plant (which freed up power from the TVA for use by the AEC), Eisenhower ordered the AEC to cancel the contract in July 1955.

During the 1950s, Strauss continued to oppose a nuclear test ban despite the heated debate over the effects of radioactive fallout. In 1954, fallout from an H-bomb test caused radiation sickness among Japanese fishermen on a trawler hundreds of miles from the test site. Reports also circulated that radioactive fish had reached Japan. At a press conference following the incident, Strauss argued that radiation levels would decrease rapidly. Japanese scientific studies failed to substantiate the claim and convinced many scientists that Strauss was trying to cover up the effects of atomic testing. The official AEC report on the incident, issued 11 months later, minimized the effects and claimed no long-term problems, but it did little to allay the public's fears.

As the controversy over the effects of testing continued, the administration, following Strauss's advice, emphasized the importance of U.S. nuclear supremacy while stressing the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. As part of this policy, Eisenhower announced the Atoms for Peace program in 1955. Under the plan, the International Atomic Energy Agency was established to increase the supply of fissionable materials available to other nations for nonmilitary purposes.

The rancor and bitterness generated by the debate over the danger of radioactive fallout continued through the end of the decade, and Strauss continued to defend the increasingly unpopular tests. In 1956, Strauss announced that within four years the United States would develop methods for localizing fallout from atomic blasts. Two years later, however, he was forced to withdraw the claim.

Strauss further enraged proponents of a test ban in March 1958, when the AEC announced that the maximum distance for detection of an underground atomic blast was 250 miles. Critics charged that the announcement was designed to sabotage attempts to achieve an atmospheric nuclear test ban treaty, which was dependent on U.S. ability to detect Soviet underground explosions. Challenges to Strauss's statement forced the AEC to admit one week later that a blast could be detected 2,300 miles away.

Strauss's steadfast opposition to a test ban conflicted with the Eisenhower administration's growing commitment to reach agreement on such a treaty in the late 1950s. In 1958, Strauss declined Eisenhower's offer of reappointment to another five-year term as AEC chairman, saying that "circumstances beyond the control of either of us make a change in the chairmanship . . . advisable." The administration announced in June that Strauss would become Eisenhower's special assistant for Atoms for Peace.

In October 1958, Eisenhower appointed Strauss to replace SINCLAIR WEEKS as secretary of commerce. However, his role in the Dixon-Yates affair and the Oppenheimer hearings, as well as his hostility to a test ban, generated strong opposition to his confirmation. Moreover, by the time hearings on his nomination began, the Democrats had won a decisive victory in the congressional elections of 1958 and enjoyed a majority of 30 seats in the Senate. Although Eisenhower defended Strauss as "a valuable public servant . . . of the utmost integrity and competence" and refused to withdraw the appointment, the Senate rejected the nomination 49 to 46 on June 19, 1959. He became the first cabinet appointee to be denied confirmation since 1925, and he resigned June 30. After leaving the government, Strauss published his memoirs, Men and Decisions (1962), and remained active in philanthropy during the 1960s. He worked for the presidential campaigns of BARRY GOLDWATER in 1964 and RICHARD M. NIXON in 1958. He died at his estate in Culpepper, Virginia, on January 21, 1974.

—MSM

Streibert, Theodore C(uyler)

(1899–1987) director, United States Information Agency

Born in Albany, New York, on August 29, 1899, Streibert graduated from Wesleyan University in 1921 and received an M.B.A. from Harvard two years later. He remained at Harvard Business School, first as a research staff member for three years and then moved to New York as an executive in the film industry. He returned to Harvard Business School in 1929 as assistant dean and held that position until 1933. He simultaneously began a career in radio in 1933. Over the next 18 years, he was vice president, general manager, and, in 1945, president of radio station WOR. He also served as treasurer, vice president, and, from 1949 to 1951, chairman of the board of the Mutual Broadcasting System. During the opening months of the Eisenhower administration, Streibert served as an adviser to the International Information Administration and to the U.S. high commissioner in Germany.

Eisenhower appointed Streibert to be the first director of the proposed U.S. Information Agency (USIA) in July 1953. The Senate confirmed the appointment on August 3, two days after Congress passed the law creating the agency. Streibert's task was to reorganize the department and restore morale in the wake of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) attacks and severe budget cuts. The director created the office of policy and programs to centralize administration and appointed assistant directors for the four geographical divisions compromising the USIA to coordinate policy. These assistants determined content as well as policy. Because of budget cuts, the director was forced to close 26 overseas libraries, reduce Voice of America (VOA) broadcasts by 25 percent, and reduce staff by more than one-third. However, he was able to increase allocations for the office of private cooperation, which was designed to get American business and labor involved in sponsorship of USIA activities. Although regarded as somewhat high-handed, Streibert was able to improve staff morale, increase efficiency, and upgrade the quality of his personnel.

Streibert was continually forced to defend his agency against McCarthy's charges that it was infiltrated by communists. At the end of 1953, his office of security conducted an investigation in which he reported that "there were no Communists discovered" in the USIA. Streibert told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in January 1954 that he had combed his agency and that only about 20 out of 7,800 employees had been dismissed as security risks. After Eisenhower's advisory committee on information suggested in February that McCarthy discontinue his probe of the Voice of America because he was hurting the agency's reputation, McCarthy threatened to call Streibert to testify before his Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee. Streibert responded with an address to Congress in which he defended the VOA. He told Congress that the agency tried to stress the facts and avoid "strident and propagandist material," and he proudly claimed that a poll of east European refugees rated the VOA as their favorite show. He assured Congress that he had dismissed security risks and banned works by communist authors in USIA libraries.

Despite Streibert's announcement that the USIA would "concentrate on objective factual news reporting and appropriate commentaries," the agency reflected the cold war thinking of the time. The USIA praised the United States-sponsored overthrow of the leftist Arbenz regime in Guatemala, calling it a victory of free men over "red colonialism." It also tried to convince India and Egypt to renounce their neutralist policies, but it failed.

Streibert was particularly concerned to depict the dark side of Soviet totalitarianism. He focused a large portion of the agency's resources on publicizing Russian repression of the Hungarian revolt in 1956. The director also launched a "worldwide offensive to explore this spurious intellectual and ideological appeal of Communism." He ordered 54 selected books for USIA libraries, including such titles as Forced Labor in Soviet Russia and Death of Science in Russia.

In February 1955, Eisenhower appointed Streibert a member of the National Security Council's operations coordinating board. Beginning in 1956, he was invited to attend cabinet meetings. However, his influence on policymaking was slight. Streibert continued to advocate a hard line in the cold war and questioned the easing of tension between the United States and the USSR that followed the summit conference in 1955.

Streibert resigned his post in November 1956 and joined the business staff of Nelson and Lawrence Rockefeller. In 1960, he became a vice president of the Time-Life Broadcasting Corporation and served as president of the Radio Free Europe Fund from 1962 to 1965. He died at his home in Laurel Hollow, Long Island, on January 18, 1987.

—MSM

Strobel, Peter A(ndres)

(1901–1980) commissioner, Public Buildings Service, General Services Administration

Born in Denmark on May 22, 1901, Strobel graduated from Copenhagen's Technical University with a degree in civil engineering at the age of 24. He immediately emigrated to the United States, accompanied by his wife and daughter. After a long apprenticeship in the building trades, Strobel worked as chief structural engineer at the New York World's Fair of 1939. During World War II, he designed prefabricated army barracks and portable airplane hangers. After the war, his new firm, Strobel and Salzman, built shopping centers, railroad stations, and the cosmotron building at Brookhaven National Laboratory.

Upon the recommendation of the Republican National Committee, Strobel was appointed commissioner of the Public Buildings Service (PBS) of the General Services Administration (GSA) in 1954. As commissioner, Strobel operated 6,000 government buildings, supervised the construction of over 100 others, and directed the 45 factories of the National Industrial Reserve. In accepting the position as commissioner, he willingly accepted a cut in his income from the $100,000 he earned annually in the private sector to $14,800. "Perhaps," he said at the time of his appointment, "I can partly pay back this country for what it has done for me."

In September 1955, columnist DREW PEARSON charged that Strobel had not dissolved his connection with Strobel and Salzman after becoming commissioner. Strobel demanded an opportunity to refute the charges but refused to do so in Pearson's column.

When the House Judiciary Committee's Anti-trust Subcommittee opened hearings on the matter in October, Strobel cooperated fully. He admitted maintaining a 90 percent interest in his engineering firm, but he insisted that he never "used or sought to use my official position to further the firm's interests." Strobel acknowledged that, while commissioner, he pressed his firm's claim for $7,500 against the Corps of Engineers, unaware that he was violating a law forbidding federal employees from acting as agents in claims against the government. He also negotiated a $71,050 contract with the corps after being appointed commissioner but before taking office. The commissioner's testimony revealed that he had recommended several of Strobel and Salzman's clients for PBS contracts, including one for work on the new $46 million Central Intelligence Agency headquarters. However, he maintained that his firm received no profits from the jobs. The subcommittee also learned that Strobel had not signed the required standard of conduct statement, stipulating that employees get written approval before engaging in outside business activity, and had not submitted a list of his firm's clients to the agency until August 1955.

In evaluating Strobel's testimony, the chairman of the subcommittee, EMANUEL CELLER (D-N.Y.), said that, although some of the commissioner's actions might have been in violation of the criminal code, Strobel was not an intentionally dishonest man. Celler set November 22 as the deadline to hear what action the GSA contemplated against him. Strobel resigned on November 8 and returned to his firm amid rumors that members of the White House staff pressed him to resign. In April 1956, The Antitrust Subcommittee voted 4-3 to clear Strobel of unethical conduct. The Justice Department decided not to initiate criminal charges against him. He died in Palm Beach, Florida in March, 1980.

—MSM

Sulzberger, C(yrus) L(eo)

(1912–1993) journalist

Born in New York City on October 27, 1912, Sulzberger was a nephew of Arthur Hays Sulzberger, publisher of the New York Times from 1935 to 1961. His cousin, Arthur Ochs Sulzberger, published the paper from 1963 to 1992. Following his graduation (magna cum laude) from Harvard in 1934, Sulzberger began a career in journalism. Because of his family connections to the Times, he decided to try to make his name elsewhere. He went to work for the Pittsburgh Press. After a year, he moved to the United Press, where he covered labor, the Treasury Department, and the Federal Reserve system. He later wrote for the London Evening Standard. In 1939, he joined the New York Times as the Balkan bureau manager. During his first three years with the paper he traveled more than 100,000 miles through 30 countries reporting on World War II.

In 1944, Sulzberger became the chief foreign correspondent for the New York Times and headed its foreign desk. The paper gave him his own column in 1954. His column, "Foreign Affairs," appeared three times a week on the editorial page until 1970, when it moved to the Op-Ed page. He argued that powerful leaders, such as HARRY S. TRUMAN, Joseph Stalin, Charles de Gaulle, and Winston Churchill, rather than ideas shaped history. Reflecting his belief that great men shaped events, his column focused on interviews with and profiles of foreign leaders. Through Sulzberger's writing, these individuals emerged as personalities. Sulzberger began by holding interviews with Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES and former secretary of state DEAN ACHESON. From these discussions, the journalist was able to outline the differences in attitudes between the two cold warriors. Dulles emerged as a moralist anxious to carry on a crusade against communism, while Acheson appeared as a realist maintaining that morality produced useless slogans. Churchill and de Gaulle were Sulzberger's favorite subjects. He thought of both as symbols of the most positive and negative expressions of their cultures. Sulzberger called them "the last of the giants of the past age."

Sulzberger wrote two books on foreign policy during the Eisenhower administration, both of which synthesized views he had expressed in his columns. The first book, The Big Thaw: A Personal Exploration of the "New" Russia and the Orbit Countries (1956), discussed what he saw as the relaxation of Stalin's oppressive internal policies following the dictator's death. Sulzberger argued that the Soviets were extending this "thaw," in varying degrees, to its satellite nations. He believed the West would benefit from this because it could lead to a breakup of monolithic communism. In response to these developments, he advised the United States to encourage more "Titoist heresies" in eastern Europe. The publication of Sulzberger's book coincided with the Soviet suppression of the Hungarian revolt. At least one reviewer suggested that Sulzberger might want to revise his thesis in light of events in Hungary.

In 1959, Sulzberger published What's Wrong with U.S. Foreign Policy. Reiterating a theme that first emerged in his writing during the 1940s, he criticized the United States for failing to demonstrate a strong enough sense of realism and direction in its policies. Sulzberger urged the United States to stop using abstract ideology as a means of interpreting the intentions of its rivals. Russian imperialism, he argued, rather than Marxism, motivated Soviet leaders. Reflecting the importance he placed on the individuals who molded policy, Sulzberger recommended that greater care should be used in the selection of diplomats.

Sulzberger's contacts with the famous and powerful gained him many exclusive stories, and he won praise for his ability to uncover news and place it in context. At the same time, reviewers and academic critics often criticized his books for being pompous, repetitious, and overwhelmed by trivial detail. Many objected that the author injected himself too much into his columns and books.

Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, Sulzberger continued to be one of the nation's leading observers of foreign policy. Through his travels to distant lands, his meetings with foreign leaders, and his contacts with foreign policy experts at home and abroad, Sulzberger continued to document and interpret the changes in American diplomacy. He published a volume of memoirs, A Long Row of Candles, in 1969. The Fall of Eagles (1977) dealt with the collapse of the Hapsburg, Hohenzollern, and Romanov dynasties. Another volume of memoirs, Seven Continents and Forty Years, which contained numerous brief, sharply drawn portraits of world leaders, was published in 1977. Sulzberger gave up his column on the Op-Ed page of the Times in 1978 but continued to write. He died in Paris on September 20, 1993.

—MSM

Summerfield, Arthur E(Illsworth)

(1899–1972) postmaster general

The son of a rural mail carrier, Arthur Summerfield was born in Pinconning, Michigan, on March 17, 1899. He left school at the age of 13 and worked for the Weston-Mott Company and then for the Buick Motor Company. During World War I, he worked for the ammunition department of the Chevrolet plant in Flint, Michigan. He entered the real estate business in 1919 and became a distributor in Flint for the Pure Oil Company in 1924. He developed the latter business into one of the largest individual oil distributorships in the state. In 1929, he also launched the Summerfield Chevrolet Company, which eventually became one of the largest dealerships in the nation, with branches throughout his home state of Michigan. In 1937, he gave up his Pure Oil business and the following year became president of Bryant Properties Corporation, a profitable real estate business.

Summerfield entered politics during Wendell Willkie's campaign for the presidency in 1940. Seeing the failure of the local Republicans to mobilize support for Willkie, Summerfield organized his own county committee. Willkie carried the county, a factor crucial for the Republican's upset victory in Michigan. The automobile magnate thus earned a reputation as an effective political organizer.

Summerfield unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for Michigan secretary of state in 1942. The following year, he became finance director for the state's Republican Central Committee. He expanded the party's drives, which had concentrated on the wealthy, to include Republicans of all means. The method proved so successful that several other states adopted it. During World War II, he assisted in mobilizing manpower for the war effort and directed Flint's war chest campaign. Summerfield was elected to the Republican National Committee in 1944. Two years later, he made an unsuccessful bid for the Republican nomination for a seat in the U.S. Senate. In 1946, Summerfield was named to the party's national finance committee. There his fame as a money raiser approached the "legendary," according to one newspaper.

During the postwar period, Summerfield attempted to promote Senator Arthur S. Vandenberg (R-Mich.) for president, but the senator declined to run. In 1948, the Republican presidential candidate THOMAS E. DEWEY, contemplated appointing Summerfield national chairman. However, Summerfield removed his name from consideration. The following year, he accepted the chairmanship of the Republican national strategy committee. In that capacity, he designed the strategy for the congressional elections of 1950. After coming into conflict with the party's chairman, Guy C. Gabrielson, Summerfield resigned.

Summerfield headed the Michigan delegation to the Republican National Convention in 1952. Although he had initially backed Senator ROBERT A. TAFT of Ohio for the nomination, prior to the convention he shrewdly announced his neutrality in the race between General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER and Taft. The morning of the nomination meeting, he threw his support behind Eisenhower, which helped create momentum for Eisenhower's candidacy. Thirty-five of Michigan's 45 delegates voted for Eisenhower on the first ballot. Pennsylvania, the other large uncommitted state, then joined Michigan in coming out for Eisenhower. Following the convention, Summerfield became chairman of the Republican National Committee. During the summer, he successfully unified the party, which had been split by the bitter primary fight between Taft and Eisenhower.

After Eisenhower's victory in November, he announced that Summerfield would become postmaster general, a position traditionally held by one of the top functionaries of the victorious party. Summerfield surprised many by resigning as Republican national chairman and refusing to use the postal service for patronage.

In taking over the postal department, Summerfield sought to introduce business techniques to improve service and reduce the department's operating deficit. He appointed new managers to top administrative positions, made financial statements available at the end of each month, and streamlined administration. In addition, he reorganized the Postal Service's transportation patterns, standardized equipment throughout the nation to keep costs down, and closed uneconomical post offices and ended uneconomical routes. Summerfield devoted substantial resources to invest in new machinery. He persuaded Eisenhower to veto pay increases for postal workers on four different occasions, which alienated employees of the Postal Service. In 1956, Summerfield claimed that he had sharply reduced the deficit. His critics charged that the reduction resulted more from a rise in the postage rates and clever bookkeeping tricks. They also questioned the success of his reforms, charging that improvements in the department tended to be cosmetic—newly painted mailboxes, new uniforms for mailmen, and the availability of chained pens on desks in front of postal windows.

During his tenure as postmaster general, Summerfield experimented with several ways to speed the mails. In 1959, a guided missile carried 3,000 letters from a submarine in the Atlantic to a field near Jacksonville, Florida. He heralded the flight as the first known "official use of missiles by any Post Office Department in any nation." The following year, he demonstrated an electronic facsimile system to deliver mail across the nation in seconds. Letters were put on a postal form and transmitted over television microwaves. This system, however, proved too costly to operate.

Summerfield's attempts to modernize the department were often hindered by Congress, which controlled the postal budget. The legislature refused rate increases Summerfield believed necessary for modernization or to fund purchases of new equipment. The postmaster general also wanted to increase salaries of management personnel to attract better administrators, but Congress focused its attention on average postal workers, raising their pay by 8 percent in 1955. That decision appealed to the political instincts of members of Congress, but it added to Summerfield's operating costs without corresponding rate increases. The postmaster general also discovered that politics made it difficult to close uneconomic local post offices. Many members of Congress pressed him to reopen them, and he was forced to do so to maintain their support for his budget.

Summerfield waged an energetic campaign against obscene material sent through the mail. He believed that the courts had upheld his authority to bar pornography. In 1959, he reported that 315 arrests had been made that year on such charges. Intending to demonstrate the dangerous and offensive nature of the matter he sought to ban from the mails, Summerfield arranged an exhibition of seized pornographic material in Washington, D.C. Rather than persuading the public that it needed to be protected from such matter, the exhibit provoked tittering and sneers. That same year, Summerfield attempted to ban from the mails a new, unexpurgated edition of D. H. Lawrence's novel, Lady Chatterley's Lover. He stated, "Any literary merit the book may have is far outweighed by the pornographic and smutty passages and words, so that the book taken as a whole, is an obscene and filthy work." A federal district court ruled against Summerfield's action, and, on March 25, 1960, a federal court of appeals unanimously upheld the lower court's ruling. The Justice Department decided not to appeal the decision to the Supreme Court.

Following his retirement from public service, Summerfield returned to his business ventures and raised funds for BARRY GOLDWATER's presidential campaign in 1964. Summerfield died in West Palm Beach, Florida, on April 26, 1972.

—MSM

Symington, (William) Stuart (1901–1988) U.S. senator

Symington was born on June 26, 1901, into a wealthy family in Amherst, Massachusetts, where his father taught Romance languages at Amherst College. He was raised in Baltimore, Maryland. After service as a second lieutenant in the army during World War I (he never left the United States), he attended Yale University but left in 1923 without taking a degree. He worked briefly as a newspaper reporter in Baltimore and as an iron molder in his uncles' company in Rochester, New York. In 1925, he became president of Eastern Clay Products. During the next 12 years, he served as chief operating officer of three other companies, moving first to Buffalo and then to Baltimore. He took over foundering enterprises and made them into financial successes.

Symington's greatest business achievement came as president of the Emerson Electric Manufacturing Company from 1938 to 1945. When he joined the firm, it was suffering from serious labor and financial problems. Symington successfully negotiated with the unit of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers that represented Emerson and started a profit-sharing program. As a result, the employees rallied to the support of the company, profits rose, and Emerson was the only large war plant in St. Louis not to have labor problems during World War II.

After the war, President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed Symington head of the Surplus Property Board, where he directed the disposal of $90 billion in surplus war property. As director, Symington helped alleviate the housing shortage for veterans by ordering federal agencies to turn over to states without charge surplus materials, equipment, and land for emergency housing. In 1946, Truman appointed Symington assistant secretary of war for air. After passage of the Armed Forces Unification Bill in 1947, Symington became the first secretary of the air force. Believing that the United States had to act from a position of military superiority against the expansionist policies of the Soviet Union, Symington became a leading proponent of increased defense spending. He particularly advocated the development of a large nuclear-equipped air force as the cornerstone of a modern defense system. In 1950, shortly before the Korean War, Symington resigned to protest a series of cuts in military spending. Truman appointed him to chair the National Security Resources Board. A year later, at Truman's request, Symington took over the scandal-ridden Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Symington ran for the Democratic nomination for a seat in the U.S. Senate from Missouri in 1952. Although Truman had already committed to support his opponent, Symington won the primary. He easily won the general election in November and won reelection in 1958, 1964, and 1970. From the time he arrived in the Senate, he served on the Armed Services Committee, and other members deferred to him as an expert on defense. While a liberal on domestic issues, he was known primarily for his devotion to protecting the interests of the Defense Department and particularly the air force. Shortly after taking his seat, he criticized the United States for lagging behind the Soviet Union in the development of missiles and bombers. Symington alleged that the cuts in defense spending proposed by the Eisenhower administration would leave the country vulnerable to a strategic bombing campaign, an allegation that, in private, Eisenhower referred to as "pure rot."

Several years later, Symington joined such military men as General NATHAN TWining in suggesting that a "bomber gap" existed between the United States and the USSR. In April 1956, Symington headed a special subcommittee of the Senate Armed Forces Committee that held hearings on the state of American airpower. In a Senate speech in May, he stated, "It is now clear that the U.S. . . . may have lost control of the air" and called for an accounting of U.S. air strength. During three months of hearings, the panel heard testimony from a number of military leaders, including Air Force general CURTIS LEMAY, who predicted that the United States would be behind the Soviets in airpower within the decade unless spending was increased. Representatives of the administration, however, defended the president's limited budget and maintained that U.S. defenses would continue to be superior to those of the USSR. Following testimony by Secretary of Defense CHARLES WILSON, Symington charged that the Defense Department was considering going against the wishes of Congress by refusing to increase production. He also maintained that someone in the department was misleading the American people in describing comparative U.S. and USSR defense strengths. At a meeting with Republican congressional leaders, Eisenhower dismissed the agitation as "purely political."

The subcommittee's majority report, issued in January 1957, concluded that U.S. vulnerability to sudden attack had "increased greatly" and that the Soviet Union exceeded America in combat aircraft and would soon close the "quality gap." The report alleged that "the United States has never been more vulnerable to Soviet attack than now" and charged that the Eisenhower administration had placed financial considerations ahead of defense requirements. At a press conference, Eisenhower dismissed the alarmist findings of the report. He acknowledged that "the vulnerability of any nation is probably greater today than it ever was, because one bomb today can do the damage of probably all that we dropped on Germany in World War II.” On the other hand, he maintained that “we are in as good a position as we have ever been in time of peace. And I don’t believe that the position by any manner of means is deteriorating at the rate that some people would have you think.”

After the Soviet Union launched Sputnik, Symington stepped up his attack. In 1959, Symington charged that a “missile gap” existed between the United States and the USSR. He predicted that the Soviet Union would soon have a three-to-one lead over the United States in operational intercontinental ballistic missiles. That, he maintained, would enable the Russians to “wipe out our entire manned and unmanned retaliatory force” with a single blow. Eisenhower invited Symington to a private meeting in which, according to a memorandum of the conference, Eisenhower pointed out that “it would be out of character for him to be indifferent to valid assessments of Soviet strength.” Symington remained undeterred.

During the early 1950s, Symington was an outspoken and fierce opponent of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.). In February 1953, as a member of McCarthy’s Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, Symington defended Annie Lee Moss, a clerk in the Pentagon whom McCarthy had charged with having seen decoded messages while being a member of the Communist Party. Symington believed that the Annie Lee Moss under investigation was actually the wrong Annie Lee Moss, since three appeared in the Washington, D.C., telephone directory. He offered to help her find another job if she was fired as a result of McCarthy’s inquiry.

Symington also played a principal role in the Army-McCarthy hearings the following year, during which, according to the historian Robert Griffith, Symington was “McCarthy’s most intransigent foe.”

When Republicans on the subcommittee tried to get the hearings adjourned, Symington, with the cooperation of the White House, pressed for their continuation. Accused by McCarthy of using the investigation to destroy the Republican Party and Eisenhower, Symington assured the nationwide television audience watching the hearings that he was “not afraid of anything about [McCarthy] or anything [McCarthy had] to say, at any time, any place, anywhere.”

In 1959, Symington entered the campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination. His central issue was an attack on Eisenhower’s defense policies. Although he had the backing of former president Harry S. Truman, Symington’s candidacy failed. Avoiding what proved to be the decisive primary campaigns, he had based his hopes on a deadlocked convention. After Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) won the nomination, Symington was mentioned as a possible running mate, but that went to Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.).

During the 1960s, Symington continued his advocacy of increased military spending. Beginning in 1961, he chaired the Foreign Relations Committee. Although an early supporter of the war in Vietnam, the senator became an opponent of the war by late 1967. Reversing his early belief that the United States had to take a dominant role in defense of the world, Symington called on President RICHARD M. NIXON in 1973 to bring home many of the U.S. servicemen throughout the world because of the detrimental effect large-scale defense commitments had on the American economy. Symington also fought for the reassertion of congressional authority in foreign policy. He did not run for reelection in 1976. After leaving the Senate, he became vice chairman of First American Bankshares. He lived in New Canaan, Connecticut, until his death there on December 14, 1988.

—MSM

Taber, John

(1880–1965) U.S. congressman; chairman, Appropriations Committee

The son of an attorney, Taber was born on May 5, 1880, in Auburn, New York, where he attended public schools. After receiving a B.A. degree from Yale University in 1902, he attended the New York Law School for one year. Following his admission to the New York bar in 1904, he joined his father's practice in Auburn. In 1918, he established his own practice. Early in his career, Taber became involved in Republican Party politics. He sat as a special judge of the county court from 1910 to 1918. In 1922, he won election to the U.S. House of Representatives from New York's Finger Lakes region. His district reelected Taber 19 consecutive times.

During his first term, he was named to the Appropriations Committee and served on it for the rest of his career in the House. Throughout the 1920s, Taber established a reputation as a fiscal conservative, but he exercised little influence. After the Democratic landslide in 1932 wiped out the senior Republicans on the Appropriations Committee, Taber became the ranking minority member. Throughout the New Deal, he consistently voted against social welfare programs. He also opposed federal intervention on behalf of African Americans; he voted against bills outlawing the poll tax and making lynching a federal offense as well as the Fair Employment Practices Commission. In foreign policy, Taber was an isolationist until 1941, when he declared his support for Lend-Lease aid. After the United States entered the war, Taber enthusiastically supported appropriations for the war effort. He remained, however, staunchly opposed to President Franklin D. Roosevelt's domestic programs.

After HARRY S. TRUMAN became president, Taber once again attempted to cut government spending and continued to oppose social welfare measures. He attempted to block federal grants for school lunches and supported the Taft-Hartley Act while opposing wage and price controls and public housing. Although he often took internationalist positions in foreign affairs, he was a critic of foreign economic aid programs. When the Republicans gained control of Congress after the elections of 1946, Taber became chairman of the Appropriations Committee. He declared his intention to cut Truman's proposal for a $37.5 billion budget by $6 billion and to reduce the federal payroll by half. Although Taber did force reductions in domestic programs, the savings were more than offset by increased spending on the cold war. He also failed in his efforts to eliminate half of federal employees. Taber played a key role in cutting foreign relief funds in 1947 but fought unsuccessfully for substantial reductions in Marshall Plan appropriations the following year. The Democrats regained control of Congress after the elections of 1948, and Taber reverted to ranking minority member.

The election of 1952 brought DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to the White House and returned the Republicans to control in Congress. Taber once again assumed the chair of the Appropriations Committee in 1953. In July 1953, Taber's panel cut $700 million from Eisenhower's $5.1 billion foreign aid request, despite a personal appeal by the president at a breakfast meeting with the representative from New York. Most of the cuts were in the area of economic assistance. In order to secure the expeditious enactment of a foreign military aid package, however, Taber was willing to accept a somewhat higher level of economic aid at the House-Senate conference two weeks later. He urged the House to approve the bill as it came out of conference on the ground that "the world is facing a very difficult situation" and "we have got . . . to develop military strength sufficient to combat the Communist threat." The following year, after the French defeat at Dien Bien Phu in northern Vietnam, Taber defended that year's foreign aid bill. He believed that recent international developments required the United States to "do whatever we can to build up support for the defense of the Far East, Southeast Asia and the Western Pacific."

During his second term as chairman, he repeatedly took to the floor to defend cuts made by his committee. In 1953, the Appropriations Committee eliminated provisions providing for aid to schools in areas that had increased enrollment as a result of the Korean War. The entire House restored that provision, and Taber took the floor in a futile effort to reinstate the cut. That same year, he successfully fought off House efforts to increase the $60 million appropriation for the State Department's International Information Administration (IIA) approved by his committee. In opposing any increase above the level recommended by his committee, Taber charged that there were "thousands and thousands of incompetents" on the IIA payroll. Followers of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) voted with Taber because they believed that the IIA harbored left-wingers. The following year, Taber successfully opposed an effort in the whole House to restore funding for the Census Bureau to do a business census. He argued that such censuses were of no help to business and "have just historic value." Finally, in 1953, he voted against an increase in Social Security payments and the inclusion of 750,000 new workers.

After the Democrats regained control of Congress in the 1954 elections, Taber reverted to the status of ranking Republican on the Appropriations Committee. For the remainder of the decade, he was particularly vehement in opposing public works projects. In 1956, Taber asserted that "we cannot go along continuing to pile up projects that are . . . to cost a tremendous amount of money and yet have the nation land right side up." A critic of the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA), he attacked an appropriation for additional TVA power facilities in 1956 and the following year unsuccessfully attempted on the House floor to cut funding for the TVA from $13.3 million to $3.5 million. Continuing his budget-minded approach to foreign economic aid, Taber unsuccessfully attempted in 1960 to eliminate appropriations for U.S. participation in the International Development Association (IDA), which he denounced as a "giveaway."

During the administration of JOHN F. KENNEDY, Taber opposed most New Frontier legislation. In 1962, he announced that he would not seek reelection. He returned to Auburn, New York, where he died on November 22, 1965.

—MSM

Taft, Robert A(lphonso)

(1889–1953) U.S. senator; Senate majority leader

The grandson of Ulysses Grant's attorney general and son of the 27th president and 10th chief justice of the United States, Robert A. Taft was born on September 8, 1889, in Cincinnati, Ohio. After graduating first in his class at both Yale in 1910 and Harvard Law School in 1913, he returned to Cincinnati to practice law. During World War I, he was an assistant counsel to U.S. Food Administrator HERBERT HOOVER. Taft won election as a Republican to the Ohio house of representatives in 1920. During his six years in that body, he opposed prohibition and the Ku Klux Klan. His colleagues elected him Republican floor leader in 1925 and speaker in 1926. Taft retired from the legislature in 1926 and resumed his career with Taft, Stettinius and Hollister. He served a term in the state senate from 1931 to 1932. A firm opponent of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal, Taft ran for the U.S. Senate in 1938 and won. He was reelected in 1944 and 1950. His intelligence, mastery of detail, and expertise on parliamentary procedure made Taft a leader of the Republican minority from the time he entered the Senate.

Taft quickly emerged as the most articulate champion of the Republican Party's midwestern, conservative, isolationist wing. He repeatedly denounced most New and Fair Deal social programs as both wasteful and hazardous to individual liberties. He denounced expanding government bureaucracies as "creeping socialism." His stature was such that, after only a year in the Senate, he emerged as a serious candidate for the Republican presidential nomination. At the Republican National Convention in 1940, Taft and THOMAS E. DEWEY, the leader of the eastern, liberal, internationalist wing of the party, battled to a standstill, and the nomination went to Wendell Willkie on the sixth ballot.

Throughout the 1930s, Taft had opposed American military intervention in Europe. Although appalled by Nazism, he believed that the United States should go to war against Hitler only if attacked. Thus, he opposed the Lend-Lease bill in 1941 and other measures he thought likely to bring the United States into World War II. At the same time, Taft supported military preparedness and aid to Britain "consistent with the policy of staying out of the war." Among other things, Taft feared that a war would contribute to the growth of government and expansion of presidential power. World War II bore out Taft's concerns. In the Senate, Taft alone raised constitutional objections to legislation providing for the forced removal of Japanese and Japanese Americans, although he swallowed his objections when the bill passed by a voice vote without dissent.

In 1944, Taft put aside his ambition for the presidency and backed JOHN BRICKER, the governor of Ohio, for the Republican nomination. Bricker, however, lost the nomination to Dewey. In the general election, Roosevelt defeated Dewey. When Roosevelt died not quite three months into his fourth term, HARRY S. TRUMAN became president.

Taft doggedly led the congressional opposition to Truman's administration. Taft's reputation as a grim reactionary, however, derived more from his stern demeanor than from ideological rigidity. On occasion, he veered sharply from conservative orthodoxy. Beginning in 1945 and 1946, for example, Taft sponsored decidedly liberal measures providing for federally funded public housing and aid to education.

His signature legislative achievement, however, infuriated organized labor. A rash of strikes in the postwar period led to demands to curb organized labor. Truman himself called for legislation that banned secondary boycotts and strikes arising from jurisdictional disputes between unions. As chair of the Senate Labor Committee, Taft became a key player in crafting reform of the National Labor Relations Act. The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (known as the Taft-Hartley Act), which became law after Congress overrode Truman's veto, outlawed secondary boycotts, banned the closed shop, authorized the president to order an 80-day "cooling off" period to forestall strikes that threatened national health or safety, required union officials seeking certification by the National Labor Relations Board to sign noncommunist oaths, and required unions to file financial reports with the Department of Labor. Union leaders decried the measure as a "slave labor act" and warned that it would destroy organized labor. It did no such thing.

With respect to foreign policy, Taft rejected calls by some Republican leaders after the war for bipartisanship in foreign policy. Skeptical of postwar Europe's military and economic weakness, Taft took exception to Truman's primary focus on western Europe in the struggle against communist expansion. Like many midwestern conservative Republicans, Taft believed that America's primary interests lay across the Pacific. He nevertheless supported aid to Greece and Turkey and, after some reluctance, the Marshall Plan.

Taft again sought the presidential nomination in 1948. He had the loyalty of party regulars in the Midwest, but his results in the primary elections were disappointing. At the convention, Dewey's forces were better organized, and Taft lost the nomination to Dewey, whom Truman defeated in a stunning upset that November.

During Truman's second term, Taft clashed repeatedly with the administration on foreign policy. He voted against the North Atlantic Treaty, which created the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Although Taft later accepted American membership in NATO, he sought reductions in America's military commitment to the alliance.

The senator excoriated the Truman administration for “losing” China to the Communists. After North Korea invaded South Korea in June 1950, Taft denounced the “outrageous act of aggression,” which he thought “in all probability was instigated by Soviet Russia.” Had Truman gone to Congress for a joint resolution approving the dispatch of American air and naval forces, declared Taft, he would have voted for it. Nevertheless, he criticized Secretary of State DEAN ACHESON for publicly excluding Korea from the defense perimeter of the United States and thereby encouraging the North Koreans. He also attacked Truman for failing to get congressional approval for the military action.

Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) presented Taft with a dilemma. McCarthy’s charges that communists had infiltrated the State Department and the Truman administration placed Taft, the unquestioned leader of the midwestern Republicans in the Senate, in a difficult situation. Taft believed that there was some truth to the charges. Moreover, he recognized the political value of such attacks on the Truman administration. On the other hand, Taft had a solid record in support of civil liberties, and, in private, Taft complained that McCarthy did not “check his statements very carefully,” “overstated a good case,” and “made allegations which are impossible to prove which may be embarrassing before we get through.” When it became clear that McCarthy’s particular allegations were unfounded, Taft distanced himself from the junior senator from Wisconsin.

Dewey’s defeats at the hands of Roosevelt and Truman discredited him in the eyes of conservative Republicans, who detested him anyway. Conversely, Taft’s unilateralist approach to foreign policy alarmed the internationalist wing of the party, as did his dour personality and the thought that he could not win a general election. Given Taft’s popularity with party loyalists, the eastern wing of the party, led by Dewey, sought a candidate whose personal popularity could derail Taft’s seemingly certain nomination. They found such a candidate in DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

The battle for the Republican nomination in 1952 was tightly contested. At the convention in Chicago, the outcome turned on a challenge mounted by the Eisenhower forces to the credentials of the Taft delegates from Texas, Louisiana, and Georgia. The superior organization and strategy of Eisenhower’s supporters led to victory in the struggle over the contested southern delegations and ultimately to Eisenhower’s nomination.

Taft’s last and narrowest defeat for the nomination proved his greatest personal disappointment, and his defeat embittered many loyal party workers. Recognizing the need to unify the party, Eisenhower met with Taft at the nominee’s headquarters on Morningside Heights in September. After a long breakfast meeting, Taft emerged to endorse his former rival. Taft released a statement to reporters that sketched out an agreement that he and Eisenhower had reached. Taft acknowledged that he and the nominee held differing views on foreign policy, but the statement declared that the two men agreed on what Taft described as the most important issue in the campaign: the struggle for “liberty” against “creeping socialism in every domestic field.” In addition, the statement committed the candidate to reduce the budget and taxes as well as to support the basic elements of the Taft-Hartley Act. Critics, including liberal Republicans, denounced the agreement as the “surrender at Morningside Heights.”

In the weeks after his election, Eisenhower displayed only the most formal regard for Taft’s sensibilities. Several of the president’s choices for his cabinet annoyed the senator, who thought that the selections included too many leaders of big business. None perturbed him more, however, than the nomination of MARTIN DURKIN, a Democrat, labor leader, and avowed foe of the Taft-Hartley Act, as secretary of labor. Taft called Durkin’s selection “incredible.”

Eisenhower’s lopsided victory in November helped Republicans gain control of both houses of Congress, and, in December 1952, Republican senators unanimously elected Taft majority leader. Ever the party loyalist, Taft tried to put aside the frustrations of the previous year. Although his party held only a narrow, 48–47 majority, Taft constructed a working majority in support of most of Eisenhower’s domestic program. He proved to be a loyal and effective majority leader.

Senator McCarthy posed Taft’s first major problem as majority leader. Supporting some of McCarthy’s broader goals, Taft had early on defended the controversial anticommunist investigator despite private misgivings over his methods and doubts over the extent of a domestic communist menace. Taft also worried that McCarthy might embarrass the new Republican administration. He therefore charged Senator WILLIAM JENNER (R-Ind.), chairman of the Internal Security Committee, with the responsibility for investigating domestic subversion and relegated McCarthy to the chairmanship of the previously insignificant Government Operations Committee. There, Taft reasoned, "We've got McCarthy where he can't do any harm." Events proved him incorrect.

Eisenhower's nomination of CHARLES BOHLEN to be ambassador to the Soviet Union provided Taft with the greatest single challenge during his majority leadership. Largely because of Bohlen's participation in the controversial Yalta Conference of 1945, McCarthy and other militantly anticommunist Republican senators quickly denounced him as a security risk. Sensing a potentially disastrous rift within his own ranks and an early humiliation for the new president, Taft personally examined Bohlen's FBI file. He found nothing to validate charges made by the nominee's detractors. Taft refused to allow McCarthy to examine the confidential file. With the full weight of his own impeccable anticommunist credentials, Taft ardently defended Bohlen, thus assuring his confirmation in March, by a vote of 74 to 13. The votes against the nomination came from McCarthy and a handful of Republican right-wingers.

Defense policy continued to divide Eisenhower and Taft after the election. In February 1953, Taft gave a speech that anticipated the president's own farewell address by declaring, "We could destroy our liberty by a military and foreign expenditure in time of peace so great that a free economic system cannot survive." Excessive military spending, he warned, might make America a "garrison state." He failed, however, to convert Eisenhower during an April budget meeting; Eisenhower refused to reduce Defense Department requests for fiscal 1954. The president did acquiesce to Taft's suggestion that, as part of an overall effort to distinguish his image from that of his predecessor, he should replace all members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, including his old army comrade Omar Bradley.

Though essentially loyal to Eisenhower, Taft publicly differed with the president on certain aspects of foreign policy. He criticized NATO's dependence on American military power and called upon European members to play a larger role. He remained more anxious over communist expansion in Asia than in Europe. In a widely reported speech on Korea during May 1953, Taft faulted the United Nations for impeding the war there. If truce negotiations failed, Taft suggested that the United States must "reserve to ourselves a completely free hand" and expand operations against China. America, he insisted, should insist on a free, united Korea. The White House quickly released a statement making it clear that the administration did not share Taft's opinions.

Taft became seriously ill with cancer in the late spring and died in New York City on July 31, 1953. In June, he had selected WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND (R-Calif.) as his successor. Robert Taft possessed rare intelligence, courage, and integrity. Years later his various positions found support among a wide range of people. Democrats quoted his speeches in favor of public housing, and New Left scholars praised his skepticism toward a cold war leviathan state. Many conservative Republican partisans continued to seek revenge for Taft's defeat in 1952 well into the 1960s. They realized their goal with the nomination of BARRY GOLDWATER in 1964 and Ronald Reagan in 1980. The conservative wing ultimately seized control of the Republican Party. In 1959, the Senate designated Taft as one of the five greatest senators in history.

—MSM

Talbott, Harold E(Istner)

(1888–1957) secretary of the air force

Born in Dayton, Ohio, on March 31, 1888, Talbott attended the Hill School, in Pottstown, Pennsylvania, spent two years at Yale University, and joined his father's construction company in 1911. Along with a group of investors, he and his father founded the Dayton-Wright Airplane Company (a successor to the Orville Wright Company) in 1916. Talbott served as its president from 1916 to 1923. When the United States entered World War I, Dayton-Wright became the leading supplier of aircraft to the American military. In September 1918, Talbott was commissioned a major in the air service of the signal corps and assigned to France. The signing of the armistice resulted in the cancellation of his assignment. An investigation led by Charles Evans Hughes revealed that Dayton-Wright's cost-plus contracts with government resulted in profits of approximately $3.5 million. Talbott and his partners received salaries of $100,000, which were charged to the government as part of the cost of production. The government attempted to prosecute the firm in 1922, but the case was dismissed. The sale of Dayton-Wright to General Motors in 1920 made Talbott wealthy. Talbott moved to New York City in 1924. He was one of the original investors in the Chrysler Corporation and served as chairman of North American Aviation in the early 1930s.

After serving as aircraft production director of the War Production Board during 1942–43, Talbott joined the board of directors of Chrysler Corporation in 1944 and also served as a member of the finance committee of the Electric Auto-Lite Company. Beginning in the 1930s, he became a fundraiser for the Republican Party. He raised money for the presidential campaigns of Wendell L. Willkie in 1940 and THOMAS E. DEWEY in 1944 and 1948. Talbott served as chairman of the Republican National Finance Committee in 1948–49. An early supporter of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the presidency in 1952, Talbott raised money for Eisenhower's campaign that year.

President-elect Eisenhower nominated Talbott air force secretary in December 1952. Because of regulations requiring government personnel to divest themselves of stock held with firms that had government contracts, Talbott was forced to sell his stock in Chrysler and Electric Auto-Lite. However, he was allowed to continue his partnership with Paul Mulligan & Company, a general management engineering firm. The Senate confirmed Talbott by a vote of 76 to 6 in February 1953.

As secretary of the air force, Talbott improved the pay and living conditions of those serving in the air force. He also founded the Air Force Academy and oversaw the expansion of the air force from 98 to 122 wings.

In July 1955, however, the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, chaired by JOHN L.

McCLELLAN (D-Ark.), brought charges of conflict of interest against Talbott. At hearings held by the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, McClellan asked Talbott if he had used his influence to obtain business for Mulligan and Company. Talbott denied that he had; the people he had approached had been personal friends for many years. The probe, however, revealed that Talbott had solicited clients for the Mulligan Company using air force stationery. Although Talbott claimed that the prospective clients were not defense contractors, he had successfully negotiated new contracts with Olin Industries, Owens-Illinois Glass Company, and Avco Company, all of which held contracts with the Defense Department. Moreover, profits for the Mulligan Company had risen substantially since Talbott's appointment, and the secretary's personal income from the firm had averaged over $50,000 per year after his appointment.

The most damaging testimony was the revelation that the Radio Corporation of America (RCA) had declined to renew a contract with the Mulligan Company after failing to secure an advisory opinion from the Justice Department clearing it of impropriety under the conflict-of-interest laws. Talbott reportedly told an attorney for RCA that his position was "foolish" and that RCA should "come off [its] high horse and stop acting so high and mighty." Claiming that his memory was hazy, he still maintained that he had never made the alleged statement about RCA. John Johnson, general counsel to the air force, testified that Talbott had asked him to investigate whether a contract between RCA and Mulligan would constitute a conflict of interest. Johnson concluded that such a contract would neither violate existing laws nor be improper. He met with Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL to get official approval, but Brownell declined to approve it.

As a result of the hearings and newspaper coverage, Talbott was forced to resign in August 1955. His letter of resignation asserted that his conduct had been "within the bounds of ethics" and blamed his predicament on "distorted publicity." In a letter accepting Talbott's resignation, Eisenhower praised Talbott's "unexcelled" diligence in the administration of his department and his "fine accomplishments as Secretary" but stated that "under the circumstances, your decision was the right one.” In private, Eisenhower, who considered Talbott “a warm personal friend” and “a splendid public servant,” believed that the secretary had been “guilty of indiscretions” and had “made a mistake in trying to do his own work.”

Talbott received a spectacular farewell at Bolling Air Force Base and received the Medal of Freedom, the Defense Department’s highest civilian award, from Secretary of Defense CHARLES WILSON. Talbott returned to the business world “to make a little dough” and died of a stroke while vacationing in Palm Beach, Florida, on March 2, 1957.

—MSM

Talmadge, Herman E(ugene)

(1913–2002) governor of Georgia, U.S. senator

The son of Eugene Talmadge, the fiery white supremacist and anti-New Deal governor of Georgia during the 1930s, Herman Talmadge was born in McRae, Georgia, on August 9, 1913. After earning his law degree from the University of Georgia in 1936, Talmadge joined his father’s law firm in Atlanta. He managed his father’s unsuccessful bid for a seat in the U.S. Senate in 1938. Two years later, Talmadge managed his father’s successful campaign for reelection as governor. He entered the navy in 1941 as an ensign and saw action in the Pacific theater during World War II. Discharged in November 1945 with the rank of lieutenant commander, Talmadge returned to his law practice. When Eugene Talmadge entered the Democratic primary for governor in 1946, Herman once again managed the campaign. After winning the nomination, which was tantamount to winning election in Georgia, Eugene Talmadge became seriously ill. Concerned that the nominee would not survive, his followers mounted a write-in campaign in the general election for Herman Talmadge, who won enough votes to finish second to his father. In December 1946, shortly before the inauguration, the governor-elect died.

The constitution of Georgia did not clearly provide for such an eventuality, and a fierce controversy broke out between the Talmadge and anti-Talmadge factions of the Democratic Party. In January 1947, the state legislature chose Herman Talmadge to succeed his father. The outgoing governor, Ellis G. Arnall, however, refused to surrender his office. Talmadge responded by deploying units of the state police and the National Guard to seize control of the state capitol and the governor’s mansion. Arnall then abdicated his claim to the governorship in favor of the incoming lieutenant governor, Melvin E. Thompson, who took the oaths for both lieutenant governor and governor. Talmadge continued to occupy the executive departments, but, after 67 days, the state’s supreme court ruled that the legislature had acted improperly in electing Talmadge and awarded the office to Thompson.

The ultimate resolution came in a special primary election between Talmadge and Thompson in 1948. Adopting his father’s campaign trademarks (red suspenders and chewing tobacco), Talmadge projected a properly rustic image. He also adopted his father’s campaign tactics and exploited the racial fears of rural whites. Talmadge won the election.

While in office, Talmadge increased expenditures for health, education, and welfare, particularly for vocational schools, roads, and mental hospitals. He paid for these by pushing a sales tax through the legislature. At the same time, he made every effort to prevent African Americans from participating in politics. During his election campaign, Talmadge had promised to establish a new voter registration system, based on educational requirements, that would have barred 80 percent of the state’s potential black voters. The law was enacted but never enforced; Talmadge’s supporters realized that it would disqualify an equally large number of poor white voters. In another effort to exclude African Americans from voting, Talmadge unsuccessfully attempted to revive the poll tax, which had been repealed in 1945, as a means of restricting black voting.

By 1950, the Talmadge administration faced serious financial problems, and Talmadge faced a strong challenge from Thompson in the gubernatorial primary. Talmadge stressed the threat posed to white supremacy by the Truman administration’s Fair Employment Practices Commission. Emphasizing his own unambiguous commitment to segregation, he portrayed Thompson, who had ties to the national administration, as an ally of integrationists. Placed on the defensive, Thompson spent most of the campaign denying Talmadge's accusations. Talmadge won renomination and, inevitably, reelection.

As the urbanization of Georgia threatened Talmadge's rural base (he bragged that he had never carried a county with a streetcar line), he responded by sponsoring a amendment to the state constitution in 1952 that would have extended and formalized the county unit system, thereby increasing the already disproportionate electoral weight of the least populous counties. When presented as a referendum, the measure went down to defeat by 29,000 votes. At the same time, however, Talmadge made overtures to urban voters by encouraging new industries and expanding state services. Ultimately, he won a substantial urban following while retaining the allegiance of rural dwellers.

Talmadge's reaction to the Supreme Court's decision striking down segregated public schools (Brown v. Board of Education [1954]) enhanced Talmadge's prestige in Georgia. He declared that "there aren't enough troops in the whole United States to make the white people of this state send their children to school with colored children" and predicted that "blood will run in Atlanta's streets." Soon after the Court's ruling, the governor put forward a constitutional amendment that permitted the substitution of private schools for the state's public school system. Voters in Georgia overwhelmingly endorsed this device to avoid desegregation. As a result of his aggressive opposition to desegregation, Talmadge achieved virtually complete domination of the state's Democratic organization by the mid-1950s. In 1956, he defeated the longtime incumbent, WALTER F. GEORGE (D-Ga.), in the Democratic primary and went on to win election to the U.S. Senate. During the campaign, he declared that "God advocates segregation." He won reelection in 1962, 1968, and 1974.

Despite his reputation for political demagoguery, Talmadge quickly established a reputation among his fellow senators as an intelligent and well-informed legislator. During the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, he unfailingly opposed civil rights legislation (including the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965) and supported measures favorable to business interests.

During the late 1960s, however, as the number of black voters in the state increased, Talmadge became less vehement in his opposition to civil rights measures, even though he continued to vote against them. Although a strong supporter of the war in Vietnam during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, he became an opponent of the war during the administration of President RICHARD M. NIXON. By 1969, Talmadge questioned the wisdom of fighting a war that, in his opinion, the government was not attempting to win. Subsequently, he called on Nixon to withdraw American troops from Indochina in 1971. Talmadge served on the Senate Select Committee to Investigate Presidential Campaign Activities, known as the Watergate Committee, in 1973. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, as urban and African-American voters made up an increasingly large proportion of the electorate in Georgia, Talmadge became more inclined to vote for social welfare programs. For example, he helped develop the food stamp program and sponsored a school lunch program passed in 1970. In the mid-1970s, personal problems, including a messy divorce and alcohol abuse, derailed his career. The Senate Ethics Committee looked into irregularities in his campaign and office expenses. Denounced by the Senate for "reprehensible" financial misconduct in October 1979, Talmadge survived a tough primary challenge but lost the general election in 1980 to Mack Mattingly, who became the first Republican senator from Georgia since Reconstruction. Talmadge returned to Hampton, Georgia, where he resumed the practice of law. He died in Hampton on March 21, 2002.

—MSM

Taylor, Maxwell D(avenport)

(1901–1987) army chief of staff

The son of an attorney, Taylor was born in Keytesville, Missouri, on August 26, 1901. Stirred by his maternal grandfather's tales of the Confederate army, Taylor decided on a military career. After graduating from Northeast High School in Kansas City, he won appointment to West Point and graduated fourth in a class of 102 in 1922. Commissioned a second lieutenant, he joined the corps of engineers, attended engineers school, and was assigned to duty in Maryland, Hawaii, and Washington. Taylor transferred to the artillery in 1926. His demonstrated talent for languages won him an assignment to Paris in order to polish his French. He returned to West Point to teach French and Spanish from 1927 to 1932. After attending field artillery school and the command and general staff school (from which he graduated in 1935), Taylor received a posting to the U.S. embassy in Tokyo, where he served from 1935 to 1939. During the interwar years, advancement came slowly, and Taylor did not receive his promotion to captain until 1935. In 1939 he served as assistant military attaché in Beijing. Promoted to major in 1940, he served in the war plans division. He attended the army war college in 1940 and then served as commander of the 12th Field Artillery Battalion from 1940 to 1941. When the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor, Taylor was chief of staff to General MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY, commander of the 82nd Infantry Division. He received promotions to lieutenant colonel in December 1941 and to colonel in February 1942. Promoted to brigadier general in December 1942, Taylor served as artillery commander of the 82nd Airborne Division and participated in the invasions of Sicily and Italy. After one especially risky mission in Italy, for which Taylor won a Silver Star, General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER praised him for discharging his "weighty responsibilities . . . with unerring judgment." Promoted to major general, Taylor assumed command of the 101st Airborne Division in May 1944 and became the first American general to land in France on D-day. Taylor was injured during Operation Market Garden in September 1944 and missed the Battle of the Bulge. As the 101st held out desperately against the German offensive at Bastogne, Belgium, Taylor returned to join the drive to relieve his unit.

After the war, Taylor became superintendent of West Point in September 1945. He expanded the curriculum to include a greater emphasis on the liberal arts. In 1949, he became chief of staff of the U.S. Army's European command and later that year became commander of the American forces in Berlin. Taylor returned to the Pentagon in 1951 as deputy chief of staff of operations and administration, a position he held until assuming command of the Eighth Army in February 1953, during the final stages of the Korean War. In April 1955, he began a brief assignment as U.S. and UN commander in the Far East. That June, President Eisenhower selected Taylor to replace General Ridgway as army chief of staff. Ridgway had opposed Eisenhower's cuts in the defense budget and particularly his cuts in the army.

Prompted by a desire to hold down defense spending and a reluctance to commit American fighting men to unpopular wars, the administration's New Look defense policy focused on airpower and the nuclear deterrent. The administration announced that the United States would avoid debilitating ground wars such as the Korean conflict and would instead respond "swiftly and selectively" with nuclear power to stop communist aggression.

In his initial years as army chief of staff, Taylor avoided public criticism of Eisenhower's defense policy, although he almost immediately came into conflict with the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Admiral ARTHUR W. RADFORD, who supported the New Look. Taylor advocated a policy of "flexible response," which required a larger conventional military and larger defense budgets. "Air power," he argued, "is our initial line of defense, but no one has proved to my satisfaction that we will have only world wars to be settled only by big bangs. . . . infantrymen at one time or another become indispensable. . . . The atom bomb is no weapon to counter a coup d'état." When he testified in 1957 at the House Appropriations Committee's hearings on the proposed defense budget for fiscal 1958, he strongly endorsed the Defense Department's military funding request and outlined ways in which the army was spending funds more efficiently.

Months later, before the Senate Appropriations Committee, Taylor reiterated his strong support for Eisenhower's budget. He casually admitted that he had originally urged greater funding for long-range modernization of conventional forces, but he did not complain about being turned down. He did, however, warn that as the United States and USSR reached nuclear parity, the Soviet Union would grow increasingly reluctant to risk nuclear war. Consequently, the threat of subversion and limited wars would increase greatly. To meet such a danger, he maintained, the United States needed a well-equipped, highly prepared army, ready to “intervene quickly with substantial forces.” At that time, no one on the committee regarded Taylor’s comments as especially important, nor did the general himself consider them anything other than a plea for the restoration of cuts the House had made in the administration’s defense budget.

The Soviet Union’s launch of Sputnik in the fall of 1957 opened a debate within the various branches of the military on defense strategy. Taylor, with the backing of top navy personnel, spoke for a group that advocated the capacity to fight “limited wars.” He contended that Sputnik portended the end of American nuclear superiority and that conventional forces (especially army units) would therefore become vitally important in the era of stalemate to follow. He opposed a primary reliance on missiles and nuclear weapons on the ground that they limited options. In contrast, a faction headed by the air force proposed that the United States increase funding for strategic aircraft and missiles in order to maintain its traditional nuclear superiority.

Taylor’s demands for increased defense spending brought him into conflict with Eisenhower. The president angrily criticized Taylor’s failure to appreciate the broader considerations, particularly economic factors, involved in constructing defense policy. As a result of his stand, Taylor was eased out of his position as army chief of staff. When his term ended in June 1959, he retired from the army but continued to express his views, both in print and on television.

In 1960 he published The Uncertain Trumpet, a biting attack on the administration’s New Look. Instead of a policy that he argued would lead either to general war or to compromise and defeat, Taylor advocated a “flexible response” that would enable the United States to respond to “anything from general war to infiltration, aggression,” or subversion. Taylor focused particularly on the ability to fight small, local wars, where the use of nuclear weapons was inappropriate. He believed that such a policy could be achieved only by building up both conventional and nuclear forces.

Taylor’s book impressed JOHN F. KENNEDY, who used the arguments to attack the Eisenhower administration’s defense policy during his presidential campaign in 1960. Taylor’s ideas about limited war in particular influenced Kennedy. Early in his presidency, Kennedy named Taylor to conduct an investigation of the failed invasion at the Bay of Pigs. Kennedy created a new post of military representative of the president and convinced Taylor to return to active duty to assume that position in July 1961. Taylor became chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in October 1962. His theories shaped America’s early military response to the war in Vietnam. Kennedy had sent him on a mission to South Vietnam in October 1961, after which he reported that the situation was deteriorating and urged the president to increase economic and military aid to the government in Saigon. Following Taylor’s advice, Kennedy increased American involvement. Taylor was also instrumental in gaining the support of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty in 1963. After Kennedy’s assassination, Taylor continued as chairman of the Joint Chiefs under President LYNDON B. JOHNSON. In July 1964, Johnson appointed Taylor ambassador to Vietnam. In that capacity, Taylor controlled the American forces then in Vietnam and played an important role as the United States escalated its involvement. Taylor remained at that post until July 1965, when he returned to the United States as a special consultant to the president. He continued in that position until the end of the Johnson administration. In retirement, Taylor published Precarious Security in 1976. He lived in Washington, D.C., where he died on April 19, 1987.

—MSM

Teller, Edward

(1908–2003) associate director, Lawrence Livermore Laboratory, Atomic Energy Commission

The son of a well-to-do Jewish lawyer, Teller was born in Budapest, Hungary, on January 15, 1908. At the age of 18, he left the increasingly anti-Semitic atmosphere of Hungary for Germany and the Institute of Technology at Karlsruhe. Intrigued by physics, especially the new theory of quantum mechanics, Teller transferred to the University of Munich in 1928. He completed his doctorate at the University of Leipzig in 1930 and then joined the faculty of the University of Göttingen. After the Nazis came to power in 1933, Teller fled Germany. In 1934, he went to Denmark, where he worked at the Institute for Theoretical Physics under the renowned Danish physicist, Niels Bohr. From there, Teller emigrated first to England, where he held a job at the University of London, and then, in 1935, to the United States, where he took up a position at George Washington University. He became an American citizen in 1941.

In 1941, Teller joined the Manhattan Project, the top secret project that developed the atomic bomb. He worked at the University of Chicago with Enrico Fermi and at the University of California at Berkeley with J. ROBERT OPPENHEIMER. In 1942, he participated in a planning seminar, convened by Oppenheimer, to discuss the development of atomic weapons. At that meeting, Teller raised the possibility of creating a bomb that worked through the thermonuclear fusion of isotopes of hydrogen and deuterium (heavy hydrogen). In 1943, Teller went to Los Alamos, New Mexico, where a laboratory had been established for research on the atomic bomb. His ambition to create a fusion bomb led to friction with Oppenheimer, the laboratory's director, who insisted that the laboratory concentrate on the development of a fission weapon (a less complicated device that worked by splitting the atom). Moreover, the development of a hydrogen bomb encountered major scientific and technological obstacles. Despite his focus on a fusion weapon and his sometimes egocentric behavior, Teller made valuable contributions to the development of the atomic bomb. Following the first successful test of an atomic bomb in 1945, the sense of urgency surrounding the development of the H-bomb diminished.

After the war, Teller turned down an offer to remain at Los Alamos as director of the theoretical division and returned to the University of Chicago in 1946. During the postwar period, Teller played an important part in the debate among nuclear scientists over the role of atomic weapons. He supported the Baruch Plan that called for the creation of an atomic development authority under the auspices of the United Nations. The Soviet rejection of the Baruch Plan convinced Teller that hopes for an accommodation with the Soviet Union were chimerical and that an arms race was inevitable. He believed that, in order to maintain American military superiority over the Soviet Union, the United States should work on developing a hydrogen bomb. The explosion of the Soviet Union's first atomic device in 1949 induced Teller to push for a crash program to develop the H-bomb. Ernest O. Lawrence, a physicist from the University of California at Berkeley, joined Teller in advocating development of the hydrogen bomb. Military leaders supported their position. The majority of the Atomic Energy Commission's (AEC) General Advisory Committee (GAC), including its chairman, Robert Oppenheimer, however, opposed the plan on moral and technical grounds. They questioned the project's military value, believed that it would escalate the arms race, and thought it too costly as well as fraught with technical problems. These scientists recommended gradual development of the "Super," as the H-bomb was called. President HARRY S. TRUMAN supported Teller's position and ordered a crash program in 1950.

Teller returned to Los Alamos to work on developing the weapon. In 1952, Teller, who had lobbied for the creation of a second center for thermonuclear research, left Los Alamos for the newly created laboratory at Livermore, California, a branch of the Berkeley Radiation Laboratory. A thermonuclear device was successfully tested in November 1952, and the first hydrogen bomb was detonated in May 1954. Teller became known as "the father of the hydrogen bomb," a title he detested.

Teller played a central role in the Oppenheimer security hearings of 1954. Oppenheimer's security clearance had been suspended in 1953 on the grounds that his prewar leftist associations and his reluctance to develop the H-bomb raised significant doubts about his loyalty. Of the six scientists involved in the H-bomb controversy who testified at the AEC hearing, only Teller supported denying Oppenheimer's security clearance. Teller told the security board that he considered Oppenheimer a loyal American and that Oppenheimer's direction of Los Alamos, both as a scientist and as an administrator, constituted "a very outstanding achievement." Nevertheless, Teller stated his belief that Oppenheimer had hindered work on the development of a thermonuclear weapon, which Teller argued might have been produced "about four years earlier" if "at the end of the war people like Oppenheimer had lent . . . moral support” to the project. “If it is a question of wisdom and judgment, as demonstrated by actions since 1945,” concluded Teller, “then I would say one would be wiser not to grant clearance.” The board agreed with Teller.

Teller served as director of the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory (which he, along with Ernest Lawrence, had helped found) from 1958 to 1960. After that, he continued as an associate director and held a professorship of physics at the University of California at Berkeley. He also chaired the committee that founded the Space Sciences Laboratory at Berkeley.

As the dangers of radioactive fallout became publicized in the late 1950s, demands for a nuclear test ban grew. Teller continued to support tests because he thought them necessary not only to maintain American military superiority but also to improve nuclear weapons and solve the problem of fallout. In meetings with the president and congressional committees in 1957 and 1958, Teller assured government leaders that the United States would produce a “clean bomb,” free of fallout, within four or five years. Although he conceded that “thousands of genetic mutations might result from test radioactivity,” he warned that the United States “may be sacrificing millions of lives in a ‘dirty’ nuclear war later” if it agreed to a test ban.

After the Soviet Union launched Sputnik in 1957, Teller advocated space research for both its scientific and its military value. He also recommended that the government develop plans for quick industrial recovery from a nuclear missile attack and that it institute a massive fallout shelter program. Teller participated in a panel sponsored by the Rockefeller Brothers Fund that, in its report released in January 1958, urged “substantially increased defense expenditures.”

In the 1960s, Teller continued to oppose a nuclear test ban; indeed, he stepped down as director of Lawrence Livermore in order to lobby against the test ban. During the administration of JOHN F. KENNEDY, Teller continued to press for nuclear tests. In 1963, at Senate hearings on the nuclear test ban treaty, Teller was the most influential scientist to testify against ratification. In subsequent years, he persisted in his advocacy of a strong national defense. He made headlines in the 1970s by promoting the development of nuclear fusion as an alternative source of energy. Teller became a senior research fellow at the Hoover Institute for the Study of War, Revolution and Peace at Stanford University in 1975. In the 1980s, he defended the development of a strategic missile defense system. President George W. Bush presented Teller with the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 2003. Teller died in Palo Alto, California, on September 9, 2003.

—MSM

Thomas, Charles S(arks)

(1897–1983) undersecretary of the navy, assistant secretary of defense for supply and logistics, secretary of the navy

Born in Independence, Missouri, on September 28, 1897, Thomas moved with his parents to Los Angeles, California, in 1911. He attended the University of California at Berkeley during 1915–16 before transferring to Cornell University. Thomas left school during his junior year to serve as a naval aviator during World War I. In 1919, he joined the Los Angeles investment house of George H. Burr Company, subsequently becoming a partner and vice president. Named vice president and general manager of Foreman and Clark, Incorporated, a retail clothing manufacturer, in 1932, he saved the company from bankruptcy during the depression and advanced to become president and director by 1937.

During World War II, Thomas became special assistant first to Artemus L. Gates, assistant secretary of the navy for air, and later to Secretary of the Navy James L. Forrestal. After the war, Thomas returned to Foreman and Clark. He also served as airport commissioner of Los Angeles from 1945 to 1950 and assumed several corporate directorships, including one with Lockheed Aircraft Corporation.

In February 1953, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER appointed Thomas undersecretary of the navy and five months later promoted him to assistant secretary of defense for supply and logistics. Thomas's duties were similar in both capacities. His major project was to formulate a single catalogue of equipment used by the three armed services, thus preventing duplication and saving money.

In March 1954, Eisenhower nominated Thomas to be secretary of the navy. As secretary, Thomas faced several vexing matters relating to loyalty and security. In October, acting on the recommendation of Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, Thomas suspended the security clearance of Edward U. Condon, an authority on quantum mechanics who had worked as Oppenheimer's deputy at Los Alamos and then as director of the National Bureau of Standards from 1945 to 1951. In the late 1940s, as president of the American Physical Society, Condon called for closer working relations with the Soviet Union. This raised the ire of J. Parnell Thomas (R-N.J.), the chair of HUAC. The scientist insisted that the secretary of commerce have his loyalty investigated. Soon after the Commerce Department's loyalty board cleared Condon. However, in 1948, HUAC issued a report calling him "one of the weakest links in our atomic security." Condon left the government in 1951 and went to work for Corning Glass Works. Since Corning held classified contracts, Condon required security clearance, which he had received. At Nixon's urging, Thomas suspended Condon's security clearance on the ground that the scientist had knowingly or unknowingly associated with alleged Soviet espionage agents. After initially announcing his readiness to be cleared "a fifth time," Condon resigned from Corning.

In August 1955, Thomas announced that he would personally review the case of Eugene W. Landy, a graduate of the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy who had been denied a commission in the naval reserve because his mother had been a member of the Communist Party from 1937 to 1947 and still subscribed to the party's organ, the Daily Worker. Landy's mother protested that she had left the party at her son's urging. Thomas appointed a special review board, which, in late September, recommended against issuing Landy's commission. Thomas, however, overruled the board and made Landy an ensign in the naval reserve.

Thomas spent much of his time as secretary of the navy attempting to defend the administration's policy of reducing the military budget. In January 1958, he testified before the House Armed Services Committee that the navy and the marine corps could maintain and even increase their striking power

Newly sworn in Secretary of the Navy Charles S. Thomas shakes hands with President Eisenhower, May 3, 1954 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

despite the administration's budget cuts, which resulted in reductions of both manpower and vessels. Two years later, the secretary returned to Capitol Hill to defend the administration's program, which eschewed large increases in the military budget and instead emphasized more efficient use of equipment on hand over the building of costly new weapons systems. "In essence," said the navy secretary, "the United States could not endure if it either permitted its military arsenal to rust," or if "in response to some transient danger," it undertook a "prolonged and full mobilization during peace time."

In March 1957, shortly after his testimony before the House, Thomas resigned as secretary of the navy. That June, he became chairman of the Republican National Finance Committee. From 1958 to 1960, he was president and chief executive officer for Trans World Airlines. He became president of the Irvine Company of Tustin, California, in 1960, a post he held until his retirement in 1966. In 1971, President Richard Nixon appointed Thomas chairman of the National Tourism Review Commission, a group composed of business leaders and government officials organized to encourage foreign travel in the United States. Thomas died in Corona del Mar, California, on October 17, 1983.

—MSM

Thomas, Norman M(attoon)(1884–1968) peace and reform advocate

Descended from three generations of ministers, Thomas was born in Marion, Ohio, on November 20, 1884. After graduating from Marion High School in 1901, he spent a year at Bucknell University before transferring to Princeton University as a pre-divinity student. Thomas graduated as valedictorian of his class at Princeton in 1905. He then engaged in social work at the Spring Street Presbyterian Church's settlement house in a working-class section of New York City. He became a minister's assistant at New York's Christ Church and then associate pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church. He received a B.D. from Union Theological Seminary, a leading center for the Social Gospel, in 1911 and became pastor of the East Harlem Presbyterian Church in New York City. He also directed the American House, a settlement house in an immigrant neighborhood.

Thomas opposed American participation in World War I. In 1917, he joined the Fellowship of Reconciliation, a religious pacifist group and edited its official organ, the New World (which soon became the World Tomorrow), from 1918 to 1921. That same year, he helped to found the National Civil Liberties Bureau (later the American Civil Liberties Union [ACLU]).

Thomas supported the socialist candidate, Morris Hillquit, for mayor of New York in 1917. The next year, Thomas joined the Socialist Party and resigned from the ministry. He advocated a gradual, democratic transition to socialism. His views blended traditional Marxism with tenets of the Social Gospel. Although sympathetic to the Bolsheviks, he criticized their rejection of democracy. He departed from the overwhelming majority of his party and argued that racism constituted a social problem independent of economics.

In 1921, Thomas left the World Tomorrow and became associate editor of the Nation, a liberal magazine. A year later, he became coordinator of the League for Industrial Democracy. He briefly edited the socialist daily paper, the New York Leader; but in 1922 his wife inherited a trust fund that provided the couple with a comfortable income. Freed from the need to earn an income, Thomas devoted himself to various causes. He was the Socialist candidate for governor of New York in 1924 and mayor of New York City the following year. During the 1920s, he emerged as a leading figure in the Socialist Party, and, on the death of Eugene Debs in 1926, Thomas became the party's national leader. Thomas headed its national ticket in every presidential election from 1928 through 1948. He advocated unemployment insurance, child labor laws, legislated minimum wages and maximum hours, collective bargaining, programs to retrain workers in declining or obsolete industries, and government planning of the economy. His most successful electoral effort came in 1932, when he polled about 3 percent of the total vote. Thomas supported some elements of the New Deal, but, for the most part, he remained critical of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his programs. Thomas regarded the New Deal as an effort to prop up a doomed system and attacked its limitations.

For all of Thomas's rhetorical skills, he was a poor organizer and administrator. During the depression, his party disintegrated into warring factions and lost ground to the communists.

Unlike many on the left, Thomas was not taken by the illusion of the Soviet Union. After touring the Soviet Union and Spain in 1937, he castigated the USSR as an oppressive society and denounced Stalin's purges and show trials.

The Spanish civil war caused Thomas to question his commitment to pacifism. Nevertheless, he opposed American intervention in the burgeoning European crisis. In 1938, he founded the Keep America Out of War Committee. He was associated with the America First Committee, the most powerful anti-interventionist group, but broke off that association after Charles Lindbergh, one of the organization's founders, made an anti-Semitic speech. Based on the experience of World War I, Thomas viewed war as a threat to American democracy. When World War II broke out in Europe, Thomas opposed American entry. After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, however, he offered "critical support" to the war effort. Thomas's reluctant endorsement of the war cost the Socialist Party support, as did his outspoken opposition to the internment of Japanese Americans.

During the late 1940s, Thomas was a forceful critic of Soviet despotism and expansionism.

He denounced Henry A. Wallace, the Progressive Party presidential candidate in 1948, as an apologist for Soviet aggression and an advocate of peace by appeasement of Stalin. Nevertheless, Thomas favored international agreements to reduce arms and in 1950 called on President HARRY S. TRUMAN to propose disarmament at the United Nations. During the same year, Thomas urged the Socialist Party to abandon its increasingly ineffectual electoral efforts, but its national convention rejected this proposal.

The red scare presented Thomas with a difficult balancing act. He had helped purge communists from the ACLU's leadership in 1940. In the late 1940s, he denounced Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY's (R-Wis.) campaign against communists in government as a threat to civil liberties and defended the right of communists to engage in legal political activity. There were limits, however, to Thomas's defense of communists. He drew a distinction between dissenters and conspirators and regarded communists as conspirators. Thus, he did not believe that communists had a right to hold positions as teachers or sensitive government jobs.

Widely admired even by those who strongly disagreed with his views, Thomas refrained from expressions of personal animosity and tempered his often impassioned rhetoric with wit. Even opponents acknowledged his integrity and genuine compassion for the weak. Furthermore, he explicitly rejected Leninism and advocated instead the peaceful establishment of a democratic form of socialism.

During the 1950s, Thomas's prestige rose still further, because he became increasingly identified as an individual advocate of reform rather than as a partisan leader of the Socialist Party. Thomas continued to act as a spokesman for the group, but, over the course of the decade, he gave up his posts in the dwindling organization. In 1952, he supported the Socialist ticket and campaigned for it, but he developed an admiration for ADLAI E. STEVENSON, the Democratic presidential nominee and a fellow Princetonian. In private, Thomas made it clear that he hoped Stevenson would win in 1952 and again in 1956.

After DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER became president, Thomas continued to balance his opposition to communism with concern for civil liberties. He continued to excoriate McCarthy and urged clemency for JULIUS AND ETHEL ROSENBERG, even though he believed them guilty. Thomas met with Eisenhower in October 1953 to protest the exclusion of Socialists from policy-making positions and the broad definition government officials had given to such posts. Thomas was always sensitive to the notion that Socialists were disloyal. In addition, the State Department and Mutual Security Agency were dismissing Socialists who did not hold policy-making positions. Eisenhower agreed that Socialists should not be barred from jobs that did not involve making policy. Thomas emerged from the meeting impressed with the president, whom he found "an extremely decent man" who "showed a much better understanding of what Socialism really was than I expected."

While Thomas condemned communist tyranny, he supported peaceful coexistence with the Soviet Union because he thought it necessary in order to avoid a nuclear holocaust. He persistently advocated disarmament and placed part of the blame for failures to achieve arms reductions upon the United States. In 1955, Thomas criticized the Eisenhower administration for rejecting a British and French proposal, accepted by the Soviet Union, to reduce conventional forces. Two years later, he condemned the United States for turning down a Soviet plan for a monitored moratorium on nuclear tests.

In 1957, Thomas and NORMAN COUSINS were key figures in organizing the Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy (SANE). In 1960, the group held a rally in New York City, attended by more than 17,000 people, to urge an end to nuclear testing and a concerted effort to end poverty. That same year, Senator THOMAS DODD (D-Conn.), vice chairman of the Internal Security Subcommittee, charged that SANE was heavily infiltrated by communists and fellow travelers. The organization's national board issued a policy statement, endorsed by Thomas, barring communists from membership in the organization. Shortly afterward, 37 members of SANE's New York City chapter, which openly opposed this policy, were subpoenaed by Senate investigators. The national board, at Thomas's insistence, refused to come to their defense. Subsequently, the board revoked the local chapter's charter.

Thomas favored Stevenson for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1960. When Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.) captured the nomination, Thomas reluctantly backed him in the general election. Thomas testified before a Senate committee in July 1963 as a supporter of the administration's civil rights bill, which he regarded as a worthwhile but timid step toward ending racial injustice. During the administration of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Thomas stridently criticized America's military involvement in Vietnam. A stroke forced him to withdraw from public life in 1967. Thomas died in Huntington, New York, on December 19, 1968.

—MSM

Thompson, Frank, Jr.

(1918–1989) U.S. congressman

The son of a newspaperman and the nephew of a Democratic leader in New Jersey, Thompson was born in Trenton, New Jersey, on July 16, 1918. He attended public and parochial schools, Wake Forest College in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, and Wake Forest Law School. He served in the navy from 1941 to 1948 and saw action in the Pacific, where he won the Bronze Star. After gaining admission to the bar in 1948, he practiced law in Trenton. In 1949, he won election as a Democrat to the New Jersey state assembly. He served in the assembly until he won election to Congress in 1954 as a self-styled "New Deal-Fair Deal Democrat of the Adlai Stevenson School." During his campaign, he called for a bipartisan foreign policy and drastic revision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

In the House, Thompson voted in agreement with the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education's (COPE) recommendations on most issues. As a member of the Education and Labor Committee, he quickly emerged as a leading advocate of federal aid to education. In January 1959, Thompson sponsored a bill, drafted by the National Education Association, to provide $1.3 billion in federal grants to local school districts for the construction of schools and teachers' salaries. He claimed that the bill would finance 25,000 new classrooms and, through provisions for federal-state matching funds, would encourage the states to build 15,000 to 16,000 more. In January 1960, the Senate passed a version of the proposal, but strong conservative opposition threatened its passage in the House. Responding to pressure from the administration to water down the bill, Thompson removed the provisions for aid to teachers' salaries and amended it to require equal matching of federal with state funds during every year of the proposed four-year program.

Passage of the bill was further threatened by an anti-segregation rider attached by Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR. (D-N.Y.). Recalling that a similar rider had led to the defeat of a bill to provide funds for school construction in 1956, Thompson accused conservatives in the House of supporting the Powell amendment solely to prevent the bill's final passage. He declared that individual school districts defying court orders to desegregate could be denied funds under the bill "without the addition of any amendment," because the Constitution was "self-enacting." The bill passed with the rider attached in May 1960. However, the House Rules Committee killed the measure by refusing to authorize a House-Senate conference, which might have resolved the differences between the House and Senate versions.

Despite his opposition to the Powell amendment, Thompson generally supported civil rights throughout his congressional career. In 1959, he helped bring a number of younger liberal members of Congress together in the Democratic Study Group, and he led an unsuccessful fight the same year to curb the power of the conservative-dominated Rules Committee to keep legislation from the floor. Limiting the power of the Rules Committee would have prevented its ability to block civil rights legislation.

Thompson actively supported JOHN F. KENNEDY in the presidential campaign of 1960, and, after Kennedy won the election, Thompson introduced the new administration's proposal for federal aid to schools in 1961. A key sponsor of legislation that created the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment of the Humanities, Thompson also authored the bill that established the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C. Thomas lost his bid for reelection in 1980 after being caught up in the Abscam scandal. Posing as a rich Arab sheik and his aides, federal agents offered to bribe several American public officials. The investigation led to the conviction of Thompson and six other members of Congress for bribery and conspiracy. Thompson served two years of a three-year prison sentence. After unsuccessful appeals of his conviction, he went to prison from 1983 to 1985. Upon leaving Congress, he resided in Alexandria, Virginia, until his death in Bethesda, Maryland, on July 22, 1989.

—MSM

Thompson, Llewellyn E., Jr.

(1904–1972) high commissioner for and ambassador to Austria, ambassador to the Soviet Union

The son of a rancher, Thompson was born in Las Animas, Colorado, on August 24, 1904. He graduated from the University of Colorado in 1928 and then entered the School of Foreign Service at Georgetown University. The following year, he joined the Foreign Service and was sent to Ceylon (later Sri Lanka) as vice consul. In 1933, Thompson moved to Geneva, Switzerland, where, over the next seven years, he served as vice-consul and then as consul. During the latter half of the decade, he also worked as adviser to the conferences of the International Labour Organization. Thompson returned to the United States in 1940 and attended the army war college. In November 1940, Thompson was appointed second secretary and consul at the American embassy in Moscow. In 1941, the German army reached the gates of Moscow. Most of the Soviet government, including the foreign ministry, as well as the foreign diplomatic corps moved to Kuibyshev. Thompson remained in Moscow through the siege and won the admiration of the Soviets for his willingness to share their risks and hardship. President Franklin D. Roosevelt awarded Thompson the Medal of Freedom for his service.

During the last year of the war and in the decade after its end, Thompson's career progressed through a series of increasingly important assignments. From 1944 to 1946, he was stationed at the United States embassy in London. Following the war, Thompson returned to Washington, where he held a number of administrative positions in the State Department: chief of the division of Eastern European affairs from 1946 to 1947, deputy director for European affairs from 1947 to 1949, and deputy assistant secretary of state for European affairs from 1949 to 1950. In June 1950, he became counselor of the embassy in Rome. President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed Thompson high commissioner to Austria in July 1952.

As commissioner, Thompson spent a good deal of his time negotiating the Trieste settlement of 1954 and the Austrian State Treaty of 1955. Both Italy and Yugoslavia claimed the key port of Trieste, which had been placed under the jurisdiction of the United Nations following World War II. In 1954, after eight months of patient negotiations with both sides, Thompson worked out an agreement. Italy and Yugoslavia signed an agreement in October, under which Italy took possession of the northern half of the disputed territory, including the city of Trieste, and Yugoslavia occupied the southern area, including the Slovene town of Crevatini. Thompson later recalled that the agreement "was one of the few things we have done that even the Russians approved."

Simultaneously, Thompson worked on the Austrian State Treaty, signed in May 1955. After World War II, Austria had been placed under the joint occupation of France, Great Britain, the USSR, and the United States. Over the next 10 years, the United States made repeated attempts to negotiate a treaty ending the occupation, but the Soviet Union, fearing a revitalized, pro-Western Austria bordering on Eastern Europe, refused to normalize relations. In 1955, however, the USSR dramatically announced its willingness to negotiate the issue. In 11 days of arduous bargaining, Thompson worked out the final terms of an agreement. Under the treaty, Austria regained its independence in return for its military neutrality.

In 1957, Eisenhower appointed Thompson ambassador to the Soviet Union. Since Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES dominated policy making, Thompson had little role in molding American policy toward the Soviet Union. He served primarily as a reporter of events and a negotiator who arranged many of the top-level conferences of the period. At Thompson's urging, Eisenhower invited Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev to visit the United States in 1959. The ambassador arranged the trip, accompanied the Soviet leader, and also took part in the meetings between Khrushchev and Eisenhower at Camp David, Maryland. The “spirit of Camp David” marked a notable relaxation of tensions in the cold war. Following the visit, Thompson was instrumental in laying the groundwork for the ill-fated Paris summit conference of 1960, which was cancelled after the downing of a U-2 intelligence plane over the Soviet Union. Despite the incident, Thompson maintained good relations with Khrushchev and the Soviet foreign minister, Andrei Gromyko. In 1960, Thompson achieved the rank of career ambassador.

Thompson remained in Moscow for the first two years of the administration of President JOHN F. KENNEDY. During this period, he helped to arrange the Vienna summit conference in 1961. In fall 1962, Thompson returned to Washington as ambassador at large and special adviser to the State Department on Soviet affairs. He aided in the negotiations leading to the nuclear test ban treaty in 1963. After LYNDON B. JOHNSON became president, Thompson served as acting deputy undersecretary of state from 1964 to 1966. Johnson appointed him ambassador to Moscow in 1967, a post he held until 1969. Adam Ulam, a specialist on Soviet affairs at Harvard, called Thompson, “the most effective of our Moscow envoys” in the post-World War II period. Thompson retired from the Foreign Service in January 1969, but President RICHARD M. NIXON called him back to serve on the American delegation to the strategic arms limitation talks. Thompson retired for a second time in 1971 and died in Bethesda, Maryland, on February 2, 1972.

—MSM

Thurmond, Strom

(1902–2003) U.S. senator

The son of a lawyer and politician, Thurmond was born in Edgefield, South Carolina, on December 5, 1902. He received a B.S. from Clemson College in 1923 and worked as a high school teacher until, after winning election as county school superintendent in 1928, he took office in July 1929. While working as school superintendent, Thurmond studied law with his father. Thurmond was admitted to the South Carolina bar in 1930 and almost immediately elected as attorney for Edgefield. In 1933, Thurmond won election to the state senate from Edgefield. In the legislature, he supported a number of social welfare programs, including the state’s first bill providing aid to the aged, the blind, and needy children. In 1938, the state legislature elected Thurmond to fill a vacancy as a circuit judge; two years later, the legislature elected him to a full term. A member of the U.S. Army Reserves, Thurmond enlisted in the army as a captain immediately after the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor. By 1944, he was a lieutenant colonel in a civil affairs unit with the 82nd Airborne, and he landed in France by glider on D-day. Among other decorations, he won the Bronze Star and French Croix de Guerre. Thurmond resumed his judgeship after being discharged from the service in January 1946, but he stepped down from the post the following May to run for governor. His opponents in the Democratic primary charged him with being a New Dealer and hinted that he was receiving money from the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Nevertheless, he won his party’s nomination, which was tantamount to election in South Carolina. As the state’s chief executive, Thurmond increased appropriations for education and health care facilities, led a successful drive to repeal the poll tax, and backed a bill establishing a minimum wage and maximum hours. After a mob in Greenville lynched an African American accused of robbing and killing a white taxi driver, Thurmond appointed a tough prosecutor who obtained indictments against 28 alleged members of the mob. A jury, however, acquitted all of the defendants. Thurmond won praise for his strong stand against lynching. He also pressed to improve black schools and appointed an African American to the state Hospital Advisory Council.

Thurmond entered the national political scene, however, as a staunch conservative. In 1948, when liberals, led by HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, forced a stronger civil rights plank into the Democratic platform at the National Democratic Convention, some of the southern delegates walked out of the convention. They then organized a third party, the States’ Rights Democrats (popularly known as the Dixiecrats), and nominated Thurmond for president. Opposing what he regarded as federal encroachment upon the constitutional powers of the states, Thurmond denounced Truman’s civil rights and social welfare programs as well as the president's call for federal control of tidelands oil. Above all, Thurmond opposed racial integration. "All the laws of Washington and all the bayonets of the Army," he declared, "cannot force the Negro into our homes, into our schools, our churches and our places of recreation and amusement." Thurmond received nearly 1.2 million popular votes, almost all from the south, and captured 38 electoral votes (he carried Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina). In subsequent national campaigns, Thurmond did not endorse the Democratic national ticket.

In 1950, Thurmond challenged the incumbent, Senator Olin D. Johnston (D-S.C.), in the Democratic senatorial primary. Though at least as committed a segregationist and white supremacist as Thurmond, Johnston had remained loyal to the Democratic Party in 1948. Johnston defeated Thurmond, who moved to Aiken and returned to the private practice of law. In 1952, Thurmond once again bolted from the national Democratic Party and backed DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the presidency.

Thurmond reentered politics in 1954, when incumbent senator Burnet R. Maybank (D-S.C.) died after winning renomination in the Democratic primary. The South Carolina Democratic Executive Committee, dominated by loyalist Democrats, chose State Senator Edgar A. Brown to replace Maybank as the party's nominee. The Dixiecrat faction of the party and Governor JAMES F. BYRNES opposed the selection. With the support of the governor and the Dixiecrats, Thurmond mounted a write-in campaign in the general election. He defeated Brown by 59,000 votes, becoming the first person to win a seat in the U.S. Senate through a write-in campaign. In the meantime, Byrnes had appointed Charles E. Daniel to serve the remaining four months of Maybank's term. Daniel resigned on December 24, 1954, in order to allow Thurmond to have seniority over other first-term senators. Byrnes appointed Thurmond to fill the remaining days of Daniel's term.

In the Senate, Thurmond joined the Democratic caucus. During the campaign, he had promised that, if elected, he would resign in 1956 and run in the Democratic primary. True to his word, he resigned his seat in April 1956 and won the Democratic primary (with no opposition) as well as the general election to fill the remainder of his term. He served in the Senate until 2003.

Thurmond was one of Congress's most aggressive opponents of integration and civil rights legislation. In 1956, he initiated a movement among southern members of Congress to issue a Declaration of Constitutional Principles as a challenge to the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which struck down segregated public schools. Thurmond wrote the initial draft, which contained sections endorsing the doctrine of interposition and declaring the Court's decision to be unconstitutional and illegal. He and Senator HARRY F. BYRD (D-Va.) circulated the draft among southern members, but moderates refused to sign it unless the clauses endorsing interposition and declaring the Court's decision unconstitutional were removed. As modified by Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL (D-Ga.) and others, the declaration, popularly known as the Southern Manifesto, was presented to Congress on March 12, 1956, with the signatures of 19 southern senators and 81 southern members of the House. It described the Brown decision as "a clear abuse of judicial power" and urged the states "to resist forced integration by any lawful means."

In 1957, Thurmond conducted a record-breaking filibuster against a civil rights bill aimed primarily at protecting black voting rights. Before the measure, originally proposed by the administration, came to a vote in the Senate, opponents substantially weakened it by deleting provisions authorizing the president to use troops to enforce existing civil rights laws and permitting the attorney general to institute civil action for preventive relief in civil rights cases. It was further diluted by the addition of an amendment permitting jury trials in criminal contempt cases brought against those who obstructed black voting rights. Most southern members of Congress believed that the final version of the bill did not pose a serious threat to their region's racial practices and that it was the most favorable measure they could obtain. On August 28, Senator SAM ERVIN (D-N.C.), speaking on behalf of senior southern senators, said there would be no filibuster against it. Later in the day, however, Thurmond began a one-man filibuster that lasted 24 hours and 18 minutes, the longest in Senate history to that time. Many of his fellow southerners believed that Thurmond's action could have created a backlash leading to a strengthening of the bill. Agreeing with Senator HERMAN TALMADGE's (D-Ga.) description of the filibuster as a "grandstand" performance, they branded Thurmond an opportunist who would seek to advance his political career even at the risk of the southern cause.

Thurmond opposed the expansion of the public sector of the economy and national social welfare programs. In 1956, he joined three colleagues on the Public Works Committee in issuing a minority report opposing public power development at Niagara Falls. They stated that private enterprise had pioneered the project and that public development would be "tantamount to saying that all public resources must be publicly developed." The Senate passed the bill, but it died in the House Rules Committee. In 1960, Thurmond successfully amended a minimum wage bill to reduce the number of workers covered by overtime pay provisions. That bill died in conference.

Thurmond advocated an anticommunist foreign policy and was skeptical of efforts to reduce East-West tensions. In 1955, he backed a bill authorizing the president to use U.S. forces in defense of Taiwan and the Pescadores Islands, warning that "war might come as the result of any display of weakness, of disunity or of hesitation." Five years later, Thurmond joined Senators RUSSELL, CLAIR ENGLE (D-Calif.), and THOMAS DODD (D-Conn.) in leading the unsuccessful opposition to the Antarctic Treaty, signed by 12 nations including the United States and the USSR. The senators contended that the pact did not fully ensure against secret Soviet military operations in Antarctica and that it gave the Soviet Union equal rights with the United States in an area in which the United States had previously predominated.

Throughout his career in the Senate, Thurmond paid careful attention to issues that had an impact on his constituents. In March 1955, Thurmond expressed reservations about a reciprocal trade bill sponsored by the administration, because he worried about the effects tariff reductions would have on South Carolina's textile industry. The measure would have permitted the president to reduce tariffs up to 15 percent for three successive years beginning July 1, 1955. Since it seemed likely that a treaty with Japan lowering textile tariffs would be concluded before July 1, Thurmond feared that his state's textile enterprises might be severely injured. In April, however, Senator WALTER GEORGE (D-Ga.) successfully proposed an amendment moving up the effective date of the president's new power to reduce tariffs to January 1, 1955. This eliminated the possibility of a double reduction of the tariff on textiles in 1955. Once the George amendment was adopted, Thurmond supported the bill.

During the early 1960s, Thurmond continued to vote as a conservative on most matters. He became increasingly alienated from the national Democratic Party, especially after President LYNDON B. JOHNSON chose Humphrey as his running mate. Moreover, Thurmond found the Republican nominee for the presidency, Senator BARRY M. GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.), ideologically compatible and liked him personally. In September 1964, in order to demonstrate his support for Goldwater, Thurmond became a Republican. As he left the Democratic Party, Thurmond blasted it for "leading the evolution of our country to a socialistic dictatorship," for having "forsaken the people to become the party of minority groups, power-hungry union leaders, political bosses and big businessmen looking for government contracts and favors," for encroaching on "the private lives of the people," and for supporting "judicial tyranny." Thurmond uniformly opposed President Johnson's Great Society programs while criticizing the administration for using insufficient military force in Southeast Asia. In 1968, his forceful advocacy of RICHARD M. NIXON's bid for the Republican presidential nomination kept most southern delegates to the Republican National Convention out of the camp of California's governor, Ronald W. Reagan. In order to attract support in the South, Thurmond advised Nixon not to press too hard on school desegregation and not to choose a northern liberal as a running mate. In the 1970s, as the number of black voters in South Carolina increased, Thurmond moved away from his earlier segregationist positions without ever renouncing them. He became one of the first southern senators to hire a black aide, supported the extension of the Voting Rights Act in 1982, voted for strengthening the Fair Housing Act in 1988, and supported making Martin Luther King, Jr., Day a federal holiday. When Republicans took control of the Senate in 1981, they elected Thurmond president pro tempore. He served until the Democrats regained control of the upper house after the elections of 1986. When the Republicans returned to power in 1995, Thurmond again became president pro tempore.

A fitness buff, Thurmond exercised vigorously and abstained from alcohol, tobacco, coffee, tea, and Coca-Cola. During his last years in the Senate, he became hard of hearing but refused to use a hearing aid. After collapsing on the floor of the Senate in October 2001, he moved into Walter Reed Army Medical Center. From then on, he had to be helped on and off the Senate floor by aides. He did not stand for reelection in 2002 and retired from the Senate in January 2003. After leaving the Senate, he returned to Edgefield, where he lived until his death there on June 26, 2003.

—MSM

Thye, Edward J(ohn)

(1896–1969) U.S. senator

Thye was born in Frederick, South Dakota, on April 26, 1896. In early childhood, he moved with his parents to Minnesota, where the family settled on a farm near Northfield. Thye attended public schools, the Minneapolis Tractor and Internal Combustion School, and the American Business College. After the United States entered World War I in 1917, he enlisted as a private in the U.S. Army Air Corps and served overseas. Following his discharge as a second lieutenant, he worked as a tractor expert for a local manufacturing concern. Thye resigned in 1922 and became a successful dairy farmer. His political career began in 1925 with his election to the local school board. In 1929, he became president of the Dakota County Farm Bureau, a position he held for a decade. In the early 1930s, Thye met HAROLD STASSEN. When Stassen decided to run for governor in 1938, Thye campaigned actively on his behalf. Stassen appointed Thye state dairy and food commissioner and deputy commissioner of agriculture in 1939. When Stassen ran for reelection in 1942, Thye joined him on the ticket as the Republican candidate for lieutenant governor. Stassen and Thye carried the election that fall. When Governor Stassen resigned to go on active duty with the navy in 1943, Thye became governor. He subsequently won election to the office in 1944. As governor, Thye approved a low-cost, pre-paid medical care plan, launched extensive highway construction, and set up a state postwar planning commission. He also earned a reputation for his ability to settle labor disputes.

Thye ran for the U.S. Senate in 1946. In the primary campaign, Thye attacked the incumbent, Senator Henrik Shipstead (R-Minn.), for his isolationist record, and defeated him by a wide plurality. Thye then went on to win the general election. In the Senate, he became a prominent proponent of a bipartisan foreign policy during the Truman administration. Thye sided with the president on aid to Greece and Turkey, the North Atlantic Security Pact, and the foreign mutual aid bill. He won reelection in 1952.

A liberal Republican, Thye championed aid to education and civil rights legislation during the 1950s. He also supported the Eisenhower administration's foreign policy. The senator backed the Refugee Relief Act of 1953, the creation of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation in 1954, the Formosa Resolution of 1955, and the Eisenhower Doctrine of 1957.

Thye was particularly concerned about the problems of the small farmer. He consistently opposed Secretary of Agriculture EZRA TAFT BENSON's plans to phase out price supports for farm commodities. In 1954, the senator opposed the secretary's farm program, which established a flexible scale of price supports, from 75 percent to 90 percent of parity, for basic farm commodities. A member of the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee, Thye supported extension of the existing rigid price system at 90 percent of parity. He thought that lower prices, an inevitability with growing postwar surpluses, would result in greater production as farmers tried to maintain their existing income levels. Thye recommended that surpluses be reduced through production controls "before we start tampering with the price supports." In late April 1954, he introduced an amendment to the Agricultural Act of 1949 limiting the downward adjustment of price supports on dairy products.

It was defeated, and parity on dairy products was reduced to 75 percent.

In 1956, Thye supported a bill providing for price supports at 90 percent of parity and a "soil bank." The Eisenhower administration had proposed the soil bank, under which farmers could receive payments from the federal government for removing a specified amount of land from production and putting it back into ungrazed grass, forest, or water storage. The administration had also recommended flexible price supports. Democrats in Congress amended the administration's proposal and reintroduced high, rigid price supports. President Eisenhower vetoed it, citing the provision calling for a return to 90 percent of parity as "unacceptable." Two years later, Thye again failed to prevent a reduction of price supports on dairy products.

Thye lost his Senate seat to EUGENE J. McCARTHY in 1958. Upon leaving the Senate, Thye resumed his agricultural interests and remained active in Republican politics and civic affairs. In 1960, Thye represented Minnesota as a delegate at large at the Republican National Convention. He died at his farm in Northfield, Minnesota, on August 28, 1969.

Till, Emmett L(ouis)

(1941–1955) lynching victim

Emmett Till was born near Chicago, Illinois, on July 25, 1941. His parents divorced two years later, and Till was raised by his mother. In the summer of 1955, Till's mother sent him to visit his great-uncle Moses Wright, a sharecropper who lived in LeFlore County, Mississippi, near the town of Money. On the evening of August 24, Till and a group of black teenagers went into Money. They entered a store owned by Roy Bryant and his wife, Carolyn. Roy Bryant was out of town, and his wife was behind the counter. Witnesses disagreed about precisely what happened, but, apparently on a dare by some of the other teenagers, Till asked Carolyn Bryant for a date. One of Till's cousins pulled him from the store; as they departed, Till whistled at Mrs. Bryant. Although Carolyn Bryant decided not to tell her husband about the incident, Roy Bryant later learned about it from a black customer. On August 28, Bryant, accompanied by his half-brother, J. W.

Milam, went to the cabin in which Wright and his wife, Elizabeth, lived. Bryant and Milam abducted Till, pistol-whipped him, and murdered him. Till's savagely mutilated body was pulled from the Tallahatchie River on August 31. It was tied to a cotton gin fan to weigh it down. Till's mother demanded that the body be returned to Chicago and insisted on an open casket, so that "the world" could "see what they did to my boy."

Till arrived in Mississippi when racial tension was high. The White Citizens Council had publicly defended segregation and had called for resistance to the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which declared segregated public schools unconstitutional. Several African Americans had been murdered throughout the South in reprisal for attempts to register black voters. In LeFlore County, threats and intimidation had stopped African Americans from voting in the primary of August 1955.

Authorities arrested Bryant and Milam on August 29. They admitted abducting the boy to question him about having whistled at and insulted Mrs. Bryant but denied killing him. A grand jury indicted the two men for murder. At the subsequent trial, Wright dramatically identified Bryant and Milam as the men who had kidnapped Till. Nevertheless, an all-white jury acquitted Bryant and Milam after deliberating little more than an hour. A grand jury later refused to indict Bryant and Milam for kidnapping. In an article that appeared in Look magazine in 1956, the two men admitted that they had killed Till.

The Eisenhower administration responded carefully to the Till case. Civil rights experts in the Justice Department carefully studied the case but concluded that neither the murder of Till nor the acquittal of his killers violated existing federal law. The attorney general, HERBERT BROWNELL, believed that the case dramatized the lack of federal authority to enforce a constitutional promise. Moreover, as he pointed out, the "horrible nature of the facts involved" generated considerable pressure on the Justice Department to act. Further, many people mistakenly assumed that, since Till was a citizen of Illinois and was murdered in Mississippi, there were sufficient grounds to invoke federal jurisdiction.

The verdict aroused a storm of protest throughout the world and increased efforts to win strong government support for civil rights. The NAACP, the Jewish Labor Committee, the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, and other organizations held protest demonstrations in the North to demand that President Eisenhower call a special session of Congress to enact an antilynching law. When he announced his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination in October 1955, Senator ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) made the Till case a cornerstone of his position on civil rights. He said that, if elected, he would ask Congress for antilynching legislation.

In a cabinet meeting held in December 1955, Brownell mentioned the mounting pressure on the Justice Department to investigate racial violence in the South, particularly the Till case. Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON suggested that the administration call for a congressional investigation. Southern Democrats, he argued, would block any legislation that emerged from the investigation, and that would shift the onus onto the Democrats.

In public, the administration adopted a cautious tone. On ABC's "College Press Conference," WILLIAM P. ROGERS, the deputy attorney general, called the fact that the killers had not been brought to justice a "real black mark" on the American system of justice. In an address to the National Urban League a few weeks later, Rogers called the verdict a "serious black mark."

With the exception of Kefauver, leading Democrats matched the administration's caution. ADLAI STEVENSON, preparing to mount another run for the presidency, failed to speak out on the Till case. Indeed, when Till's mother attempted to take her case to the public, Stevenson condemned her appearances as "a spectacle parading around the country." In private, he expressed exasperation that the matter constantly came up, and, when a reporter raised the Till case at a press conference, Stevenson cut off the questioner.

The murder of Emmet Till and the subsequent acquittal of his killers provided an impetus for the Eisenhower administration to ask Congress for civil rights legislation in 1956. Wanting no part of a bill that would create internecine conflict in the Democratic Party in an election year, the majority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), consigned the bill to Senator JAMES O. EASTLAND's (D-Miss.) Judiciary Committee, from which it never emerged. The following year, after substantially weakening the measure, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1957. Till's murder also spurred support for the burgeoning Civil Rights movement. Although a number of African Americans were murdered in the South, and particularly in Mississippi, the youth of the victim, the savagery of the crime, and the determination of Till's mother not to let the matter pass quietly made the Till case a focal point for the indictment of the southern social system.

—MSM

Timmerman, George B(ell)

(1881–1966) U.S. district judge

Timmerman was born in Edgefield County, South Carolina, on March 28, 1881. After receiving his law degree from South Carolina College in 1902, Timmerman entered private practice and became involved in local Democratic politics. After winning election as solicitor for South Carolina's Fifth Judicial Circuit in 1904, he served in that office from 1905 to 1920. In the following years, he established a successful legal practice and held office as a member of the state house of representatives in 1923–24 and as state highway commissioner from 1931 to 1939. A Democratic state committeeman from 1938 to 1942, Timmerman was named a federal district court judge for South Carolina by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1942.

As a member of a federal three-judge panel in May 1951, Timmerman heard a case challenging public school segregation in Clarendon County, South Carolina. The suit was the first in a series of cases brought by the NAACP to mount a frontal assault on racial segregation in public primary and secondary schools. In June 1951, Timmerman joined the opinion of Judge John J. Parker, chief judge of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, which ruled that segregated public schools did not violate the Constitution, that the schools for African Americans in Clarendon County were not equal to those for whites, and that the black schools had to be made equal to those for whites. Judge J. Waties Waring dissented. The three-judge panel held a rehearing in early March 1952. Ten days later, the panel handed down its ruling. The court found that, while the schools had not yet been equalized, South Carolina had undertaken a good-faith effort toward equalization and that the black schools would achieve substantial equality by the beginning of the school year in fall 1952. The court therefore saw no purpose in disrupting the schools so near to the end of the academic year. The NAACP appealed the case to the Supreme Court, where it was joined by four other cases (from Kansas, Delaware, Virginia, and Washington, D.C.). On May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court ruled that segregated public schools were inherently unequal and therefore unconstitutional (Brown v. Board of Education). In compliance with this decision, Timmerman and his colleagues in July 1955 enjoined officials in Clarendon County from enforcing racial segregation in local public schools.

Judge Timmerman soon made it clear, however, that he remained a confirmed segregationist, that he strongly disapproved of the Supreme Court's decision, and that he would issue an order to desegregate only when he had no alternative. While his son, South Carolina's governor, GEORGE B. TIMMERMAN, JR., led South Carolina's efforts to oppose desegregation in the late 1950s, the judge attempted to limit the scope of the Court's decree in Brown. In April 1955, he dismissed a case challenging South Carolina's laws requiring segregation on buses. Brown, he held, applied only to public education. The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed Timmerman in July, ruling that Brown had invalidated legally enforced segregation in other public facilities, including transportation, and remanded the case for trial. Timmerman dismissed the suit a second time for more technical reasons in June 1956, but the appellate court again reversed his decision that November.

In March 1956, South Carolina adopted a law forbidding the employment of NAACP members as teachers in the state, and Timmerman sat on the three-judge federal panel that heard a challenge to the statute. The court voted two-to-one to dismiss the case in January 1957. In a concurring opinion, Timmerman wrote that the law was "designed to protect young minds from the poisonous effects of NAACP propaganda," and he believed it fully constitutional. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court, but the state legislature, recognizing the likelihood of an adverse ruling, repealed the law before the Court could act.

In August 1959, Judge Timmerman dismissed a suit challenging segregated facilities at the municipal airport terminal in Greenville, South Carolina. In his opinion, Timmerman declared that whites "still have the right to choose their own companions and associates and to preserve the integrity of the race with which God Almighty has endowed them." The Fourth Circuit reversed Timmerman's action in April 1960. At the trial in October, Timmerman again ruled against the black plaintiff. In December, the court of appeals ordered him to issue an injunction against enforcing laws requiring the segregation of the airport. In February 1961, Timmerman issued the order prohibiting segregated facilities at the air terminal but made it clear that he did so only because a higher court had commanded it.

In July 1957, Timmerman criticized the Supreme Court in a speech to a Rotary Club in Thomson, Georgia. In addition to the school desegregation decision, Timmerman objected to the Court's judgments in cases involving loyalty-security measures and criminal rights. He attacked the Court as a "hierarchy of despotic judges that is bent on destroying the finest system of government ever designed."

Timmerman retired from the federal bench at the age of 81 in October 1962. He then lived with his son in Batesburg, South Carolina, until his death in Columbia, South Carolina, on April 22, 1966.

—MSM

Timmerman, George Bell, Jr.

(1912–1994) governor of South Carolina

The son of a conservative and white supremacist federal judge from South Carolina, George Bell Timmerman, Jr., was born in Anderson, South Carolina, on August 11, 1912. After attending the Citadel and the University of South Carolina, from which he graduated in 1934, Timmerman received his LL.B. from the University of South Carolina in 1937. He was admitted to the bar that year and practiced law with his father, GEORGE BELL TIMMERMAN. After serving in the U.S. Naval Reserve from 1942 to 1946, Timmerman returned home and won election as lieutenant governor. He took office in 1947 and won reelection to the office in 1950. During his second term in office, he served under Governor JAMES F. BYRNES, one of the South's most prominent advocates of states' rights and opponents of desegregation.

Running on a platform supporting states' rights and opposing the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which outlawed school segregation, Timmerman won election as governor in 1954. In his inaugural address, he asserted that the Court had usurped powers that the Constitution had never intended it to have. The Court's exercise of such powers, he argued, "endanger[ed] the future freedom of all citizens."

As governor, Timmerman focused primarily on opposing desegregation. He urged Congress to limit the authority of the Supreme Court. With three other southern governors, he issued a statement endorsing the doctrine of interposition in 1956. This doctrine held that the sovereign states had the power and right to intercede if the federal government overstepped its legitimate authority. In such a situation, states had the right to interpose their authority between the federal government and the states' citizenry. Even Timmerman had reservations about interposition, however. "We do not believe that nullification will help us in South Carolina," he said. Moreover, while he believed that the people of his state would support closing parks and other public amenities, he did not think that they were "prepared to bring a crisis in our schools." The press called the South Carolina General Assembly's session in 1956 the "Segregation Session," because it passed a series of laws designed to block integration. Timmerman supported a measure, passed in 1956, making members of the NAACP ineligible for state employment; he declared that the group exerted "constant pressure on its members contrary to the principles upon which the economic and social life of our state rests." Timmerman condemned the enactment of civil rights legislation sponsored by the Eisenhower administration as "dastardly." After Eisenhower sent federal troops to enforce a court order to desegregate Little Rock's Central High School, Timmerman accused the president of "trying to set himself up as a dictator" and resigned his commission in the naval reserves.

Timmerman also tried to suppress dissent in the state's black colleges. When a Hungarian refugee enrolled in previously all-black Allen University in September 1957, talk of communist influence at the school spread. The governor informally advised the school's board of trustees to dismiss faculty members who favored desegregation. When the board refused, the governor cancelled the school's accreditation. The following January, Timmerman devoted a large part of his annual address to alleged communist influence in black colleges. In that speech, he charged that three members of the faculty at another black college, Benedict University, were subversive. Political pressure mounted against the black schools throughout the spring. They finally surrendered and dismissed the accused professors. Their accreditation was then restored.

During 1956, Timmerman devoted considerable energy to building a new Dixiecrat coalition, which would promote a united southern front at the Democratic National Convention. He presented his plan at two conferences held in Atlanta during July and August but received little support. Advocates of conciliation, led by Mississippi's governor, JAMES COLEMAN, dominated the discussion, and southern delegates went to the national convention in August intent on working for change within the party. Democrats from South Carolina, led by Timmerman and Senator STROM THURMOND (D-S.C.), continued to criticize the national party. Eventually, however, Timmerman and the state's Democratic Party endorsed the presidential ticket. In November, ADLAI STEVENSON carried the state.

Limited by law to one term, Timmerman returned to his law practice in 1959. He served as a Democratic elector in the presidential election of 1964. In 1967, Timmerman received an appointment as a circuit judge, a position he held until his retirement in 1984. He continued to hear cases part time until 1988. Timmerman died in Columbia, South Carolina, on November 29, 1994.

—MSM

Truman, Harry S.

(1884–1972) president of the United States

The son of a farmer, Truman was born in Lamar, Missouri, on May 8, 1884. He moved with his family to Independence, Missouri, in 1890. Afflicted with poor eyesight from birth, he did not participate in sports and related awkwardly with other boys. He was equally awkward with girls. He learned to play the piano and worked hard in school. Despite his efforts, he was not an outstanding student. After graduating from high school in 1901, he worked as a timekeeper for a construction company and then as a bank clerk. In 1906, along with his parents and siblings, Truman began managing a farm owned by his maternal grandmother and uncle. He joined the Masonic order as well as other fraternal organizations and belonged to a national guard artillery battery from 1905 to 1911. As the United States moved toward war in 1917, Truman rejoined the national guard. Elected lieutenant by the newly formed 129th Artillery Regiment, he attended advanced artillery school in France. Promoted to captain, he was given command of Battery D, which saw combat in France. Truman returned home in 1919 and formed a partnership with an army comrade, Eddie Jacobson, in a haberdashery shop in downtown Kansas City. Ever the joiner, Truman took an active role in the Reserve Officers Association, the American Legion, and a downtown improvement group. During the postwar economic downturn, Truman's business failed in 1922. Debts from that failure would plague him for years.

With the support of Tom Pendergast, boss of the powerful Democratic machine in Kansas City, Truman won election as judge of the Eastern District of Jackson County. Despite the title, the position was not a legal one; it was analogous to that of a county commissioner. In office, he dutifully dispensed patronage to members of the machine and overlooked various ethical and legal violations of his associates. A split in the Democratic Party contributed to Truman's defeat in his bid for reelection two years later. He became membership director of the local automobile club and took a couple of night classes at Kansas City School of Law. In 1926, with the Pendergast machine firmly in control of the local Democratic Party, Truman won election as presiding judge of Jackson County (elected from the entire county) and occupied that position for eight years. He built a county road system and a new courthouse while continuing to distribute patronage to the Pendergast machine.

Despite his loyal performance as a member of the Pendergast organization, Truman earned a reputation as something of a reformer. Further, while his personal conduct in office fell short of spotless, he was regarded as "honest" by the standards of the Pendergast machine.

Truman became the Pendergast machine's candidate for the U.S. Senate in 1934. Through his own tireless campaigning and the efforts of the Pendergast machine, Truman won the Democratic nomination and easily carried the general election. In the Senate, he consistently supported President Franklin D. Roosevelt's domestic and foreign policies. A party loyalist, he backed even Roosevelt's court packing plan. Throughout his first term, Truman dutifully obtained patronage for the Pendergast machine and remained an obscure backbencher. Some in the Washington press corps referred to him as "the gentleman from Pendergast." His personal finances remained shaky, and, at one point, he obtained a favorable mortgage from the Jackson County school fund. As chair of subcommittees of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, he did play a role in passing the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 and the Railroad Transportation Act of 1940.

Tom Pendergast went to jail for income tax evasion in 1939. Unlike many of the boss's political associates, Truman never abandoned his patron. Pendergast's troubles, however, came at a bad time for Truman, who had to run for reelection in 1940. His chances were considered so slim that Roosevelt sent word that he would appoint Truman to a seat on the Interstate Commerce Commission if the senator would step aside in favor of another Democrat. Truman defied Roosevelt and ran for a second term. To the surprise of almost everyone, Truman narrowly defeated Governor Lloyd Stark for the Democratic nomination and went on to win a hard-fought victory in the general election.

Truman first gained national prominence in 1941, when he chaired the Special Committee to Investigate Contracts under the National Defense Program (known as the Truman Committee). His panel uncovered waste, extravagance, and misconduct in military procurement and the nation's defense industries. The committee also exposed abuses by contractors and labor unions.

In 1944, the left wing of the Democratic Party favored the renomination of Henry A. Wallace for vice president, but southerners and conservatives objected strenuously. Conservatives in the party backed presidential assistant JAMES F. BYRNES for the vice presidency, but liberals, labor, and African Americans resolutely opposed him. Roosevelt was in a strong position as he sought a fourth term; the party needed a candidate who would not divide the party or harm the ticket. Truman emerged as a logical compromise candidate. Southerners liked him; he came from a border state and had supported Senator Pat Harrison (D-Miss.) for majority leader over the administration's choice, Senator Alban Barkley (D-Ky.). On the other hand, Truman had consistently voted for New Deal measures, which made him acceptable to liberals and labor. The press dubbed the choice of Truman "the Missouri Compromise."

Roosevelt and Truman won the election in November, and Truman took office in January 1945. He had served as vice president for only 83 days when Roosevelt died on April 12, 1945. Truman, who had not been closely briefed by Roosevelt on the progress of the war, was thrust into the position of guiding the American war effort during the last months of the conflict and formulating foreign policy during the postwar period. In July, Truman met with the leaders of the Soviet Union and Great Britain at Potsdam, Germany. At the meeting, the United States and Britain issued an ultimatum to Japan demanding unconditional surrender. The Japanese government dismissed the ultimatum. In August, Truman approved the use of the recently developed atomic bomb. After the destruction of Hiroshima on August 6 and Nagasaki on August 9, the Japanese surrendered on August 14.

Relations with the Soviet Union and the United States deteriorated rapidly after the war ended. A strong stand by the United States resulted in the Soviet Union's withdrawal from Iran. While he still harbored hope, at least occasionally, that he could deal with Stalin, Truman grew increasingly convinced that the Soviets were hopelessly intransigent. Truman came to accept the view of GEORGE F. KENNAN that the Soviet Union was an expansionist power, driven by internal dynamics, and that the United States should respond by containing it. When Henry Wallace, the secretary of agriculture, publicly criticized the administration's policy toward the Soviet Union in September 1946, Truman dismissed him. The administration implemented the containment policy through the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan. In 1947, Truman called for American aid to Greece and Turkey in order to prevent communist insurgents from taking over those countries. In asking for that aid, Truman articulated what became known as the Truman Doctrine: "I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures." Later that year, Secretary of State George C. Marshall announced a program of massive economic aid for the reconstruction of Europe, which became known as the Marshall Plan. When the Soviets blockaded West Berlin in June 1948, Truman used an airlift to resupply the city. In 1949, Truman secured ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty, which created the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), a mutual defense pact.

Although Truman secured a general consensus on these measures, he proved less successful in domestic policy. The first problem he confronted was reconversion of the economy. Truman and his advisers focused primarily on preventing a recession. In fact, that did not turn out to be a problem. The pent-up consumer demand created by the war made inflation the primary issue. Truman's policies, intended to stimulate the economy, further fueled inflationary pressures. In September 1945, he presented a 21-point program, which included an increase in unemployment compensation, a rise in the minimum wage, housing legislation, increased public works, and tax reductions. Runaway inflation led to a series of strikes. Truman's threat to draft striking railway workers alienated organized labor.

Truman's less-than-sure handling of reconversion led to a sweeping Republican victory in the congressional elections of 1946. The Republican campaign slogan ("Had Enough?") proved devastatingly effective, and Republicans emerged from the election with a substantial majority in the House and a slim majority in the Senate. After the election, however, the worst of the disruptions caused by reconversion eased. The shortages disappeared, and the number of strikes declined. Moreover, freed from a Democratic Congress that received his initiatives coolly, Truman found his political footing as an adversary of a Republican Congress. He portrayed himself as a bold, visionary leader hampered by a reactionary Congress. Truman put forward a program of social legislation designed to preserve and expand the New Deal that would also solidify Truman's standing with liberals in the party and establish the foundation for his campaign for reelection in 1948. He proposed increased aid to farmers, an increase in the minimum wage, a program to increase the stock of new housing, and slum clearance. In response to an outbreak of racial violence in the South, Truman appointed a President's Committee on Civil Rights in December 1947. The panel's report, "To Secure These Rights," issued in October 1947, frankly addressed racial discrimination in American society. In February 1948, Truman called for enactment of some of the commission's recommendations, including a federal antilynching bill, the elimination of the poll tax, and creation of a Fair Employment Practices Commission. Congress rejected most of Truman's proposals; although it did enact the housing program. Truman also vetoed 62 bills during the 80th Congress, including the Taft-Hartley Act, which Congress passed over his veto. That veto solidified Truman's standing with organized labor.

Going into 1948, Truman had created a broad base of support for his foreign policy and made significant strides toward rebuilding the Democratic presidential coalition. Nevertheless, his chances for reelection seemed slim. Wallace ran for president on the Progressive Party ticket and attracted voters from the left wing of the Democratic Party. Truman also lost the right wing of his party when liberals at the Democratic convention pushed through a strong civil rights plank over the objections of Truman and his managers. As a result, southern delegates walked out and subsequently formed a third party (the States' Rights Democrats, or Dixiecrats). They nominated Governor STROM THURMOND of South Carolina for the presidency. Confronted with the defection of the southerners and needing to mend fences with liberals, Truman issued an executive order banning discrimination in the armed forces (although he subsequently did little to enforce it).

The Republicans nominated THOMAS E. DEWEY, the leader of the eastern, or liberal, wing of their party. While Dewey ran a restrained campaign, Truman vehemently attacked the Republican Congress and charged that, if left to their own devices, they would undo the New Deal. In November, Truman fell just short of a majority of the popular vote (his opponents divided the remainder), but he won a comfortable victory in the electoral college. Democrats regained control of both houses of Congress.

After winning election in his own right, Truman presented to Congress a domestic program he called the Fair Deal, which proposed several extensions of the New Deal. It included a housing bill, federal aid to education, national health insurance, a repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, civil rights legislation, and the Brannan Plan (named for the secretary of agriculture, Charles Brannan, the plan proposed to pay subsidies to farmers while allowing prices of agricultural goods to drop to market levels). Congress passed a housing bill, an increase of Social Security benefits, an increase in the minimum wage, and a few other modest extensions of the New Deal. Most of Truman's program, however, went down to defeat. Under LEON KEYSERLING, the chair of the Council of Economic Advisers, the Truman administration emphasized economic growth, rather than redistribution, as the goal of liberalism.

Despite the containment of communism in Europe, the United States suffered a series of reverses in the cold war. Mainland China fell to Mao Zedong's Communists in 1949, and that same year the Soviet Union exploded its first atomic device. In January 1950, Truman approved development of a thermonuclear bomb. In June 1950, North Korea, controlled by a communist government, invaded South Korea. Truman's conduct of the Korean War aroused controversy. He concluded that the North Korean aggression had to be resisted. At the same time, the president favored a restoration of the status quo that had existed before the North Korean invasion of the South. Moreover, he decided not to ask Congress for a declaration of war. Thanks to a temporary boycott by the Soviet Union, the Truman administration got the United Nations Security Council to condemn the invasion. After American forces managed to hold a defense perimeter around the port of Pusan, General Douglas MacArthur staged a successful amphibious landing at Inchon and inflicted a devastating defeat on the North Korean invaders. Hoping for a much-needed victory in the cold war, Truman approved an advance into North Korea with the intent of unifying Korea under a noncommunist government. As they advanced deep into North Korea, American forces encountered Chinese troops. By late November 1950, the United Nations forces were once again in full-scale retreat. Truman rejected MacArthur's proposal to expand the conflict by bombing mainland China. The president worried about the possibility of a Soviet move against western Europe and the possibility of a third world war. MacArthur took his case to Republican congressional leaders, and Truman relieved MacArthur of his command in April 1951. Initially the general rallied considerable support, particularly among those who were already critical of the Truman administration for having allegedly lost China to the communists. The furor over the dismissal subsided after a few weeks, but the conflict settled into a bloody stalemate that lasted until the end of Truman's presidency.

The cold war and the war in Korea fed fears of communist subversion. In 1945, an FBI raid on the offices of Amerasia, a left-leaning journal devoted to foreign policy, discovered classified State Department documents. The following year, a Canadian Royal Commission uncovered evidence of Soviet spying in Canada and the United States. Truman initiated a loyalty program for federal employees in 1947. In January 1950, a jury convicted Alger Hiss, a former assistant secretary of state, of perjury for denying in testimony before Congress that he had passed documents to the Soviets. That same year, Dr. Klaus Fuchs, a German-born scientist who held British citizenship and had worked on the Manhattan Project, was arrested in England and confessed to spying for the Soviets. The arrest of Fuchs led to the arrest of JULIUS AND ETHEL ROSENBERG, as well as others belonging to the ring led by Julius Rosenberg. Amid these disturbing events, an obscure Republican senator from Wisconsin, JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY, gained national attention in February 1950 with charges that the State Department harbored communists. McCarthy made a series of spectacular allegations but could prove none of them. Nevertheless, the charges made by McCarthy and others plagued the Truman administration.

Under attack for failing to end the Korean stalemate and for failing to root out communists in government, Truman became increasingly unpopular. In addition, his administration was plagued by corruption, ranging from the small-time influence peddling of the president's military aide, Harry Vaughan, to more serious breaches. During the Truman administration, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation became, in the words of Truman's favorably inclined biographer, Alonzo Hamby, "a hotbed of political favoritism." The most serious incidents involved wrongdoing in the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Tax Division of the Justice Department. Fifty-seven functionaries of the Bureau of Internal Revenue had to be dismissed or were forced to resign by the end of 1951. Charles Oliphant, chief counsel of Internal Revenue, resigned under pressure after accepting gifts in exchange for favors. Assistant Attorney General T. Lamar Caudle was dismissed in 1951 and later convicted of conspiracy. Attorney General J. Howard McGrath failed to move against corruption in his department, and Truman had to force his resignation.

On March 29, 1952, Truman announced that he would not seek reelection. He publicly professed to oppose a third term as a matter of principle, but he realized that he had virtually no chance of winning another term. His approval rating fell to 23 percent after he fired MacArthur, and it never got higher than 32 percent for the rest of his term in office. Moreover, Truman's announcement came after Senator ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) soundly trounced the sitting president in New Hampshire's presidential preference primary. Truman offered to support Chief Justice FRED VINSON and General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, both of whom declined to seek the Democratic nomination. Eisenhower ultimately decided to run for the Republican nomination. Truman then turned to ADLAI E. STEVENSON, the governor of Illinois. Stevenson, however, believed that he could not win if he were too closely associated with an unpopular administration. Anticipating a draft, he insisted upon his noncandidacy. After winning the nomination, Stevenson carefully maintained some distance from the administration. Stevenson's strategy offended the president; in addition to which, Truman disliked the candidate's low-keyed style. Despite the personal friction between the president and the candidate, Truman campaigned aggressively for Stevenson. Given Truman's unpopularity, that may have been a liability for Stevenson. In subsequent years, Truman asserted that Stevenson's defeat was the candidate's own fault. In any event, Eisenhower overwhelmingly defeated Stevenson in November.

In his final State of the Union message, on January 7, 1953, Truman warned Soviet premier Joseph V. Stalin that war would mean ruin for the USSR. He also stressed the necessity for the West to resist communist expansion without plunging the world into atomic conflict. With respect to domestic policy, Truman cautioned against legislation aimed at domestic communism that would promote an "enforced conformity." He further asserted that the economy had "grown tremendously" under his administration, and, while acknowledging increases in prices, he said that income had increased more.

Later that year, Truman became embroiled in a controversy that raised a fundamental issue involving the relationship between the executive and legislative branches of the federal government. On November 6, Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL charged that Truman knew that the late Harry Dexter White was a Russian spy when he promoted White from assistant secretary of the Treasury to U.S. executive director of the International Monetary Fund in 1946. Governor JAMES F. BYRNES of South Carolina, who had been Truman's secretary of state at the time, backed the charge, but Truman heatedly denied it. On November 10, the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) subpoenaed Truman, Byrnes, and Supreme Court Justice TOM C. CLARK, Truman's former attorney general. Such a summons to an ex-president was unprecedented. Two days later, Truman rejected it. He offered to testify regarding any acts unrelated to his presidential role but said that the constitutional position of the presidency would be jeopardized if he accepted the congressional subpoena to testify about his conduct as president. The chair of the HUAC, Representative Harold H. Velde (R-Ill.), decided that he would not attempt to compel Truman to appear before the panel.

After leaving the White House, Truman retired to Independence, Missouri, where he wrote his memoirs. He remained a public figure during the 1950s, periodically criticizing the Eisenhower administration for its domestic policies and particularly for its cuts in defense spending. Truman, who thought of himself as an active and decisive chief executive, denounced Eisenhower as a "do-nothing" president in April 1956. Truman also remained active in Democratic politics. In August 1956, he announced his support for New York's governor, AVERELL HARRIMAN, for the Democratic presidential nomination. Truman said that the governor's "long experience in top government positions" made him the best candidate. Three days later, the ex-president stated at a news conference that he did not think Stevenson could win the election. Nonetheless, after Stevenson captured the nomination, Truman campaigned vigorously for him in the general election. Eisenhower trounced Stevenson even more decisively than he had in 1952.

After the election of 1956, Truman became a member of the newly created Democratic Advisory Council (DAC). Formed at the urging of Democratic national chairman PAUL BUTLER, the DAC was designed to provide a means of developing Democratic legislative programs in a forum independent of the Speaker of the house, SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.), and the majority leader of the Senate, LYNDON B. JOHNSON (D-Tex.), whom liberals in the party regarded as too conservative. Other members of the DAC included Stevenson, ELEANOR ROOSEVELT, and Senator Estes Kefauver. In 1958, Truman joined other DAC members in proposing stronger civil rights legislation, curbs on Senate filibusters, a higher minimum wage, and other measures.

In 1957, the Harry S. Truman Library Institute for National and International Affairs, built by private subscription and given to the government, opened its doors in Independence. It housed the ex-president's papers, the papers of members of his administration, a large collection of books, and many exhibits. Truman subsequently spent much of his time working in an office there.

Truman declined to attend the Democratic National Convention in 1960 on the ground that it had been rigged in advance to assure the nomination for Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY (D-Mass.). However much he disliked the Kennedy family, party loyalty and his loathing for Kennedy's opponent, Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, led Truman to campaign actively for Kennedy in 1960, as he had for Stevenson four years earlier.

During the 1960s, Truman gave his public support to Kennedy's policies and even more enthusiastic support to President Lyndon B. Johnson's Great Society. Although he endorsed the civil rights legislation passed during Johnson's presidency, Truman criticized civil rights demonstrators at the New York World's Fair in 1964 and the following year called the civil rights march in Selma, Alabama, a "silly" effort to attract attention. In April 1965, he described MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., as a "troublemaker." Truman consistently supported Johnson's policy in Vietnam. He died in Kansas City, Missouri, on December 26, 1972.

By the late 1950s, many Americans had come to regard Truman as a beneficent elder statesman endowed with an earthy common sense that made his judgments superior to those of intellectuals. During 1961 and 1962, Truman gave extensive recorded interviews to Merle Miller. After Truman's death, Miller published selections of the transcripts as Plain Speaking: An Oral Biography of Harry S. Truman (1973). The book served to rekindle interest in Truman and to reinforce the public image of Truman as a plain-speaking figure possessed of an uncommon amount of common sense. Plain Speaking revealed many of Truman's resentments and contained highly negative comments about many people, including the entire Kennedy family, which he regarded as power hungry, Stevenson, whom he considered a "sissy," and Tom Clark, whose elevation to the Supreme Court he regarded as his worst mistake as president and whom he described as a "dumb son of a bitch."

Historians have drawn a more reserved image of Truman. At his best, concluded Hamby, Truman was decisive; at his worst, he was impetuous. Truman was not good at giving formal speeches, and his poor eyesight made it difficult for him to read transcripts. Truman's sometimes awkward efforts made a marked contrast with Roosevelt's magnificent speeches. Hamby also contended that Truman "carried a lot of latent, unfocused anger" as a result of his failures in business and the criticism he received for his association with the corrupt Pendergast machine. In addition, noted Hamby, Truman worked exceedingly hard and experienced a great deal of stress, which "reinforced a tendency toward ill-tempered and unpresidential outbursts." Truman tended to appoint friends and cronies to high places. Constitutional historians generally regard his four appointments to the Supreme Court as the least distinguished set of appointments to the Court in American history. In spite of his support for civil rights legislation, Truman retained prejudices of his small-town Missouri upbringing. Eben Ayers's diary reveals that Truman regularly used the word "nigger," and the president was prone to occasional anti-Semitic outbursts, some of which he recorded in his own diary ("The Jews, I find, are very, very selfish."). Another sympathetic biographer, Robert Donovan wrote: "Still, he had come from a world of two-bit politicians, and its aura was one that he never was able to shed entirely. And he did retain certain characteristics of machine-bred politicians: intense partisanship, partisan loyalty, a certain insensitivity about the transgressions of political associates, and a disinclination for the companionship of intellectuals and artists. Mostly, his personal friends were plain, obscure, even mediocre men who shared his love of politics and poker." Yet Truman guided the United States through the early days of the cold war, and, through his administration's emphasis on Keynesian demand management as a means to achieve growth and avoid questions of redistribution, he helped recast liberalism for the postwar era.

—MSM

Tuttle, Elbert Parr

(1897–1996) general counsel to the Treasury Department, federal appellate judge

Born in Pasadena, California, on July 17, 1897, Tuttle moved with his family first to Washington, D.C., and then in 1906 to Hawaii. He attended Punahou Academy in Honolulu and graduated from Cornell University in 1918. Upon graduating, he enlisted in the U.S. Army as a "flying cadet" in the artillery's observation corps. He was still in training when World War I ended, and Second Lieutenant Tuttle joined the U.S. Army Reserve. In 1919, Tuttle went to work as a reporter and editorial writer for the New York Evening World. He returned to Cornell for law school and worked as a reporter to support himself. Tuttle compiled an excellent record in law school and became editor-in-chief of the law review. Upon receiving his LL.B. in 1923, he and William Sutherland, his brother-in-law, decided to practice law together and founded a law firm in Atlanta, Georgia. Their practice thrived, and Sutherland, Tuttle & Brennan (later Sutherland Asbill & Brennan) became a leading law firm. Sutherland specialized in corporate tax law, and Tuttle devoted himself to general practice. Tuttle also did a good deal of pro bono work and took cases for the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). In 1931, as a major in the national guard, Tuttle commanded a unit that prevented a mob from lynching an African-American man accused of raping a white woman. Subsequently, the accused man was convicted and sentenced to death. Tuttle filed a petition with a federal district judge in which he argued that the presence of the mob effectively denied the defendant due process. The judge denied the petition, and Tuttle appealed to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, which granted a new trial. Tuttle and Sutherland also challenged the constitutionality of a state statute prohibiting incitement to insurrection. After losing in the state courts, Tuttle appealed the case to the U.S. Supreme Court, which struck down the statute by a five to four vote. The ACLU asked Tuttle to take a case of a convicted counterfeiter who had been unable to afford legal representation at his trial. After losing in the lower courts, Tuttle took an appeal to the Supreme Court and won a decision establishing the right to counsel for every defendant charged with a crime in federal courts (Johnson v. Zerbst, 1938). Tuttle also served on the board of trustees of two black colleges, Spelman College and Morehouse College.

When the United States entered World War II, Tuttle, who had remained in the reserves, turned down a desk job and the rank of full colonel. Instead, he chose to go on active combat duty as a lieutenant colonel commanding the 304th Field Artillery Battalion of the 77th Infantry Division. He served in the Pacific theater and won the Legion of Merit, a Bronze Star, and a Purple Heart. After the war, he remained in the reserves as commanding general of the 108th Airborne Division until he retired in 1950.

When the war ended, Tuttle returned to his law practice and became active in Republican politics. He gravitated toward the Republican Party because he opposed the segregationist Democratic Party in Georgia. Tuttle once described the Democratic Party of Georgia as “paternalistic at best, and autocratic at worst.” He saw “nothing ‘democratic’ about it at all except the name.” In early 1952, Tuttle became vice chairman of the Southern Conference for Eisenhower, part of the movement to draft General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER to run as the Republican presidential nominee. At the Republican National Convention, Tuttle led the pro-Eisenhower delegation from Georgia that challenged the traditional Republican leadership in his state, which supported Senator ROBERT A. TAFT of Ohio. Tuttle also played an active role in Eisenhower’s general election campaign. After Eisenhower won the election, he appointed Tuttle general counsel of the Treasury Department in 1953. The following year, Eisenhower appointed Tuttle to a newly created seat on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. At that time, the Fifth Circuit comprised Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, Alabama, Georgia, and Florida.

Tuttle became a federal appellate judge a few months after the Supreme Court ruled segregated public schools unconstitutional in Brown v. Board of Education (1954). Much of his career on the federal bench would deal with the implementation of that ruling. A week after the Brown decision, a friend asked Tuttle if he had seen what the Court had done. “Oh, yes,” replied Tuttle, “but they’ll fall in line.” Experience proved him wrong. Along with three other judges on the Fifth Circuit (JOHN MINOR WISDOM, John R. Brown, and Richard Rives), Tuttle played a central role in desegregating the Deep South. Beginning in the late 1950s, the Fifth Circuit handed down a series of rulings desegregating public schools and striking down discrimination in voting, jury selection, and employment. Tuttle wrote the opinion for the majority upholding Federal District Judge J. SKELLY WRIGHT’s order to desegregate public schools in New Orleans. In 1961, Tuttle ordered the admission of two black students to the University of Georgia. The following year, Tuttle joined in the majority opinion ordering the admission of an African American, James H. Meredith, to the University of Mississippi. After massive civil rights demonstrations in Birmingham in 1963, the Birmingham school board suspended black students who had taken part in the demonstrations. Tuttle issued an order commanding the school board to permit the students to return to school.

Tuttle became chief judge of the Fifth Circuit in 1961. He stepped down as chief judge in 1967 and took senior judge status in 1968. When the Fifth Circuit was divided into the Fifth and new 11th Circuits in 1981, Tuttle became a senior judge of the 11th Circuit. President James Earl Carter presented him with the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1981. Tuttle continued to sit until his death in Atlanta on June 23, 1996.

—MSM

Twining, Nathan F(arragut)

(1897–1982) air force chief of staff; chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff

The son of a banker, Twining was born in Monroe, Wisconsin, on October 11, 1897. He was a direct descendant of settlers who landed at Plymouth and of military men who fought in the Revolutionary War. As a youth, he moved with his family to Portland, Oregon, where he attended public schools and joined the Oregon National Guard. Called to active duty in 1916, Twining served under General John J. Pershing along the Mexican border. He then attended the United States Military Academy at West Point, where he completed an abbreviated wartime course in 1918 and became a second lieutenant. Twining served briefly with the Allied occupation forces in Germany. After being promoted to first lieutenant in 1920 and completing infantry school, he received flight training in Texas during 1923 and 1924. He transferred to the air service in November 1926 and spent the next three years as a flight instructor. Between 1930 and 1936, he was stationed in Hawaii, Texas, and Louisiana. Promoted to captain in 1935, he attended the tactical school at Maxwell Field in Alabama and the command and general staff school in 1936 and 1937. After serving in Texas, where he was promoted to major, Twining was assigned to Washington, D.C., as a member of the staff of the chief of the air corps in August 1940. He became a lieutenant colonel in July 1941. Not long after the United States entered World War II, he became assistant executive to the chief of staff of the army air force and received a promotion to full colonel. In July 1942, he was promoted to brigadier general and assigned to the South Pacific as chief of staff of army forces. In January 1943, Twining became commanding general of the 13th Air Force and saw action in the Solomon Islands. He returned to Washington in November 1943 but soon received orders to assume command of the 15th Air Force and saw action in the Mediterranean theater. After VE Day, he returned to the Pacific and, as commander of the 20th Air Force, oversaw firebombing raids on Japan and the missions that dropped atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. At the end of the war, Twining held the temporary rank of lieutenant general. After the war, he held a series of posts in the United States. He received his promotion to major general in 1948 and became vice chief of staff in 1950.

President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER appointed him air force chief of staff in May 1953. Twining's selection reflected Eisenhower's desire to reduce American reliance on conventional forces and his emphasis on airpower, technology, and the nuclear deterrent. The general supported Eisenhower's belief that the primary American deterrent should be a mobile nuclear strike force capable of meeting any threat. However, Twining objected to the cuts in conventional forces and defense spending that accompanied the administration's New Look. In testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee in 1953, he stated that proposed cuts in the air force would delay creation of the 143 wings he deemed necessary for American security. He also warned that the United States could not maintain its superiority over the Soviet Union without enough trained men and that the air force could not attract or keep such men because of low pay.

In 1956, Twining joined a number of air force generals and members of Congress in warning of an impending "bomber gap" with the USSR. Appearing before the Senate Appropriations Committee's Subcommittee on Defense in May, Twining said that "the people above" him had cut $272 million from his funds for air force bases. He further stated that he would have to request more money if all installations and early warning systems were to be completed by the targeted date of 1958. He informed the subcommittee that he had asked for six additional wings of B-52 type bombers to increase the Strategic Air Command by 300 planes but that Eisenhower was still considering his request. Twining assured the congressmen that the United States could deter a Soviet attack "this year" but questioned how long the advantage would continue. After a trip to the Soviet Union in July, he again reported that the Russians were outproducing the United States in modern planes and catching up in the quality of the aircraft they produced. Congress added nearly $1 billion dollars to the administration's request for the air force in fiscal 1957.

Swearing-in of General Nathan F. Twining as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, August 15, 1957 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Despite his disagreements with some of the administration's policies, Twining retained Eisenhower's trust, and in 1957 the president appointed him to succeed Admiral ARTHUR RADFORD as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Twining defended Eisenhower's plan for cutting back production of B-52s and for the development of the XB-70 bomber. An advocate of the Jupiter and Atlas missiles as well as the navy's submarine-launched Polaris missile, Twining nevertheless defended the administration's reluctance to commit unlimited sums of money to the development of missiles. Questioned by Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ (D-N. Mex.), chair of the Senate Subcommittee on Defense, Twining explained that less money would be needed in fiscal 1958 than in fiscal 1957, because intelligence reported a slower rate of Soviet bomber production than anticipated.

Further, he assured the subcommittee, "I know of nothing that could be done to give us operationally effective ballistic missiles appreciably sooner."

Twining advocated American intervention in the Middle East and Asia to contain communism. In spring 1954, he proposed that the United States use tactical atomic weapons to relieve the besieged French garrison at Dien Bien Phu in northern Vietnam. When the Communist Chinese began shelling Quemoy and Matsu in September of that same year, Twining joined Radford, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in recommending that the Nationalist Chinese be permitted to bomb the mainland and suggesting that American aircraft enter the battle if the Communists retaliated. In 1958, when Lebanon's president, Camille Chamoun, requested American forces to help quell a pro-Nasser insurgency, Twining successfully argued for the landing of U.S. Marines in Lebanon.

Following an operation for lung cancer in 1959, Twining retired in September 1960. He became chairman of the board of the publishing firm Holt, Rinehart and Winston, Inc. He remained a strong anticommunist. He went before Congress to testify against the limited nuclear test ban treaty of 1963 and supported the American involvement in Vietnam. In 1964, Twining served as an adviser to the Republican presidential nominee, Senator BARRY GOLDWATER (R-Ariz.). Two years later, Twining ran unsuccessfully as the Republican candidate for the U.S. Senate from New Hampshire. He retired from Holt, Rinehart and Winston in 1967 and died at Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas, on March 29, 1982.

—MSM

Vandenberg, Hoyt S(anford)
(1899–1954) air force chief of staff

A descendent of early Dutch settlers and the nephew of an influential Republican senator, Arthur Vandenberg (R-Mich.), Hoyt Vandenberg was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on January 24, 1899. Following his graduation from West Point in 1923, he began a career in army aviation. After filling a number of routine assignments, Vandenberg attended the air corps tactical school from 1934 to 1935, command and general staff school from 1935 to 1936, and the army war college from 1938 to 1939. After completing his studies at the army war college, he received a promotion to major and an assignment to the plans division in the office of the chief of the air corps. After becoming a full colonel in January 1942, he went to Britain with General Henry Arnold, the chief of the army air forces, in June 1942. Vandenberg helped plan the air operations for the Allied invasion of North Africa and later participated in the operation. He became chief of staff to General James Doolittle, commander of the 12th Air Force. Vandenberg flew 26 combat missions and became known as the “flying general.” He won the Silver Star and the Distinguished Flying Cross. Promoted to brigadier general in December 1942, he continued to serve as Doolittle’s chief of staff when Doolittle assumed command of the Northwest African Strategic Air Force. In August 1943, he became one of four deputy chiefs of staff on Arnold’s staff. Promoted to major general, Vandenberg joined General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER’s staff in March 1944. He helped plan air support for the D-day invasion. In August 1944, Vandenberg assumed command of the Ninth Air Force. After receiving a promotion to lieutenant general, he returned to army air forces headquarters in May 1945. In January 1946, Eisenhower appointed Vandenberg director of intelligence on the War Department’s general staff. In July of that year, President HARRY S. TRUMAN named him director of the Central Intelligence Group, a predecessor of the Central Intelligence Agency. Vandenberg returned to the army air corps in May 1947 and in September became the first vice chief of staff of the newly independent air force. Upon his promotion to full general a month later, he became, at the age of 49, the youngest member of the military to hold that rank. Truman appointed him air force chief of staff in April 1948.

During the postwar period, Vandenberg lobbied for a strong air force, which he considered essential in light of Soviet advances in the production of jet fighters and bombers. He also was a leading figure in the drive for a unified armed services and a strong proponent of the development of the hydrogen bomb. In 1951, Vandenberg joined other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in defending President Harry S. Truman’s dismissal of General Douglas MacArthur from his Korean command. Vandenberg was scheduled to retire as air force chief of staff in 1952, but his term was extended 14 months so that he could retire with 30 years of service and at the highest rank he had attained in the air force.

During the last months of his tenure, Vandenberg was an outspoken critic of the Eisenhower administration’s proposed cuts in the defense budget.

In May 1953, Secretary of Defense CHARLES WILSON announced a $5 billion reduction in appropriations for the air force. The cut precluded the service's anticipated expansion to 143 wings. Vandenberg testified against the cuts before the Senate Appropriations Committee in June. He warned that 143 wings was the absolute minimum needed for U.S. air defense and that anything short of that goal "would increase the risk to national security beyond the dictates of national prudence." He claimed that the air force was being crippled by limitations on personnel, base construction, appropriations, force levels, and expenditures and research. Vandenberg claimed that he had heard no sound military reason for the cut "at a time when we face an enemy who has more modern jet fighters than we have and enough long-range bombers to attack this country in a sudden all-out atomic effort." He charged that Wilson's plan would leave the United States with a "second-best air force" inadequate to meet growing Soviet strength. It would be a "one-shot" service, which would not have any reserve strength if the Soviets launched an all-out atomic war against the United States.

Secretary of Defense Wilson and Secretary of the Air Force HAROLD E. TALBOTT challenged Vandenberg's assertions, claiming the cuts would not impair American airpower. Eisenhower met with Republican congressional leaders and explained that the air force was ordering and acquiring new planes before it had the personnel to fly them or bases from which they might operate. Vandenberg retired on June 30, 1953. The cuts went into effect immediately after Vandenberg's retirement.

Vandenberg underwent surgery for prostate cancer in May 1952 but soon returned to work. Not long after he retired, however, he suffered a relapse and entered Walter Reed Army Hospital in Washington, D.C., where he remained until his death from the cancer on April 2, 1954.

—MSM

Van Doren, Charles L(incoln)

(1926–) college instructor, television quiz show contestant, writer

The product of a distinguished intellectual family, Charles Van Doren was born in New York City on February 12, 1926. His father, Mark Van Doren, was a poet and critic who taught at Columbia University and won a Pulitzer Prize for poetry; his mother, Dorothy, a novelist, had been an editor of the Nation. An uncle, Carl Van Doren, was a historian who held a Pulitzer Prize for biography. Charles Van Doren earned his B.A. from St. John's College in Maryland in 1947. After receiving an M.A. in mathematics at Columbia University, Van Doren switched to English literature. He began doctoral studies in English and worked as an instructor at Columbia. Upon completion of his dissertation on William Cowper, an 18th-century British poet, the newly minted Ph.D. received an assistant professorship at Columbia in 1959.

While a graduate student and instructor at Columbia, Van Doren gained national attention as a quiz show contestant during the 1956–57 television season. Beginning in late 1955, evening game programs, awarding large cash prizes, emerged as the most popular programs on TV. Van Doren appeared on Twenty-One, a (Jack) Barry and (Dan) Enright production. Possessing good looks and an appealing, boyish charm, Van Doren proved an immediate hit as a contestant. After a series of ties, he defeated the reigning champion, Herbert Stempel, in December 1956 and went on to win $129,000. During Van Doren's 14 appearances, Twenty-One climbed to the top of the television ratings. Van Doren became a national celebrity, and he appeared on the cover of Time magazine on February 11, 1957. Vivian Nearing, a lawyer whose husband had earlier lost to Van Doren, defeated Van Doren, after three dramatic ties, in March 1957. The National Broadcasting Company, which aired Twenty-One, capitalized on Van Doren's continuing popularity by signing him to a contract and making him a host for the network's popular morning program, the Today Show.

While Van Doren cohosted Today in August 1958, the New York World-Telegram carried a story in which Stempel charged that his appearances on Twenty-One, along with those of other contestants, had been staged by Barry and Enright. Van Doren denied Stempel's allegations on Today and persisted in defending the programs well into 1959. In August 1958, however, a guest on another quiz show, Dotto, found materials left behind by another contestant that contained the answers to the questions on that day's program. The information made its way to Manhattan's district attorney, FRANK S. HOGAN, who assigned an assistant district attorney, Joseph Stone, to begin an investigation of all TV quiz programs. Stone convened a grand jury and took testimony from over 100 contestants, most of whom, including Van Doren, swore that they knew nothing about rigging the shows. By October, Stone procured an indictment of Albert Freedman, the producer of Dotto and Twenty-One. Ratings for the programs plummeted, and NBC canceled Twenty-One in October 1958. After the grand jury completed its work in June 1959, a Manhattan judge took the unusual step of keeping its report confidential. Prior to its release, the chairman of the House Commerce Committee, OREN HARRIS (D-Ark.) launched an inquiry and subpoenaed Van Doren and others in October.

On November 2, Van Doren made a dramatic appearance before a Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight (a subcommittee of the House Commerce Committee), chaired by Harris. Van Doren admitted that he had been given the answers to questions beforehand, that he had been coached on how to deliver his responses, and that he had agreed to lose to Nearing "in a dramatic manner." Van Doren said "I was deeply involved, deeply involved in a deception . . . I have deceived my friends—and I had millions of them." In Van Doren's account, the producers of Twenty-One had persuaded him that his cooperation would create goodwill for "the intellectual life." Van Doren also admitted to lying before the grand jury. He resigned from Columbia's faculty that day; the next day, NBC fired him.

Van Doren's confession shocked the nation and altered the networks' programing. The intellectual from Columbia had been a much-admired figure, and his fall disillusioned many TV viewers. Yet surveys indicated that a majority of Americans did not hold Van Doren and other participants either legally or morally culpable for their actions. Most of the condemnation of quiz show producers and panelists came from opinion leaders—editors, ministers, and the like—not the public at large. On November 8, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER expressed "dismay" that anyone would "conspire to confuse and deceive the American people." He blamed the advertisers ("the grey-flanneled hucksters from Madison Avenue") and compared the event to the "fix" of the 1919 World Series. Because of the vague wording of communications law, however, the federal government took no action against the programs' producers or the networks. For their part, the networks, led by FRANK STANTON at CBS, canceled the quiz shows and scheduled more "public service" programming, including news and cultural programs.

Van Doren moved to Chicago, where he avoided the limelight. Hogan's office obtained perjury indictments against Van Doren and 13 other contestants in October 1960; most pleaded guilty, and all received suspended sentences in January 1962. Van Doren remained out of the public eye but began a successful career as a writer and editor. He became an editor at Praeger Books and wrote several books under a pseudonym. In 1973, he became editorial vice president of the Encyclopedia Britannica. Eventually, in the mid-1980s, he began publishing under his own name. His works include The Idea of Progress (1967), The Joy of Reading (1985), and A History of Knowledge (1991). In 2008, Van Doren published an account of his experiences on the quiz shows and his life since that episode in the New Yorker. He lives in Cornwall, Connecticut.

—MSM

Velde, Harold H(immel)

(1910–1985) U.S. congressman; chairman, Un-American Activities Committee

The son of parents of East Frisian and German ancestry, Harold Velde was born on a farm near Parkland, Illinois, on April 1, 1910. He grew up in rural Illinois. Velde attended Bradley University from 1927 to 1929 and graduated from Northwestern University in 1931. After teaching high school from 1931 to 1935, he enrolled in law school at the University of Illinois, from which he graduated in 1937. He practiced law in his home state until he entered the army signal corps in 1942. After a year of military service, Velde became an agent in the FBI's sabotage and counterespionage division. In 1946 he won election as a county judge in Illinois.

Velde won a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives in 1948 after campaigning on the slogan, "Get the Reds out of Washington and Washington out of the Red." He gained a reputation in Congress as an ardent anticommunist, alarmed by what he saw as widespread subversion within the U.S. government. His background in the FBI landed him a post on the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC). After Republicans won control of Congress in the elections of 1952, Velde became chair of the panel.

During 1953–54, HUAC held a record 178 days of hearings. Velde led HUAC investigations of the motion picture industry, education, and labor—areas the committee had investigated in previous years. However, he broke new ground in March 1954 by announcing that a probe of the nation's clergy was "entirely possible." His charges that the clergy spent more time in questionable politics than in the ministry ignited protests from church groups, citizens, and fellow members of Congress. One member of HUAC, Representative Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. (D-N.Y.), introduced a resolution calling for the removal of Velde as chair. The American Council of Christian Churches supported Velde's charges, and a Gallup poll showed 36 percent of the public in favor of a probe. General public disapproval, however, prevented him from vigorously pursuing the investigation, though several clergymen did testify before the panel. At one point, Velde charged those church leaders who had criticized his allegations with the "sin" of subversion.

During Velde's term as chairman, HUAC continued investigations of the entertainment industry, long a favorite target. In March 1953, Velde took HUAC to Los Angeles to hear testimony from various writers, performers, and technicians who had been accused of having communist ties. In May, HUAC investigators in New York interrogated such celebrities as Artie Shaw, Carin K. Burrows, Robert Rossen, and Lionel Stander. These and other investigations stirred intense public debate over constitutional rights of due process and protection against self-incrimination versus the alleged need to uncover American communists. In March 1953, a group of 23 actors and motion picture workers sued Velde and other congressmen who had served on HUAC in 1951 because they had been blacklisted in the industry after they refused to testify before the committee. State courts in California later dismissed the case.

HUAC's probe of communist infiltration in education got off to a bad start when Velde inaccurately accused Mrs. Eugene Meyer, wife of the chairman of the board of the Washington Post, of having praised the USSR in a letter to a Soviet publication. In fact, the letter had been sent by a "Mrs. G. S. Mayer." When that came out, Velde promptly fired the HUAC investigator on the case. He defended himself by saying that it was "better to wrongly accuse one person of being a Communist" than to allow the true party members to roam freely. In February 1953, Velde elicited from Dr. Robert Davis the names of 21 people whom he claimed were fellow communists while he taught at Harvard University from 1937 to 1939. The list of names included Daniel Boorstin and Granville Hicks, both of whom had since become anticommunists. The investigations moved to Philadelphia in November 1953, where the Communist Party had gained more support among teachers in the 1930s than in any other major city on the East Coast except New York. Philadelphia's board of education suspended 26 Philadelphia teachers who had appeared before Velde's committee. In 1954, HUAC cited for contempt of Congress nine witnesses who had refused to testify in the committee's investigations of alleged communist educators in Philadelphia and New York City.

Velde captured the attention of the nation in November 1953 when he issued, without prior approval of HUAC, subpoenas to former president Harry S. Truman, former secretary of state JAMES BYRNES, and former attorney general TOM CLARK. Velde did so after Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL charged that Truman had appointed an accused communist, Harry Dexter White, to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) after receiving an FBI report that indicated White had spied for the USSR. The account Byrnes gave to reporters supported Brownell's version on several key points. Although Truman, Byrnes, and Clark expressed a willingness to cooperate with HUAC, each rejected the subpoena after it was served. Truman declined to respond on grounds of executive privilege; Byrnes, then governor of South Carolina, cited states' rights; and Clark, then a justice of the Supreme Court, cited judicial privilege. President Eisenhower declared he would not have subpoenaed Truman or Clark. Truman made a nationally televised address devoted primarily to denouncing Brownell. The former president claimed that he deliberately allowed White's nomination to go through, because the appointment to the IMF was "much less sensitive—if it was sensitive at all—than the position" White held as assistant secretary of the Treasury. Further, asserted Truman, the FBI did not want to tip its hand until the investigation had been completed and White had been separated from government service "promptly" when the investigation was concluded. Both assertions were false. In testimony before the Senate Internal Security Committee, the director of the FBI, J. EDGAR HOOVER, contradicted Truman's version of the story. Nevertheless, Velde's decision to subpoena Truman offended many Americans, and HUAC took no further action on the subpoenas.

Velde continued his HUAC investigations throughout the 1953–54 session, opening hearings on alleged subversives in the navy and expanding probes of supposed communist infiltration of labor unions. Although raised voices and accusations continually flew through HUAC's hearing rooms, Velde himself never won the notoriety that his more-famous colleague, Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.), achieved.

Velde did not stand for reelection in 1956 and retired from office in 1957. He practiced law in Urbana, Illinois, and Washington, D.C., until 1969, when he became regional counsel for the General Services Administration. He retired and took up residence in Sun City, Arizona, in 1974, where he lived until his death there on September 1, 1985.

—MSM

Viereck, Peter (Robert) (Edwin)

(1916–2006) historian, poet, political commentator

The son of a German immigrant and reporter, Viereck was born in New York City on August 5, 1916. He studied in Germany and in Switzerland in his early youth and attended Phillips Exeter Academy. After receiving his undergraduate degree, summa cum laude, from Harvard University in 1937, he remained at Harvard to earn an M.A. in European history in 1939 and a Ph.D. in European history in 1942. During his academic career at Harvard, he received numerous awards, including Phi Beta Kappa and a fellowship to Oxford University.

In early 1940, the Atlantic Monthly invited Viereck to write an essay about "the meaning of young liberalism for the present age." Viereck produced an essay titled "But—I'm a Conservative!" Published in the April issue, the essay asked: "Why should any young man want to be a conservative, on a globe where so much needs changing?" In response, Viereck observed that "I have watched the convention of revolt harden into dogmatic ritual." He called for a "new conservatism" to counter the "storm of totalitarianism" abroad and the moral relativism and soulless materialism that dominated domestic life. Nazism and communism, Viereck argued, shared a fundamental utopianism that sanctioned the murder of anyone or any group perceived as an obstacle to creating the perfect society. Moreover, since liberalism represented a milder version of the same view (a belief in the innate goodness of humanity and the perfectibility of human society), it offered no adequate defense against totalitarianism. Viereck identified a conservative faith, rooted in the understanding that within the inherent "nature of man" lay "the ultimate source of evil," as the only hope to save Western civilization from attempts to subvert it, subjugate it, or perfect it.

Viereck published his first book, Metapolitics from the Romantics to Hitler, in 1941. The son of George Sylvester Viereck, a famous Nazi supporter who was convicted of conspiring with the Nazis in 1941 and spent four years in prison, Peter Viereck published the book while his father was on trial. In addition to presenting a searing critique of Nazi ideology, which he saw as "irreconcilable" with the American way of life, Viereck rejected the then-orthodox idea that Nazism grew out of the authoritarian Prussian tradition and argued instead that Nazism developed from romantic German nationalist movements of the 19th century. The book received praise from scholars and critics.

After the United States entered World War II, Viereck served in the army's psychological warfare branch, where he analyzed Nazi propaganda and rose to the rank of sergeant. After the war, he took a job teaching literature at Harvard. He taught at Smith College from 1946 to 1947 and began a long career at Mount Holyoke College in 1948.

In 1949, he published Conservatism Revisited: The Revolt Against Revolt, which immediately established him as a forceful expositor of conservatism in America. Expanding on the ideas he had presented in the Atlantic Monthly, Viereck criticized the collectivism of both fascism and Stalinism for robbing the individual of dignity. Calling for cooperation between the moderate Right and the moderate Left, he advocated a reformist conservatism, based on the “necessity and supremacy of Law and of absolute standards of conduct.” Continuing his assault on what he regarded as the naive belief in the essential goodness of humans, he ridiculed the idea of the “common, natural man.” “We don’t need a ‘century of the common man,’” wrote Viereck; “we have had it already, and it has only produced the commonest man, the impersonal and irresponsible and uprooted mass-man.” In terms reminiscent of REINHOLD NIEBUHR, Viereck rejected the “cult” of Rousseau and the “natural man,” instead emphasizing the inherently sinful and imperfect nature of humans. “In his natural instincts,” wrote Viereck, “every modern baby is still born a cave-man baby. What prevents today’s baby from remaining a cave man is the conservative force of law and tradition.” He defined conservatism as “the political secularization of the doctrine of original sin.” Viereck’s conservatism did not advocate laissez-faire capitalism but was “incompatible with fascist or Stalinist collectivism.” Above all, he based his conservatism firmly in “the four ancestries of western man”: the Judaic, Hellenic, Roman, and medieval intellectual traditions. The book gave a name to a new intellectual movement.

Throughout the 1950s, Viereck continued his call for a “new conservatism.” He intended the term to distinguish what he called “ethical” conservatism from what he derisively called “Old Guard,” “McKinley-style” Republicanism. As the 1950s progressed, however, it became clear that Viereck’s vision differed from that espoused by other philosophers of the Right. In the words of historian John P. Diggins, Viereck sought a synthesis of “philosophical conservatism and political liberalism.” Indeed, many conservatives criticized Viereck’s rejection of 19th-century laissez-faire capitalism, his support for many of the reforms of the New Deal, and his endorsement of ADLAI STEVENSON as the foremost political exponent of his own brand of conservatism. Moreover, while Viereck disdained ideologies of the far Left, he had considerably less enthusiasm for attacking liberals than did other conservatives. Indeed, he retained hope that liberals and conservatives would unite against all forms of totalitarianism. Although strongly anticommunist, he formulated a conservatism grounded primarily in philosophical and moral principles. He believed that economic theories were hollow unless set in an ethical context.

Unlike some other conservatives, Viereck vehemently repudiated Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.) and the popular movement the senator helped create. Along with a group of pluralist social scientists (including RICHARD HOFSTADTER, DAVID RIESMAN, Nathan Glazer, and TALCOTT PARSONS), Viereck contributed an essay (“The Revolt Against the Elite”) to The New American Right (1955), edited by DANIEL BELL. In contrast to those who saw McCarthyism as an outgrowth of conservatism, Viereck viewed McCarthyism as radically anti-conservative, as a kind of populist phenomenon (“the same old isolationist, Anglophobe, Germanophile revolt of radical populist lunatic-fringers against the eastern, educated Anglicized elite”). According to Viereck, McCarthyism was a form of pseudo-conservatism, “a leftist instinct behind a self-deceptive [emphasis in the original] rightist veneer.” After all, McCarthy attacked the most conservative and organic institutions as well as the American elite. Further, the anticommunism of the postwar era was “populism gone sour.” For Viereck, McCarthyism represented “the revenge of the noses that for twenty years of fancy parties were pressed against the outside window pane.” He expounded his thesis more fully in The Unadjusted Man (1956). Viereck’s position further alienated him from many anticommunist conservatives.

Viereck, however, also rebuked those of McCarthy’s critics who in his view deliberately minimized the communist threat. In addition, he denounced the foreign policy of containment of communism, which he regarded as “heartless” for consigning eastern European peoples to communism without offering them hope of liberation in the future.

Viereck’s views prevented him from becoming part of the ideological conservative group that coalesced in the mid-1950s around the National Review, edited by WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY, JR. In 1956, Frank Meyer, the culture editor of National Review, published an article in that journal denouncing Viereck for passing off “unexceptionably liberal sentiments” as “conservative philosophy.” Meyer dismissed Viereck as a “counterfeit conservative.” That same year, Willmoore Kendall, a conservative political philosopher, published an article in the National Review attacking Viereck for lecturing others on “how to be a conservative and yet agree with the Liberals about Everything.”

Although noted primarily for his philosophical and political views and writings, Viereck considered literature his first love and wrote numerous books of poetry. He won a Pulitzer Prize in 1949 for his collection of poetry, Terror and Decorum (1948), and served as a distinguished visiting professor of poetry at several universities in the United States and abroad. In the mid-1960s, Viereck stopped writing about politics and devoted his efforts to poetry and Russian history, which he taught at Mount Holyoke College until his retirement in 1987. He published a long poem, “Archer in the Marrow: The Applewood Cycles,” in 1987. Even after retiring from Mount Holyoke, he continued to teach a survey course in Russian history until 1997. In his final lecture at Mount Holyoke, he warned the undergraduates “If you kill out of love or for a perfect utopia, you never stop killing because human nature is always imperfect.” Viereck died at his home in South Hadley, Massachusetts, on May 13, 2006.

—MSM

Vincent, John Carter

(1900–1972) Foreign Service officer

The son of a real estate and insurance salesman, Vincent was born in Seneca, Kansas, on August 19, 1900. He moved with his family to Macon, Georgia, in 1906. After graduating from Mercer University in 1923, he passed the exams to qualify for an appointment in a U.S. consulate. He received his first posting, to Changsha, China, in 1924. He went from Changsha to Hankou. In 1928, he began a two-year program in Chinese language at Beijing. He became fluent in Chinese and, over the next decade, served as a diplomatic officer in a number of major Chinese cities. He was assigned to Jinan from 1930 to 1931. Between 1931 and 1936, he was stationed in Shen-yang (Mukden) and then in Darien. He witnessed firsthand the Japanese conquest of Manchuria. In 1936, he returned to Washington to serve on the China desk of the State Department's division of Far Eastern affairs. After a brief assignment in Europe (1939–40), he returned to China, serving first in Shanghai. In 1941, Vincent rose to first secretary of the U.S. embassy in Chongqing (Chunking), China's wartime capital. He became counselor of the embassy in 1942. During his years in China, Vincent developed close personal relationships with Zhou Enlai (Chou En-lai), one of the Communist leaders, and Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi), the Nationalist leader whom Vincent thought could unify the nation following the war. However, Vincent became increasingly critical of Chiang, whose government seemed incapable of resisting the Japanese, opposing the communist insurgency, or maintaining the loyalty of the people. Further, the pervasive corruption of Chiang's government along with his dictatorial methods disillusioned Vincent. Vincent became convinced that his government needed to institute substantial internal reforms, and he urged the American government to require Chiang to implement such reforms before it granted more aid. In 1944, Vincent was recalled to Washington to head the China division of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs. Throughout the war, President Franklin D. Roosevelt ignored Vincent's advice. In the postwar era, however, Vincent emerged as perhaps the most influential China specialist in the State Department.

Recognized as the Foreign Service's leading expert on China, Vincent received a promotion to director of the State Department's Office of Far Eastern Affairs in 1945. As the conflict between Chiang and the Communist forces led by Mao Zedong (Mao Tse-tung) escalated, Vincent was one of the architects of General George C. Marshall's mission to China in 1945–47. Vincent advised the secretary of state, JAMES F. BYRNES, that the United States should limit military and economic assistance to Chiang until his Nationalist government implemented reforms. The delegation headed by Marshall was instructed to urge Chiang to make necessary reforms and to attempt some sort of reconciliation with the Communists. Vincent hoped that a political settlement with the Communists would buy time for the reforms to get underway. The failure of the mission convinced Vincent that Chiang would lose the civil war with the Communists, regardless of the amount of American support. Vincent, therefore, recommended that the United States reduce military and economic aid. After Marshall became secretary of state in 1947, he adopted Vincent's recommendations.

In January 1947, Vincent was named to the rank of career minister. His appointment, however, ran into opposition from conservative Republicans and members of the China lobby, who accused him of adopting positions similar to those of the Communist Party line. Vincent won confirmation in July, but Republicans had exacted a promise that he would not be sent to an important post in the far east. Vincent was assigned to Switzerland.

Following the defeat of the Nationalists by the Communists in 1949, Vincent came under fire by officials in the State Department who had disagreed with his approach (particularly the Japan specialists), members of the China lobby, and conservative Republicans. Some accused him of attempting to engineer a Communist victory. Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) charged Vincent with sabotaging the Marshall mission by placing impossible demands on Chiang and urged that Vincent be fired. In 1950, the Tydings Committee investigated McCarthy's allegations and found nothing to support his charges against Vincent. Indeed, the Democratic majority on the committee accused McCarthy of perpetrating "a fraud and a hoax" upon the American people.

Vincent received a posting to Tangier, Morocco, in 1951. The assignment carried less prestige and a cut in salary. Also in 1951, the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, under the leadership of Senator PATRICK McCARRAN (D-Nev.), accused Vincent of having used his influence to shift American policy in favor of the Communists. McCarthy then renewed his demand that Vincent be removed from the State Department. A State Department loyalty board cleared Vincent, but the Civil Service Loyalty Review Board reviewed the decision and concluded that there was reasonable doubt about Vincent's loyalty. President HARRY S. TRUMAN and Secretary of State DEAN ACHESON formed a new panel, headed by Learned B. Hand, a highly respected federal appellate judge, to review the case.

The panel had not completed its work when the Eisenhower administration took office. In March 1953, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES decided not to rely on the panel and resolved the matter himself. He reversed the loyalty review board and ruled that there was no reasonable doubt about Vincent's loyalty. Nevertheless, Vincent's "reporting of the facts, evaluation of the facts, and policy advice during the period under review show a failure to meet the standard which is demanded of a Foreign Service officer." Offered the choice of resigning or being dismissed, Vincent chose to preserve his pension and quit. During their last meeting, Dulles asked Vincent to discuss China. "After all," explained Dulles, Vincent knew "the situation there better than just about anybody."

Critics charged that Vincent's departure, one of several in the State Department during the period, weakened the Foreign Service. Many Foreign Service officers took it as a sign that Dulles would not protect them from right-wing attacks, and some analysts have suggested that prompted many officers to make policy recommendations on the basis of accepted ideology rather than on expert opinion. In fact, some officers took heart from the fact that Dulles had vindicated Vincent on the charge of disloyalty. Virtually all, however, were dismayed by the dismissal for poor reporting.

Vincent told reporters that the Eisenhower administration should abandon the idea that the United States had "lost China," which he called a "phony idea" peddled by the China lobby. Only by acknowledging this could the administration free Foreign Service officers from "a fear that loyalty to Chiang Kai-shek is a test of loyalty to the U.S.A." and thus make possible the development of "an objective and, we hope, effective policy regarding China."

At the age of 52, Vincent retired to Cambridge, Massachusetts. He wrote and lectured on foreign affairs and maintained an informal association with the East Asian Research Center at Harvard and the Radcliffe Seminars. The Foreign Policy Association's speakers bureau advertised him as a lecturer on Asia and China, but he had few offers. In subsequent years, Vincent opposed the American intervention in Vietnam and criticized America's unwillingness to establish relations with the People's Republic of China. Chou En-lai invited him to visit China in 1972, but Vincent could not accept the invitation because he was suffering from terminal cancer. He died in Cambridge, Massachusetts, on December 3, 1972.

—MSM

Vinson, Carl

(1883–1981) U.S. congressman; chairman, Armed Services Committee

Vinson was born on November 18, 1883, in Baldwin County, Georgia, near the town of Milledgeville. After graduating from the Georgia Military College, Vinson entered Mercer University in Macon, Georgia, where he received his LL.B. degree in 1902. After gaining admission to the Georgia bar, he practiced law in Milledgeville with the firm of Hines and Vinson. He won election to two terms as the prosecuting attorney for Baldwin County and served from 1906 to 1909. Vinson served in the Georgia House of Representatives from 1909 to 1912. Upon narrowly losing his bid for reelection in 1912, he received an appointment as judge of Baldwin County Court, a position he held from 1912 to 1914, when he was elected judge of the Baldwin County Court. In 1914, Vinson won election to the U.S. House of Representatives as a Democrat. He served without interruption until January 3, 1965.

In the House, Vinson was assigned to the House Naval Affairs Committee in 1917 and emerged as a forceful advocate of military preparedness. He became chair of the Naval Affairs Committee in 1932. For the remainder of the decade, he pressed for a major enlargement of the navy. Vinson not only resisted a proposal by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to cut funding for the navy but pushed naval expansion bills through the House in 1938, 1939, and 1940. As relations with Japan worsened and Europe moved toward war, Vinson advocated a two-ocean navy. During World War II, he supported legislation to curb strikes in defense industries and other legislation restricting labor unions. This made him unpopular with union leaders.

At the end of World War II, Vinson unsuccessfully opposed President HARRY S. TRUMAN's call for merging the separate military service departments into a unified Defense Department. When the Defense Department was created in 1947, the military committees in the House were combined to form the Armed Services Committee. Two years later, when the Democrats regained control of Congress, Vinson became chair of the Armed Services Committee. The following year, he attacked reductions in military expenditures proposed by Defense Secretary Louis Johnson.

Although not widely known outside of Congress, Vinson played a crucial role in the formulation and passage of bills related to the military. He dominated his committee by dividing the panel into subcommittees without specific jurisdictions (except for the Subcommittee on Special Investigations) and deciding himself which subcommittee would receive each bill. Vinson thereby determined who would introduce bills on the House floor. On the floor itself, he was, according to Speaker SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.), the "best legislative technician in the House." The lower chamber passed almost all legislation approved by his committee.

A leading advocate of a strong military establishment, Vinson supported the army officers, led by Chief of Staff MAXWELL TAYLOR, who criticized the Eisenhower administration's New Look defense policy. They believed that the strategy placed too much emphasis upon nuclear weapons and did not prepare the country to fight limited wars. In particular, Vinson opposed attempts to reduce conventional forces. In January 1955, he attacked a proposal by the administration to reduce the strength of the army from 1.1 to 1 million men. The following month, Vinson ended his opposition, reportedly because the administration promised that troop strength would not be reduced below 900,000 men. Three years later, the Appropriations Committee approved a request by the administration to cut the army's strength to 870,000 men. On the floor of the House, however, some members of the Armed Services panel, backed by Vinson, led a successful drive to restore the troop level to 900,000.

Vinson jealously guarded what he considered to be the prerogatives of his committee and of Congress with respect to military matters. In 1956, the administration proposed a reorganization of the Defense Department that would have established an office of assistant secretary for research and development for each of the services. Vinson declared that he had no objection to the plan, but complained that he had not been informed of the proposal until it was sent to Capitol Hill. He therefore opposed the measure, and his committee voted unanimously to recommend disapproval.

Vinson opposed attempts to secure civil rights for African Americans. In 1956, he joined 100 other members of Congress who signed the Southern Manifesto, which denounced the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954) and urged resistance to it by all lawful means. He opposed civil rights legislation, including the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960.

In 1958, Vinson opposed a plan by the administration to strengthen the authority of the secretary of defense. The congressman particularly objected to a proviso that appropriated all funds to the secretary rather than to the separate service departments and allowed the secretary flexibility in shifting funds between the departments to meet new military developments. Vinson denounced this proposal as an invitation to Congress to "surrender its constitutional responsibilities." Vinson also objected to provisions of the plan that removed restrictions on the secretary's power to reassign combat functions and personnel among the three service departments. Further, he opposed a proviso repealing the law, passed in 1947, that stipulated the departments were to be separately administered by their respective secretaries. The Armed Service Committee's version of the reorganization plan reflected Vinson's views. The bill passed by Congress and signed by the president did not appropriate funds to the secretary of defense. It did, however, grant him increased authority to reassign combat functions and strengthen his administrative authority over the three departments (while maintaining the separate organization of the departments).

In 1960, Representative F. EDWARD HÉBERT (D-La.), chair of the Special Investigations Subcommittee, proposed a bill to limit the hiring of retired military officers by the defense industry on the ground that they exerted influence upon their former colleagues still in the military. The bill would have barred retired officers for two years after their retirement from helping a private company secure a defense contract. It would have imposed a $10,000 fine, two years' imprisonment, and denial of retirement pay during the period of violation. In the full Armed Services Committee, however, Vinson successfully eliminated the penalties providing for fine and imprisonment. The House approved the committee's version of the measure, but the Senate took no action on the measure.

During the early and mid-1960s, Vinson opposed efforts by the administrations of JOHN F. KENNEDY and LYNDON B. JOHNSON to phase out manned bombers in favor of missiles. He attacked Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara's efforts to transfer powers from the services to the Defense Department.

During the Kennedy administration, Vinson broke with southern members of Congress and supported a proposal by Speaker Sam Rayburn to enlarge the House Rules Committee. Rayburn's objective was to reduce the power of Representative HOWARD W. SMITH (D-Va.) to block legislation. The measure narrowly passed the House in 1961. In 1964, Vinson announced that he would not seek reelection. By that time, he had become the first person to serve in the House for 50 years. Upon leaving Congress, he retired to Milledgeville, where he lived until his death there on June 1, 1981.

—MSM

Vinson, Fred(erick) M(oore)

(1890–1953) chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court
The son of the local jailer, Vinson was born in Louisa, Kentucky, on January 22, 1890. He graduated from Kentucky Normal College in 1908 and earned a B.A. at Centre College in Kentucky the following year. While attending law school at Centre College, he taught mathematics and played semiprofessional baseball. After receiving his law degree in 1911 and gaining admission to the Kentucky bar the same year, Vinson practiced law in Louisa. He became the city attorney of Louisa in 1913. Vinson entered the army in 1918 and was attending officer training camp in Arkansas when the war ended. Discharged from the military, he returned to Louisa and won election as commonwealth attorney for the 32nd Judicial District. In January 1924, he won a special election to fill a vacant seat representing Kentucky's Ninth Congressional District. Reelected in the fall of 1924 and again in 1926, he joined the Democratic minority in the House of Representatives. During his two terms, he had little impact. In 1928, he served as Al Smith's campaign manager in Kentucky. Herbert Hoover resoundingly defeated Smith, and Vinson lost his own seat in the Republican landslide of that year. Vinson returned to private practice in Ashland, Kentucky, but, riding a Democratic tide, won election to the House in 1930. Assigned to the Ways and Means Committee, he quickly established himself as an expert on taxation. With the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932, Vinson became an important member of the House, because virtually all New Deal measures contained some tax provision. A loyal supporter of Roosevelt, Vinson helped develop New Deal tax programs and coauthored the Guffy Coal Act of 1935. Vinson even backed Roosevelt's plan to pack the Supreme Court in 1937.

Roosevelt nominated Vinson to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in December 1937. After receiving confirmation from the Senate, Vinson took his seat on the bench in May 1938. A competent but pedestrian judge, Vinson demonstrated some traits that would mark his later judicial career. He tended to favor governmental authority in general and in particular against claims that government had infringed on individual liberties.

At Roosevelt's request, Vinson resigned from the court in May 1943 to serve as director of economic stabilization. Roosevelt named him federal loan administrator in March 1945. One month later, the president called on Vinson to replace JAMES F. BYRNES as director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion. Vinson was a key adviser to President HARRY S. TRUMAN, who appointed him secretary of the Treasury in July 1945. Upon the death of Chief Justice Harlan Fiske Stone, Truman nominated Vinson to be chief justice of the Supreme Court on June 6, 1946. Truman admired Vinson's record of government service and his political philosophy. He also hoped that the genial, patient Kentuckian, who had a reputation as a skilled negotiator and compromiser, would be able to bring unity to a bitterly divided Supreme Court. Ideological and personal differences led to friction between a liberal faction, led by Justices HUGO L. BLACK and WIL-LIAM O. DOUGLAS, and a faction devoted to judicial restraint, led by Justices ROBERT H. JACKSON and FELIX FRANKFURTER.

Vinson failed to bring the warring justices together. Debates over the extent to which the Court should defer to the elected branches of government and whether the Fourteenth Amendment applied the Bill of Rights to the states continued to divide the Court during Vinson's tenure. While he did help reduce some of the personal friction between the justices, Vinson's own philosophy placed him with the Frankfurter/Jackson wing of the Court and against the judicial activists led by Black and Douglas. Beginning in 1949, however, when Truman named two more justices to the Court, Vinson was able to bring together a bloc of five justices that dominated the Court until 1953.

The group led by Vinson generally upheld government interests against claims of individual rights. Vinson himself wrote the Court's opinion in two significant cases. In May 1950, the Court upheld the provision of the Taft-Hartley Act that required union leaders to sign affidavits swearing that they were not and had never been members of the Communist Party (American Communications Association v. Douds). In June 1951, it upheld the provision of the Smith Act that made it a crime to teach or advocate violent overthrow of the government (Dennis v. U.S.). Vinson believed that the government needed broad powers to deal with the threat of communism at home and abroad in particular, but he believed that the government needed leeway to deal with other national and international problems as well. The chief justice favored a restrained, limited role for the Supreme Court and was willing to give wide latitude to the executive and legislative branches, especially in matters relating to internal security. Thus, Vinson repeatedly favored government policy on internal security over claims of individual rights. According to C. Herman Pritchett, a leading legal scholar, Vinson's record made him, "very nearly the most negative member of the Court on libertarian claims."

Vinson's deference to government action manifested itself in other ways as well. He wrote the opinion for the majority when the Court upheld Truman's seizure of coal mines following a nationwide strike (U.S. v. United Mine Workers and John L.

Lewis [1947]). The chief justice dissented when the Court held that Truman had exceeded his statutory and constitutional authority by seizing the nation's steel mills (Youngstown Sheet & Tube Company v. Sawyer [1952]). In addition, Vinson took a conservative position on most issues involving the rights of those accused of crimes, particularly on matters relating to search and seizure.

With respect to civil rights, however, the Vinson Court established a relatively liberal and unified record. The chief justice himself wrote some of his most important opinions in this area. In May 1948, he spoke for a unanimous Court that held restrictive covenants barring the sale of residential property to African Americans and other minorities legally unenforceable (Shelley v. Kraemer). Two decisions in June 1950 undermined the separate but equal doctrine that derived from Plessy v. Ferguson (1896). Speaking for a unanimous Court in Sweatt v. Painter, Vinson held that a separate law school for African Americans established by Texas as an alternative to the University of Texas did not meet the test of equality and therefore the exclusion of Herman Sweatt from the University of Texas Law School on the basis of his race constituted a denial of the equal protection guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. By any quantitative measure, held the chief justice, the black law school did not measure up. Even more important, wrote Vinson, "the University of Texas Law School possesses to a far greater degree those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school." McLaurin v. Oklahoma presented a related, but different, issue. Since Oklahoma did not provide a comparable graduate education for African Americans, it admitted a black graduate student to the doctoral program in education at the University of Oklahoma. The state admitted the student, however, "on a segregated basis." George McLaurin had to sit in an alcove adjacent to the classroom, to eat at a specified table in the dining hall and at a different time, and to study at a specified desk on the mezzanine floor of the library. While the case was on appeal, the state mitigated the restrictions. McLaurin was allowed to sit in the classroom but had to sit in a separate row designated "Colored." He could eat at the regular time, but at a separate table, and use a specified desk on the main floor of the library. Writing again for a unanimous Court, Vinson held that such restrictions impaired McLaurin's ability to learn. Having admitted McLaurin to graduate study, the university had to treat him as it did other students. Neither decision overturned Plessy, but the holding in Sweatt made it difficult for a state to maintain a segregated law school.

Nevertheless, the chief justice was among the more cautious members of the Court on the race question. His opinions expanded the rights of minorities, but only as far as was needed to decide the issue at hand. He resisted calls from other justices to strike down legally enforced segregation. Moreover, Vinson occasionally dissented from decisions favorable to the rights of African Americans. In his final term on the Court, for example, Vinson alone dissented when, in June 1953, the majority extended the rule of Shelley v. Kraemer and held that neighbors could not sue a white homeowner for damages when he violated a restrictive covenant by selling to African Americans.

In 1952, the Court granted review in five cases that challenged the constitutionality of segregation per se in public schools. In June 1953, the Court ordered the litigants to reargue the case in the fall and to answer specific questions about the intent of the Congress that adopted the Fourteenth Amendment and the power of Congress or the courts to abolish segregation under that amendment. Vinson did not live to hear the reargument. Under Vinson's successor, EARL WARREN, the Court struck down segregated public schools in these cases, known collectively as Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

In June 1953, Vinson and the Court became involved in the case of JULIUS AND ETHEL ROSENBERG, who had been sentenced to death for passing atomic secrets to the Soviet Union. The Supreme Court three times refused to review the Rosenbergs' conviction and, on June 15, 1953, denied what seemed to be all final motions in their case. Two days later, however, Justice William O. Douglas granted a stay of execution because a new legal argument had been raised on behalf of the convicted couple. A lawyer new to the case argued that the Atomic Energy Act of 1956 had superseded the Espionage Act of 1917 and that the district court therefore had no authority to impose the death penalty without the recommendation of a jury. Vinson immediately called a special session of the Court. On June 18, the justices heard oral arguments on whether to uphold Douglas's stay. The following day, Vinson read the decision of a six-to-three majority, which held that the Atomic Energy Act did not displace the penalties of the Espionage Act. Moreover, since the activities for which the Rosenbergs had been convicted took place before passage of the Atomic Energy Act, any alleged consistency was irrelevant. Therefore, the Court vacated the stay of execution. The Rosenbergs were executed later that day.

Vinson died of a heart attack at his home in Washington, D.C., on September 8, 1953. Neither a philosopher nor a legal theorist, he never developed an overarching theory of the Constitution. Vinson adopted a pragmatic approach guided by his belief in democratically elected leaders and in a strong national government. During his tenure as chief justice, the Court generally exercised restraint and permitted other branches of government the freedom he thought they should have. In the years after his death, many legal scholars regarded him as an unsuccessful chief justice. He was certainly not the Court's intellectual leader, and he proved unable to unify a bitterly divided Court. To be sure, he inherited a Court divided by judicial philosophy and personal conflicts. While he managed to calm the personal conflicts to a limited degree, the ideological disputes continued unabated. Although the Vinson Court did take steps to advance the legal status of African Americans, John P. Frank, the noted legal scholar, observed that Vinson presided over the reversal of a trend that began in the 1930s toward judicial protection of civil liberties. To some extent, assessments of Vinson have depended largely on whether the observer believed that the needs of the time justified the judicial restraint the Vinson Court normally displayed, especially in civil liberties cases.

—MSM

Vorys, John M(artin)

(1896–1968) U.S. congressman

The son of a lawyer and active Republican, Vorys was born in Lancaster, Ohio, on June 16, 1896. After attending public schools in Lancaster and Columbus, he received his B.A. in 1918 from Yale University, where he lettered in football and belonged to the Skull and Bones Society. During World War I, he served overseas as a pilot in the U.S. Naval Air Service and retired to inactive service in 1919 with the rank of lieutenant. Vorys taught for a year in Changsha, China. During 1921 and 1922, he served as an assistant secretary of the American delegation to the conference on the Limitation of Arms and Pacific and Far East Affairs (the Washington Naval Conference). Vorys earned a law degree at Ohio State University in 1923. A Republican, Vorys served in the Ohio General Assembly from 1923 to 1924 and sat in the Ohio State Senate from 1925 to 1926. In 1938, he won election to the U.S. House of Representatives on a platform opposing the New Deal. He was reelected nine consecutive times.

Appointed to the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Vorys initially supported isolationist policies. Throughout the 1920s and 1930s, he had opposed Wilsonian internationalism. Moreover, as Europe moved closer to war, he worried that the United States would be drawn into the war and President Franklin D. Roosevelt would exploit the opportunity to expand presidential power. When in 1939 Roosevelt sought to repeal a law that provided for an embargo of the sale of arms to any nation at war, Vorys offered an amendment that helped sink the measure. Later that year, after Germany invaded Poland, Congress repealed the embargo. Vorys opposed Lend-Lease aid to Great Britain and a peacetime draft. Following the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Vorys, like many others who had been identified as "isolationist," modified his views. He concluded that the United States would need to take a more active role in international affairs and in 1943 supported the Fulbright Resolution, which put the House on record in favor of American entry into a postwar international organization. Vorys remained opposed, however, to the idea of a single world state and determined that the United States should abandon only enough sovereignty to make an international organization workable.

After the war, Vorys, along with Senator Arthur Vandenberg (R-Mich.), led the Republican Party to bipartisan support for internationalism. Vorys alienated some members of his own party by supporting aid for Greece and Turkey as well as the Marshall Plan. Despite his vital support for Truman's policy of containment, he was infuriated by what he perceived to be the administration's indifference to the "loss" of China.

Vorys became an important figure in the debates over foreign aid. During the Truman administration, he opposed foreign aid grants and recommended that assistance take the form of long-term loans. In 1951, he was the author of the Vorys Compromise, which won approval by the House of a plan to send massive shipments of wheat to India and to allow India to pay for the wheat over several decades at a low rate of interest in return for a long-term repayment plan. The following year, his amendments to the Truman administration's aid budget accounted for a substantial part of the $1.7 billion eliminated from the request. Vorys was a strong supporter of Senator ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio) for the Republican presidential nomination in 1952.

After DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER defeated Taft and won the general election, Vorys often acted as spokesman for the Eisenhower administration and defender of presidential authority. During the first year of the Eisenhower administration, Vorys defended the president's requests for foreign aid. On February 23, 1953, he introduced legislation containing a draft of the president's call for a resolution criticizing the Soviet Union for violating the "clear intent" of the Yalta Accords and "subjugating" whole nations. Five days later, the Foreign Affairs Committee unanimously approved the measure. The resolution did not satisfy the Old Guard of the Republican Party. Stalin's death, however, provided an excuse to shelve the resolution and thereby avoid a fight within the Republican Party. Also in the first year of Eisenhower's presidency, Vorys opposed Taft's proposal for a congressional investigation of the Korean War. "I doubt if you can investigate the past conduct of a war that is going on without having the committee influence the current war," he said, "and I don't think a congressional committee can conduct a war." In 1955, he pushed for approval of the Formosa Resolution, which authorized the president to use the armed forces to defend Taiwan and the neighboring Pescadores against a possible invasion by the Chinese Communists.

In 1956, Vorys opposed the Hardy amendment to the Mutual Security Act, which would have required the executive branch to refer relevant documents to Congress before spending foreign aid funds. Vorys said, "An executive cannot be independent if somebody else has the right to look not only at his mail but at every scrap of information." The amendment was defeated. In 1957, Vorys opposed the Senate version of the Eisenhower Doctrine, giving the president power to aid Middle Eastern nations threatened by communism, because it deleted the House's authorization for the president to use troops "as he deemed necessary."

Vorys was a key defender of the administration's foreign aid program in the 1950s. According to the New York Times, the congressman was a "trimmer" rather than a "slasher" of White House foreign aid budgets. Debating the Mutual Security Act in 1953, he urged approval of what he called the "smallest foreign aid bill in five years." Vorys attempted to keep congressional cuts to $500 million, but Congress shaved off $1 billion from the administration's military and economic aid requests. The following year, under his management, the president's request passed with a substantially smaller cut.

Vorys was appointed to the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy in 1953. In January 1954, the panel released its final report suggesting methods for improving the nation's international trade situation. These included a three-year extension of the Tariffs Agreement Act and other proposals to encourage international trade. It recommended reducing tariffs, reorienting U.S. foreign aid toward making loans instead of grants, and increasing trade with Soviet satellites. Eisenhower submitted a program to Congress based on the commission's recommendations, but most of the proposals remained stalled on Capitol Hill throughout 1954. After a bitter struggle in 1955, Vorys succeeded in getting approval of the extension of reciprocal trade agreements and implementation of tariff cuts over a three-year period.

Vorys did not seek reelection in 1958. After retiring from the House in January 1959, he resumed the practice of law. In 1961, President JOHN F. KENNEDY appointed him to a commission studying the cost of political campaigns. Vorys died of a respiratory ailment in Columbus, Ohio, on August 25, 1968.

—MSM

Wadsworth, James J(eremiah)

(1905–1984) representative to the United Nations

The product of a wealthy Hudson Valley family that traced its ancestry back to the colonial period, Wadsworth was born in Groveland, New York, on June 12, 1905. His relatives included John Hay, Lincoln's private secretary who later served as secretary of state, and his father was a U.S. senator. He attended Fay School and St. Mark's School. Following his graduation from Yale University in 1927, Wadsworth returned to his family estate to manage his own dairy farm. Wadsworth won election as a Republican to the New York Assembly in 1930 and served until 1941 (he did not run for reelection in 1940). Upon leaving the legislature, he went to work for the Curtis-Wright Corporation in Buffalo, New York, where he rose to the position of assistant manager of industrial relations and earned a reputation as a skillful labor negotiator. In 1945, he was appointed director of the public service division of the War Assets Administration. Between 1946 and 1948, he headed the governmental affairs department of the Air Transport Association.

In 1948, Wadsworth became a special assistant to PAUL G. HOFFMAN, head of the Economic Cooperation Administration. In that capacity, he helped line up congressional support for the Marshall Plan. In June 1950, he became administrator of the civil defense office of the National Security Resources Board. The following year, he received an appointment as deputy administrator of the Civil Defense Administration.

At the urging of HENRY CABOT LODGE, the incoming administration's designated ambassador to the United Nations and a Yale classmate of Wadsworth's, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER appointed Wadsworth deputy representative to the UN in 1953. He sat on the Economic and Social Council and was an alternate representative to the Technical Assistance Conference. As a representative, Wadsworth had no policy-making role but served as spokesman for the administration on many sensitive issues. He opposed the blanket admission of new members, which could lead to the entrance of Communist China to the international organization, and barred any negotiations on Korean unification until North Korea recognized the "authority of the United Nations in repelling the Communist invasion of South Korea." Wadsworth also urged the Security Council in 1955 to censure Israel for attacking the Gaza Strip. He advised the Arab nations to recognize the right of Israel to exist and recommended that they resettle Palestinian refugees from Israel permanently and regard them "not as temporary residents but as fellow citizens and co-sharers of the Near East's future."

Wadsworth's primary responsibilities involved disarmament and atomic energy. As deputy representative to the UN Disarmament Commission, Wadsworth took part in negotiations for arms reduction. Speaking before the General Assembly in October 1954, he voiced the Eisenhower administration's policy that disarmament must be accompanied by an effective inspection system. "We cannot stop an arms race unless all the racers stop running," he said, "and we cannot know whether all the racers have stopped running if one of them insists on running on a concealed track. For the free world to stop arming while the Soviet Union keeps on increasing its strength would be an invitation to the very war we seek to avoid."

As U.S. representative to the Disarmament Commission's Subcommittee on Atomic Control, Wadsworth reiterated the administration's demand for an end to secrecy in nuclear development and ready access to atomic installations for inspection purposes. In May 1955, he cautioned that Soviet proposals for a self-inspection system "still appear to fall short of the minimum safety requirements." He responded unequivocally to Soviet foreign minister Andrei Y. Vishinsky's demand in October 1954 that the UN Security Council be given veto powers in any disarmament formula. Wadsworth believed that Vishinsky's proposal would make the Soviets the supreme arbiter in deciding which disarmament violations were to be punished.

Wadsworth gradually achieved a reputation as the administration's "chief troubleshooter." His abilities as a negotiator earned him the praise of many of his colleagues in the UN. During 1956, he handled the extremely delicate negotiations leading to the formulation of the Statute of the International Atomic Agency, establishing a 70-nation organization to further peaceful use of atomic energy. In October 1956, Dr. João Carlos Muniz of Brazil, chairman of the council that elaborated the fine points of the statute, called it a "monument to Wadsworth."

In February 1958, Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES appointed Wadsworth to replace HAROLD STASSEN as chief U.S. disarmament negotiator. Wadsworth represented the United States at the disarmament conference in Geneva, Switzerland. Although the United States and the Soviet Union continued to disagree on the issue of inspections (the United States pressed for on-site inspections, while the Soviets would agree only to "seismic" inspections from outside national borders), they reached agreement on 17 of 21 articles that became part of the treaty signed in 1963.

Wadsworth later replaced Henry Cabot Lodge in September 1960 as permanent U.S. representative to the UN. He proved to be a popular diplomat, known for his informal manner and ready laugh as well as his diplomatic expertise. The Russians who worked with him found him "serious, not a cold warrior." Wadsworth left his UN post in 1961. He served as a government consultant during the 1960s, and President LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed him to the Federal Communications Commission, on which he sat from 1965 to 1970. Wadsworth retired to his family farm in the Genesee Valley of upstate New York. He died in Rochester, New York, on March 13, 1984.

—MSM

Wagner, Robert F(erdinand), Jr.

(1910–1991) mayor of New York City

The son of the popular senator Robert F. Wagner, Sr. (D-N.Y.), Wagner was born in New York City on April 20, 1910. Raised in the Yorkville section of Manhattan, he attended Taft School and in 1933 graduated from Yale University. After receiving his law degree from Yale in 1937, he ran successfully for a seat in the New York State Assembly. Reelected in 1938 and 1940, he resigned in 1941 to join the army air corps. He served as an intelligence officer in Europe and rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel. After World War II, Wagner returned to New York and resumed his political career. With the support of Tammany Hall, New York City's Democratic machine, he advanced rapidly. Mayor William O'Dwyer appointed Wagner city tax commissioner in 1946, commissioner of housing and buildings in 1946, and chairman of the city planning commission in 1947. In 1949, Wagner won election as Manhattan borough president. While serving in that office, he made an unsuccessful bid for the Democratic senatorial nomination in 1952.

In 1953, CARMINE DESAPIO, the powerful Democratic Party leader in Manhattan, became disillusioned with Mayor Vincent Impellitteri and, anxious to improve Tammany's image, chose Wagner as his candidate for the Democratic mayoral nomination. Although not a charismatic leader, Wagner's excellent staff, his capacity for hard work, and his ability to make well-thought-out decisions earned him praise from the press and informed observers. His forceful advocacy of improved schools gained him the support of the powerful Parent-Teachers Association, and his father's popularity further enhanced his standing. Moreover, he had managed to avoid the kind of scandals that had rocked the previous Democratic administrations. All of this made him a strong candidate. In the primary, Wagner condemned the incumbent for increases in rent, taxes, and transit fares. He particularly stressed the problem of overcrowded classrooms. With the support of unions and reformers anxious to rid the party of the scandals of the Impellitteri years, Wagner won the primary by over 160,000 votes. He easily defeated the Republican candidate, Harold Riegelman, in the general election.

As mayor, Wagner became known for the steady, methodical, and cautious way in which he attacked the city's problems. He used his administrative abilities and formidable political skills to bring about important improvements in the city. Wagner carefully avoided offending New York's many interest groups, and he often delayed decisions until assured of broad political support.

During Wagner's first two terms, he built 123,000 units of middle-income housing, increased school construction, improved welfare services, opened new parks, modernized the city's building code, successfully pressed the city council to pass a fair housing law, recognized the right of municipal employees to unionize, and undertook a substantial program of highway construction. He appointed greater numbers of African Americans and Puerto Ricans to political and governmental positions than did his predecessors. Wagner also supported the performance of Shakespeare's plays in Central Park. In an extremely popular move, he hired 3,000 additional policemen and transferred others from desk jobs to street assignments; incidents of major crime in the city declined by 21 percent. When a blue-ribbon panel suggested closing 30 firehouses to save $1 million a year, Wagner yielded to popular pressure and refused to shut them down.

The mayor also took important steps to improve city government. He created the office of city administrator to coordinate the activities of various departments and hired expert administrators for top-level posts. Although obligated to DeSapio and Tammany Hall for his election, he refused to put political hacks in policy-making positions. The press praised him for increasing the professionalism of the city's contracting process and for the quality of his appointments to high-level offices, particularly commissioners. Acutely aware of his need for Tammany's support, however, he rarely took low-level jobs away from political appointees and did not interfere with established political practices and customs.

During the late 1950s, Wagner pressed unsuccessfully for revision of the city charter to concentrate executive and administrative power in the hands of the mayor and legislative power in the city council. His reforms were intended to simplify the government's structure, limit political rivalries, and unify the city administration. In 1958, Wagner asked the state legislature to authorize a commission to revise the charter, but the measure did not pass. The following year, he proposed a city law establishing the commission, and the state responded by forming its own panel. The state commission's first report was essentially a political document that criticized the administration of the city. In February 1960, Wagner countered by creating a city panel of high-ranking municipal officials to recommend revision of the charter. Facing the prospect of two commissions preparing conflicting reports, the state legislature enlarged the committee and authorized the mayor to appoint two of its 11 members. Wagner then dissolved his task force. In 1961, voters approved the new charter. It gave the mayor greater power in preparing the capital budget and administering the expense budget, where the Board of Estimate had previously exercised total control. At the same time, it reduced the power of the borough presidents, effectively limiting their patronage.

Yet, despite these accomplishments, Wagner's city could not escape the problems that beset major urban areas during the 1950s. In 1957, New York experienced a seven-day subway strike. The following year, Wagner recognized the right of municipal workers to unionize. With newfound power and the threat of a strike, the city's unions began to extract substantial increases in wages and benefits, which, according to some observers, laid the basis for the city's fiscal problems during the 1970s. Although Manhattan experienced a boom in the construction of office buildings and luxury housing, a good many of the city's residential areas decayed. Thousands of poor African Americans and Hispanics moved into the city, while the white middle class fled to the suburbs. The increasing population of poor people was accompanied by a rising crime rate, de facto school segregation, and growing unemployment. The loss of the city's tax base to the suburbs made it more difficult for the city government to respond to these issues.

In 1957, New York lost the Giants to San Francisco and the Dodgers to Los Angeles. Wagner appointed a commission to investigate the possibility of bringing the National League back to New York. That commission and the mayor proved instrumental in bringing a new franchise, the Mets, to a new stadium in Queens.

During his first two terms, Wagner sought both to remain friendly with DeSapio and to establish independence from the Democratic boss. The Tammany leader was Wagner's chief political adviser and regularly counseled him on patronage matters. Attempting to follow his father into the U.S. Senate, Wagner, with DeSapio's support, won the Democratic nomination in 1956 but lost in the general election to the Republican candidate, JACOB JAVITS. In his bid for reelection as mayor in 1957, Wagner gained the support of all five of the city's Democratic leaders and the backing of the Liberal Party as well. He won an overwhelming 72 percent of the vote. This gave him the opportunity to divorce himself from DeSapio, and the two became rivals during Wagner's second term.

In 1961, Wagner broke with Tammany Hall and, with the support of Democratic reformers such as HERBERT LEHMAN and ELEANOR ROOSEVELT, sought his third term by running against bossism in the Democratic primary. Although he lost the support of all five of New York's Democratic Party leaders, Wagner defeated DeSapio's candidate, Arthur Levitt, and went on to win reelection, defeating Louis J. Lefkowitz.

During Wagner's third term, the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts opened, the city fluoridated its water, and the city hosted the World's Fair in 1964. Nevertheless, he faced a series of problems, including racial violence and shortfalls of municipal revenues. He committed the city to borrowing at unprecedented levels to meet current expenses, thereby establishing a precedent that contributed to the city's fiscal crisis in the following decade. Wagner declined to run for a fourth term in 1965 and was succeeded by a liberal Republican, JOHN V. LINDSAY. After leaving the mayor's office, Wagner practiced law with the firm of Wagner, Quillinan & Tenant. President LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed him ambassador to Spain in 1968. Wagner resigned at the end of the Johnson administration and ran for mayor in 1969 but lost the Democratic primary to Mario Procaccino. In 1976, his law firm merged into Finley, Kumble, Wagner, Heine, Underberg, Manley, Myerson & Casey. President James Carter appointed him unofficial representative to the Vatican in 1978, a position he held until 1981. Wagner left Finley, Kumble in 1987 and joined Fischbein, Badillo & Wagner. He died in New York City on February 12, 1991.

—MSM

Walter, Francis E(uгене)

(1894–1963) U.S. congressman; chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration Affairs of the Judiciary Committee; chairman, Un-American Activities Committee

Born in Easton, Pennsylvania, on May 26, 1894, Walter graduated from the Princeton (New Jersey) Preparatory School in 1912. He attended Lehigh University and George Washington University, where he earned his B.A. After serving in the air service of the U.S. Navy during World War I, he earned an LL.B. from Georgetown University in 1919. He returned to Easton, was admitted to the bar in 1919, and began to practice law. In addition to practicing law, Walter served as a director of the Broad Street Trust Company in Philadelphia and of the Easton National Bank. In 1928, he was appointed solicitor of Norhampton County, Pennsylvania. He won election as a Democrat to the House of Representatives in 1933 and served in the House continuously until his death. During his early years in the House, he supported the New Deal, especially those programs that brought benefits to his district. During Roosevelt's second term, however, he became increasingly worried about the growth and increasing power of the federal bureaucracy. Walter served in the naval air service for six months during World War II.

During the postwar era, Walter emerged as a conservative on many issues. In 1946, he and Senator PAT McCARRAN (D-Nev.) sponsored the Administrative Procedure Act, which required the publication of regulations promulgated by federal agencies in the Federal Register. Walter supported efforts to limit the power of organized labor and congressional efforts to combat communist influence at home and abroad. He became the second-ranking member of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) in 1949. That year, he introduced an unsuccessful bill to deprive members of the Communist Party of American citizenship. In 1950, as chair of a subcommittee of HUAC, he led an investigation of communist activities in Hawaii. The following year, he served as acting chair of the committee in a second round of hearings on communist influence in the film industry.

Walter also became an influential figure in formulating immigration policy. In 1950, he sponsored legislation to allow more displaced persons to come to the United States and to remove racial barriers to naturalization. As a delegate to the International Committee for European Migration in 1951, he worked to place immigrants in countries other than the United States. In 1952, he cosponsored the McCarran-Walter Act, which passed despite opposition from liberals in Congress. Passed over President HARRY S. TRUMAN'S veto, the act continued immigration quotas established in 1924, which were based on ratios of foreign born to the nation's population reported in the 1920 census. The measure had the practical effect of severely limiting the number of eastern and southern European and Asian immigrants. It also extended the grounds for excluding or deporting immigrants. Critics attributed Walter's harsh legislation to his fear of communist infiltration through foreign immigration.

During the next eight years, six of them as chairman of the Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Immigration Affairs, Walter consistently opposed President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER'S efforts to reform the McCarran-Walter Act. Eisenhower proposed using the census of 1950 as a basis for quotas and pooling the unused quotas. Walter blocked such changes and warned that they would increase the danger of communist subversion. In 1953, the president managed to secure passage of the Refugee Relief Act, designed to admit 215,000 non-quota immigrants over the next three years. In 1956, the State Department hired EDWARD CORSI, a respected former immigration official, to administer the law. Walter forced the removal of Corsi from his post, in part because Corsi had criticized the McCarran-Walter Act. Walter also charged that Corsi had once been affiliated with communist front organizations, an allegation that he never substantiated. Eisenhower continued his struggle against Walter in 1956 by recommending major revisions in immigration laws, including the removal of national origins quotas and liberalization of policies affecting refugees from communist countries. Once again Walter was able to block major changes. Later in 1956, however, he departed from his hard-line position and proposed the admission of 5,000 refugees from the Hungarian revolt. One month later, however, Walter was "thoroughly convinced" that many of the new refugees had been communists in Hungary, and he urged that they be admitted as "parolees." In Eisenhower's final year, Walter again thwarted the president's efforts to increase immigration and change admission procedures.

When HUAC was chaired by HAROLD VELDE (R-Ill.) from 1953 to 1955, Walter earned a reputation as one of the more fair and temperate investigators on that panel. Upon assuming the chair of HUAC in 1955, however, his own words and actions took on a new stridency that intensified over the next nine years. In 1955, HUAC investigated one of its familiar targets, the entertainment industry. The hearings turned up little new information. In the spring of 1956, the committee began an investigation of alleged unauthorized use of U.S. passports. In particular, Walter expressed concern about the dissemination of anti-American views. As a result of the hearings, HUAC issued eight contempt citations, none of which were upheld in the courts. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1958 that the State Department had not been authorized by Congress to withhold passports on the basis of "beliefs and associations." Walter immediately pressed for tighter legislative controls on passports.

In July 1958, HUAC probed the Fund for the Republic, set up by the Ford Foundation. Commentator Walter Goodman wrote that Walter suspected the group of campaigning against his immigration law. Furthermore, the liberal foundation was committed to support the “elimination of restrictions on freedom of thought.” At the center of the confrontation was the financing by the fund of a critical report on blacklisting in the entertainment industry. During the hearings, it became clear that while Walter would not admit to the existence of a blacklist, he backed the exclusion of communists. Walter attacked the fund as a tax-exempt organization supporting dubious, anti-American activities. In HUAC’s annual report of 1956, he declared that 200,000 people in the United States, “the equivalent of 20 combat divisions of enemy troops,” were aiding the subversion of U.S. political affairs. HUAC recommended tighter postal and passport controls and more severe punishment for individuals who “obstructed” congressional hearings.

In subsequent years, HUAC chose targets that had been heavily investigated in previous congressional sessions, including the labor movement, the churches, and the entertainment industry. HUAC went to California in 1957 to investigate suspected communists in the education system. In an unusual action, HUAC released names to local school boards and delegated to them the authority to hear testimony that would be duly recorded for HUAC’s later study. Numerous teachers lost their jobs at the hands of local school board officials. Walter incurred the wrath of Protestant ministers in 1960, when he endorsed charges that communists had infiltrated the churches.

HUAC held hearings in San Francisco in 1959, which provoked demonstrations opposing HUAC’s activities. In 1960, HUAC produced a movie, Operation Abolition, that depicted the demonstrations as communist-inspired and directed. The film received considerable criticism as a blatantly deceptive and manipulative journalistic enterprise.

During the administration of President JOHN F. KENNEDY, Walter continued to block efforts to overhaul the McCarran-Walter Act and warned Congress about the danger of importing subversion. While he frequently disagreed with the Kennedy administration on immigration and internal security, he supported much of Kennedy’s proposed economic and social legislation. Indeed, Walter acted as a key operative for the president on numerous congressional votes. Walter’s HUAC had a diminishing role in U.S. affairs during the early 1960s. He died in Washington, D.C., of leukemia on May 31, 1963.

—MSM

Warren, Earl

(1891–1974) chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court The son of Scandinavian immigrants, Warren was born in Los Angeles, California, on March 19, 1891. His mother came from Sweden, and his father, who worked as a railroad mechanic for the Southern Pacific Railroad, came from Norway. Earl Warren grew up in Bakersfield, California, and attended the University of California, where he received an undergraduate degree in 1912 and a law degree in 1914. After working for private firms, which he found unsatisfying, Warren enlisted in the army when the United States entered World War I in 1917. He spent most of the war training recruits and was discharged as a first lieutenant in December 1918. Upon leaving the army, he became a deputy city attorney in Oakland in 1919 and the following year took a position as a deputy district attorney in Alameda County, California. After advancing to chief deputy in 1923, Warren was appointed in 1925 to fill the last year of District Attorney Ezra DeCoto’s term when DeCoto accepted an appointment to the state railroad commission. Warren won election to a full term in 1926 and reelection in 1930 and 1934. In the 13 years he served as district attorney, Warren built a reputation as an honest, efficient, and fair-minded prosecutor. He received national attention for his advocacy of the professionalization of law enforcement and the use of science in law enforcement, as well as his support for cooperation between jurisdictions. Although he was an aggressive prosecutor, no higher court ever overturned a conviction obtained by his office.

Although he was a Republican, Warren’s appeal transcended partisan affiliation. When he ran for state attorney general in 1938, he won the primaries of the Republican, Democratic, and Progressive Parties. Running with little more than token opposition, he swept to victory in the general election. As California’s attorney general, he reorganized his department and focused on prosecuting vice and organized crime. After Pearl Harbor, Warren enthusiastically supported the internment of Japanese Americans. At the same time, however, he issued an opinion holding that the state personnel board could not deny state employees of Japanese descent their rights as civil servants.

President Eisenhower and Earl Warren, governor of California, July 13, 1953 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Running as a Republican, Warren won the first of three successive terms as governor in 1942. Although never a charismatic figure, his hearty public persona, plain manner of expression, and progressive but pragmatic approach to issues won him a personal following that extended across party lines. Warren's liberal Republicanism alienated some conservatives but won over substantial numbers of Democrats. Indeed, when he ran for reelection in 1946, he did so as the nominee of both the Republican and Democratic Parties. He won in a landslide. In his bid for a third term, he carried every county in the state.

As governor, Warren made appointments virtually without regard to party affiliation. He increased old age pensions and unemployment benefits, overhauled the state penal system, expanded unemployment coverage, and inaugurated a public works program that built new schools, highways, hospitals, and parks to meet the needs of the state's rapidly expanding population. He supported lower taxes, proposed a statewide compulsory health insurance program, and opposed the dismissal of professors at the University of California who refused to sign a loyalty oath. Warren did, however, support a loyalty pledge for all state employees, and he signed a bill outlawing the Communist Party in California. Over all, he established a socially progressive record and earned a reputation as a governor with an open mind.

A candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 1948, Warren swung California's delegation to Governor THOMAS E. DEWEY of New York on the final ballot. After Dewey claimed the nomination, he selected Warren as his running mate. Although heavily favored to win the general election, Dewey and Warren lost to President HARRY S. TRUMAN and his running mate, Alben Barkley.

Warren made another bid for his party's presidential nomination in 1952. At the Republican National Convention in July, the California delegation, which Warren led, voted for a resolution to bar contested delegates from voting on the credentials of other contested delegates. The so-called fair play resolution amounted to a vote to seat delegates who supported DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER and helped Eisenhower win the nomination. During the general election campaign, Warren campaigned for Eisenhower in California.

Warren's support for Eisenhower seems not to have been part of any quid pro quo. Following the election, Eisenhower telephoned Warren to inform him that he would not be offered a position in the cabinet. The president-elect had considered Warren for the position of attorney general, but that went to HERBERT BROWNELL, whose legal and political advice Eisenhower greatly valued. Eisenhower then remarked that he intended to offer Warren the first vacancy on the Supreme Court. Eisenhower, at least, did not consider the commitment to be a concrete one; Warren, by all indications, did. In any event, no one expected the first vacancy to be the chief justice. In the meantime, Eisenhower offered Warren the position of solicitor general, which Warren accepted. Before the nomination was made public, however, Chief Justice FRED VINSON died early in September 1953. The president considered other possible appointees before settling on Warren. Eisenhower announced Warren's nomination as chief justice on September 30, saying that he had chosen the Californian for his “integrity, honesty, middle-of-the-road philosophy, experience in Government, [and] experience in the law.” Eisenhower gave Warren a recess appointment, and the new chief justice was sworn in on October 5, the day the Court’s new term started. The Senate confirmed his nomination by a unanimous voice vote on March 1, 1954.

Warren took the helm of a court bitterly divided between a faction of judicial activists, led by HUGO BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, and a faction dedicated to judicial restraint, led by FELIX FRANKFURTER and ROBERT H. JACKSON. Under Vinson’s ineffective leadership, the ideological divisions persisted unabated, even though the personal animosities had calmed somewhat.

In December 1953, soon after Warren took his seat, the Court heard arguments in five cases held over from its previous session, which challenged the constitutionality of racial segregation in public schools. The cases came from four states and the District of Columbia. When the justices met to consider the case, Warren suggested that, contrary to their usual practice, they discuss the matter before voting on it. Over the next few months, Warren demonstrated his exceptional skills as a politician and managed to unite the Court behind a decision to overturn segregated public schools. After the justices finally voted in late February or March 1954, Warren undertook to write the opinion himself. On May 17, 1954, he announced the Court’s decision in Brown v. Board of Education, his first major opinion as chief justice. In a deliberately low-key manner, Warren read the decision of a unanimous Court, which held that racially segregated public schools were inherently unequal and therefore deprived children of equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. He left open the question of how this decision should be implemented and called for further argument on that issue. In a second opinion handed down that day, Warren, again speaking for a unanimous Court, ruled that segregated public schools in the District of Columbia violated the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. A year later, on May 31, 1955, Warren spoke once more for a unanimous Court, this time on the question of implementation. In that decision, the Court ruled that school desegregation was to begin immediately and proceed “with all deliberate speed.”

The most famous and perhaps the most important of Warren’s many major decisions, Brown did not explicitly overturn Plessy v. Ferguson (1896). Therefore, it did not strike down segregation in other public facilities, but the logic of Brown was clear. Appellate courts struck down segregated parks, swimming pools, and other facilities. In 1963, the Court ruled, in Johnson v. Virginia, that “a State may not constitutionally require segregation of public facilities.” Brown effectively ended the legality of the South’s Jim Crow system and helped set in motion major changes in American race relations.

Warren’s particular contribution in Brown lay in his ability to gain unanimity among the justices. Although several prior rulings had suggested that the Court might outlaw segregation in Brown, the outcome was by no means assured. More important, a unanimous Court, which was invaluable in such a momentous decision, proved difficult to secure. Even some justices who personally found segregation abhorrent questioned whether the Court had the constitutional authority to overturn it. Warren got his unanimous decision by his handling of the issue in conference, his discussion of the cases with individual justices, and the moderate phrasing of the final opinion. Similarly, his decision to put off the matter of implementation helped promote unanimity, even though it did not, as Warren hoped, promote southern acceptance of the decision.

Addressed to the American polity as well as judges and lawyers, Warren’s opinion in Brown was short and nontechnical. In terms easily accessible to the general public, it eloquently argued that segregation harmed black students and therefore violated their constitutional rights. On the other hand, it lacked, in the words of legal historian Paul Finkelman, “technical precision and rigorous [legal] analysis.” Opponents, and even some supporters, of the Brown decision, criticized Warren’s opinion for its absence of solid legal analysis and argument, as well as its reliance on social science. Many civil rights advocates expressed dissatisfaction with the gradualist formula for implementation the Court adopted in the second decision.

Aside from Brown, Warren in his first years on the bench turned out to be the moderate and rather cautious jurist most observers expected him to be when he was appointed. In his first term, for example, he voted to uphold a state gambling conviction based on illegally seized evidence and to sustain medical authorities in the state of New York when they suspended a doctor's license to practice because he had refused to cooperate with a congressional investigation into communism.

By mid-1956, however, Warren aligned himself with the Court's more activist and libertarian members. His shift became evident through a series of controversial cases involving loyalty and security issues in which he consistently voted in favor of individual claimants and against the government, though he did so on a variety of grounds. In April 1956, Warren, speaking for a majority of six justices, overturned the conviction of a well-known communist under Pennsylvania's anti-sedition statute (Pennsylvania v. Nelson). The chief justice held that Congress had preempted this field with the Smith Act of 1940. Warren again spoke for the Court in Watkins v. U.S. (1957), which reversed the contempt conviction of an officer in a labor union who, while willing to answer questions about himself and others he knew to be members of the Communist Party, had refused to answer questions before a subcommittee of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) about people who had once been members of the party but no longer were. Warren ruled that the subcommittee had failed to show that the questions asked were pertinent to the subject under investigation, but he added to this narrow holding a lengthy essay which insisted that congressional committees were subject to constitutional limitations and that congressional investigations had to be related to a legitimate legislative purpose. "There is," wrote Warren, "no Congressional power to expose for the sake of exposure."

In a companion case reversing a similar contempt conviction under state law, Warren, writing for a plurality, also limited the investigative power of the states (Sweezy v. New Hampshire [1957]). The legislature of New Hampshire had given the state's attorney general authority to investigate subversive persons and activities. Called before the attorney general, Paul M. Sweezy, a left-wing professor, refused to answer questions about the content of the lecture he had given at the state university. The attorney general petitioned to county court to ask the professor the same questions. When Sweezy refused to answer, the court held him in contempt. The Supreme Court reversed that conviction. Basing his opinion on a narrow question, Warren, writing for himself and three other justices, held that the legislature had not specified that it desired the information about which the attorney general had questioned Sweezy. Two other justices voted to set aside the conviction but did so on the ground that the questions put to Sweezy infringed upon his constitutionally protected academic and political freedom.

The decisions in Watkins and Sweezy aroused considerable controversy. Some members of Congress openly and harshly criticized the Court. Senator WILLIAM JENNER (R-Ind.) introduced a bill that would have limited the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in cases involving the functions of congressional committees, security programs administered by the executive branch, and state laws dealing with subversion. Representative HOWARD SMITH (D-Va.) introduced a bill to limit the discretion of the Court in determining that statutes passed by Congress had preempted the field. None of the various anti-Court bills became law.

The congressional reaction overestimated the reach of the Watkins and Sweezy cases. In June 1959, the Court upheld contempt convictions in two cases very similar to those decided in 1957. Focusing on the limited nature of the Court's decision in Watkins, a narrow majority of the Court (five to four) voted, in Barenblatt v. U.S., to uphold the conviction for contempt of Congress of a teacher who had refused to answer questions before a subcommittee of HUAC. The questions posed in this case, held the majority, were "pertinent" to the investigation, which, moreover, fell within the committee's purview. Decided the same day as Barenblatt, Uphaus v. Wyman upheld the conviction of Willard Uphaus for refusing to divulge the names of the people who attended a "World Fellowship" camp in New Hampshire. The majority distinguished this case from Sweezy in that it involved no question of academic freedom, the legislature clearly wanted the questions answered, and the government's interest in "self-preservation" outweighed "individual rights in an associational privacy which . . . were here tenuous at best.” The chief justice dissented in both Berenblatt and Sweezy.

During the 1960s, when new appointments created a liberal majority, Warren led an increasingly activist Court whose rulings were marked by a concern for protecting individual liberties and promoting equality. Although he exercised considerable influence on the Court, unlike Chief Justice John Marshall, Warren did not assign to himself all of the most important decisions in which he joined the majority. Indeed, many of the decisions that define the Warren Court were written by other justices. For example, Warren did not write for the Court in Mapp v. Ohio (1961), which excluded evidence seized without a warrant; Engel v. Vitale (1961), which struck down mandated or state-sanctioned prayers in public schools; Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), which extended the Sixth Amendment’s right to counsel to defendants in state courts; and Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), which struck down state prohibitions on the use of contraceptives and established a constitutional right to privacy. Warren did not even assign himself the opinion in a case he considered the most significant of his tenure, Baker v. Carr (1962), in which the justices ruled that federal courts could decide legislative apportionment issues. The Court later ordered reapportionment on the basis of “one man, one vote” (Gray v. Sanders [1964]).

Warren did, however, write opinions in a number of highly significant cases. In Miranda v. Arizona (1966), Warren wrote the decision for a five-to-four majority which held that suspects had to be informed of their right to remain silent and that anything a suspect said could be held against him or her in court. In addition, suspects had to be informed of their right to counsel and their right to have counsel appointed if they could not afford one. These so-called Miranda warnings reshaped the administration of criminal justice in the United States. In Reynolds v. Sims (1964), a case dealing with legislative reapportionment, Warren held that legislative districts should be based on population. “Legislators,” he memorably wrote, “represent people, not trees or acres.”

The Warren Court expanded the rights of those suspected or accused of crime, overturned much of the loyalty-security apparatus of the 1950s, held organized prayer and Bible reading in public schools unconstitutional, and expanded the scope of freedom of speech and of the press. By the time Warren retired in June 1969, the Court had wrought a constitutional revolution in several areas, and its rulings had made a profound impact on American social and political life.

In November 1963, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON appointed Warren to head a presidential commission assigned to investigate the assassination of President JOHN F. KENNEDY. Warren balked at the assignment; he questioned the appropriateness of his service on an extrajudicial investigative panel. Johnson prevailed on the chief justice, who acceded to the president. Johnson hoped that the Warren Commission would squelch burgeoning speculation that Kennedy’s assassination was the result of a conspiracy. The Warren Commission found that Lee Harvey Oswald, acting alone, assassinated Kennedy. For a variety of reasons, the commission did not do a good job of investigating the matter, and the shortcomings of its report subsequently fueled conspiracy theories. Ironically, in spite of all of the report’s inadequacies, the weight of scholarly opinion supports the Warren Commission’s conclusion that Lee Harvey Oswald assassinated Kennedy.

Johnson announced that he would not seek reelection on April 1, 1968. Convinced that RICHARD M. NIXON, a longtime political enemy and the frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination, would win the election, Warren decided to resign. That decision seems to have been based on Warren’s fear that Nixon would appoint his successor. Johnson nominated Associate Justice Abe Fortas to replace Warren and Homer Thornberry, a judge from Texas, to replace Fortas. Ironically, a scandal involving Fortas’s financial dealings forced him to withdraw his nomination. Warren agreed to remain on the Court, but the scandal forced Fortas to resign from the Court. Warren remained in office until Nixon appointed WARREN E. BURGER to the chief justiceship. Nixon appointed Harry Blackmun to the vacancy created by Fortas’s resignation.

After leaving the Court, Warren wrote his memoirs and gave public lectures. He died in Washington, D.C., on July 9, 1974.

Aside from those who objected to the outcome of particular cases, the Warren Court encountered criticism for reaching out to decide controversial issues and for being too result-oriented in its rulings. Even some supporters of the Court's decisions conceded that the justices acted more like legislators than judges in the way they made new policy. Warren answered these criticisms by asserting that the Court had an obligation to decide all cases properly placed before it, however controversial the issues. For Warren, the Court's special function lay in guaranteeing the constitutional protections afforded to individuals, especially those least likely to receive them.

Neither a great legal scholar nor judicial philosopher, Warren was not even an especially skilled legal craftsman. Most analysts, however, regard him as one of the most important and influential chief justices, perhaps second only to John Marshall. Warren believed in fairness and common sense and regarded them as more appropriate bases for decisions than the fine points of judicial philosophy.

—MSM

Washington, Val(ores) (James)

(1903–1995) Republican national committeeman, director of minorities

Born in Columbus, Indiana, on September 18, 1903, Washington graduated from Indiana University in 1924. He worked as an editor and publisher of the Gary (Indiana) Sun from 1924 to 1926. For the next eight years, he was a freelance writer, specializing in political articles and features. In 1934, he joined the Chicago Defender, Chicago's African-American Newspaper, where he worked as the paper's business, advertising, and general manager. He remained with the Defender until 1941, when he became a member of the Illinois Commerce Commission, a position he held until 1948.

An active Republican, he became executive assistant to the campaign director of the Republican National Committee (RNC) in 1946. At the same time, he received an appointment to the headquarters staff of the RNC as director of minorities. In that capacity, he had responsibility for planning and executing strategies to win black voters back to the Republican Party. Two years later, he served as assistant campaign manager to HERBERT BROWNELL, who ran THOMAS E. DEWEY's presidential campaign.

During the presidential campaign of 1952, Washington served as the RNC's official spokesman for the campaign of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER on African-American issues. In support of Eisenhower's campaign in 1952, Washington wrote in The Crisis: "Historically, 3,000,000 Negro slaves found emancipation through the Republican party eighty-nine years ago. In 1952, this same party offers the surest and best chance, the most practical, realistic and honest program through which this minority . . . can achieve their present political ambition of full citizenship." Washington defended Eisenhower against charges that he had supported segregation in the military. Just before the election, he persuaded the National Council of Negro Democrats to endorse Eisenhower.

During the Eisenhower administration, Washington served as an adviser to the president and as an administrative liaison to Congress on minority affairs. During the campaign, Eisenhower had promised to include qualified African Americans for positions in his administration. Eisenhower assigned responsibility for seeking out black candidates to SHERMAN ADAMS. Washington was responsible for gathering the names of likely candidates. He played a role in obtaining an appointment for E. FREDERIC MORROW as adviser on business affairs in the Department of Commerce and then in getting Morrow a position as administrator for special projects in the White House. In the latter post, Morrow became the first African American to hold an executive post in the White House. Washington also played a role in the appointment of J. Ernest Wilkins as assistant secretary of labor. Other appointments for which Washington could claim some responsibility included Frank Snowden as cultural attaché in Rome, Clifton Wharton as minister to Romania, John B. Eubanks as head of the Rural Improvements Staff of the U.S. Operations Mission of the International Cooperation Administration, and Robert Lee Brokenburr, Charles H. Mahoney, and Archibald J. Carey as members of the American delegation to the United Nations. In addition, Washington constantly urged Republican officials at all levels of government to appoint African Americans to their staffs.

Washington offered advice, which was not always welcome, to the Eisenhower administration on racial matters. He urged Eisenhower to demonstrate "warmth, sympathy, and solid helpfulness" to school districts that complied with the Supreme Court's ruling, in Brown v. Board of Education, that segregated public schools were unconstitutional. He also suggested that federal aid for school construction be extended to districts that desegregated. Washington also argued for a public statement from the administration condemning the murder of EMMETT TILL. Going into the election of 1956, Washington pressed for an increase in the RNC's budget to attract black voters. During the campaign, Washington aggressively defended the administration's record. In 1957, Washington strongly supported the administration's civil rights bill and strenuously objected when key sections were cut and weakened.

At the end of the Eisenhower administration, Washington left the Republican National Committee and founded an import/export firm based in Washington, D.C. When Ronald Reagan won the presidential election in 1980, Washington told Ebony magazine that Reagan would open doors for African Americans.

Washington died of a heart attack at his home in Upper Marlboro, Maryland, on April 23, 1995.

—MSM

Watkins, Arthur V(ivian) (1886–1973) U.S. senator

A Mormon whose grandparents were among the early pioneers of Utah, Arthur Watkins was born in Midway, Utah, on December 18, 1886. He moved with his family to Vernal, Utah, in the mid-1890s. He studied at Brigham Young Academy (later Brigham Young University) from 1903 to 1906. After teaching grade school for a year, he left for New York City to serve two years as a missionary. He remained to study law at New York University and Columbia University, from which earned a law degree in 1912. Watkins returned to Vernal in 1913, where he gained admission to the bar, entered the practice of law with a family friend, and edited a weekly newspaper. After losing a race for county attorney in Uintah County, in which he ran on the Progressive ticket, he received an appointment as assistant county attorney of Salt Lake County in 1914. When the Republicans were turned out of office the following year, Watkins lost his position and practiced law in Centerville, Utah. Health problems interfered with his work as a lawyer, and, beginning in 1919, he managed a ranch owned by his cousins, which he turned into Utah's first commercial turkey farm. During the early 1920s, he resumed the practice of law in American Fork and relocated to Orem in 1925, where he also leased a commercial fruit farm. He served as judge for the fourth judicial district in Utah from 1928 to 1933. After an unsuccessful attempt to gain a seat in the House of Representatives in 1936, he won election as a Republican to the U.S. Senate in 1946. He was reelected in 1952.

A conservative on domestic issues and a unilateralist in foreign policy, Watkins associated himself with the midwestern, conservative wing of the Republican Party led by Senator ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio). Anxious to assert congressional control over foreign policy, he introduced a reservation to the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 that would have required congressional approval before committing American forces to combat. The Senate rejected his reservation. Later he criticized President HARRY S. TRUMAN's decision to send troops to Korea without seeking congressional approval. Watkins also favored more aid to Nationalist China and less to Europe.

A strong advocate of western water development, Watkins worked to gain support for the Upper Colorado River Storage Project, which Congress passed in 1956. As head of the Indian Affairs Subcommittee, he took the lead in efforts to end federal trust relationships with numerous tribes.

Although a strong anticommunist, Watkins remained noncommittal on Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY's (R-Wis.) anticommunist crusade during the early 1950s. Nevertheless, Watkins played a key role in the events leading to the Senate's condemnation of McCarthy in late 1954. In July, Senator RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.) introduced a resolution to censure McCarthy for conduct "unbecoming a member of the U.S. Senate . . . contrary to senatorial traditions, and tending to bring the Senate into disrepute." Senators WILLIAM FULBRIGHT (D-Ark.)

and WAYNE MORSE (Ind.-Oreg.) later added 33 specific complaints against McCarthy. The leaders of the Senate created a special select committee to investigate the charges and chose six “neutral” senators to serve on it. The members of the committee, highly respected by their colleagues, all came from the moderately conservative group that held the balance of power in both parties. None had taken a strong stand on McCarthy. Watkins’s reputation as a stern moralist, devoted to order, propriety, and the traditions of the Senate, made him a logical choice for chair. In addition, Watkins was a member of the Internal Security Subcommittee and had impeccable anticommunist credentials.

When the committee’s hearings began on August 31, Watkins clearly intended to exercise full control and not to allow McCarthy to turn the hearings into a circus or a showcase for himself. The committee forbade smoking and television cameras in the hearing room. Further, the rules established by the committee permitted either McCarthy or his lawyer (but not both) to cross-examine a given witness. By eliminating the senators who had introduced the censure motion as witnesses, the committee deprived McCarthy of anyone to attack. Moreover, Watkins forced McCarthy to obey the rules and adhere to standards of relevance. With grim determination and effectiveness, Watkins used the gavel to cut off McCarthy’s outbursts.

The Watkins Committee decided to consider 13 charges divided into five general categories, including contempt of the Senate, receipt of classified information, encouragement of federal employees to violate the law, abuse of fellow senators, and abuse of General RALPH W. ZWICKER, who had appeared before McCarthy’s Government Operations Committee during its investigation of the army. Over many tedious hours and days, the panel and an admittedly bored McCarthy heard a mass of evidence documenting the behavior of the junior senator from Wisconsin. The unanimous committee’s report, issued on September 27, recommended censure on two counts: contempt of the Senate for failing to appear before the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections in 1952 and for abusing General Zwicker. The report described McCarthy’s conduct as “contumacious, denunciatory, unworthy, inexcusable and reprehensible.” Neither party especially wanted to bring the matter to a vote before the elections in November. The Senate leadership postponed a vote by the full Senate on the censure resolution until after the November elections. During the interim, Senator McCarthy denounced Watkins as “cowardly and stupid.”

On the first day of debate, November 10, 1954, Watkins presented his committee’s charges before the Senate. Afflicted with a painful spastic abdominal muscle, Watkins did not waver under attacks by McCarthy and his allies. In a speech inserted into the Congressional Record on November 15, McCarthy accused the Watkins Committee of becoming a “unwitting handmaiden” of the communists. Watkins then told the Senate that McCarthy should be censured for his attacks on the panel. This charge replaced the one dealing with the abuse of Zwicker. Later in the proceedings, an angry Watkins elicited tears from some of his colleagues and applause from others as he described McCarthy’s attack on the Select Committee as a blow against the Senate itself. He challenged that body, “What are you going to do about it?”

On December 2, the censure resolution passed by a margin of 67–22. After the vote, STYLES BRIDGES (R-N.H.), one of McCarthy’s supporters, demanded of Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, then presiding, whether the word “censure” appeared in the resolution. Nixon acknowledged that it did not and, exercising his prerogative as presiding officer to change the title of a resolution to conform to its text, eliminated the word censure from the title. No one, however, could misinterpret the Senate’s forceful condemnation. McCarthy himself observed that “it wasn’t exactly a vote of confidence.” Soon afterward, President Eisenhower personally congratulated Watkins for his excellent work, a fact that provoked charges of “lynching” from McCarthy’s remaining supporters.

After the McCarthy investigation, Watkins receded from the public eye. He lost his bid for reelection in 1958, when the former governor of Utah, J. BRACKEN LEE, who personally disliked Watkins, ran as an independent in the general election and split the Republican vote. As a result, the Democratic candidate, Frank Moss, was elected senator. After leaving the Senate, Watkins served briefly as a consultant to the secretary of the interior. Appointed to the Indian Claims Commission in 1959, he became chair of the commission in 1960. After retiring from the commission in 1967, he returned to Salt Lake City. In 1973, he moved to Orem, where he died on September 1, 1973.

—MSM

Watson, Thomas J(ohn), Jr.

(1914–1993) president, International Business Machines Corporation

The son of the head of International Business Machines Corporation (IBM), Watson was born in Dayton, Ohio, on January 8, 1914. He attended the Hun School in Princeton, New Jersey, and graduated from Brown University in 1937. That same year, he joined IBM as a salesman. When the United States entered World War II, Watson joined the New York National Guard and later received a commission as a second lieutenant in the army air corps. By the time he was discharged in 1945, he held the rank of lieutenant colonel. After the war, Watson returned to IBM, where he demonstrated managerial ability and a flair for salesmanship in the rapidly growing corporation, which made punch card tabulating machinery (adding machines). Young Watson rose rapidly through the company. His father placed him as assistant to the executive vice president. Watson became a vice president of IBM in 1946 and later that year was elected to the board of directors. In 1949, he became executive vice president.

Watson became president of IBM in 1952. His father was chairman of the board and chief executive officer. Watson assumed the position of chief executive officer in 1956, and, when the elder Watson died a few months later, his son became the major force behind the company. Watson oversaw changes in the company's benefits and pension policies that included offering medical insurance for employees and stock options for managers. He also decentralized the company's corporate structure.

During the mid-1950s, Watson led the company into the computer industry. IBM had funded efforts to develop an electronic computer during World War II but had not demonstrated any interest in developing computers for commercial use. The elder Watson believed them too expensive and too unreliable. Nevertheless, electronic computers could make calculations many times faster than the conventional business equipment produced by IBM that operated with electric motors, levers, and punch cards. After the Census Bureau purchased a UNIVAC computer, built by another company, to process census information, the younger Watson moved to get IBM into the business. During the Korean War, Watson persuaded his father that the company should develop computers to sell to the military. The result was the 701 Data Processing Machine. IBM developed a version for commercial use (the IBM 702) in 1954. In these computers, transistors replaced vacuum tubes; and the machines could store data on magnetic tape. Under Watson's direction, the sales and profits of IBM skyrocketed. Watson vastly increased IBM's spending on research and development, and the company's research division turned out increasingly advanced models to meet the increasing demand for sophisticated equipment. In the late 1950s, IBM developed a computer network to link a string of radar stations for the air force. That technology became the basis for the first commercial online computer network, which IBM built for American Airlines and began operating in 1964.

IBM's dominant position in the sale of office equipment brought unwelcome attention from the federal government, which filed an antitrust lawsuit against the company in 1952. Watson persuaded his father to sign a consent agreement to settle the matter in 1956. IBM agreed to sell, as well as lease, its office equipment, share some of its patents, and separate its service operations from the rest of the company. Watson calculated that the agreement would primarily effect the firm's older equipment and that settling the matter would free the company to expand its business in computers. By 1960, IBM had become one of the nation's leading corporations and the dominant producer of computers. That year its profits reached over $168 million.

Unlike many of the important business executives of the period, Watson was a liberal Democrat who opposed neither high levels of government spending nor the high tax rates necessitated by such spending. In a speech before the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM) in 1959, he maintained that a liberal welfare state was necessary to achieve U.S. goals at home and abroad. He argued that the Soviet Union's success in raising its standard of living impressed underdeveloped nations, which were tempted to follow its example. Watson, however, maintained that the American economic system provided an even more appealing model and asked businessmen to realize that the nation must do everything in its power to help other countries adopt it. Watson told his audience that business leaders should not complain about high taxes. The American people desired a stronger nation, a balanced budget, and the same or even lower taxes. "These three goals," Watson said, "are incompatible. One of our first sacrifices must be a willingness to accept higher taxes if necessary." Watson's speech received polite but restrained applause.

The following year, Watson testified before a Senate subcommittee examining the economic and military threat posed by the Soviet Union. He said that, although he disliked government controls of business, he accepted them as necessary in the cold war. He remarked, "I would rather have greater control by our government under the present system than to discover one day that business-as-usual has not been sufficient to win the battle." As he had in his speech to the NAM, Watson stressed that only liberalism could prevent the spread of communism.

Watson stepped down as president in 1961, but he continued as chairman of the board and chief executive officer. During the 1960s and 1970s, IBM grew to be one of the largest multinational corporations in the world. Under Watson's direction, the company spent $5 billion on the development of a new generation of computers. Introduced in 1964, the System/360 used hard drives instead of magnetic tape and integrated circuits instead of transistors. The new line of computers proved so successful that IBM expanded its already large share of the market. Several competitors, including Honeywell, RCA, and General Electric, dropped out of the market.

A close friend of President JOHN F. KENNEDY, Watson served on a number of important advisory committees, including the Committee on Labor Management Policy, the National Advisory Council for the Peace Corps, and the Citizens Committee for International Development. In 1969, the government brought an antitrust suit to break up the company. In response, Watson "unbundled" the pricing of computer hardware from that of maintenance and software. That prompted the development of a new industry of independent software makers.

Watson suffered a heart attack in 1970, after which he stepped down as chairman and chief executive officer in 1971. He continued on the board of directors and headed its executive committee until 1979. In 1977, President Jimmy Carter named Watson to chair the General Advisory Committee on Arms Control and Disarmament. Two years later, Carter appointed him ambassador to the Soviet Union. Watson's hopes for substantial gains in arms reduction evaporated when the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan, but he continued as ambassador until the end of the Carter administration. He returned to IBM's board of directors in 1981 and served until 1984. After that, Watson devoted himself to philanthropic activities. In the 1980s, the microchip and the growth of personal computers did what the government had never been able to achieve; it broke IBM's hold on the computer market. Watson died in Greenwich, Connecticut, on December 31, 1993.

—MSM

Weeks, Sinclair

(1893–1972) secretary of commerce

Sinclair Weeks was born in West Newton, Massachusetts, on June 15, 1893. His father founded the brokerage house of Hornblower & Weeks and served as a Republican mayor of Newton, a member of Congress, a U.S. senator, and Calvin Coolidge's secretary of war. Weeks graduated from Harvard in 1914 and went to work for First National Bank of Boston. A member of the Massachusetts National Guard, he served on the Mexican border in 1916. When the United States entered World War I, Weeks enlisted in the army. Rising from second lieutenant to captain, he saw action in France as commander of battery B of the 101st Artillery of the 26th Division. Upon his discharge from the army in 1919, Weeks returned to First National Bank. In 1923, his father-in-law, whose health was failing, prevailed on Weeks to help manage Reed & Barton, a silver manufacturing firm, and United States Fastener Company, which made fasteners for clothing. Weeks negotiated a merger with United States Fastener's main competitor, creating United-Carr Fastener Corporation in 1929. Under Weeks's careful leadership both United-Carr and Reed & Barton weathered the Great Depression in good shape.

Weeks also began a career in politics. After losing a race for alderman in Newton in 1921, he won the seat the following year. Reelected three times, he served from 1923 to 1930 and, during the later part of his tenure, became president of the board of aldermen. Weeks won election as mayor of Newton in 1929. He performed his duties as mayor during mornings and evenings and devoted the afternoons to running his businesses. While initiating public works projects, he kept the city's debt under control. He won reelection in 1931 and 1933. Driven by his opposition to what he regarded as President Franklin D. Roosevelt's reckless spending, Weeks sought the Republican nomination for the U.S. Senate in 1936. He narrowly lost the nomination to HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., but he soon assumed the chair of the Republican state committee. From 1941 to 1953, he was a member of the Republican National Committee, and he served as treasurer of that body from 1940 to 1944. He chaired the Republican Finance Committee from 1949 to 1952. A director of the National Association of Manufacturers as well as a number of major corporations, he exercised considerable influence in the business community and served as an important link between business leaders and the Republican Party. Weeks took an active role in the presidential campaign of Wendell L. Willkie in 1940.

When Lodge resigned from the Senate in 1944 to enlist in the army, Governor LEVERETT SALTONSTALL appointed Weeks to fill the vacant seat. Weeks did not run for the seat that September. During nearly a year in the Senate, Weeks was an outspoken opponent of Roosevelt's domestic programs. He then returned to his role as a party functionary. He supported Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg's unsuccessful bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 1948 and engineered a draft of Representative CHRISTIAN A. HERTER for the Massachusetts gubernatorial nomination in 1952. Herter subsequently defeated his Democratic opponent.

Weeks became the first member of the Republican National Committee to declare his support for the candidacy of General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. Senator ROBERT TAFT (R-Ohio) had the support of most party regulars, but Weeks helped to organize Eisenhower's primary drive and then helped swing delegates to Eisenhower's candidacy during the Republican National Convention. In a much publicized statement, Weeks urged Taft to withdraw from the race, calling on the senator to "perform a supreme act of self-denial" that would "electrify the country, instantly unite the Party[,] . . . guarantee victory and save the country." Taft, predictably, rejected the suggestion. After Eisenhower defeated Taft for the nomination, Weeks became chair of the Republican National Finance Committee and raised a record amount of money for the fall campaign.

After the election, President-elect Eisenhower approached Weeks about assuming the chairmanship of the Republican National Party, which became vacant when ARTHUR SUMMERFIELD resigned to become postmaster general. Weeks, however, expressed a preference for becoming secretary of commerce, a position he thought would enable him to use his skills as a manager and to promote the interests of American businesses.

As secretary of commerce, Weeks quickly emerged as the most aggressively pro-business member of Eisenhower's cabinet. During the closing months of 1952, Eisenhower asked Weeks to head a panel formed to study the question of ending the wage and price controls imposed by the Truman administration. The commission recommended an end to price controls and a return to a free market. Based on historical experience, the panel maintained, controls had coped only with the symptoms of inflation rather than its basic causes. The panel therefore recommended they be reserved only for extreme emergencies and then used only for short periods of time. Weeks argued that controls would “distort and impede our production effort.” He conceded that removing controls might result in rising prices but maintained that the long-range effect would be salutary. Eisenhower followed Weeks’s advice and in February 1953 ordered the removal of all wage and some price controls at once.

President Eisenhower and Secretary of Commerce C. Sinclair Weeks, October 19, 1954 (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

During the first year of the administration, Weeks became involved in a debate within the administration over modifying the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, which labor opposed because of its restrictions on unions. The principal proponent of revision, Secretary of Labor MARTIN DURKIN, wanted to drop the act’s provision requiring union leaders to sign noncommunist affidavits, abolish “right-to-work” laws, give unions more control over membership, and permit secondary boycotts. In addition, he hoped to minimize the jurisdiction of state courts in labor disputes. Eisenhower rejected extreme revisions and supported amending the legislation to eliminate only those provisions that could be used to “smash unions.” Weeks, on the other hand, saw the attempt at revision as an opportunity to strengthen the act. He was particularly anxious to clarify the authority of states in labor disputes to prevent “erroneous” interpretations of the statutes.

Weeks and Durkin clashed bitterly over the revision of Taft-Hartley. In an effort to resolve the dispute, presidential assistants BERNARD SHANLEY and GERALD MORGAN drew up a 19-point memorandum suggesting a position for the administration. Most of the points reflected Durkin’s position. The memorandum eventually became the basis for a draft of a message to be forwarded to Congress on July 31. Taft, however, died that day, and, because he had coauthored the original legislation, the White House delayed action. It seemed impolitic to submit revisions of the act the day its original sponsor died. Further, Taft’s death greatly diminished any prospect for passage of amendments. Without Taft’s prestige and influence, particularly with the Republican Right, the amendments had little chance of gaining congressional approval. In the meantime, Weeks, joined by Vice President RICHARD NIXON, maneuvered behind the scenes to kill the message. They convinced the president that alienating business and supporters of states’ rights would be politically disastrous. During the early part of September, Eisenhower informed Durkin that the 19 points would not be forwarded to Congress. Durkin resigned from the cabinet.

Weeks became involved in another well-publicized clash in 1953—this time within his own department. Dr. Allen V. Austin, head of the National Bureau of Standards (NBS), announced that a product advertised as giving longer life to storage batteries proved ineffective in a scientific test. On March 31, Weeks attempted to force Austin’s resignation on the ground that he had made a subjective judgment. However, public opposition to what appeared to be political interference with the scientific process and sentiment within the NBS (400 employees threatened to resign) forced Weeks to establish a panel of scientists to rule on the product. The committee not only backed Austin’s conclusions but insisted that he remain on the job. Recognizing his own mistake, Weeks retreated. Weeks and Austin eventually became friends and worked closely together.

Weeks consistently advocated turning over government operations to private industry whenever possible. In 1954, he oversaw the sale of the Inland Waterways Corporation’s barge lines to a syndicate from the Midwest. Weeks also faced criticism for his department’s use of business leaders as unpaid management consultants; by 1957, he curtailed his department’s use of such consultants.

Weeks often came across as an unyielding conservative. Even President-elect Eisenhower noted in his diary that he found Weeks “so completely conservative in his views that he seems to be illogical. I hope . . . that he will soon become a little bit more aware of the world as it is today.” During his years as secretary of commerce, however, Weeks frequently supported the president’s “modern Republicanism.”

He backed Eisenhower's commitment to more open trade and led the fight for Eisenhower's reciprocal trade program, even though many manufacturers opposed it. Although known as a hard-liner on communism, he nevertheless issued regulations in August 1957 permitting an increase in the export of "peaceful" goods to Poland. The move incurred the wrath of members of the Republican Right. Weeks served as liaison between the cabinet and various subcommittees during the planning stages of the St. Lawrence Seaway, a project for which he was a vigorous advocate. He fought for U.S. membership in the antiprotectionist Organization of Trade Cooperation, broadened Weather Bureau services, modernized the air navigation system, furthered legislation to assist railroads, administered the nation's largest peacetime shipbuilding program for merchant ships, expanded the fair trade program, and expanded his department's activities in research and the gathering of statistics. In addition, Weeks furthered the passage of the Federal Highway Act of 1956. In his memoirs, Eisenhower wrote that "the great highway system would stand as a memorial to the man in my cabinet who headed the department responsible for it."

Weeks retired from the cabinet in November 1958 for personal and financial reasons. In 1959, he was elected director of the First National Bank of Boston, a post he had resigned to join the cabinet. Five years later, he joined Hornblower & Weeks, Hemphill, Noyes, as a limited partner. Despite his business activities, Weeks spent much of his time on his farm in Lancaster, New Hampshire. He died in Concord, Massachusetts, on January 7, 1972.

—MSM

Welch, Joseph N(ye)

(1890–1960) special counsel, U.S. Army

The son of poor English-born parents, Welch was born in Primghar, Iowa, on October 22, 1890. He clerked in a real estate office for two years to save enough money to attend college. After graduating Phi Beta Kappa from Grinnell College in 1914, he went to Harvard Law School on a scholarship. After receiving his LL.B. in 1917, he enrolled in the army's officer candidate school, which he was attending when World War I ended. After serving with the legal division of the U.S. Shipping Board, he joined the Boston firm of Hale and Dorr in 1919. A highly successful trial lawyer, he became a partner in 1923 and senior partner in 1936.

In April 1954, Welch agreed to serve as special counsel for the army in its dispute with Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), a position for which Welch took no pay. Welch immediately filed 29 charges with the Senate Government Operations Committee's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, chief among them that McCarthy and his aide ROY M. COHN "had improperly pressed the Army to promote Private G. DAVID SCHINE," a former member of McCarthy's staff.

The hearings, which opened before the subcommittee on April 22, attempted to sort out a confusing myriad of charges and countercharges. The accuracy of specific allegations or facts proved less influential than impressions and images. McCarthy's menacing appearance, his angry outbursts, his rudeness, his personal attacks, and his abuse of procedure had more impact on the public than the substantive matters before the panel. Moreover, McCarthy's crude behavior stood in marked contrast to Welch's civility, dry wit, legal skill, and self-composure. The experienced trial attorney refused to let McCarthy's antics distract him, and Welch continually needled McCarthy. Welch also surgically dissected McCarthy's "evidence." He exposed a doctored photograph of Secretary of the Army Robert T. Stevens and Schine, which purportedly showed that the two had been friendly at a time when Stevens claimed to be angry over improper pressure on Schine's behalf. When McCarthy claimed to have a copy of a letter from J. EDGAR HOOVER, director of the FBI, that warned army officials of security problems, Welch dismissed the document as "a carbon copy of precisely nothing."

McCarthy increasingly lost control of his temper and became more and more reckless. Toward the end of the 36-day hearings, the mounting personal animosity between Welch and McCarthy exploded in a celebrated exchange. During Welch's heated cross-examination of Cohn, the army's attorney badgered Cohn about the exact number and the names of communists or subversives in defense plants. "I don't want the sun to go down while they're still in there," intoned Welch. McCarthy interrupted and said that “in view of Mr. Welch’s request that, uh, the information be given if we know of anyone who might be performing any work for the Communist Party, I think we should tell him that he has in his law firm a young man named [Frederick G.] Fisher whom he recommended incidentally to do the work on this Committee, who has been, for a number of years, a member of an organization [the National Lawyers Guild] which is named, oh years and years ago, as the legal bulwark for the Communist Party.” Charging Welch with trying to “burlesque” the hearings, McCarthy added that he doubted the lawyer had “any conception of the danger of the Communist Party.” Visibly shaken, Welch responded that “Until this moment, Senator, I think I never really gauged your cruelty or your recklessness.” Welch went on to explain that Fisher had been a member of the guild only briefly, while in law school and for a few months after, and that he had since become a promising lawyer and a Republican. When he decided to represent the army, Welch explained, he had asked James St. Clair to be his assistant and told St. Clair to choose another lawyer in the firm to assist him. St. Clair chose Fisher. When Welch asked if either of the younger lawyers had anything in their pasts that might prove embarrassing, Fisher said that he had belonged to the National Lawyers Guild, and Welch sent Fisher back to Boston in order to avoid any possible controversy. Welch’s account was something less than the truth. Welch sent Fisher back to Boston only after consulting with members of the White House staff. Moreover, Welch did not say that both sides in the Army-McCarthy hearings had agreed not to raise the matter. Turning to McCarthy, he said, “Little did I dream you could be so reckless and so cruel as to do an injury to that lad. . . . If it were in my power to forgive you for your reckless cruelty, I would do so. I like to think I’m a gentle man, but your forgiveness will have to come from some one other than me.” When McCarthy persisted, Welch cut him short, pleading with the senator not to “assassinate this lad further.” Welch then demanded: “Have you no sense of decency, sir, at long last? Have you left no sense of decency?” He then left the room to the applause of the spectators.

According to many observers, McCarthy’s attack on Welch’s associate was his single most damaging blunder during the hearings. Although McCarthy’s popularity had already begun to slide, the hearings, McCarthy’s attack on Fisher, and Welch’s memorable response contributed to a growing sense of national outrage at the senator’s actions. More important, McCarthy’s rash disregard for the Senate’s procedures and decorum alienated a substantial bipartisan bloc in the upper house and led to his eventual condemnation by the Senate in December 1954.

Welch returned to his law practice. As a result of the hearings, however, he became a nationally popular figure. He appeared on a number of television shows and in 1959 played a judge in the film Anatomy of a Murder. He died on October 6, 1960, in Hyannis, Massachusetts.

—MSM

Welker, Herman

(1906–1957) U.S. senator

Born on December 11, 1906, in Cambridge, Idaho, Welker grew up in rural Idaho, attended public schools, and worked his way through the University of Idaho and its law school, where he received his LL.B. in 1929. While still a student, he was appointed the prosecuting attorney of Washington County, Idaho, in 1928. He held that position until 1936, when he left his home state for Los Angeles, where he set up private law practice. After serving in the army air corps in 1943 and 1944, he established a law practice in Payette, Idaho, and then won election as a Republican to the state senate in 1948. Two years later, he won a seat in the U.S. Senate by the largest margin in a senatorial election in Idaho since 1936. He credited his victory to the support of his ally, Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.).

A vehement anticommunist, Welker joined the small group of ultraconservative Republicans in the Senate. Like McCarthy, he attributed most of the nation’s problems to Democratic appeasement and misrule. In 1951, he supported a complete ban on Western trade with the Soviet bloc. He also favored drastic cuts in foreign aid to Europe, which he regarded as the home of numerous left-wing groups. In domestic affairs, Welker supported a measure giving states title to tidelands oil. He was one of McCarthy’s strongest supporters in the upper house. As a member of the Senate Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, he attempted to delay the panel's investigation of McCarthy in 1952 and resigned from the subcommittee that September, protesting that the subcommittee was being used as a "political vehicle by the Democratic Party."

Welker remained on the extreme right of the Republican Party after DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER became president and frequently came into conflict with the new president and his administration. On domestic issues, Welker supported limiting government intervention in the private sector. He voted to cut appropriations for the Tennessee Valley Authority and opposed wage and price controls as well as tax increases. An extreme cold warrior, in 1953, Welker opposed Eisenhower's nomination of CHARLES BOHLEN as ambassador to the Soviet Union because of the career diplomat's role in what Welker termed the "Truman-Acheson policy of appeasement" toward the Soviet Union. Also in 1953, Welker argued against an emergency immigration bill, designed to admit increased numbers of refugees from eastern Europe. The following year, he vigorously opposed U.S. recognition of Communist China. In 1954, Welker accused ARTHUR H. DEAN, the U.S. negotiator of the Korean armistice, of supporting appeasement and of collaborating with Communist China. He assailed Dean as an "ex-official spokesmen" of the Institute of Pacific Relations, which many on the Right believed had links to communists. Also in 1954, he supported the Bricker amendment, which was designed to limit the president's treaty-making power.

The senator from Idaho was known for his vitriolic style in debate. Reporter RICHARD ROVERE observed that Welker was "capable of more hatred than McCarthy, as well as more ideology." During the debate over a resolution to censure McCarthy in November 1954, Welker served as floor manager for the junior senator from Wisconsin. Welker vigorously defended McCarthy, whom he called "one of the greatest living champions of human liberty, and one of the greatest living foes of Communist slavery," and attacked the Watkins Committee's recommendation to censure McCarthy. If passed, Welker charged, such a resolution would indirectly promote the aims of communist conspirators.

On November 16, Welker told the Senate that the Constitution provided for punishing senators for "disorderly behavior but did not for the specification in the censure resolution—conduct unbecoming a senator or . . . contrary to senatorial traditions." The following day, Welker said that there was no precedent for censuring McCarthy, that many senators had assailed colleagues with violent language without being censured. He predicted that he himself would be censured for defending McCarthy. Welker protested repeatedly that senators showed "disrespect" for McCarthy by their sparse attendance during Welker's presentation of the defense case. Even some of McCarthy's supporters questioned Welker's vitriolic rhetoric. On December 2, the Senate condemned McCarthy by a vote of 67–22.

In 1955, Senator McCarthy named Welker and FBI director J. EDGAR HOOVER as "good candidates to replace Eisenhower as President." In 1956, Welker lost his bid for reelection to FRANK CHURCH. After leaving the Senate, he practiced law in Boise, Idaho, and owned a farm. In early 1957, Welker participated in a meeting of right-wing Republicans, during which he joined a series of speakers who denounced the direction of the Eisenhower administration and "modern Republicanism." Welker died of a brain tumor in Bethesda, Maryland, on October 30, 1957.

—MSM

Whittaker, Charles E(vans)

(1901–1973) associate justice, Supreme Court

The son of a farmer, Whittaker was born near Troy, Kansas, on February 22, 1901. He dropped out of school after the ninth grade. After working as a farmer for two years, he went to Kansas City to study law. He worked as an office boy in a law office while earning the equivalent of a high school diploma. Whittaker completed his high school work in 1922 and enrolled in the University of Kansas City's law school. Working his way through law school, he passed the state bar exam in 1923, a year before his graduation. Upon graduating, he joined the prestigious Kansas City law firm of Watson, Gage & Ess, where he specialized in litigation and business planning for a largely corporate clientele. He became a partner in 1940, and his name was added to the firm's name in 1942. He remained with that firm until he took a seat on the federal bench.

In July 1954, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER named Whittaker to a federal district court judgeship in Kansas City. Although not politically active, Whittaker was a Republican, well regarded by political leaders in Kansas, and a close friend of the president's brother, Arthur Eisenhower. Moreover, since Democrats held both Senate seats from Missouri, the White House took a more active role in seeking out nominees for a vacancy on the federal district court in that state. As a judge, Whittaker demonstrated great industry and efficiency. Eisenhower promoted him to a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit in July 1956. Upon the retirement of Justice STANLEY REED, Eisenhower nominated Whittaker to the Supreme Court in March 1957. The American Bar Association warmly endorsed his nomination, and the Senate quickly confirmed him.

On the bench, Whittaker aligned himself with the Court's more conservative members. On occasion, however, he joined an opinion upholding a particularized individual right against encroachment by the government. For example, he joined with the other members of the Court in taking a firm stand against segregation. Nevertheless, on most issues, Whittaker voted against individual claims of civil liberties and in favor of the needs of government and social order. He wrote the majority opinion in Mulcahey v. Catalanotte (1957), which upheld the deportation of an alien for trafficking in narcotics, even though that crime had not been grounds for deportation when he committed it. The decision upheld a section of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. A year later, Whittaker joined a five-justice majority in Beilan v. Board of Education (1958), which sustained the dismissal for incompetence of a public school teacher who refused to answer questions by the school superintendent about the teacher's communist affiliations. Whittaker dissented in Kent v. Dulles (1958), when the Court ruled that the State Department lacked an adequate statutory basis to deny a citizen a passport because of his political beliefs. In two cases decided in June 1959, the justice voted to uphold the contempt convictions of witnesses who had refused to answer questions or produce records for congressional and state investigations of communism. In Barenblatt v. U.S., Whittaker voted with the majority to uphold the conviction for contempt of Congress of a teacher who had refused to answer questions before a subcommittee of the House Un-American Activities Committee. Whittaker also voted with the majority in Uphaus v. Wyman, which upheld a conviction for contempt in a state court for refusing to divulge the names of people who attended a World Fellowship camp in New Hampshire.

Whittaker did occasionally vote with the Court's liberals in cases involving the First Amendment and issues relating to loyalty and security. In January 1958, his opinion for the Court in Staub v. City of Baxley declared unconstitutional a local ordinance that required union organizers to obtain permits before they could solicit workers to join a union. Whittaker held that the ordinance gave too wide discretion to city officials. Whittaker also voted with the majority in Trop v. Dulles (1958) to overturn a federal statute that punished desertion from the armed forces in a time of war with a loss of citizenship. On a case decided the same day, however, he voted with the majority in Perez v. Brownell (1958), which held that a deserter from the armed forces who had left the country for Mexico and voted in a Mexican election had relinquished his citizenship.

In criminal rights cases, Whittaker also tended to favor the claims of government. In Bartkus v. Illinois (1959), he joined the majority in a decision holding that an individual acquitted in a federal court could then be tried for the same offense in a state court without violating the safeguard against double jeopardy. Whittaker dissented in Mapp v. Ohio (1961), in which the Court extended the exclusionary rule to state criminal proceedings. In some criminal cases, such as those involving allegedly coerced confessions, Whittaker was accused of inconsistency because he would vote opposite ways in largely similar cases without clearly explaining his reasons for doing so.

Although a modest, sincere man who worked extremely hard while on the Court, Whittaker was not a distinguished justice. Neither an outstanding judicial theorist nor a legal craftsman, he wrote very few opinions of any significance. He articulated no judicial philosophy and agonized over decisions. Leon Friedman wrote that Whittaker "was not fitted intellectually or physically for the job” of a Supreme Court justice. On the advice of his physician, Whittaker retired from the Court in March 1962 and returned to corporate practice. He died in Kansas City, Missouri, on November 26, 1973.

—MSM

Whyte, William H(ollingsworth), Jr.

(1917–1999) journalist and sociologist

The son of a railroad executive, Whyte was born in West Chester, Pennsylvania, on October 1, 1917. Known as Holly, he attended St. Andrew's School in Middletown, Delaware, and Princeton University, from which he graduated with a degree in English in 1939. He then attended the Vick School of Applied Merchandising to prepare for a position as a junior executive with the Vick Chemical Company. He enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1941 and served in the Pacific. He was discharged with the rank of captain in 1945. After leaving the service, he took a job with Fortune magazine in 1946. He rose to the position of assistant managing editor of Fortune by the time he published The Organization Man in 1956.

The Organization Man joined DAVID RIESMAN's The Lonely Crowd (1950) and C. WRIGHT MILLS's White Collar (1956) in offering a powerful and literate critique of the forces promoting conformity in mid-20th century American society. Whyte described the decline of entrepreneurship and risk-taking that accompanied the bureaucratization of corporate business and argued that bold visions of entrepreneurial individualists were giving way to “the modest aspirations of organization men who lower their sights to achieve a good job with adequate pay and proper pension and a nice house in a pleasant community populated with people as nearly like themselves as possible.” “In our attention to making the organization work,” he warned, “we have come close to deifying it.” Even worse, he maintained, “we . . . [are] denying that there is—or should be—a conflict between the individual and the organization. This denial is bad for the organization. It is worse for the individual.” “Fight the organization,” Whyte advised his readers, “but not self-destructively.” Writing from “the optimistic premise that individualism is as possible in our times as in others,” Whyte urged people to seek “individualism within organizational life.”

Perhaps even more important, White warned that the “organizational ethos,” based on a desire for security and characterized by conformity, had spread to academic and scientific institutions and, indeed, to suburbia. He contended that American society was changing from one shaped by a Protestant ethic, characterized by work, sacrifice, responsibility, to a “social ethic,” defined by the organization. As Whyte explained it, the “social ethic” was belief that “of himself, [man] is isolated, meaningless; only as he collaborates with others does he become worthwhile, for by sublimating himself in the group, he helps to produce a whole that is greater than the sum of its parts.” Therefore, according to the social ethic, there should be no conflict between the individual and society.

Although often lumped together with social critics rooted in a radical or left liberal tradition, such as Riesman and Mills, Whyte came from a different perspective. A Princeton graduate, a former junior executive with Vicks (makers of Vaporub), and a journalist for a popular business magazine, Whyte was not interested in bringing down the organization; he was interested in creating space for individuals within it.

Whyte left Fortune in 1958 to devote himself to other pursuits. While working at the magazine, he had encountered and impressed Laurence S. Rockefeller, the philanthropist, who shared Whyte's interest in conservation and urban development. Rockefeller subsequently subsidized a number of Whyte's projects involving rural land use, beautification, reclamation, city planning, suburban growth, and civic design. Whyte's study, Conservation Easements, published by the Urban Land Institute in 1959, helped to win passage of open-space legislation in California, New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts.

For the next 10 years, Whyte devoted himself to issues relating to conservation and urban sprawl. He wrote reports for the Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission and the American Conservation Commission. A member of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's Task Force on Natural Beauty, Whyte wrote the initial draft of its final report. His proposal for urban beautification led to passage of a $50 million program to plant trees in urban areas. Whyte argued for the preservation of rural lands and open areas in Cluster Development (1964) and The Last Landscape (1968).

In 1969, Whyte took part in the New York City Planning Commission's development of a comprehensive plan for the city. His work with the planning commission led him to wonder how people actually used the spaces provided for by the plan. In particular, he was curious about the effectiveness of incentive zoning. A grant to study street life in New York and other cities, provided by the National Geographic Society, enabled Whyte to establish the Street Life Project, a pioneering study of urban dynamics and pedestrian behavior. He and his team observed and filmed the use of corporate plazas, urban streets, parks, and other open spaces in New York City; they charted the movement of pedestrians. Whyte opposed what he described as "the fortressing of America," typified by windowless walls, concrete courtyards, and features that discouraged people from sitting ("The human backside," he once commented, "is a dimension architects seem to have forgotten."). He was interested in "schmoozing patterns, the rituals of street encounters," and he explored why "people flocked to some plazas and left others empty." "It is difficult to design a space that will not attract people," he observed; "what is remarkable is how often this has been accomplished." Whyte championed the creation of space that encouraged social interaction and civic engagement. Above all, he advocated designing public spaces based on studies of how people used such spaces. The years of observation and time-lapse photography compiled for the Street Life Project became the basis of "The Social Life of Small Urban Places," a documentary that ran on the Public Broadcasting System. He expanded that documentary into a book, The Social Life of Small Urban Spaces (1980), in which he wrote: "I end then in praise of small spaces. . . . It is not just the number of people using them, but the larger number who pass by and enjoy them vicariously . . . For a city, such places are priceless, whatever the cost." In 1988, he published City: Rediscovering the Center.

Whyte died in New York City on January 12, 1999.

—MSM

Wiley, Alexander

(1884–1967) U.S. senator

The son of Norwegian immigrants, Wiley was born in Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin, on May 26, 1884. He grew up on his father's farm and, as a young man, worked as a lumberjack. Wiley studied to become a Lutheran minister at Augsburg College in Minneapolis from 1902 to 1904. Abandoning his plans to become a minister, he entered the University of Michigan Law School in 1904 and then transferred to the University of Wisconsin's law school, from which he graduated in 1907. Admitted to the bar that same year, Wiley returned to Chippewa Falls, where he set up a law practice. Over the next 32 years, his practice thrived. He served three terms as district attorney (1909–15), and, building on his success as a lawyer, he purchased a dairy farm, was a bank director, served on the school board, and joined a number of civic and fraternal organizations. Wiley also traveled the state delivering inspirational talks. In 1933, he won election as president of the Kiwanis International for the Wisconsin and Upper Michigan district. His statewide contacts provided him with the base to win the Republican nomination for governor in 1936. He lost the general election to the popular incumbent, Philip LaFollette. Two years later, however, Wiley won a seat in the U.S. Senate. He won reelection in 1944, 1950, and 1956.

A conservative Republican, Wiley opposed Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal legislation and American entry into World War II. After Pearl Harbor, however, he renounced his isolationist views and joined the internationalist wing of the Republican Party led by Senator Arthur Vandenberg (R-Mich.). In 1945, Wiley became the second-ranking Republican member of the Foreign Relations Committee, which Vandenberg chaired. Wiley supported American entry into the UN and worked closely with the administration of HARRY S. TRUMAN to obtain passage of legislation implementing the Marshall Plan and the North Atlantic Treaty, the two cornerstones of the president's containment policy toward the Soviet Union. Wiley, however, broke with the administration over its China policy. A member of the so-called China bloc in the Senate, he called for all-out aid to Chiang Kai-shek in the civil war against the Communists. Wiley supported Truman's decision to commit American forces to Korea but criticized the president's decision to fire General Douglas MacArthur as the commander of Allied forces in Korea. In domestic matters, Wiley assumed an important role when, after the Republicans won control of both houses of Congress in the elections of 1946, he became chair of the Judiciary Committee in 1947. He cooperated with the Truman administration to establish the practice of consulting local bar associations on the qualifications of judicial nominees. In addition, he supported the Taft-Hartley Act and served on the Kefauver Committee, appointed to investigate organized crime.

Wiley opposed Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-Wis.), both on moral grounds and because of internal state politics, but he approached the matter with caution. In a letter to his son written in 1950, Wiley described McCarthy's techniques as "rather vicious." Nevertheless, after Truman launched into a tirade against McCarthy and other conservative Republicans at a press conference, Wiley issued a press release the same month in which he called on Truman to stop trying to "smear McCarthy." Running for reelection in 1950, Wiley set aside his personal distaste for McCarthy and his methods and praised his junior colleague for sounding the alarm about "the danger of Communist penetration." In the spring of 1952, Wiley delivered a speech during which he made a favorable reference to DEAN ACHESON, a favorite target of the Republican Right. In reaction to Wiley's speech, the Chicago Tribune, a conservative paper, condemned the senator as a "Truman Republican and an Acheson stooge." The paper also charged that he was an "expert on betrayal," as sinister as Alger Hiss. McCarthy's supporters in the Senate also attacked Wiley, implying that Acheson had seduced an "illiterate country bumpkin inflated to the point of bombast." Despite the denunciations, Wiley refused to retract his statement. During the debate over a resolution to censure McCarthy, Wiley arranged to be in Brazil.

Upon the death of Vandenberg in 1951, Wiley became the ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. As chair of the Foreign Relations Committee from 1953 to 1954 and as its ranking minority member from 1955 to 1960, Wiley was a major supporter of the Eisenhower administration's foreign policy and often defended it against challenges from the Republican Right. In 1953, he supported the appointment of CHARLES BOHLEN as ambassador to the Soviet Union. The right wing of the Republican Party regarded Bohlen as too closely associated with the "Truman-Acheson policies of appeasement."

Wiley consistently supported the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and he favored a strong, rearmed West Germany as its leading European power. Although he believed that the United States should not recognize Communist China and should oppose its admission to the UN, he refused to join Republican conservatives in criticizing the British and French governments for recognizing and trading with the Beijing regime. He thought that attacking America's allies would play into Moscow's hands by splitting the Atlantic alliance. Although deeply concerned about communist electoral victories in western Europe, he concluded that they reflected a discontent with existing governments rather than acceptance of communist ideology.

Wiley led the opposition in the Senate to the Bricker amendment, which would have curbed the president's treaty-making powers. As a result, the Wisconsin Republican State Convention, dominated by McCarthy and his supporters, censured him in June 1953. On May 26, 1956, Wiley's 72nd birthday, the Republican State Convention denied him its endorsement. It chose instead Representative Glen R. Davis, who had supported the Bricker amendment and advocated a reduction in foreign aid. After leaving the hall, Wiley, sobbing, vowed to run anyway. In September, he won the primary by 9,700 votes out of more than 424,000 cast. Wiley then went on to win the general election.

In 1962, Governor Gaylord Nelson defeated Wiley in his bid for reelection. Although he had his differences with the Eisenhower administration, Wiley regarded himself as a "modern Republican." He supported a modest welfare state and an internationalist foreign policy. During the administration of JOHN F. KENNEDY, Wiley generally voted as a conservative on domestic legislation, except for civil rights, which he strongly supported. While generally backing the president's diplomacy, Wiley called for more aggressive action against Cuba.

A back-slapping, joke-telling politician, Wiley published a small book, Laughing with Congress (1947), in which he recounted humorous incidents relating to Congress. Critics regarded him as something of a buffoon for his cliché-ridden speeches and his corny political stunts, but Wiley's image led some to overlook his hard work and his usually sound political instincts. After leaving the Senate, he resided in Washington, D.C., until a few days before his death from a stroke in Germantown, Pennsylvania, on October 26, 1967.

—MSM

Wilkins, Roy

(1901–1981) executive director, NAACP

The son of a minister who was forced to find work tending a brick kiln, Wilkins was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on August 30, 1901. His mother died when Wilkins was only four, after which he was raised by an aunt and uncle in St. Paul, Minnesota. Wilkins grew up in an integrated, working-class neighborhood and went on to attend the University of Minnesota, where he majored in sociology and wrote for the campus newspaper. In 1922, he became editor of a failing black weekly, the Appeal. During his senior year, he joined the St. Paul, Minneapolis, chapter of the NAACP and became its secretary. After graduating in 1923, he went to work as a reporter for the Kansas City Call, a weekly black newspaper, and eventually became its managing editor. In Kansas City, he encountered Jim Crow for the first time. While working for the Call, he became active in a number of causes involving the city's black community. In 1930, Wilkins worked against Senate confirmation of Judge John J. Parker, an allegedly racist nominee to the U.S. Supreme Court. That same year, he also worked to defeat Senator Henry J. Allen (R-Kan.), a segregationist. His activities brought him to the attention of Walter White.

When White replaced James Weldon Johnson as executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in 1931, he offered his former position as assistant secretary to Wilkins. The NAACP was dedicated to the elimination of racial discrimination, primarily through lawsuits and legislative lobbying. In his new position, Wilkins had a number of responsibilities. He investigated conditions of black workers on the Mississippi levees in December 1931. White assigned Wilkins to serve as the NAACP's point man on the Scottsboro Case, which involved nine young black men accused of raping two white women while traveling on a freight train. Wilkins also edited the NAACP's organ, the Crisis, from 1934 to 1949 and ran the national office during White's frequent absences. His many activities included participation in the planning of A. PHILIP RANDOLPH's proposed March on Washington in 1941, efforts to end rioting in Harlem in 1943, and service as a consultant to the U.S. delegation to the conference in San Francisco that established the charter for the United Nations.

When White took a leave of absence from the NAACP in 1949, Wilkins became acting executive secretary. In 1950, he organized an Emergency Civil Rights Mobilization in Washington, D.C., to lobby on behalf of civil rights legislation. Upon White's return in May 1950, the board of directors relieved him of some of his duties. They selected Wilkins to handle the daily administrative duties. When White retired in 1955, Wilkins replaced him as executive secretary (a title later changed to executive director) of the 240,000-member organization.

Wilkins oversaw the NAACP's legal and legislative efforts, ran the national office, made speeches throughout the country, wrote pamphlets, and raised funds. One of his first activities after becoming executive secretary was to help raise money to support the Montgomery bus boycott led by MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. Wilkins, however, focused his primary attention on attempts to integrate southern schools. In June 1955, the national office urged southern chapters of the NAACP to petition local school boards to implement the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which struck down segregation in public schools.

In 1956, Wilkins attacked both major political parties for taking weak positions on civil rights. He criticized Democratic presidential aspirant ADLAI E. STEVENSON in February for favoring a go-slow approach to granting African Americans their rights as citizens. In August, Wilkins unsuccessfully urged the Republican platform committee to promise to amend the rules of the Senate to make it easier to end filibusters. Subsequently, he criticized both national party platforms as inadequate. Since the NAACP was a nonpartisan organization, Wilkins expressed no preference in the presidential race.

In February 1957, Wilkins testified before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee in support of the administration's civil rights bill, which he described as "minimum legislation." Before its enactment by Congress, the Senate eliminated the crucial Title III, which would have permitted the attorney general to file civil suits in cases of civil rights violations. Nevertheless, Wilkins decided to support the bill, which established a civil rights commission, elevated the Civil Rights Section of the Justice Department to the status of a division, and provided some protection for black voting rights. It was, he concluded, the best that could be obtained at the moment. He also thought that it represented an historic breakthrough that would open the way for more far-reaching legislation in the future. Wilkins convinced the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of groups opposing racial discrimination, to support the measure.

On June 23, 1958, Wilkins, King, A. Philip Randolph, and Lester B. Granger met with President Eisenhower to present a nine-point program to further civil rights. The plan included the organization of a White House conference on school desegregation, the granting of funds to officials and community groups seeking to promote the desegregation of schools, the denial of federal funds for segregated institutions, the assurance of federal protection against terrorist bombings in the South, and the enactment of what had been Title III of the original civil rights bill presented to Congress in 1957. The black leaders received a polite audience from the president. Wilkins denounced the Civil Rights Act of 1960, which extended the voting rights protection of the legislation passed in 1957. Under the act, he declared, "the Negro has to pass more check points and more officials than he would if he were trying to get the United States gold reserves in Fort Knox. It's a fraud." In that year, he again denounced the civil rights planks of both parties as inadequate and participated in picketing the Democratic National Convention. He and other civil rights leaders believed that, among other things, the major parties should repudiate the segregationists within their ranks and, in accordance with the Fourteenth Amendment, back a reduction of congressional representation in areas where African Americans were denied the right to vote.

The decade after 1955 brought new challenges to the NAACP and its leader. Direct action protest commanded the attention of the nation and the black community. The Montgomery bus boycott, the lunch counter sit-ins of 1960, and the Freedom Rides brought new leaders to the fore and led to the creation of new organizations. At the NAACP's convention in 1960, Wilkins praised direct action as a means of promoting desegregation in the South. He announced in the spring that the NAACP would support student sit-ins at lunch counters and that the organization itself would stage wade-ins in the summer to integrate swimming facilities. Wilkins nevertheless held firm in his belief that legal and political action offered the best chance for advancing black civil rights. The effectiveness of direct action, he believed, was limited, as was its applicability to a national scale.

Wilkins and Clarence Mitchell, the NAACP's top lobbyist, played a major role in obtaining major civil rights legislation in the 1960s. Pressure from the NAACP under Wilkins helped to convince President JOHN F. KENNEDY to issue an executive order in 1962 that banned discrimination in federally financed housing. Wilkins and Mitchell cooperated with President LYNDON B. JOHNSON and lobbied Congress to obtain passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Wilkins participated in the March on Washington in 1963, the march from Selma to Montgomery in 1965, and the continuation of James Meredith's March Against Fear in 1966.

By the mid-1960s, however, the direction of the black struggle for equality was changing. Wilkins resisted growing demands for black nationalism and black separatism. He regarded Stokely Carmichael as a huckster and opposed his call for black power in 1966. In his memoirs, Wilkins wrote that "black power was just a slogan, loaded words, not a real program." His attack on black power in his keynote address at the NAACP's convention in 1966 drew the ire of many younger and more militant African Americans. Wilkins denounced the growing number of nationalist and separatist groups. While he understood the frustrations that led to such violence, he condemned the black riots in many northern cities. Unlike many civil rights activists who spoke out against the war in Vietnam, Wilkins believed that the issues of civil rights and peace should be kept separate.

By the late 1960s, Wilkins's moderate stands made him a target for criticism by black militants. Within the NAACP, a group of younger, more militant members called for him to step down. Police broke up a plot by the Revolutionary Action Movement to assassinate Wilkins. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, Wilkins opposed separate dormitories and dining halls for black college students. "I had been against black apartheid all my life," he explained in his memoirs. Wilkins retired as executive director in 1977. He died in New York City on September 8, 1981.

—MSM

Williams, G(erhard) Mennen

(1911–1988) governor of Michigan

A product of a wealthy and prominent family, Williams was born in Detroit, Michigan, on February 23, 1911. His grandfather founded the Mennen Company, which made soaps and toiletries, his father was the head of a company that made pickles. G. Mennen Williams, or Soapy as he was known, grew up in a privileged Episcopalian and Republican home. After attending the exclusive Salisbury School in Connecticut, Williams earned his B.A. from Princeton University, where he graduated Phi Beta Kappa in 1933. As president of the Young Republican Club at Princeton, he campaigned for HERBERT HOOVER in 1932. Williams then surprised his family by becoming an enthusiastic supporter of the New Deal and joining the Democratic Party.

He earned a law degree from the University of Michigan in 1936 and that same year went to Washington to serve as an attorney for the Social Security Board. The following year, Michigan's governor, Frank Murphy, appointed Williams assistant attorney general. When Murphy became U.S. attorney general in 1939, Williams joined his staff as an administrative assistant. President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Murphy to the Supreme Court in 1940, after which Williams remained briefly at the Justice Department before moving to the Office of Price Administration (OPA). In 1942, Williams enlisted in the navy and served in the Pacific as an air combat intelligence officer on aircraft carriers. Upon leaving the navy in 1946 with the rank of lieutenant commander, he took a position as deputy director of the Michigan office of the OPA. In 1947, he became a partner in the law firm of Griffiths, Williams, and Griffiths in Detroit. Williams engaged in Democratic Party politics and in 1947 received an appointment to the state liquor control commission.

Supported by the Michigan Democratic Club (a liberal organization founded by Williams and his law partners designed to wrest control of the state party from JAMES HOFFA, the president of the Teamsters), the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and many liberals, Williams ran for governor in 1948. Williams defeated Hoffa's candidate in the primary and ran in the general election on a platform that called for improved housing, roads, and education as well as increases in farm supports, unemployment compensation, and veterans' benefits. It also strongly supported civil rights for African Americans and promised to repeal Michigan's "little Taft-Hartley" act, which restricted some activities of organized labor. With the support of African Americans, ethnic voters, and the United Automobile Workers, Williams won the general election. Given his patrician background, his folksy style of campaigning brought derision from his critics. It was nevertheless effective; he went on to win five more terms in a state where Democrats had previously enjoyed little success.

During the 1950s, Williams earned a reputation as one of the most liberal governors in the nation. He modernized Michigan's courts, built more schools, and reformed state prisons. To win public support for his programs, he formed bipartisan commissions of experts to study proposals and make recommendations. The panels recommended legislation to aid the handicapped, improve the juvenile justice system, and reform election procedures. A committed supporter of civil rights, Williams proposed a fair employment practices law in 1948, which the Republican-dominated legislature passed in 1955. The governor also got the legislature to ban discrimination in the sale of real estate. Williams appointed many African Americans to state offices, including positions in his cabinet and on the state courts.

Williams had less success in implementing his ambitious social agenda. Soon after taking office, the governor requested state corporate and personal income taxes to finance his proposals for programs to improve education, hospitals, prisons, unemployment benefits, and health care. The Republican-controlled legislature repeatedly turned down his requests, preferring an increase in sales and user taxes. Increases in general revenue, however, enabled Williams to take modest steps toward implementing his proposals. The stalemate between the governor and the legislature led the state to the brink of bankruptcy by the late 1950s. The difficult battle over taxes and the state's precarious financial position contributed to Williams's decision not to seek reelection in 1960.

As the governor of one of the nation's largest states, Williams's name frequently came up as a possible presidential or vice presidential candidate. He never denied interest in either office. At the Democratic National Convention in 1952, the governor was Michigan's favorite-son candidate. Williams supported Senator ESTES KEFAUVER (D-Tenn.) with the expectation that, if the senator won the presidential nomination, he might select Williams as the vice presidential nominee. The nomination, however, went to ADLAI STEVENSON. Political commentators once again mentioned Williams as a presidential contender in 1956, but his forceful advocacy of civil rights, his belief that segregation had to end throughout the nation, and his pro-union record made him unacceptable to the southern Democrats. One incident in particular irritated southerners. Invited to speak at a Democratic fund-raising event in Birmingham, Alabama, in 1955, Williams initially accepted the invitation, but, after finding out that African Americans would be banned from the affair, he publicly refused to attend.

The animosity of southerners in the party did not diminish Williams's enthusiasm for civil rights. In 1957, Williams published an article in the Nation, in which he appealed to the Democratic Party to take a more forceful position in support of civil rights for black Americans. The United States, he warned, could not afford to face the world as a nation that did not adhere to its founding principles.

Although he considered it, Williams did not mount a serious candidacy for the Democratic nomination in 1960. He expressed some interest in Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY's (D-Mass.) candidacy but initially remained skeptical of Kennedy's commitment to liberalism. After a meeting with Kennedy, however, Williams endorsed him on the spot. At the Democratic National Convention, the governor urged delegates from uncommitted states to support Kennedy, who won the Democratic nomination and defeated Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON in the general election that November.

Williams hoped for a position in the cabinet, but Kennedy did not offer him one. In 1961, Kennedy appointed Williams assistant secretary of state for African affairs. After the assassination of Kennedy, Williams had less influence. LYNDON B. JOHNSON, whom Williams had opposed for the vice presidency, became president. Williams remained at the State Department until 1966, when he made an unsuccessful bid for the Senate. Johnson appointed Williams ambassador to the Philippines in 1968, a position he held until 1969. Williams won election to the Michigan Supreme Court in 1970 and served as chief justice from 1982 until his retirement in 1986. He lived in Grosse Pointe Farms until his death in Detroit on February 2, 1988.

—MSM

Williams, Harrison A(rlington), Jr.

(1919–2001) U.S. congressman and senator

Born in Plainfield, New Jersey, on December 10, 1919, Williams attended public schools in Plainfield and received a B.A. degree from Oberlin College in 1941. He studied briefly at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service and worked as a copy boy for the Washington Post. After service as a flight instructor in the navy during World War II, he worked as a steelworker in Lorain, Ohio. Williams enrolled in Columbia University Law School and received an LL.B. in 1948. He practiced law in New Hampshire for a year and then returned to Plainfield, where he worked as "a combination clerk and babysitter" for a conservative Republican lawyer. Williams gained admission to the state bar in 1951. That same year, Williams ran unsuccessfully for the state assembly; the following year, he failed in an effort to win a seat on the Plainfield City Council.

In August 1953, Representative CLIFFORD P. CASE, a liberal Republican, resigned his seat from New Jersey's sixth district to run for the Senate. In November 1953, Williams ran as the Democratic candidate in the special election for the seat. The sixth district, which encompassed Union County, had been controlled by Republicans since its creation in 1932. Because the Democratic Party regarded the race as hopeless, Williams had to finance the campaign with his own money. He promised to follow in Case's political footsteps, and he benefited from the successful campaign of the Democratic candidate for governor, ROBERT MEYNER. In the end, Williams defeated his opponent by a narrow margin. He won reelection by a more substantial margin in 1954.

In Congress, Williams supported an anticommunist foreign policy and liberal social programs at home. During 1954, he backed government-supported urban renewal and an extension of unemployment benefits. In 1955, he favored the elimination of the national origins quota system for immigration and the following year supported the Powell amendment, stipulating that no federal aid would go to segregated schools. A fervent cold warrior, he introduced a resolution in 1955 that condemned Soviet violations of agreements that nation had signed with the United States and urged that measures be taken to inform the American people of such infractions. The next year, Williams successfully offered an amendment to the Mutual Security Act terminating all aid to Yugoslavia unless the president declared such aid in the national interest.

In 1956, Williams lost his seat in Congress. His largely Republican district went overwhelmingly for President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, and, even though Williams ran well ahead of the national Democratic ticket, it was not enough. He returned to the private practice of law and continued to be involved in Democratic politics. In 1957, he played a major role in Governor Meyner's campaign for reelection. He served as chairman of the Meyner for Governor Clubs, and Meyner's substantial victory revived Williams's political fortunes. The following year, the governor helped him win the state organization's endorsement for the Senate. As a result of Meyner's backing and the economic recession of 1958, Williams carried the general election by 85,000 votes. He thereby became the first Democrat to win election as senator from New Jersey since 1936.

Williams immediately aligned himself with the Democratic liberals in the Senate. During his first month as a senator, Williams joined the chamber's liberals in backing a proposal by Senator PAUL DOUGLAS (D-Ill.) to change the rules of the Senate to enable a majority vote to end a filibuster. The measure went down to defeat by a vote of 67-28. In March 1960, he joined in an unsuccessful effort to end a southern filibuster against a civil rights bill sponsored by the Eisenhower administration. That same year, he successfully offered an amendment to increase funding for housing for the elderly from $5 million to $50 million (the final bill provided $20 million). He also backed Senator PATRICK V. McNAMARA's (D-Mich.) abortive attempt to provide health care to the elderly through the Social Security system. Williams chaired the Labor and Public Welfare Committee's Special Migratory Labor Subcommittee from its inception in 1959. In June 1961, the subcommittee recommended legislation providing for the extension of the minimum wage to agricultural workers, the application of the child labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act to agriculture, federal registration of farm labor contractors, the inclusion of agricultural employment under the National Labor Relations Act, and the establishment of matching federal grants to the states for education and health programs designed to help migrant workers. Congress passed most of these measures during the administrations of JOHN F. KENNEDY and LYNDON B. JOHNSON. However, the bills providing for a federal minimum wage for agricultural workers and the inclusion of agricultural workers under the collective bargaining and other labor laws did not pass.

A party loyalist, Williams consistently ranked among those senators who voted most frequently with his party. During the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, he regularly backed social welfare programs. He also initially supported the war in Vietnam. In 1966, however, he joined 14 other senators in signing a letter to President Johnson calling for continued suspension of air strikes against North Vietnam. Williams nevertheless voted for appropriations for the war in 1967 and 1968. Not until 1969, when a Republican occupied the White House, did Williams's voting record reflect his doubts about the war in Vietnam and the cold war. In that year, he voted to bar American ground troops from Laos and Thailand; he also voted against the antiballistic missile program. In 1970, Williams voted for the Cooper-Church amendment, which cut off funds for American forces in Indochina after the end of the year.

Personal and ethical problems plagued Williams's last years in the Senate. According to journalist Franklin Pierce, Williams "undercut his own effectiveness for years by heavy drinking . . . until he finally went on the wagon around the end of 1968." In spite of his problems, Williams won reelection in 1970 by a comfortable margin and assumed the chair of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee in January 1971. During the 1970s, he became interested in mine safety and actively maintained his concern for the welfare of the elderly. He sought ways to mitigate the impact of inflation on the elderly and in 1972 introduced a bill designed to prevent abuses of private pension plans (that bill became a law in 1974). Williams also supported the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, the Philadelphia Plan (which required contractors with the federal government in the construction industry to hire quotas of minority workers), and banking reform. He easily won reelection in 1976. One of the congressional targets in an FBI sting operation known as ABSCAM, Williams was convicted on charges of bribery and conspiracy in May 1981. He was fined $50,000 and sentenced to three years in prison. Facing near-certain expulsion from the Senate, he resigned his seat on March 11, 1982. After his release from prison, Williams resided in Bedminster, New Jersey, until his death in Denville, New Jersey, on November 18, 2001.

—MSM

Williams, John J(ames)

(1904–1988) U.S. senator

The ninth of 11 children, John Williams was born in Frankford, Delaware, on May 17, 1904. He grew up on a farm in southern Delaware. After graduating from Frankford's high school, he moved to nearby Millsboro and set up a feed business with his brother. The business prospered, and the brothers expanded their ventures to include a hatchery for chickens and turkeys, farms, and timberland. An active Rotarian, a Mason, and a Sunday school teacher, Williams won election to the town council in 1940; he served 14 years in that office.

Despite his obscurity, Williams entered the race for the U.S. Senate in 1946. He disapproved of the way President HARRY S. TRUMAN's administration handled the postwar economic reconversion. In particular, he opposed the continuation of wartime economic regulations. Running for the seat of a popular Democratic incumbent, he had little opposition for the Republican nomination. Few gave him any chance to win the general election, but he campaigned vigorously against government controls and big budgets and was swept into office on the Republican tide of that year. He won reelection in 1952, 1958, and 1964.

In the Senate, he voted, for the most part, as a conservative. He opposed agricultural price support programs, opposed the continuation of the Office of Price Administration, supported tax cuts, and called for a reduction in the number of federal employees. He also worked to promote the poultry industry of Delaware. In foreign policy, he voted against aid to Greece and Turkey in 1947 and the implementation of the Marshall Plan in 1948. He did, however, support the North Atlantic Treaty.

Williams devoted a considerable amount of his time and effort to investigating fraud and abuse in the government. Assigned to the Committee to Investigate the National Defense, Williams participated in the investigation of the companies owned by HOWARD HUGHES. In 1949, he exposed massive discrepancies in the bookkeeping of the Commodities Credit Corporation. The most noteworthy accomplishment of Williams's first term in this regard was his investigation of corruption within the Bureau of Internal Revenue (BIR). From his seat on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, he led an investigation that uncovered extensive corruption and favoritism in the BIR. His report, issued in 1951, led to action by Congress and the Justice Department; by November 1953, Williams reported that 380 IRS employees had been fired and over 200 indicted for crimes including bribery, extortion, and embezzlement. The so-called Truman tax scandals led to a reorganization of the system and the establishment of the Internal Revenue Service. Under the new system, tax collectors ceased to be political appointments and were brought under the civil service.

Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Williams continued to conduct his independent investigations of fraud, waste, and mismanagement within the federal government. Operating without a staff and eschewing the fanfare of committee hearings, he relied on agency informants, the General Accounting Office (GAO), and his own dogged thoroughness. In the mid-1950s, for example, he criticized the government for paying over $2 million for radar equipment to a British manufacturer, then declaring the equipment surplus and selling it back for $114,000. In 1960, he criticized the air force for buying 272,710 screws for $1 each from a contractor who paid the manufacturer 5.5 cents each.

In addition to such waste, Williams sought to expose and eliminate some of the perquisites enjoyed by government employees. His favorite targets were overseas trips taken by members and employees of Congress at public expense. In February 1957, he demanded that public accounting be made of "counterpart funds" (foreign currency supplied by nations receiving aid from the United States) spent by congressional employees on foreign travel. In May 1960, the Senate adopted, by a vote of 68–0, an amendment proposed by Williams that required members of Congress and congressional staff members to submit itemized public accountings of money spent on foreign travel. A House-Senate conference committee cut the amendment. An amendment Williams offered to prohibit government employees from traveling at a reduced rate on any American ship suffered a similar fate in June 1958, but it finally passed in June 1960.

In 1957, Williams tried to return the unused portion of the stationery allowance for his office to the Treasury, which declined to accept the money. This led Williams to a decade-long effort to remedy this situation. Finally, in 1968, Congress passed legislation providing for the return of unexpended congressional stationery allowances to the Treasury. Williams's campaigns against waste and favoritism won him the sobriquet "the conscience of the Senate."

During the Eisenhower years, Williams served on the Finance Committee and the Agriculture and Forestry Committee. In 1960, he left the latter for the Foreign Relations Committee. On the Finance Committee, his general opposition to high taxation and big government found expression in actions such as his proposed amendment to the 1953 extension of the excess profits tax. The amendment would have raised the amount of corporate income exempt from the tax from $25,000 to $100,000, but it was defeated, 52–34.

On the other hand, Williams strove to eliminate various tax loopholes favored by others on the Finance Committee. Throughout the 1950s, he tried and failed to lower the 27.5 percent oil depletion allowance. Williams also voted against various tax reductions. For example, in June 1958 he voted not to repeal the 3 percent excise tax on freight shipments and the 10 percent levy on passenger travel. Among 15 Republican senators seeking reelection that year, he was the only one to vote against the popular tax cuts.

Consistent in his support of free markets, Williams supported the Eisenhower administration's farm program, which proposed to make price supports more flexible. In June 1956, Williams said that rigid price supports continued "to stimulate wasteful production." In the same month, Williams opposed additional airline subsidies. "Let us not fool ourselves," he said; "this is a little extra gravy for a special group that has already been riding the gravy train." He also sought to reduce subsidies to the maritime industry.

One of the most conservative members of the Senate on domestic issues, Williams consistently voted against social welfare legislation. In 1959 and 1960, he voted against a foreign aid authorization, federal aid to education, federal aid to depressed areas, an increase in the minimum wage, larger appropriations for housing and public works, and a Democratic plan to provide medical care for the elderly through the Social Security system.

A moderate on civil rights issues, Williams believed that the Supreme Court's decision striking down segregated public schools (Brown v. Board of Education [1954]) encroached on the right of states to establish their own policies with respect to education. Nevertheless, he opposed extralegal opposition to the decision. When an agitator from a group that called itself the National Association for the Advancement of White People came to Delaware in the aftermath of the Brown decision, Williams publicly called for order. He stated that, while citizens might disagree with the Supreme Court's decision (as he acknowledged that he did), they had a civic duty to observe the law as declared by the Court. He voted for the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, but not until the measure was amended to provide a jury trial for those charged with criminal contempt for interfering with black voting rights. He also voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1960.

Beginning in 1958, a subcommittee of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee investigated charges that Eisenhower's chief of staff, SHERMAN ADAMS, had accepted a vicuna coat and other gifts from BERNARD GOLDFINE, an industrialist, and had allowed Goldfine to pay some of Adams's hotel bills. Moreover, the committee looked into charges that Adams had used his influence on behalf of Goldfine, who had tax problems as well as regulatory problems with the Securities and Exchange Commission. In 1959, Williams called for the resignation of Adams.

During the 1960s, Williams continued to pursue his one-man investigations and to champion more stringent ethical requirements for Congress. He opposed several of President JOHN F. KENNEDY's ambassadorial appointments because of their involvement in questionable business dealings. In 1962, he requested an investigation of Billie Sol Estes, a Texan who had fraudulently manipulated the Department of Agriculture's programs of crop control allotments and grain storage. In 1963, an independent inquiry by Williams turned up important information on the unethical practices (including tax fraud and influence peddling) of Robert G. ("Bobby") Baker, secretary to the Senate majority and a protégé of LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Williams's investigation uncovered much of the information used in the subsequent hearings of the Senate Rules Committee. Although he was not on the Rules Committee, he was invited to sit in on its sessions. His insistence on a thorough investigation of the matter brought him into conflict with the committee. Williams clashed with the committee when it voted to limit the investigation to staff members, thereby excluding senators. His activities also earned him the enmity of Johnson, who made a serious, but ultimately unsuccessful, effort to defeat Williams in his bid for reelection in 1964.

Williams initially criticized the Johnson administration for what he regarded as a half-hearted commitment to Vietnam, but by 1967 he concluded that victory was improbable and that negotiations would have to end the conflict. Williams did not support the incursion into Cambodia ordered by President RICHARD M. NIXON in 1970. At the same time, he opposed the Cooper-Church amendment, which would have cut off funding for the war. Moreover, Williams was appalled by actions of antiwar demonstrators. Much as he had done with respect to opposition to the Brown decision in 1954, he called on people to observe the law and to maintain order.

When President Johnson sought a tax increase in 1969, Williams, recognizing that an increase was inevitable, began to lobby for simultaneous and mandatory cuts in federal spending. Williams opposed the Nixon administration's Family Assistance Plan, a proposal to reform the welfare system. He also voted against the nomination of CLEMENT F. HAYNSWORTH to the Supreme Court. Williams chose not to run for a fifth term in 1970. He resigned from the Senate on December 31, 1970, in order to give his successor and protégé, William V. Roth, Jr., seniority over other members elected in 1970. After leaving the Senate, he retired to his home in Millsboro, Delaware, and devoted his efforts to real estate and farming. He died in Lewes, Delaware, on January 11, 1988.

—MSM

Wilson, Charles E(rwin)

(1890–1961) secretary of defense

The son of a high school principal, Charles Wilson was born in Minerva, Ohio, on July 18, 1890. He moved with his family to Mineral City, Ohio, in 1894; 10 years later, the family moved to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Wilson earned a degree in electrical engineering from the Carnegie Institute of Technology in 1909. He then went to work at

Charles E. Wilson, Secretary of Defense (Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and Museum)

Westinghouse Electric as an apprentice engineer. There he designed the company's first motor for automobile starters and by 1916 was in charge of all of Westinghouse's production of electrical equipment for automobiles. During World War I, he designed dynamotors and radio generators for the military. He also designed a primitive crystal set for use by the infantry. In 1919, Wilson joined the Remy Electric Company, a subsidiary of General Motors (GM), as chief engineer and sales manager of the company's automobile division; he became general manager of the company in 1925. When Remy merged with Delco in 1926, Wilson became president and general manager of the combined company. In 1928, Wilson moved to the parent company as a vice president and special assistant to Alfred P. Sloan, the head of GM. Wilson joined GM's board of directors and became executive vice president in 1934. When GM's president, William S. Knudsen, went to Washington in 1940 to become director of defense production, Wilson became acting president. Upon Knudsen's resignation in 1941, Wilson became president of GM.

Wilson led the company through World War II and the postwar era. Under his leadership, the company geared up for military production, although it continued to produce automobiles for civilian use until early 1942. Between 1942 and 1945, the company sold $13.4 billion worth of goods; production for the military accounted for over 90 percent of that total. GM made tanks, armored trucks, aircraft, arms, and ammunition. GM accounted for the production of approximately one-quarter of all tanks, armored cars, and airplane engines built in the United States during the war. It made almost half the machine guns and carbines as well as two-thirds of heavy trucks. Soon after the war, Wilson replaced Sloan as GM's chief executive officer and continued as president of the company. He oversaw the company's reconversion to civilian production. By the end of the 1940s, GM made more than 6 million cars and trucks annually and accounted for 43 percent of new car sales.

Wilson also became a prominent figure in postwar labor relations. He helped create a social contract under which big business gave recognition to organized labor and paid good wages and benefits in exchange for stability, predictability, and control over the process of production. From the mid-1930s until he left the company to go to Washington, Wilson led GM in its bargaining with the United Auto Workers (UAW). Immediately after World War II, WALTER REUTHER, the head of the UAW, led a 113-day strike against GM, demanding a wage increase without price increases. Wilson refused to yield to those demands. Over the years, however, Wilson developed a mutually respectful relationship with Reuther. In 1948, Wilson introduced the cost-of-living adjustment, which tied wages to government price indexes. He also agreed to regular pay increases tied to increases in productivity. The plan drew praise from labor leaders and won rapid acceptance. The contract GM negotiated with the UAW in 1950, known as the Treaty of Detroit, established a pension plan for GM's workers. At the same time, Wilson and GM steadfastly refused to surrender control over personnel or the details of production.

After winning the presidential election in 1952, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER named Wilson secretary of defense. Eisenhower had first become impressed with Wilson when, as army chief of staff, he consulted the executive on problems relating to production and supply. The president-elect thought it a good idea for the secretary of defense to have expertise in management as well as procurement, storage, transportation, and distribution. As head of GM, Wilson had such qualifications, and Eisenhower offered him the position in late 1952.

Wilson almost immediately became a center of controversy. During hearings on his nomination, members of the Senate Armed Services Committee expressed concern that his holdings of stock in General Motors, the nation's largest defense contractor, could constitute a conflict of interest. Members of the panel, therefore demanded that he sell his nearly 40,000 shares worth approximately $2.5 million. Wilson objected in what at least some of the senators regarded as an arrogant manner. For Wilson, the whole matter was infuriating; he was leaving a job that paid some $600,000 a year for one that paid $22,500. Asked if he would be able to make a decision in the national interest even if it had "extremely adverse" consequences for General Motors, Wilson answered, "Yes, sir, I could. I cannot conceive of one because for years, I thought what was good for the country was good for General Motors and vice versa." Subsequently he was frequently misquoted as having said "What's good for General Motors is good for the country." After Eisenhower told him that he would have to sell his stock, Wilson announced on January 22 that he would do so; the following day, the Senate overwhelmingly approved his nomination.

Wilson saw his role as mainly administrative and operational rather than as one involving the formulation of policy. Eisenhower would make military policy and Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES would give instructions on foreign affairs. During his first year at Defense, Wilson undertook a major reorganization of the department. The secretary cut nearly 40,000 civilian employees from the Defense Department staff, canceled or held up many military building programs, and instituted the "narrow base" approach to procurement, which directed production to large, and presumably more efficient, suppliers. His reorganization gave the service secretaries more responsibility. It strengthened civilian control, facilitated implementation of the secretary's decisions, improved communications, and provided better means for strategic planning. By the end of his first year, Wilson pared his staff from 3,100 to 2,400.

Throughout his tenure as secretary of defense, Wilson never established good relations with the press. Known as a generally good-natured fellow and an excellent man to work under, he nevertheless had an unfortunate habit of putting his foot in his mouth. When asked his opinion about assistance for unemployed workers, he stated that he preferred "hunting dogs to kennel-fed dogs because the hunting dogs or bird dogs would get out and hunt for what they wanted; whereas the kennel-fed dog would set back his haunches and yelp." The fact that this occurred during the congressional elections in 1954 made the matter all the worse. On another occasion, Wilson stated that he wanted to cut back the National Guard and added that the guard was not much of a fighting force. He then said that those who enlisted in the guard during the Korean War did so to evade regular military service. That brought a public rebuke from the president, who called it "a very . . . unwise statement." The secretary's propensity for unfortunate public statements led JAMES RESTON, a columnist for the New York Times, to quip that Wilson invented the automatic transmission so that he would be free to drive with one foot in his mouth.

Regardless of his lack of verbal discretion, Wilson lined up behind Eisenhower's New Look defense policy, which called for a reduction in the defense budget and reliance on airpower, technology, and the nuclear deterrent rather than costly conventional forces. In his usual blunt manner, Wilson said that the shift in policy would give the United States "a bigger bang for a buck." From the outset, the policy encountered fierce resistance from Democrats and some Republicans. Between December 1953 and June 1955, the army's budget was cut from nearly $13 billion to $7 billion; its manpower was reduced from 1.5 million to 1 million men. During the same period, the navy and marines contracted from 1 million to 870,000 men. On the other hand, the number of air force personnel rose from 950,000 in 1953 to 970,000 in 1955, and its budget increased from $16.4 billion in 1955 to $18 billion in fiscal 1957.

By 1955, many prominent military officials publicly opposed the administration's New Look. Wilson issued a gag directive to stop their writing. However, the retiring chief of staff, General MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY, leaked proof of the army's discontent and published a series of articles in Life magazine. Wilson's order became a source of criticism of him and the administration.

Opposition to the New Look along with fierce interservice rivalries frustrated Wilson. By the mid-1950s, critics accused the New Look for weakening the nation's military and limiting its flexibility. Moreover, Eisenhower lost patience with Wilson's verbal gaffes and became frustrated with Wilson's unwillingness to make decisions. Even in the quotidian running of the department, an area where one would have expected Wilson to excel, Wilson disappointed Eisenhower, who thought that Wilson wanted to pass on too many decisions to the president. "Look here, Charlie," a frustrated president told his defense secretary, "I want you to run Defense. We both can't run it, and I won't run it. I was elected to worry about a lot of things other than the day-to-day operations of a department."

Weary of the disputes and the pace, Wilson submitted his resignation in August 1957 and left the Defense Department in October. He returned to his business activities, which included a dairy farm in Michigan, a cattle ranch in Florida, and a plantation in Louisiana. Wilson also served as a member of the board of directors of General Motors, a director of the National Bank of Detroit, and chairman of the Michigan advisory committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. He died at his plantation in Norwood, Louisiana, on September 26, 1961. His obituary in the New York Times misquoted him as having said: "What's good for General Motors is good for the country."

—MSM

Wilson, Sloan

(1920–2003) author

The son of a university professor, Wilson was born in Norwalk, Connecticut, on May 8, 1920. After attending Phillips Exeter Academy, he entered Harvard College in 1938, where he majored in psychology and philosophy. Wilson interrupted his education in 1942 to join the coast guard. Commissioned a reserve ensign, he served in the North Atlantic and South Pacific before his discharge as a lieutenant in 1945. The following year, he returned to Harvard and received his B.A. He wrote articles for the New Yorker and other magazines about how former servicemen were adjusting, or failing to adjust, to civilian life. In 1947, Wilson published Voyage to Somewhere, his first novel, which was based on his wartime experience in the South Pacific. Following a brief stint as a reporter for the Providence Journal, he joined Time magazine as a reporter and then became an assistant to Roy Larsen, the president of Time-Life. From 1949 to 1952, he worked for the National Citizens Commission for Public Schools. In 1952, Wilson became information director and an assistant professor of English at the University of Buffalo. He left the University of Buffalo in 1955. That same year, he was appointed as assistant director of the White House Conference on Education. He worked at Parents magazine and the New York Herald-Tribune before becoming a freelance writer in 1958.

Wilson published The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit in July 1955. It quickly became a best seller. Distinguished in neither style nor composition, the novel nevertheless attracted the interest of middle-class America. Wilson wrote about a new type of American who staffed the growing service sector of the economy, in particular those who worked in the media and advertising industries. These white-collar workers and their world had already drawn the attention of DAVID RIESMAN in The Lonely Crowd (1950) and C. WRIGHT MILLS in White Collar (1950). They were also the subject of WILLIAM WHYTE's The Organization Man (1956). The organization men described by Riesman, Whyte, Mills, and Wilson worked in unsatisfying circumstances to produce an intangible product. Fleeing cities for the good life in suburbia, these commuters found fulfillment illusory there, too. Despite a reasonable income that provided a comfortable middle-class life, the pressures on the men in gray flannel proved endless: a bigger house, a better car, private schools for the children. Moreover, these men found themselves cut off from traditional values like heroism, found no purpose in work or suburban life, and saw no way to deal with their problems. Wilson's novel dealt with the malaise of these conformist, status-hungry, executive commuters.

The central figure of Wilson's novel, Tom Rath, is a veteran of World War II who works for a charitable foundation and likes the work. He and Betsy, his wife of 12 years, have three small children and live in an unprepossessing house in Westport, Connecticut. Tom's income will not support their social aspirations, and their lives are blighted by "a thousand petty shabbinesses"; the house needs repair, as does their car and washing machine. Driven by the desire to make more money, Tom gives up his job at the foundation and takes a job at the Union Broadcasting Corporation. In order to succeed, he must become Whyte's organization man. In the end, he quits the rat race but gets rich anyway. The happy ending blunts the social criticism of the book; as the novel closes, he is about to develop the land left to him by his grandmother. Whatever its artistic shortcomings, the novel struck a chord, and its title entered the language.

The book received mixed reviews. The reviewer for the New York Times called it "a good novel—neat, smooth and reportorially exact in its account of the pressures, problems and tribal customs of the men in grey flannel suits, the ambitious commuters who are too young to be either successes or failures but whose time is running out." Perhaps because the egocentric head of the fictional Union Broadcasting Corporation in the novel resembled Roy Larsen, the president of Time magazine, the review in Time dismissed The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit as "upper-middle-class soap opera."

In 1956, the novel was made into a movie directed by Nunally Johnson and starring Gregory Peck and Jennifer Jones. The movie received widespread critical acclaim that the book did not. It was also a hit at the box office.

Wilson followed his first success with A Summer Place, published in 1958. The story revolves around Ken and Sylvia, teen lovers divided by wealth and social status. Ken, the son of a Swedish immigrant, is working as a lifeguard at a resort in Pine Island, Maine, where Sylvia's family arrives as guests. In spite of her love for Ken, Sylvia's parents push her into marriage with a young man, Bart, from a wealthy family. An alcoholic boor, Bart loses the fortune he inherited from his father and has to turn the family house on Pine Island into an inn. Ken, who becomes rich through his work as a research chemist, marries Helen, a woman obsessed with status and appearances. The plot gets under way when Ken and Helen book rooms at the inn owned by Bart and Sylvia. Ken's daughter, Molly, and Sylvia's son, Johnny, are attracted to each other. Ken and Sylvia have an affair that results in divorce for both of them. Eventually Ken and Sylvia marry and, when Molly becomes pregnant by Johnny, the reunited couple guides their children to marry.

The book's frank depiction of adultery, divorce, and teenage sex attracted considerable attention when it was published. Wilson also satirized racial and religious bigotry. Taken together, A Summer Place and The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit challenged the American dream of personal happiness through economic success. Driven by a high-powered advertising campaign, sales of A Summer Place earned Wilson over a million dollars. Many serious writers and critics were repelled by what they regarded as the crass campaign to sell the book (and perhaps by jealousy); they spurned Wilson as greedy and commercial. A Summer Place became a film in 1959 starring Troy Donahue and Sandra Dee.

Wilson's greatest success as a novelist came in the 1950s. Over a dozen subsequent novels received an indifferent response from critics and enjoyed nothing like the sales of The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit or A Summer Place. Wilson published A Sense of Values in 1960 and the following year took a job teaching English at New York University. He began drinking heavily and sank into depression and alcoholism. His career turned downward, but he continued to write, publishing Georgie Winthrop in 1963, Janus Island in 1967, and All the Best People in 1970. He found help for his psychological problems in the form of drug therapy and overcame his alcoholism with the assistance of family. In 1976, he published What Shall We Wear to This Party?, which described his life before and after the mid-1950s and received a warmer critical reception than the fiction he wrote after the 1950s.

He based Ice Brothers (1979) on his experience as commander of a trawler in the North Atlantic and another novel, Pacific Interlude (1982), on his experiences in the South Pacific. Small Town (1978) and The Greatest Crime (1980) failed to attract critical acclaim or to sell well. A sequel to The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit, The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit II (1984) took Tom Rath, amicably divorced from Betsy, to Washington to work for the Kennedy administration. The sequel was a critical and commercial flop.

Wilson lived in Florida for many years and, for a time in the 1980s, was a distinguished writer in residence at Rollins College in Florida. He moved in 1999 to Colonial Beach, Virginia, where he died on May 25, 2003.

—MSM

Wisdom, John Minor

(1905–1999) federal appellate judge

Wisdom was born into a prominent family in New Orleans, Louisiana, on May 17, 1905. His father, a cotton broker, businessman, and a member of the old Democratic establishment of New Orleans, had belonged to the White League, which opposed the integrated city government of New Orleans during Reconstruction. John Minor Wisdom earned his B.A. from Washington and Lee University in 1925. After spending a year as a graduate student in English literature at Harvard, he returned to New Orleans to study law and received his LL.B. from Tulane University in 1929. Upon graduating first in his law school class, he remained in New Orleans, where he established a successful practice, specializing in estates and trusts. Wisdom also taught part time at Tulane Law School. During World War II, he rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel in the legal service of the U.S. Army. While still in law school, Wisdom became concerned that Huey Long threatened democracy in Louisiana, so he joined the Republican Party. After the war, he became convinced that one-party rule had led to political stagnation in the South. In the late 1940s and early 1950s, Wisdom devoted considerable time and effort trying to build a Republican Party in Louisiana. His efforts brought him into contact with ELBERT PARR TUTTLE, who was trying to establish a Republican Party in Georgia; their efforts attracted the attention of national Republican leaders.

Wisdom was active in promoting the candidacy of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER for the presidency in 1952. Tuttle and Wisdom helped launch the Eisenhower movement in the South, and, in February 1952, a group of 15 Eisenhower supporters from the South chose Wisdom to chair the Southern Conference for Eisenhower; Tuttle served as vice chair. Wisdom traveled Louisiana, helping to organize local conventions to choose members for the Louisiana delegation to the Republican National Convention. A pro-Eisenhower slate, which included Wisdom, contested the party regulars, who supported Senator ROBERT A. TAFT (R-Ohio). Similar challenges came from Georgia and Texas. After a brilliant and lawyerly presentation by Wisdom, the Credentials Committee seated the pro-Eisenhower delegation from Louisiana; Tuttle's delegation from Georgia lost in the Credentials Committee but defeated the pro-Taft regulars in a vote on the convention floor. The defeat of the party regulars from the South led to Eisenhower's victory in the battle for the nomination.

During the general election, Wisdom campaigned for Eisenhower in Louisiana. After the election, he continued his involvement in politics and won election as Republican National Committeeman from Louisiana, a position he held from 1952 until he went on the bench. President Eisenhower appointed him to the president's Committee on Government Contracts, chaired by Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON and created to insure that contractors with the federal government did not discriminate for reasons of race, religion, creed, or national origin.

Possessed of a scholarly bent, Wisdom published articles in the areas of admiralty as well as estates and trusts. In addition, he engaged in a wide variety of civic activities, including service as president of the New Orleans Council of Social Agencies and as a board member of the National Urban League. A courtly and courteous individual, Wisdom, in spite of his outspoken opposition to segregation, managed to retain the friendship of conservatives with whom he had been raised. A member of the social elite, Wisdom continued his affiliations with exclusive private clubs and Mardi Gras crews that excluded African Americans and Jews. Wisdom defended his decision not to resign from such organizations by pointing out that the members knew how he stood "on these matters" and that his resignation would not have changed their views.

In 1957, President Eisenhower appointed Wisdom to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. There he joined Tuttle, whom Eisenhower had named to the Fifth Circuit in 1954. At that time, the Fifth Circuit comprised Louisiana, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, and Georgia. Tuttle emerged as the leader of the court. Particularly after he became chief judge in 1961, Tuttle performed a role similar to that of EARL WARREN on the Supreme Court.

Widely read in history, literature, and political philosophy, as well as law, Wisdom quickly emerged as the intellectual leader of the Fifth Circuit. His elegantly crafted opinions defined the philosophical and legal matters facing the court. He aligned himself with the court's liberal, antisegregationist bloc, which included Tuttle, Richard T. Rives, and John R. Brown. These four judges led the Fifth Circuit in desegregating the Deep South as they implemented the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954). Wisdom played a large role in leading the court to interpret Brown as demanding not just an end to segregated public schools but an end to discrimination in voting, employment, and jury selection. Similarly, the Fifth Circuit held that Brown required the desegregation of public parks, playgrounds, community centers, and cultural facilities. Careful legal craftsmanship, a broad knowledge of history, and graceful prose characterized Wisdom's many decisions for the court.

Wisdom came to the court with the belief that segregation, as he said in an interview in 1983, "was just plain wrong." His courageous stand against segregation made him the target of political vituperation by segregationist politicians as well as more direct and personal assaults. He received threatening phone calls, rattlesnakes were thrown into the courtyard garden of his home, and two of his pet dogs were poisoned. Wisdom nevertheless refused to get an unlisted phone number and claimed never to have lost a friend.

Wisdom wrote many of the decisions that broke down legal segregation in the Deep South. In 1961 he struck down Louisiana's school closing law after St. Helena Parish voted to close its public schools rather than to desegregate (St. Helena Parish School Board v. Hall).

He also wrote the decision in 1962 that found that the University of Mississippi had denied admission to James Meredith solely on the basis of his race (Meredith v. Fair). Wisdom castigated the university officials for engaging "in a carefully calculated campaign of delay, harassment and masterly inactivity" and ordered the admission of Meredith to the university. The decision led to three days of rioting in which three people were killed. Writing for the court, in United States v. Louisiana (1963), Wisdom struck down a Louisiana statute that required black voters to interpret passages of the United States Constitution or that of the state of Louisiana to pass the literacy test. "We hold," wrote Wisdom, "that this wall, built to bar Negroes from access to the franchise, must come down." The decision included a masterly history of direct and indirect means of excluding black political participation in Louisiana.

Wisdom wrote the opinion in U.S. v. Jefferson County (1968), which held that the Constitution did not merely forbid legally enforced segregation but required integration. "The law," wrote Wisdom, "imposes an absolute duty to . . . disestablish segregation" as well as "an absolute duty to integrate." He advocated "the planned organized undoing of the effects of past segregation" and, in doing so laid the philosophical groundwork for affirmative action. "The only school desegregation plan that meets constitutional standards," he wrote, "is one that works."

Wisdom took senior judge status in 1977 but continued to hear cases into his 90s. In 1993, President William Jefferson Clinton awarded Wisdom the Presidential Medal of Freedom. Wisdom died in New Orleans on May 15, 1999.

—MSM

Wolfson, Louis E(Iwood)

(1912–2007) industrialist

The son of Russian Jewish immigrants, Wolfson was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on January 28, 1912. He grew up in Jacksonville, Florida, where he excelled in athletics. A football star in high school, he also boxed professionally under the name "Kid Wolf" as a youth. He attended the University of Georgia, but he left after two years to work in his father's scrap yard. Wolfson raised $10,000 to start Florida Pipe and Supply Company, which dealt in building materials. Before long, he had created a substantial business. During World War II, Florida Pipe and Supply held over $4.5 million in government contracts. After the war, he extended his interests into real estate and shipbuilding. At the end of the war, he bought a surplus shipyard in Jacksonville from the government. He bought Merritt-Chapman & Scott Corporation, a conglomerate that began as a construction firm but expanded into ship building, chemicals, and money lending.

In 1949, he became majority shareholder and board chairman of Capital Transit Company, which provided streetcar and bus service for Washington, D.C. In that capacity, he became a favorite villain of the capital city. That image became firmly ensconced when he admitted to Time magazine that he had milked the company of its surplus by paying large dividends to shareholders, many of whom were his associates. In the meantime, fare prices went up, the company's profits lagged, and a strike shut down operations for 51 days in the summer of 1955. On August 1, 1955, Congress voted to revoke Wolfson's franchise. After O. Roy Chalk took over the system, customers continued to complain about fare hikes and poor service.

Wolfson regarded himself as a savior of moribund businesses who turned out stagnant leadership and revived failing enterprises. Typically, he bought up companies whose book values exceeded the value of their common stock and then moved in with his own management. In fact, he did successfully revive a number of failing firms. His aggressive management style, though, contributed to his reputation as a corporate raider concerned only with making money for himself and his associates. By the mid-1950s, he had built an empire worth roughly $200 million.

Between 1954 and 1958, Wolfson attempted to win control of two major corporations: Montgomery Ward & Company, the nation's second largest retailer, and American Motors Corporation (AMC), the fourth largest domestic auto producer. Wolfson's campaign to control Montgomery Ward commenced in August 1954, when the financier and his associates began to purchase large blocks of the company's common stock. Management problems at Montgomery Ward aided Wolfson's cause. The company's chairman of the board, SEWELL AVERY, though past his 80th birthday, still single-handedly ran the company and had allowed it to stagnate. Despite a protracted eight-month struggle and a court fight, Wolfson failed to acquire Ward; he secured just under 1 percent of the company's stock. Through his initiative, however, he won for himself and two allies places on the board of directors and forced Avery's retirement. Wolfson declared Avery's resignation to be a victory for his side, which had "succeeded in infusing new blood into the Ward management." Curiously, Wolfson quit the board in January 1956.

A year later, Wolfson attempted to gain control of AMC, which had been created when several auto concerns had merged in January 1954. Wolfson had owned a large number of shares in one of those companies, Hudson, and used this block as the base for his acquisitions. In October 1956, Wolfson threatened AMC president GEORGE ROMNEY with a stock takeover unless he partially liquidated some of AMC's assets. Unable to compete with the industry's three leaders and in desperate need of new financing, AMC management appeared vulnerable. Romney, however, persuaded Wolfson, by then the largest individual stockholder, to delay acting against management and not to demand a place on the board of directors. Wolfson issued a statement in support of Romney and dropped his campaign. Wolfson profited from his cooperation. By 1958, AMC had markedly improved its sales and earnings. As his the value of his stock rose, Wolfson sold his holdings for a profit of $2 million.

During the mid-1960s, Wolfson became the target of an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) into his manipulation of the stock of Continental Enterprises, a company in which Wolfson held a controlling interest. Ultimately, he was convicted in 1967 and again in 1968 on federal charges stemming from stock sales. The first conviction involved Wolfson's sale of unregistered shares in Continental Enterprises. He did not deny the specifics of the allegations but argued that the law was misapplied. In September 1967, he was convicted on 19 counts of conspiracy and illegal stock sales. His lawyers appealed all the way to the Supreme Court, which refused to hear the appeal. Wolfson served nine months in federal prison and paid a substantial fine. The second conviction, for perjury, obstruction of justice, and filing misleading annual reports, involved an investigation by the SEC into Merritt-Chapman & Scott. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed this conviction in 1970. Two subsequent trials resulted in hung juries. Wolfson agreed to a plea bargain in which he pleaded no contest to the charges and avoided additional time in prison.

Wolfson's ties to Supreme Court justice Abe Fortas contributed to the withdrawal of Fortas's nomination to replace EARL WARREN as chief justice and led to Fortas's resignation from the Court in May 1969. In January 1966, not long after taking his seat as an associate justice, Fortas agreed to serve as a consultant to Wolfson's charitable foundation, in exchange for which the foundation paid Fortas an annual fee of $20,000 for the rest of his life. At that time, Wolfson was already under investigation for suspected securities violations. After Wolfson was indicted, Fortas returned the money in December 1966 and recused himself from the case. Nevertheless, when Life magazine published an article about Fortas's arrangement in May 1969, the public outcry forced the justice's resignation from the Court.

In the late 1960s, Wolfson lived in Miami Beach, Florida. He established Harbor View Farm, a thoroughbred horse farm near Ocala, Florida. He bred, raised, and raced Affirmed, a horse that won the Triple Crown in 1978. Wolfson died at his home in Bal Harbour, Florida, on December 30, 2007.

—MSM

Wright, J(ames) Skelly

(1911–1988) U.S. district court judge

The son of a city building superintendent and plumbing inspector, Wright was born in New Orleans, Louisiana, on January 14, 1911. He grew up in a working-class neighborhood and attended the city's public schools. Wright went to Loyola University on a scholarship and graduated from that institution in 1931. That year he began teaching mathematics and English at Fortier High School. While working as a high school teacher, he attended Loyola University Law School, from which he received a degree in 1934. He continued teaching at Fortier until 1935 and held an appointment as a lecturer in English history at Loyola from 1936 to 1937. Through the political connections of an uncle, Wright became an assistant U.S. attorney for New Orleans in 1937; he remained in that position until he entered the coast guard in 1942. During World War II, he served as commander of a submarine chaser in the North Atlantic and then as an attaché at the American embassy in London. After leaving the coast guard in 1945, he returned to the U.S. attorney's office in New Orleans as senior assistant to U.S. attorney Herbert Christenberry. In spring 1946, Wright opened a law office in Washington, D.C. The next year, he entered a partnership with two other attorneys. Wright's practice primarily dealt with maritime and shipping matters. In 1948, he returned to New Orleans as U.S. attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana. The following year, President HARRY S. TRUMAN appointed Wright to a U.S. district court judgeship for the eastern district of Louisiana.

As a district judge during the 1950s, Wright presided over many cases involving desegregation and civil rights. Even before the Supreme Court declared segregated public schools unconstitutional in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), Wright ordered the admission of black students to the law school at Louisiana State University on the ground that the law school for African Americans at Southern University was not equal to the white institution. In 1957, he held that laws designed to keep Louisiana State University and other state universities segregated were unconstitutional. The following year, he ordered the desegregation of transportation facilities in New Orleans. In 1959, Wright ruled unconstitutional a law banning sports events in which both whites and blacks participated, and in 1960 he ordered registrars in Washington parish registrars to restore African Americans to the voting rolls.

However controversial those decisions may have been, Wright's decisions desegregating the public schools of New Orleans made him the most hated man in the state. In 1952, the NAACP filed a suit against the Orleans Parish School Board to desegregate the public schools (Bush v. Orleans Parish School Board). Both the NAACP and the school board assented to Wright's decision to postpone a ruling until the Supreme Court had decided Brown. In the aftermath of Brown, Louisiana joined other southern states in employing a number of devices to thwart desegregation. One such device was the enactment of pupil placement laws. In February 1956, Wright sat on a three-judge panel that struck down Louisiana's pupil placement laws. Then, sitting alone, Wright ordered the school board to make arrangements to desegregate "with all deliberate speed" but explained that his order did not require it be done "overnight" or "even in a year or more." The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld Wright's order.

A series of appeals delayed action on the case, but in 1959 the NAACP got Wright to order the school board to submit a desegregation plan by March 1960. When it refused, Wright ordered integration to begin in September 1960 on a grade-per-year basis. In response, the governor of Louisiana, JIMMIE DAVIS, took control of the schools under a recently enacted statute in an attempt to close them and thus maintain segregation. Wright then issued restraining orders prohibiting the school closings. On November 14, four black first graders entered two previously all-white schools amid the protests of taunting white mobs. In 1962, Wright issued his final order in the matter of public schools in New Orleans. Frustrated with the lack of progress toward desegregation, he ordered the public schools of New Orleans to desegregate beginning with the fall term. Wright ruled that pupils in first through sixth grades could choose to attend the school nearest his or her home rather than the school to which the school board had assigned the pupil. Wright's successor, Frank Ellis, modified the ruling in May to require only the first grade be integrated by September 1962. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit modified Ellis's order. The appellate court ruled that students in grades one through three should be given the option to attend the school nearest their residence and that the option be extended to the first five grades by 1964.

In the course of the litigation over public schools in New Orleans, Wright became a pariah. Crosses were burned on his lawn; he received threatening telephone calls; state politicians denounced him in the most immoderate language and even urged citizens to defy his orders. Federal marshals guarded his home and escorted him to and from his chambers. Old friends refused to recognize him.

If it were possible, Wright further alienated the people of New Orleans and Louisiana when he held in 1962 that Tulane University was a "public institution" because it received a "very substantial state subsidy." Therefore, he reasoned, the university was subject to the Fourteenth Amendment's ban on state-sanctioned discrimination. Accordingly, he ordered the university to admit two black students.

President JOHN F. KENNEDY considered appointing Wright to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals but ultimately decided not to, because he thought opposition from southern senators would make confirmation unlikely. Instead, Kennedy appointed Wright to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in 1962. As an appellate judge during the 1960s, Wright continued to hand down important civil rights decisions. In a special circumstance, Wright sat as a district judge in 1967 and heard a controversial case involving segregation in the public schools of Washington, D.C. Wright ruled unconstitutional a tracking system that resulted in the de facto segregation of black students in the District of Columbia's public schools (Hobson v. Hanson). During the 1970s, Wright handed down significant decisions dealing with the Alaska pipeline, military justice, and nuclear reactors. In 1973, Wright was a member of the circuit court that ordered President RICHARD M. NIXON to release the Watergate tapes. Wright served as chief judge of the Court of Appeals for Washington, D.C., from 1978 to 1981. He took senior judge status in 1987. Wright died at his home in Westmoreland Hills, Maryland, on August 6, 1988.

—MSM

Yarborough, Ralph W(ebster)

(1903–1996) U.S. senator

Born on a farm in Chandler, Texas, on June 8, 1903, Yarborough went to local schools before attending the U.S. military academy in 1919 and 1920. He then taught school in Henderson County while attending Sam Houston State Teacher's College. He also worked in agriculture and building oil tanks. He paid his way to Europe by working on a freighter and lived in Germany, where he was assistant secretary for the American Chamber of Commerce in Berlin. After returning to the United States, Yarborough received an LL.B. from the University of Texas at Austin in 1927 and was admitted to the Texas bar in the same year. He joined a law firm in El Paso. He served as an assistant attorney general of Texas from 1931 to 1935. From 1936 to 1941, he served as a judge of the 53rd judicial district. In 1938, Yarborough ran unsuccessfully for state attorney general. A member of the Texas national guard in the 1930s, he joined the army in 1943. During World War II, he served as an infantry officer in Europe and in the occupation government of Japan. He won a bronze star. After his discharge as a lieutenant colonel in 1946, he practiced law in Austin.

During the 1950s, Yarborough emerged as the leader of the small group of liberal Democrats in Texas. In 1952, he entered his party's Democratic primary against the incumbent governor, ALLAN SHIVERS. A conservative, Shivers dominated the Democratic Party in Texas. Yarborough ran as a neo-populist; he supported social reform and opposed the powerful Texas business establishment. Shivers soundly defeated him, receiving 833,000 votes to Yarborough's 488,000 votes. In the presidential election that year, Shivers led the state organization in its decision to back the Republican presidential candidate, DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

Two years later, Yarborough, denouncing Shivers for his endorsement of Eisenhower, ran against the governor again, this time losing by 90,000 votes. In a nasty campaign, Yarborough accused Shivers of corruption in a scandal involving the Veteran's Land Board. Shivers accused Yarborough of supporting integration and being a tool of labor unions and communists. In fact, both men campaigned on platforms that directly or indirectly supported segregation. Shivers appealed openly to racial prejudice. Yarborough, on the other hand, professed his opposition to "forced" desegregation. Yarborough's stronger showing was aided by the growing cohesiveness of Texas's liberals, comprised of intellectuals, populist East Texas farmers, trade unionists, African Americans, and Mexican Americans. The previous year, liberals had formed the Democratic Organizing Committee with the support of House Minority Leader SAM RAYBURN (D-Tex.), who wanted to reestablish the loyalty of the state organization to the national party.

In 1956, Yarborough entered his third successive gubernatorial primary. In a runoff election, he faced U.S. senator PRICE DANIEL (D-Tex.) and lost by fewer than 4,000 votes. When Daniel resigned from the Senate to assume the governorship, Yarborough ran in a special election to fill Daniel's vacant seat. In April 1957, Yarborough won a plurality in the special election against a Democrat and a Republican who split the conservative vote. Seeking a full term in 1958, Yarborough defeated conservative William A. Blakley in the Democratic primary and easily won the general election.

During his early years in the Senate, Yarborough compiled a generally liberal record. He voted for Democratic bills in 1959 providing funding for housing and area redevelopment. He also supported unsuccessful efforts to override President Eisenhower's vetoes of those measures. He supported the National Defense Education Act of 1958, which provided loans and grants to universities and their students. He backed the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. He was one of only five southern senators to vote for the Civil Rights Act of 1957. In the 86th Congress (1959–61), according to Congressional Quarterly, Yarborough voted with the southern Democratic-Republican conservative coalition on only 23 percent of key roll call votes and against it 67 percent of the time.

Yarborough, however, joined the predominantly conservative Texas congressional delegation in defending the state's powerful oil interests. In March 1958, during a debate over a reciprocal trade bill, he stated that voluntary import quotas on foreign oil were not working and that "enforceable import quotas are critically needed." In June of the following year, he voted against an amendment to a tax bill offered by Senator PAUL H. DOUGLAS (D-Ill.) that would have reduced the depletion allowance on oil and gas wells.

In the early 1960s, Yarborough engaged in a bitter quarrel with Governor John Connally, the leader of the state's moderate and conservative Democrats, for control of the state party. When President JOHN F. KENNEDY was assassinated in Dallas on November 22, 1963, Yarborough rode in an open vehicle two cars behind the presidential limousine in the motorcade. Yarborough crassly criticized the Secret Service agents for not responding quickly enough. In an example of political grandstanding, Yarborough sponsored federal legislation to provide assistance to the family of J. D. Tippitt, the police officer killed by Lee Harvey Oswald, Kennedy's assassin. Yarborough won reelection in 1964. Yarborough defeated George H. W. Bush, a future president of the United States, to win a third term in 1964. During the mid and late 1960s, Yarborough voted for President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's Great Society measures. He urged legislation in the areas of civil rights, education, public health, and the environment. He either sponsored or cosponsored the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, the Higher Education Act of 1965, and revisions of the G.I. Bill in 1966. He also cowrote the Endangered Species Act of 1973.

While he generally supported Johnson's domestic policies, he split with the president on the war in Vietnam. In 1968, he endorsed antiwar candidate Senator EUGENE MCCARTHY (D-Minn.) for the presidency. Two years later, Lloyd Bentsen, Jr., a heavily financed conservative, defeated Yarborough in the Democratic senatorial primary. Bentsen's campaign stressed the breakdown of law and order, urban riots, and Yarborough's opposition to the war in Vietnam. After leaving the Senate, Yarborough returned to the practice of law in Austin. He made a bid to return to the Senate in 1972 but lost in the primary. He maintained an active law practice, concentrating on the oil and gas business, almost up to his death in Austin, Texas, on January 27, 1996.

—MSM

Yates, Eugene A(dams)

(1880–1957) chairman of the board, Southern Company, Inc.

Born on November 7, 1880, in Elizabeth, New Jersey, Yates graduated from Rutgers University in 1902 with a B.S. in civil engineering. After graduating, he worked in the construction industry in New York City until he moved to Alabama in 1912 to become chief engineer of the Alabama Power Company. He rose to be general manager of Alabama Power, and, recognizing the advantages of an integrated network, he played a central role in the creation of Southeastern Power and Light in 1924. Southeastern Power and Light was a holding company that created an interconnected system out of the assets of Alabama Power, Georgia Power, Gulf Power, and Mississippi Power. With the formation of Southeastern Power and Light, Yates became vice president and general manager of the company. In 1930, Southeastern Power and Light merged into the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, which included five northern companies and six southern companies, and Yates became vice president of Commonwealth and Southern. In the mid-1940s, the federal government forced the dissolution of Commonwealth and Southern under the Public Utility Holding Company Act. Four of the southern companies (Alabama Power, Georgia Power, Gulf Power, and Mississippi Power) were deemed to be an integrated system and were thus allowed to remain under common ownership. A new holding company, the Southern Company, was formed for that purpose. Yates became president of Southern Company in 1947 and chairman of its board in 1950.

In 1954, Yates joined EDGAR H. DIXON, president of Middle South Utilities, in forming the Mississippi Valley Generating Company. They proposed to build a $107 million electric generating plant at West Memphis, Arkansas, to sell power to the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC). The consumption of power by the AEC's installation at Paducah, Kentucky, taxed the capacity of the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) to meet the demands of the city of Memphis, which faced the prospect of a shortage of electricity in four years. The TVA proposed building a new steam plant at Fulton, Tennessee, to supply power to the city of Memphis. President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, who preferred private development of power, could not see a justification for the federal government to pay for a plant to supply power to a particular city. He ordered JOSEPH DODGE, the director of the Bureau of the Budget, and LEWIS L. STRAUSS, the chair of the AEC, to explore the possibility of having private industry build the plant. In response, Dixon and Yates organized the Mississippi Valley Generating Company to build a plant to supply power to the TVA to replace the power that the TVA sold to the AEC. The Dixon-Yates proposal won acceptance by the AEC, TVA, and Bureau of the Budget. Upon the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget, Eisenhower approved the proposal. The decision infuriated advocates of public power and created something of a scandal when it came out that a consultant to the Bureau of the Budget, Adolphe Wenzell, had been simultaneously advising the Dixon-Yates company. Ultimately, the city of Memphis decided to build its own power plant, which freed up power from the TVA for use by the AEC. Eisenhower took the opportunity to cancel the Dixon-Yates contract and thus avoid a continuing controversy.

Yates died of a heart attack in New York City on October 5, 1957.

—MSM

York, Herbert F(rank)

(1921–2009) chief scientist, Advanced Research Projects Agency, Department of Defense; director of defense research and engineering, Department of Defense

Born in Rochester, New York, on November 24, 1921, York graduated with honors in physics from the University of Rochester in 1942 and earned an M.A. there the following year. Upon completing his M.A., he joined the Manhattan Project as a physicist at Ernest Lawrence's Radiation Laboratory at Berkeley and at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, where he worked on the electromagnetic separation of uranium 235. At the end of World War II, he went to the University of California at Berkeley to study for a doctorate. Awarded his Ph.D. in 1949, York then worked as a consultant at the laboratory at Los Alamos, New Mexico. In 1950, he became an assistant professor at the University of California and led a team engaged in the development of nuclear and thermonuclear weapons at the California Radiation Laboratory. He oversaw the expansion of the laboratory and in 1952 became the first director of Lawrence Livermore Radiation Laboratory.

When, in 1957, the Soviet Union launched Sputnik, the first human-made satellite, it caused a national alarm in the United States. President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER created the President's Scientific Advisory Commission (PSAC) in 1957 and appointed York to it. York served from 1957 to 1961. In March 1958, he took a leave of absence from the Lawrence Livermore Radiation Laboratory in order to become chief scientist of the Defense Department's Advanced Research Projects Agency (ARPA). The ARPA supervised the development of rockets, satellites, and other space-related projects by the armed services. It also had responsibility for planning and implementing future American ventures into space.

While Eisenhower believed that military applications formed the primary basis of America's interest in space ("because they bear on our immediate safety"), the scientists at the PSAC made a case for the purely scientific possibilities of the space program. They, and some within the administration, argued that it would be better for nonmilitary research in space to be conducted by a civilian agency. Although Eisenhower worried about the cost of duplication, he agreed to proceed with a dual effort. ARPA would oversee military applications and the scientists at ARPA would design a civilian agency that would be responsible for developing nonmilitary applications. JAMES KILLIAN, head of the PSAC, appointed York to a panel to determine how the space program would be organized and what its objectives should be. Among the scientists on that panel, York was more inclined to rely primarily on the ARPA; others placed greater emphasis on a civilian agency devoted to scientific exploration. In the end, the panel recommended expanding the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics into the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to oversee the civilian space program. With respect to the overall objectives of the space program, York argued strenuously for the importance of military projects in space. After PSAC presented its final report, Eisenhower asked the committee to prepare a version for the public. "Introduction to Outer Space," written primarily by York and Nobel laureate Edward Purcell, emphasized the scientific benefits of space exploration. The projects it mentioned included satellites to help forecast weather and instrumented probes to the moon. The report also warned against exploiting "space science at the cost of weakening our efforts in other scientific endeavours."

In discussions within the PSAC, York supported a proposal by the ARPA that called for four more Explorer satellites and three lunar probes. York stressed the need to reach the moon ahead of the Soviets and warned of "the Sputnik-like reaction" that would follow a successful Soviet lunar probe. After gaining the approval of the president, the Pentagon released a statement briefly explaining the ARPA's program and downplaying any hint of a race with the Soviets to hit the moon. In April 1958, before the House Select Committee on Astronautics and Space Exploration, York comprehensively outlined the ARPA space itinerary, which included the lunar probes and especially the development of more powerful rocket engines to place larger satellites into orbit around Earth.

Interservice rivalries led to expensive and wasteful duplication in the development of missiles. In guiding a reorganization of the Joint Chiefs of Staff through Congress, Eisenhower included the creation of a new position, director of defense research and engineering. Effectively, the director of defense research and engineering would serve as a "missile czar"; it would fall to the director to clamp down on interservice rivalries and facilitate the orderly and coherent development of new weapons. In December 1958, Eisenhower appointed York to the newly created position.

While at that post, York played a central role in the military aspects of the space program and was often called on to defend its more controversial elements. In March 1959, for example, a White House report prepared by the PSAC made public details of Project Argus, which conducted nuclear tests in space during 1958. York denied that the project's three ionospheric bursts posed any danger of radioactive fallout, despite the fact that the tests had generated intense radioactivity, which was trapped in the earth's magnetic field.

After leaving the Pentagon in 1961, York became the first chancellor of the University of California at San Diego. He served in that capacity until 1964 and again from 1970 to 1972. President JOHN F. KENNEDY appointed him to the general advisory committee of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in 1962. During the administration of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON, York served again on the PSAC from 1964 to 1968. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, York consistently expressed his opposition to the arms race between the Soviet Union and the United States. In 1970, he published Race to Oblivion: A Participant's View of the Arms Race, which detailed his view of the weakness of the antiballistic missile. In 1972, York joined Senator George McGovern's (D-S. Dak.) presidential campaign as cochairman of its national security panel and supported the senator's announced intention of reducing "wasteful and dangerous elements" in the defense budget. During the presidency of Jimmy Carter, York served as U.S. ambassador to the Comprehensive Test Ban negotiations in Geneva, Switzerland, from 1979 to 1981. In 1982, York founded and directed the Institute of Global Conflict and Cooperation at UC San Diego. He is director emeritus of the Institute on Global Conflict and Cooperation at UC San Diego and serves as chair of the university's scientific and academic advisory committee. In addition to Race to Oblivion, York has written Arms Control (1973), The Advisors: Oppenheimer, Teller and the Superbomb (1976), Making Weapons, Talking Peace: A Physicist's Journey from Hiroshima to Geneva (1987), A Shield in Space? Technology, Politics and the Strategic Defense Initiative, with Sanford Lakoff (1988), and Arms and the Physicist (1995). In 2000, President William Jefferson Clinton awarded York the Enrico Fermi Award for his contributions to nuclear deterrence and arms control. York died in San Diego, California, on May 19, 2009.

—MSM

Young, Milton R(uben)

(1897–1983) U.S. senator

The son of a grain farmer and real estate dealer, Young was born on his father's farm in Berlin, North Dakota, on December 6, 1897. After graduating from high school in 1915, he attended North Dakota Agricultural College and Graceland College in Iowa before becoming a grain farmer and real estate dealer. In his first race for public office, Young won election to the school board in 1924 and, running as a Republican, won a seat in the lower house of the state legislature in 1932. Two years later, he won election to the state senate. He served in the upper house until March 1945, when Governor Fred Aandahl appointed him to fill a vacancy in the U.S. Senate created by the death of Senator John Moses (D-N. Dak.). Young then won a special election in June 1946 to complete the term, and in 1950 won election to a full term by a margin of more than two to one. He won reelection in 1956, 1962, 1968, and 1974.

Generally conservative in his voting, Young opposed most of the legislation sent to Congress by the administration of President HARRY S. TRUMAN. Young supported the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, the Internal Security Act of 1950, and the Immigration Act of 1952. As a senator from one of the nation's leading wheat-producing states, however, he was one of the foremost advocates of high price supports for agricultural products. By his own reckoning, Young was "a farmer first and a Republican second." Although he tended to vote with the midwestern, conservative wing of the Republican Party in foreign policy, he did vote for aid to Greece and Turkey in 1947 and the Marshall Plan in 1948. Thereafter, however, he consistently voted to cut economic aid to western Europe, and he was one of 13 senators to vote against the North Atlantic Treaty in 1949.

During the administration of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, Young vigorously criticized the system of flexible price supports advocated by the secretary of agriculture, EZRA TAFT BENSON. In February 1953, Benson set off a storm of controversy when he declared that price supports "encourage uneconomic production" and should be used only as "disaster insurance." By October, Young called for Benson's resignation. During the debate over the administration's omnibus farm bill in 1954, Young asserted that "the lowering of price supports . . . will result in drastically reduced prices received by farmers." Moreover, he warned that it would "hurt the Republicans in farm states." Young voted for a version of the bill, passed by the House, that set the minimum level of support at 80 percent. When the House-Senate conference produced a bill setting the minimum at 75 percent, Young opposed it. In 1956, Young successfully amended a farm bill to establish 90 percent support for millable varieties of wheat for that year. Three years later, during debate over price supports for wheat, he warned that the administration's plan for reducing supports would ruin all but large farmers. Young voted for a bill offering farmers the option of 90 percent support and a 25 percent acreage reduction or 50 percent support and no restriction on acreage. The president, however, vetoed the measure.

On issues other than agriculture, Young usually voted with the conservative wing of his party. In February 1954, he voted for the Bricker amendment, which would have imposed limits on the treaty-making powers of the president. Young opposed the censure of Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) in December 1954. On the other hand, he generally voted for civil rights measures.

In February 1956, Young voted for a bill to exempt independent gas producers from federal price regulation. President Eisenhower vetoed the measure after it came out that gas lobbyists had exerted improper influence on Congress. A newspaper in North Dakota declared that Young had “sold out” by supporting the bill. Young, who faced an election later that year, demanded an investigation. The editor of the newspaper appeared in late May before a special Senate panel investigating corrupt practices and declared that the charge had not been meant literally. The probe was dropped, and Young won reelection in November by a margin of 108,000 to 63,000 votes.

For all his seniority, Young remained virtually unknown outside of North Dakota. He received national attention briefly, however, in 1961, when he denounced the John Birch Society and warned that it was gaining influence within Republican circles in North Dakota. In 1962, he was the only Republican who voted for a bill, recommended by the administration of President JOHN F. KENNEDY, that provided for strict control of wheat and feed grain production. During the administration of President LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Young opposed Medicare and the war on poverty. He advocated cuts in spending for health, education, and welfare programs. Some programs of the Great Society gained his favor. He supported manpower training programs and provided important backing for the Model Cities program in 1966. Continuing his record of support for civil rights, Young voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1964, but he opposed the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and voted against the use of federal funds to achieve integration through busing. In the second half of the 1960s, Young became concerned over his state’s loss of population and its low per capita income; in response, he played a central role in obtaining large military contracts for his state. Young opposed American intervention in Indochina as early as 1954 and continued to oppose the war in Vietnam throughout the 1960s on the ground that the area was “militarily untenable.” He nevertheless consistently voted to provide funding for the war.

In 1974, he decided to seek reelection at the age of 76. He narrowly defeated a popular former governor, William Guy. A recount in December gave him a victory by 186 votes. Over his long career in the Senate, he used his position on the Senate Appropriations Committee to obtain seven major water projects, air force bases at Minot and Grand Forks, and several research laboratories for his state. Late in his career, he told a reporter that he was more proud of the federal largesse he brought to his state than any other accomplishment in the Senate. Young did not stand for reelection in 1980 and retired to Sun City, Arizona, where he lived until his death there on May 31, 1983.

—MSM

Z

Zwicker, Ralph W(ise)

(1903–1991) army officer

Born in Stoughton, Wisconsin, on April 17, 1903, Zwicker grew up in Madison and spent a year at the University of Wisconsin before attending the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. After graduating from West Point in 1923, he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the infantry. Assigned to the Third Infantry Regiment, he reported for duty at Fort Snelling, Minnesota. In 1930, he was assigned to Schofield Barracks, Hawaii. He graduated from the company officer's course at the infantry school in 1933, after which he returned to the Third Infantry Regiment. Upon receiving a promotion to first lieutenant in July 1933, he commanded one of the original companies of the Civilian Conservation Corps. He became an instructor at West Point in 1934 and in 1939 was assigned to the 38th Infantry. Zwicker returned to the Infantry School in 1941 as an instructor. He then completed command and general staff school at Fort Leavenworth. During World War II, he served in Normandy (where he participated in the assault landings on Omaha Beach on D-day), northern France, the Ardennes, the Rhineland, and Central Europe. Serving first as a regimental commander of the Second Infantry Division and then as then as its chief of staff, he won a Silver Star, the Legion of Merit, a Bronze Star, and decorations from Britain and France. After the war, he attended the Naval War College in 1945 and the National War College from 1945 to 1946. He served with the operation and training division of the Army General Staff from 1947 to 1949 and was transferred to the European Command Headquarters in 1949. For two years, he commanded the 18th Infantry Regiment of the First Infantry Division. Zwicker returned to the United States as an instructor at the National War College in 1952 and in 1953 served briefly as assistant division commander of the Fifth Infantry Division. Promoted to brigadier general in March 1953, he became the commanding officer at Camp Kilmer, New Jersey, in July 1953.

In that capacity, Zwicker became a key figure in the confrontation between Senator JOSEPH R. McCARTHY (R-Wis.) and the army in 1954. Beginning in the fall of 1953, the Senate Government Operations Committee's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, chaired by McCarthy, intensified its investigations of alleged subversive activity in the army. It demanded access to the army's loyalty and security files and summoned officers for questioning. On January 30, 1954, the panel questioned Major IRVING PERESS, an army dentist at Camp Kilmer. Peress had refused to answer questions on a form asking about membership in subversive organizations. In addition, he refused to respond to a subsequent interrogatory from army intelligence. After an investigation, army intelligence concluded that sufficient evidence existed to warrant the dentist's discharge as a security risk. Through a series of bureaucratic blunders, the army did not act immediately on the recommendation to discharge Peress. In September 1953, while the army's investigation was in progress, Peress requested a promotion to the rank of major, for which he automatically qualified by his age and previous experience in the army reserve. His request was approved. When Zwicker became aware of the matter in October, he wrote a letter to his superiors urging that Peress be relieved from duty immediately as a security risk. In November, the Pentagon decided to release the dentist at the earliest possible date. Outraged at Peress's promotion to major, Zwicker approached McCarthy and in December provided the senator's staff with information about the matter.

McCarthy, who had been investigating alleged communists in the army, subpoenaed Peress to appear before the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee. At a hearing on January 30, 1954, at which McCarthy was the only senator present, the dentist declined to answer all questions about his political activities. McCarthy, in turn, demanded the dentist's court-martial. In the meantime, in mid-January 1954, the army had ordered Peress's honorable discharge and had given him the usual 90 days within which to select a termination date. He chose March 31. After his appearance before McCarthy's committee, however, Peress met with Zwicker on February 1 and asked for his immediate separation from the army. The army announced his honorable discharge on February 2.

On February 18, McCarthy's subcommittee heard further testimony on the Peress matter. After several witnesses had testified in the morning, Zwicker appeared before the subcommittee that afternoon in a closed hearing. Stiff and at times unresponsive, the general infuriated McCarthy. McCarthy accused Zwicker of "double-talk," to which the general replied that he did not like "to have anyone impugn my honesty, which you just about did." McCarthy responded: "either your honesty or your intelligence; I can't help impugning one or the other." When McCarthy pressed Zwicker regarding Peress's discharge, the general found himself defending the very bureaucratic bungling that had infuriated him and that he had tried to correct. McCarthy questioned whether Zwicker had "the brains of a five-year-old child" and whether the highly decorated veteran of World War II was "fit to wear that uniform." McCarthy ordered the general to appear again before the committee the following Tuesday, February 26.

McCarthy's treatment of Zwicker brought the simmering hostility between the army and McCarthy to a boiling point and set off the chain of events that led to the Army-McCarthy hearings in the spring of 1954 and ultimately to the Senate's condemnation of McCarthy at the end of that year. Fuming at his treatment by McCarthy, Zwicker returned to Camp Kilmer, wrote a report of his encounter with the senator, and sent it to the Pentagon. The chief of staff, MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY, took the matter to the secretary of the army, ROBERT T. STEVENS. On Saturday, February 20, Stevens issued an order forbidding army officers to appear before McCarthy's subcommittee. He telephoned McCarthy to inform the senator of his intention, in response to which, McCarthy told Stevens to appear before the committee on Thursday. The next day, Stevens released a statement to the press indicating that he had ordered Zwicker not to appear for the second interrogation before the subcommittee because he was "unwilling to have so fine an officer . . . run the risk of further abuse."

In response to demands by both Republicans and Democrats, the unedited transcript of Zwicker's testimony was made public. The New York Times printed the entire transcript. When reporters contacted Zwicker, the general said that he supported McCarthy's efforts to rid the government of communists "100 percent" but that "there's a way to do it."

Under pressure from Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON and WILTON PERSONS who headed Eisenhower's congressional liaison office, Republicans on McCarthy's subcommittee (EVERETT DIRKSEN of Illinois, KARL MUNDT of South Dakota, and CHARLES POTTER of Michigan) attempted to avoid a head-on collision between McCarthy and the administration. They set up a lunch attended by Stevens, McCarthy, Mundt, and Dirksen on Wednesday, February 24. At the end of the lunch, perhaps 50 reporters and photographers, who had obviously been tipped off, awaited the group. Mundt read a "memorandum of understanding," which made it seem that Stevens had given in to virtually all of McCarthy's demands. Mundt's memorandum declared that Stevens had agreed to permit officers to appear before the subcommittee, to give the committee the names of all military personnel involved in Peress's promotion, and to make those involved in the decision available to the subcommittee. Zwicker's second appearance was postponed, and Stevens's appearance, scheduled for the following day, was canceled. During the meeting, Stevens had received a promise from the senators that army officers called to testify would be treated fairly. Mundt's memorandum, however, did not include that commitment. Faced with news reports that characterized the agreement as a "capitulation" to McCarthy and under pressure from the White House staff, Stevens attempted to work out a compromise with the Republicans on the subcommittee. When that failed, Stevens went to the White House to release a statement, prepared in consultation with Eisenhower's aides, in which he declared that he would not permit officers to be "browbeaten or humiliated" by a congressional committee and that he had received assurances from members of the subcommittee that they would not allow this to happen. When Stevens finished, Eisenhower's press secretary, JAMES HAGERTY, told reporters that the president had seen Stevens's statement and endorsed it "100 percent."

The incident involving Zwicker led to the final break between McCarthy and the administration. In a press conference on March 3, Eisenhower praised Zwicker and demanded that members of the executive branch be treated with respect and courtesy when they appeared before Congress. On March 11, the army released its "chronology," which accused McCarthy and his top aide, ROY COHN, of attempting to seek preferential treatment for G. DAVID SCHINE, a friend of Cohn's and a consultant to McCarthy's committee. This led to the Army-McCarthy hearings. In July, Senator RALPH FLANDERS (R-Vt.) introduced a motion to censure McCarthy. The speech with which Flanders introduced the motion referred to three particulars, one of which charged that McCarthy had exhibited "habitual contempt for people" and offered his questioning of Zwicker as an example. The leadership of the Senate referred the resolution to a select bipartisan committee, which in September recommended that McCarthy be censured on two counts—contempt of the Senate and his "inexcusable" and "reprehensible" treatment of Zwicker. During the Senate debate on the censure resolution, however, the charge that McCarthy had abused Zwicker was dropped without a vote on December 2 and replaced by a charge that McCarthy had abused the select committee. Some feared that censuring McCarthy for his conduct as a committee chair would set an unfortunate precedent and limit the ability of committee chairs in examining witnesses. Others thought that Zwicker had provoked McCarthy. The Senate passed the resolution to censure McCarthy later the same day.

Soon after his confrontation with McCarthy, Zwicker was transferred to Japan, where he became commanding general of the Southwestern Command, Armed Forces Far East. After the Democrats won control of Congress in the elections of 1954, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations reopened its investigation into the Peress matter. Called to testify once again, Zwicker's testimony generated new controversy. Both the subcommittee's chair, Senator JOHN McCLELLAN (D-Ark.) and its minority counsel, ROBERT F. KENNEDY, believed that Zwicker had lied on the stand. In April 1955, McClellan referred the matter to Attorney General HERBERT BROWNELL and asked whether the Justice Department should bring action for perjury. The Justice Department sat on the matter for more than a year and decided to bring no action.

In 1957, during hearings conducted by the Senate Armed Services Committee on his nomination to the rank of major general, Zwicker discussed his testimony in 1954. He admitted that he may have been uncooperative in order to avoid accidentally revealing classified information. The committee ignored McCarthy's demand that Zwicker be indicted for perjury, and the Senate approved the nomination on April 1, 1957, with only McCarthy and Senator George W. Malone (R-Nev.) dissenting. Zwicker was assigned to command the 24th Infantry Division in Korea. In May 1958, he assumed command of the XX Army Corps (Reserve).

Zwicker retired from the army in 1960 and worked as a military analyst with the Research Analysis Corporation in McLean, Virginia. He lived in Falls Church, Virginia, and then McLean.

In an interview with Newsweek magazine in 1969, Zwicker maintained that McCarthy's accusations had deleterious effects on his life, health, and career in the army. He claimed that his promotion to major general, which had been originally recommended in 1954, was delayed while the FBI investigated McCarthy's charges. Ironically, the general revealed that, before appearing before McCarthy's subcommittee, "I was not unsympathetic with the Senator." Zwicker died at Fort Belvoir, Virginia, in August 1991.

—MSM

APPENDIXES

CHRONOLOGY

1951

October 16—Sen. Robert A. Taft announces his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination.

1952

January 6—Sen. Henry Cabot Lodge enters Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower's name in the New Hampshire Republican presidential primary.

January 23—Sen. Estes Kefauver announces his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination.

March 11—Eisenhower wins the New Hampshire Republican presidential primary with 50.4 percent of the vote. Taft garners 38.9 percent. In the Democratic primary, Kefauver defeats Pres. Harry S. Truman. Kefauver gets 55.4 percent of the vote to Truman's 44.5 percent.

March 18—In the Minnesota primary, Eisenhower polls 108,692 write-in votes to 129,076 for favorite-son candidate Harold Stassen. The result convinces Eisenhower to seek the Republican presidential nomination.

March 29—President Truman announces he will not seek reelection.

April 8—Truman seizes steel mills to avoid a strike.

April 22—In the Pennsylvania primary, Eisenhower receives over 847,420 votes, a figure larger than the combined totals of his Democratic and Republican opponents.

May 27—The Texas State GOP Convention selects rival Taft and Eisenhower delegations to the Republican National Convention despite wide majorities won by Eisenhower delegates in local party conventions.

June 2—Eisenhower retires from the army to campaign for the Republican presidential nomination. In Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer, the Supreme Court declares Truman's seizure of the steel mills unconstitutional.

June 27—Congress passes the Immigration and Nationality (McCarran-Walter) Act over Truman's veto.

July 2—At the Republican Governors Convention in Houston, Tex., 23 governors, including three Taft supporters, sign a manifesto urging that contested delegates be kept from voting on the seating of others at the national convention. The move favors Eisenhower forces.

July 7—The Republican National Convention opens in Chicago. It is the first presidential nominating convention to be televised nationally.

July 9—In a key test of disputed delegates, the Republican National Convention votes to seat a Georgia delegation favoring Eisenhower. Eisenhower delegates from six other states, Texas, Florida, Mississippi, Kansas and Missouri are subsequently seated.

July 11—Eisenhower defeats Taft for the Republican presidential nomination on the first ballot. Sen. Richard M. Nixon is chosen as the vice presidential candidate.

July 19—The Democratic National Committee approves a loyalty oath requiring each delegation to “exert every honorable means” to get the party’s nominees on its state ballot.

July 21—The Democratic National Convention opens in Chicago.

July 24–25—The Louisiana, South Carolina, and Virginia delegations to the Democratic National Convention win full voting rights despite their refusal to take the loyalty pledge.

July 25—Puerto Rico becomes a U.S. commonwealth.

July 26—Gov. Adlai E. Stevenson wins the Democratic presidential nomination on the third ballot. He selects Sen. John J. Sparkman as the vice presidential candidate.

August 22—At a news conference in Denver, Eisenhower makes an indirect reference to Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy when he says that he would not “give a blanket endorsement to any man who does anything that I believe to be un-American in its methods and procedures” but that he would back Republican candidates for Congress.

August 25—Eisenhower tells the American Legion Convention in New York that the United States should help the people of communist countries “liberate” themselves. Eisenhower also defends Gen. George C. Marshall and says he had “no patience” with anyone who criticized Marshall.

September 23—In a nationally televised address, later known as the “Checkers Speech,” Nixon defends himself against charges that he had misused money from a secret political fund.

October 3—Eisenhower delivers a campaign address in Milwaukee. Under pressure from local Republican leaders, he deletes a portion praising Gen. George C. Marshall, an old friend under attack by McCarthy.

October 24—Eisenhower announces that, if elected, he will go to Korea.

November 1—The United States explodes the world’s first hydrogen (fusion) bomb.

November 4—Eisenhower defeats Stevenson in the presidential election by over 6 million votes and receives 442 of 531 electoral votes. The Republicans gain control of both houses of Congress by very narrow margins: 221 to 211 in the House and 48 to 47 in the Senate. There is one independent in each house.

December 2–5—Fulfilling his campaign pledge, Eisenhower visits Korea.

1953

January 20—Eisenhower is inaugurated 34th president of the United States.

February 2—In his State of the Union address, Eisenhower announces that there is no “sense or logic” in the United States assuming “defensive responsibilities on behalf of Chinese Communists.” He will therefore, withdraw the Seventh Fleet from the Formosa Strait between Taiwan and mainland China. He also announces that he will let wage and price controls end by April 30.

February 4—McCarthy begins a loyalty-security probe of the State Department.

February 5—Eisenhower names Charles E. Bohlen as ambassador to the USSR, touching off a battle with the right wing of the Republican Party. Conservatives accused Bohlen of being part of the “Truman-Acheson policy of appeasement” toward the USSR.

February 11—Eisenhower declines to grant executive clemency to Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, under death sentences for transmitting atomic secrets to the USSR.

February 20—Dulles submits the Captive Peoples Resolution to Congress. It rejects “any interpretations or applications” of secret World War II agreements “which have been perverted to bring about the subjugation of free peoples” and deplores Soviet “totalitarian imperialism” in Eastern Europe. The resolution disappoints the Republican Right, because it fails to repudiate the Yalta Accords.

February 28—The Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, chaired by McCarthy, opens televised hearings on subversion in the Voice of America.

March 4—Dulles announces his acceptance of the resignation of State Department China expert John Carter Vincent, under attack by McCarthy.

March 5—Marshal Joseph Stalin dies.

March 9—Rep. Harold Velde suggests investigation of subversive influences among the clergy.

March 10—Congress shelves the Captive Peoples Resolution following the announcement of Stalin’s death.

March 27—Despite strong opposition, the Senate confirms Charles Bohlen as ambassador to the Soviet Union.

March 30—Congress authorizes a new, cabinet-level Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

April 2—Japan and the United States sign a 10-year treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation.

April 4–21—McCarthy aides Roy Cohn and G. David Schine tour Europe in search of subversive literature in U.S. Information Agency libraries.

April 16—Eisenhower addresses the American Society of Newspaper Editors. His speech, “A Chance for Peace” warn of the dangers of the arms race.

April 20—The Subversive Activities Control Board determines that the U.S. Communist Party is a subversive political organization controlled by the Soviet Union and orders it to register as such with the attorney general.

April 27—Eisenhower issues Executive Order 10450, instituting a loyalty-security program for the executive branch. It replaces the loyalty program instituted by Truman.

May 19—In a nationwide address, Eisenhower calls for a six-month extension of the excess profits tax beyond June 30, 1953.

May 22—Eisenhower signs the Tidelands Oil bill, giving coastal states title to offshore oil within three miles of shore (10.5 miles for Texas and Florida).

June 14—In a speech at Dartmouth College, Eisenhower urges the undergraduates not to “join the book burners,” a reference to the Cohn and Schine European trip.

June 17—Workers in East Germany riot to protest factory speedups and food shortages. Russian tanks are brought in to quell the uprising.

June 19—The Rosenbergs are executed for giving atomic secrets to the USSR.

July 2—The Senate Foreign Relations Committee approves a resolution praising the East Germans’ “patriotic defiance of Communist tyranny” and calling for German unification on the basis of free elections.

July 9—Eisenhower denounces an article by McCarthy aide J. B. Matthews charging Protestant clergymen with forming “the largest single group supporting the communist apparatus.”

July 10—The Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee’s three Democratic members, Sens. Henry Jackson, John McClellan, and Stuart Symington, resign in protest after the panel votes to give McCarthy sole power to hire and fire staff members.

July 27—The United States and North Korea sign an armistice at Panmunjom. The treaty calls for a demilitarized zone along the 38th parallel and the voluntary repatriation of prisoners of war.

July 31—Taft dies of cancer.

August 7—Eisenhower signs the refugee relief bill, which permits 214,000 over-quota refugees to enter the United States during the next three years.

August 12—The USSR explode its first hydrogen bomb.

August 19—The House Un-American Activities Committee releases its report on organized communism in the United States. The report recommends that membership in the Communist Party be considered as prima facie evidence of violation of the Smith Act and urges legislation to prohibit misuse of the Bill of Rights to withhold information from congressional committees.

August 19–22—A coup, engineered by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), overthrows the leftist government of Premier Mohammad Mossadegh in Iran and installs a pro-Western regime loyal to Shah Pahlevi.

August 31—McCarthy begins an investigation of possible communist infiltration in the armed forces.

September 10—Secretary of Labor Martin P. Durkin resigns because of the administration's failure to revise the Taft-Hartley Act.

September 22—The American Federation of Labor expels the International Longshoremen's Association for failing to rid itself of corruption.

October 5—Earl Warren is sworn in as chief justice of the United States.

October 23—The White House announces that in the first four months of its new security program, 1,456 persons have been dropped from the federal payroll. (863 were dismissed, and 593 resigned when notified of "unfavorable" reports about them.)

November 6—Attorney General Herbert Brownell, Jr., charges that Truman promoted Harry Dexter White to U.S. executive director of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in 1946, despite warnings from the FBI that White was a "Russian spy."

November 16—In a nationwide radio-TV broadcast Truman defends his actions and charges that the Eisenhower administration is "embracing McCarthyism for political advantage."

December 3—Eisenhower orders Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer's security clearance suspended, pending a review.

December 4–7—President Eisenhower, British prime minister Winston Churchill, and French premier Joseph Laniel confer in Bermuda on the exchange of atomic information.

December 8—Eisenhower delivers his "Atoms for Peace" speech at the UN, proposing the creation of an international atomic energy agency to pool resources for the peaceful development of nuclear energy.

1954

January 11—Eisenhower sends Congress a farm program recommending flexible price supports.

January 12—Secretary of State John Foster Dulles makes a speech in which he announces that the United States will in the future meet aggression with "a great capacity to retaliate instantly by means and places of our own choosing."

January 21—The navy launches the first nuclear powered submarine the S.S. Nautilus.

January 26—Sens. Jackson, McClellan, and Symington resume membership in the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee after McCarthy capitulates to their demands for a greater role in subcommittee investigations.

January 26—The Senate approves the U.S.-South Korean Mutual Defense Treaty.

February 1—McCarthy demands the court-martial of army dentist Irving Peress for his early affiliation with left-wing organizations.

February 8—In Irvine v. California, the Supreme Court affirms a state court conviction that was based on evidence from illegal electronic surveillance.

February 10—Eisenhower tells newsmen that he can conceive of no greater tragedy than for the United States to become involved in all-out war in Indochina.

February 18—The Berlin Conference of foreign ministers fails to reach an agreement on the reunification of Germany.

February 18—During an investigation of alleged subversion in the army, McCarthy accuses the army of “coddling Communists” and disparages Gen. Ralph W. Zwicker as “not fit to wear that uniform” and lacking “the brains of a five-year-old child.”

February 26—By a vote of 50-42, the Senate defeats the Bricker amendment, which would have limited the president’s treaty-making powers.

March 1—Firing from the House visitors’ gallery, three Puerto Rican nationalists wound five members of Congress.

March 1—The United States sets off its second hydrogen bomb at Bikini Atoll in the Pacific Ocean. The force of the explosion inadvertently exposes 379 persons to radiation, including 23 Japanese fishermen seriously burned on a ship 70-90 miles from the blast center.

March 8—The United States and Japan sign a mutual defense treaty, providing for the gradual rearmament of Japan.

March 9—On See It Now, Edward R. Murrow accuses McCarthy of habitually using half-truths and of repeatedly stepping over the “line between investigating and persecuting.”

March 11—The army releases a report listing the dates on which the status of Private G. David Schine was discussed by army officials and McCarthy or members of his subcommittee staff. The next day, McCarthy accuses the army of “blackmail” and “trying to use Schine as a hostage to pressure us to stop our hearings on the Army.”

March 13—The Organization of American States adopts a U.S.-sponsored resolution calling for joint action against any Latin American state falling under communist control.

March 20—French chief of staff Gen. Paul Henry Ely flies to Washington seeking direct U.S. military aid for the beleaguered French garrison at Dien Bien Phu in northern Vietnam.

March 29—Dulles calls for united action in Indochina.

March 31—Eisenhower signs a bill providing for an estimated $999 million annual reduction in federal excise taxes.

April 14—The army files formal charges with the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee, accusing McCarthy and Cohn of trying to obtain preferential treatment for Schine “by improper means.”

April 20—McCarthy denounces army charges against him and charges Assistant Secretary of Defense Struve Hensel with malfeasance and attempting to try to interfere with his subcommittee’s investigation of the army.

April 22–June 17—The Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee holds public hearings into conflicting charges made by the army and McCarthy.

April 26—The Geneva Conference on Korea and Indochina opens with foreign ministers of 19 nations, including Communist China, present.

May 4—Dulles withdraws from the Geneva Conference after his plan for a South Asian defense alliance fails.

May 7—The French garrison at Dien Bien Phu surrenders after a 55-day siege.

May 13—Eisenhower signs a bill authorizing the joint U.S.-Canadian construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

May 17—In Brown v. Board of Education, the Supreme Court unanimously rules that segregated public schools are “inherently unequal” and therefore unconstitutional.

May 24—In Galvan v. Press, the Supreme Court upholds a provision of the Internal Security Act of 1950 making past membership in the Communist Party grounds for deportation of an alien.

June 9—Army counsel Joseph Welch reproaches McCarthy for “cruelty and recklessness” in trying to “assassinate” the reputation of Frederick Fisher, a member of Welch’s Boston law firm.

June 11—Sen. Ralph Flanders introduces a resolution to remove McCarthy from his committee chairmanships until he answers charges stemming from his action in the 1952 election.

June 14—Eisenhower signs legislation to add the words “under God” to the Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag.

June 18–25—A CIA-supported coup takes place in Guatemala, ousting the leftist government of Jacobo Arbenz.

June 29—In a controversial 4-1 decision, the Atomic Energy Commission refuses to reinstate Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer’s security clearance for access to classified information on nuclear technology. The verdict is based on “proof of fundamental defects in his character” and his associations with communists.

July 10—Eisenhower signs Public Law 480, which provides for foreign disposal of surplus farm commodities.

July 21—The Geneva Conference on Indochina ends with the signing of the Geneva Accords, partitioning Vietnam at the 17th parallel and providing for unified elections within two years.

July 22—Eisenhower signs the Chemical Amendments of 1954 (Miller Act), designed to protect consumers from chemical residues left in food products by setting “poison residue tolerances.”

July 30—Flanders introduces a resolution charging McCarthy with “personal contempt” of the Senate for refusing to answer questions about finances and for the “frivolous and irresponsible” conduct of his aides.

August 2—Eisenhower signs the Housing Act of 1954, which provides funds for 35,000 houses to serve families displaced by various urban redevelopment programs.

August 2—The Senate votes to refer the Flanders resolution to a select bipartisan committee of “neutral” senators headed by Sen. Arthur V. Watkins.

August 4—Eisenhower signs the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act of 1954, authorizing federal aid in construction of small watershed projects to prevent floods and conserve soil.

August 5—Eisenhower signs the Reed Act, which establishes a $200 million loan fund from which states with high unemployment could draw to pay unemployment insurance.

August 10—Eisenhower signs the Securities Information bill, which permits greater distribution of information on new investment security issues.

August 16—Eisenhower signs the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, which cuts personal taxes by up to $1.36 billion and moves the deadline for personal income tax returns from March 15 to April 15.

August 20—Eisenhower signs the Immunity Act of 1954, which allows congressional committees to grant immunity from prosecution to witnesses giving self-incriminatory testimony in security cases.

Critics charge the measure forces witnesses to testify or go to jail.

August 23—Eisenhower vetoes a bill providing a 5 percent increase in the salaries of federal employees.

August 24—Eisenhower signs the communist control bill of 1954. Sponsored by liberal Democrats, the measure outlaws the Communist Party and makes its members subject to the provisions and penalties of the Internal Security Act of 1950.

August 28—Eisenhower signs the 1954 agricultural bill, which institutes a flexible scale of farm support prices to stem overproduction of surplus crops.

August 30—Eisenhower signs the 1954 atomic energy bill, which permits private industry to use nuclear fuels and build and operate nuclear power plants.

August 31–September 13—The Watkins Committee holds hearings on the censure of McCarthy.

September 1—The Social Security Act is amended to increase benefits and add new category of beneficiaries.

September 3—Communist China begins heavy shelling of the Pescadores claimed by Nationalist China.

September 3—Eisenhower signs the espionage and sabotage bill of 1954, which authorizes the death penalty for peacetime espionage and sabotage.

September 8—Australia, Great Britain, France, New Zealand, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand, and the United States form the Southeast Asian Treaty Organization (SEATO), pledging joint action in defense of member nations. Nationalist China is excluded from the alliance.

September 27—The Watkins Committee unanimously recommends the censure of McCarthy for his conduct toward the Senate Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections during the 82nd Congress and for his treatment of Gen. Zwicker during the Army-McCarthy hearings.

November 2—In mid-term elections, the Democrats gain control of Congress by 29 votes in the House and one in the Senate. They also oust Republicans from eight state governorships.

November 5—Dulles announces the dismissal of career diplomat John Paton Davies, Jr., who had been attacked by McCarthy.

November 11—The Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) signs the Dixon-Yates contract permitting a private utility combine to build a generating plant in the Tennessee Valley to feed power into the Tennessee Valley Authority system and supply the Atomic Energy Commission's installations in the area.

November 23—The Dow Jones Industrial average regains its 1929 peak of 381.

December 2—The United States and Nationalist China sign a mutual defense treaty, pledging American retaliation if Communist China attacks Taiwan.

December 2—The Senate votes, 67-22, to condemn McCarthy for obstructing the elections subcommittee in 1952, abusing Sen. Watkins and the Select Committee to Study Censure, and insulting the Senate during the censure proceedings.

December 11—Eisenhower creates a Council of Foreign Economic Policy, headed by Joseph M. Dodge, to coordinate foreign aid activities and develop foreign economic policies.

December 28—Dulles indicates at a press conference that aggression in western Europe would be met with tactical atomic weapons.

1955

January 1—U.S. Foreign Operations Administration begins to supply direct financial aid to South Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos.

January 10—Eisenhower asks Congress for new powers to reduce foreign trade barriers, including a three year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

January 13—Eisenhower asks Congress to inaugurate a military reserve plan, to extend the Selective Service System, and to raise military pay, allowances, and benefits.

January 28—Congress passes the Formosa Resolution, giving Eisenhower discretionary powers to use U.S. forces in the defense of Taiwan and the Pescadores. It is the first time Congress has granted a president such war-making powers in peacetime.

February 8—Eisenhower proposes a three-year $7 billion federal-state-local school construction program to Congress.

February 18—Sen. Lister Hill accuses Adolphe Wenzell, a Bureau of the Budget consultant, of conflict of interest in connection with the Dixon-Yates contract. Hill also denounces Budget director Rowland Hughes for concealing Wenzell's actions.

February 23—Eisenhower states that the United States would stop testing atomic weapons only under a workable disarmament agreement with effective international inspection.

March 23—By voice vote, the House adopts a minimum standard of conduct for House Committee investigations. It bars "one-man hearings" and assures witnesses the right to counsel and the opportunity to rebut testimony tending to "defame, degrade or incriminate" them.

March 31—Eisenhower signs a bill providing for an increase of $745 million annually in military pay and allowances.

April 1—The Senate ratifies the treaty ending the occupation of West Germany.

April 12—Scientists announce that the Salk vaccine is "safe, effective and potent" in preventing polio.

April 20—During testimony before a Senate Judiciary subcommittee, dismissed State Department special adviser on refugees Edward J. Corsi charges that the management of the Refugee Relief Act of 1953 is "a national scandal" and that the emphasis on security investigation of refugees had made their admission incidental.

April 21—The United States ends its occupation of Germany.

May 9—West Germany is admitted to full membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

May 15—The United States, Great Britain, France, and the USSR sign a peace treaty with Austria, granting it full independence in return for political neutrality.

May 26—The Senate Banking and Currency Committee issues its report on the rise of stock market prices in 1954. The panel describes an "increase in unhealthy speculative developments," and it recommends tightening existing federal regulations and undertaking further study of abuses.

May 31—In Brown v. Board of Education, the Supreme Court hands down a ruling implementing its earlier school desegregation decision. It places the burden on local authorities to begin desegregation immediately and proceed with "all deliberate speed."

June 21—The reciprocal trade program is extended for three years.

June 30—In his second speech to the UN, Eisenhower calls for a "new kind of peace," in which the atom will be used for productive purposes.

June 30—A 12-hour steel strike of 600,000 workers is settled with an hourly wage increase averaging 15¢. Steel prices increase an average of $7.50 a ton.

June 30—The Second Hoover Commission submits its final report, recommending that government not compete with the private sector.

June 30—Eisenhower signs a bill authorizing an increase of $6 billion in the public debt.

July 1—Eisenhower signs a bill requiring the inscription “In God We Trust” on all currency.

July 11—Following an announcement that the city of Memphis has voted to build its own electrical generating plant, Eisenhower cancels the Dixon-Yates contract.

July 18–23—President Dwight D. Eisenhower, Premier Nikolai Bulganin, Prime Minister Winston Churchill, and Premier Edgar Faure hold a summit conference at Geneva. The major topic is German unification.

July 21—Eisenhower submits his “Open Skies” proposal at the Geneva summit conference. He suggests that the USSR and the United States exchange military blueprints and allow mutual air reconnaissance over their military installations.

August 1—Air Force secretary Harold E. Talbott resigns following a Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee probe of his activities in promoting Defense Department contracts with the Paul Muligan Co., of which he is part owner.

August 4—Rejecting proposals for federal construction of a single high dam at Hell’s Canyon on the Snake River, the Federal Power Commission grants the private Idaho Power Co. a 50-year license to build and operate three low hydroelectric dams in the same area.

August 8—The first conference on the peaceful uses of atomic energy opens in Geneva. Seventy-three nations are represented.

August 9—Eisenhower signs a bill creating a 12-member bipartisan commission to review the government’s loyalty-security program.

August 12—Eisenhower signs the poliomyelitis vaccination bill, which provides free vaccines for children under 20 and pregnant women, regardless of ability to pay.

August 28—Emmett Till, a 15-year-old African American, is kidnapped after allegedly propositioning a white woman. Three days later, his body is recovered from the Tallahatchie River. An all-white jury later acquits the two white men accused of the murder.

September 24—Eisenhower suffers a “moderately severe” heart attack.

September 30—Film actor James Dean, symbol of alienated youth, dies in a car crash.

October 27—The foreign ministers of the United States, Great Britain, France, and the USSR meet in Geneva to discuss disarmament, German unification and East-West relations.

November 15—Adlai Stevenson announces his candidacy for the Democratic nomination for president in 1956.

November 25—The Interstate Commerce Commission bans racial segregation on interstate trains and buses.

December 1—Rosa Parks is arrested for refusing to give up her bus seat to a white man in Montgomery, Alabama.

December 5—Under the leadership of Martin Luther King, Jr., African Americans in Montgomery, Alabama, begin a 54-week boycott of city buses.

December 5—The American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations merge. George Meany becomes president of the new organization.

December 16—Kefauver announces his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination.

1956

January 5—In his State of the Union address, Eisenhower recommends the creation of a bipartisan commission to investigate denial of voting rights.

January 13—Eisenhower names a panel of eight prominent citizens, headed by James Killian, to monitor the activities of the CIA.

January 16—In an interview with Life magazine, Dulles defends his “brinkmanship” policies, saying that the United States has gone “to the verge of war” to maintain peace. He states that “the ability to get to the verge without getting into the war is the necessary art.” “We walked to the brink, and we looked it in the face.”

January 24—At a conference in Richmond, Virginia, four southern governors endorse the doctrine of interposition. They pledge the use of state power to prevent desegregation by interposing the “sovereignty of the state between local school board officials and federal courts.”

February 3—Autherine Lucy attempts to integrate formerly all-white University of Alabama. She is suspended four days later because her presence “threatens public order.”

February 6—General Services Administrator Edward Mansure resigns in the midst of a congressional probe of political influence in granting government contracts.

February 17—Eisenhower vetoes a bill to free natural gas producers from direct federal rate control after Sen. Francis Case reveals that he received a $2,500 campaign contribution from persons favoring the measure.

February 25—Eisenhower declares he will seek reelection.

March 1—The national minimum wage is increased from 75¢ to $1 per hour.

March 12—One hundred and one southern senators and representatives issue a Declaration of Constitutional Principles, known as the Southern Manifesto, denouncing the Supreme Court’s desegregation decision and pledging to use all “lawful means” to resist it.

March 13—Eisenhower and Kefauver win the New Hampshire presidential primaries. Nixon gets a heavy vote of confidence with over 22,000 write-in votes for his renomination.

March 20—Kefauver scores an upset victory over Adlai E. Stevenson in the Minnesota presidential primary, winning by over 50,000 votes.

March 26—The Supreme Court, in Ullman v. U.S., upholds the Immunity Act.

April 2—In Pennsylvania v. Nelson, the Supreme Court rules that the Smith Act of 1940, the Internal Security Act of 1950, and the Communist Control Act of 1954 preempt state sedition laws.

April 9—In Slochower v. Board of Education, the Supreme Court rules that a state cannot discharge an employee for invoking the Fifth Amendment before a congressional committee.

April 11—The Senate rejects, 27-59, a proposal to establish a joint congressional committee to review the activities of the CIA and other intelligence operations.

April 11—Eisenhower signs a bill authorizing the Upper Colorado River Project, one of the largest water projects undertaken by the federal government.

April 18—The State Department announces agreement among 12 nations, including the USSR, to charter the International Atomic Energy Agency.

April 26—Nixon announces that Eisenhower is “delighted” to have him on the ticket as the vice presidential candidate.

May 10—The Senate cites several newsmen for contempt of Congress because of their refusal to answer questions on communism during an Internal Security Subcommittee probe into Communist penetration of the press.

May 28—Eisenhower signs the Agricultural Act of 1956. It establishes the “Soil Bank” program to compensate farmers for land left fallow in attempts to reduce surpluses. Alternatively, farmers are permitted to contract with the Agriculture Department to convert productive land to specified conservation projects.

May 29—Stevenson narrowly defeats Kefauver in Florida's Democratic presidential primary.

June 9—Eisenhower suffers an attack of ileitis and has emergency surgery.

June 9—New York's governor, Averell Harriman, announces his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination.

June 11—In Cole v. Young, the Supreme Court rules that government employees in "non-sensitive" positions cannot be dismissed as security risks under the Internal Security Act of 1950.

June 19—The House Special Government Activities Subcommittee files a report on its probe of the $43 million expansion of a government-owned nickel project at Nicaro, Cuba. The Democratic majority finds "political and private influence" in the contract award.

June 29—Eisenhower signs the highway bill of 1956, which provides for the largest road-building program in U.S. history. The measure authorizes $32.4 billion for the construction of over 40,000 miles of controlled access road.

July 5—The House defeats an administration-backed federal aid-to-education bill authorizing $1.6 billion for school construction. The defeat is, in part, attributed to a controversial Powell amendment, which prohibited aid to segregated schools.

July 19—At the close of fiscal year 1956, the U.S. budgetary surplus is $1.75 billion.

July 19—Dulles announces that the United States is withdrawing the offer of a $56 million grant to Egypt for construction of the proposed $1.3 billion Aswan High Dam.

July 23—The House passes a civil rights bill, sponsored by the administration, focusing on the protection of voting rights. Parliamentary maneuvers prevent the bill from reaching the Senate floor.

July 23—Liberals, led by Stassen, recommend nominating the governor of Massachusetts, Christian A. Herter, as the Republican vice presidential candidate instead of Nixon.

July 31—Kefauver withdraws from the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, and throws his support to Adlai Stevenson.

August 16—Stevenson is selected as the Democratic Party's presidential nominee on the first ballot at the Chicago convention. Stevenson unexpectedly throws the choice of a vice presidential running mate to the convention.

August 16—Liberals fail in an attempt to insert a strong civil rights plank in the Democratic platform.

August 17—Kefauver wins the Democratic vice presidential nomination in a dramatic two-ballot contest with Sen. John F. Kennedy.

August 22—The Republican National Convention nominates Eisenhower and Nixon for reelection.

August 23—The Federal Reserve Board raises the discount rate from 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ percent to 3 percent.

October 9—Commerce and Labor Departments report that factory workers' average weekly wage is at a record $81 for the month of September, with average factory pay exceeding $2 an hour for the first time. Nonfarm employment is at a record 52,100,000; unemployment is down to 1,988,000, the lowest figure since November 1953.

October 23—An armed revolt begins in Budapest, Hungary. As demanded by the rebels, the imprisoned Imre Nagy, a moderate communist, is brought back to head the government.

October 29—Pursuant to an agreement with Britain and France, Israel invades the Gaza Strip and the Sinai Peninsula, driving toward the Suez Canal.

October 30—A joint British-French ultimatum to Israel and Egypt demands immediate cessation of all fighting and withdrawal of military forces to positions at least 10 miles from the Suez Canal.

October 31—As Anglo-French forces attack Egyptian installations around the Suez Canal Zone, Eisenhower declares himself opposed to the use of force to settle international disputes.

November 2—The United States offers $20 million worth of food and medical supplies to Hungary.

November 4—Khrushchev orders Soviet armored units to crush the Hungarian “fascists.” Thirty thousand Hungarians and 7,000 Russians die in the ensuing conflict, which ends a year of unrest and dissent in the Soviet satellites.

November 4—In a letter to Bulganin, Eisenhower urges “in the name of humanity and in the cause of peace” that the USSR halt the bloodshed in Hungary.

November 5—The UN votes to organize a police force to restore peace in the Middle East.

November 6—Eisenhower wins reelection in a landslide, defeating Stevenson by over 9 million votes and capturing 457 out of 531 electoral votes.

November 8—Eisenhower announces that he has directed the Refugee Relief Administration to speed the processing of Hungarian refugees.

November 13—In Gayle v. Browder, the Supreme Court unanimously decides that the Montgomery, Alabama, city ordinance requiring racial segregation in buses is unconstitutional.

December 6—Eisenhower orders an air and sea lift to bring 21,500 Hungarian refugees to the United States by January 1, 1957 or shortly thereafter.

December 10—The Supreme Court rules, in Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America v. NLRB, that a union cannot be penalized because an officer files a false non-communist affidavit with the National Labor Relations Board.

December 31—Sociologist C. Wright Mills’s book The Power Elite is published.

1957

January 10–11—Martin Luther King, Jr., and 60 other black leaders from 10 southern states meet in Atlanta to form the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

January 21—Eisenhower is inaugurated for his second term. He becomes the first president limited by the Twenty-Second Amendment.

January 30—The Senate adopts a resolution setting up the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, chaired by John McClellan.

February 25—The Supreme Court, in Butler v. Michigan, overturns a Michigan law intended to protect children from obscenity. Justice Felix Frankfurter writes that, by banning all such material, the law denies adults access to material that is unsuitable only for children.

March 7—Congress approves the Eisenhower Doctrine, giving the president the authority to use military force in the Middle East to preserve “the independence and integrity” of Middle Eastern nations and prevent “overt armed aggression from . . . international Communism.”

March 24—Eisenhower and British prime minister Harold Macmillan issue a joint communiqué, after four-day conference at Bermuda, stating that the United States has agreed to supply guided missiles to Great Britain.

March 26–27—Teamster Union president Dave Beck testifies before the McClellan Committee on links between the Teamsters and organized crime.

April 11—The House of Representatives votes to authorize $250,000 for a Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight to probe federal regulatory agencies.

April 13—Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield halts Saturday post office operations because of Congress's failure to vote supplemental funds for the balance of the fiscal year.

April 16—Normal post office service resumes after Eisenhower signs a $41 million supplemental appropriations bill.

April 29—The army's first nuclear power reactor is dedicated at Fort Belvoir, Virginia.

May 2—Sen. Joseph McCarthy dies of acute liver failure.

May 4—In testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee, Health, Education and Welfare secretary Arthur S. Flemming proposes that the states set up federally subsidized Medicare systems to provide health insurance for persons over 65.

May 14—The United States resumes military aid to Yugoslavia, which had been halted because of Tito's reconciliation with the USSR.

June 3—In U.S. v. duPont, the Supreme Court holds that duPont's acquisition of 23 percent of General Motors Co. stock violates the Clayton Antitrust Act.

June 3—In Jencks v. U.S., the Supreme Court rules that the government must permit defendants access to reports made to the FBI by witnesses who testified against the defendant.

June 3–6—The United States formally joins the Military Committee of the Baghdad Pact at a meeting of the Council of Ministers in Karachi, Pakistan.

June 17—In Yates v. U.S., the Supreme Court rules that advocating an "abstract doctrine" of overthrowing the government is not punishable under the Smith Act.

June 17—In Watkins v. U.S., the Supreme Court overturns John Thomas Watkins's conviction for contempt of Congress. In his opinion for the majority, Warren holds that congressional investigations must be related to a legitimate legislative purpose.

June 17—In Sweezy v. New Hampshire, the Supreme Court reverses the contempt conviction of a professor who had refused to answer questions concerning the content of his lectures and his earlier activities in the Progressive Party.

June 24—The Supreme Court, in Roth v. U.S., rules that obscenity is not protected by the First Amendment and that state and federal obscenity laws are therefore constitutionally permissible.

July 11—Twenty of 22 leading nuclear scientists attending a conference at Pugwash, Nova Scotia, warn that misuse of nuclear energy could lead to the annihilation of humanity.

July 16—Secretary of Defense Charles Wilson orders the armed forces reduced by 100,000 men by the end of 1957.

July 20—The Southern Regional Council reports that in 11 southern states only 25 percent of the eligible black voters are registered, compared with 60 percent of the white voters.

August 12—Eisenhower signs a bill authorizing New York State to construct a $600 million power plant at Niagara Falls.

August 13—The Senate Finance Committee approves a proposal, sponsored by Sen. Robert S. Kerr, under which the federal and state governments would share in paying medical expenses for needy aged persons.

August 21—Eisenhower announces a U.S. offer to suspend nuclear weapons tests for two years in return for a Soviet agreement to halt production of fissionable material for weapons and to establish an inspection system.

August 25—The Special Radiation Subcommittee of the Joint Atomic Energy Committee reports that the effect of radioactive fallout is negligible but might increase if atomic tests increase.

August 28—Sen. Strom Thurmond stages a 24-hour 27-minute filibuster in an effort to prevent Senate passage of a civil rights bill.

August 29—The Senate passes a civil rights bill focusing on voting rights.

September 1—Rev. Dr. Billy Graham's New York City crusade ends with a rally in Times Square. An estimated 2 million people attended his nightly meetings and 56,767 persons responded with "decisions for Christ."

September 4—The governor of Arkansas, Orval E. Faubus, orders national guardsmen to bar nine black students from entering Little Rock's Central High School.

September 9—Eisenhower signs the Civil Rights Act of 1957, establishing a 6-person bipartisan commission with power to study all aspects of the matter of "equal protections of the laws under the Constitution." It also elevates the Civil Rights Section of the Justice Department to the status of a division and protects black voting rights. It is the first civil rights act in 82 years.

September 14—Faubus and Eisenhower confer at Newport, Rhode Island, on the question of the desegregation of Little Rock's Central High School.

September 20—Faubus removes national guardsmen from Little Rock's Central High School in compliance with a federal court injunction.

September 23—Federal officers secretly escort the nine black students into the Little Rock high school building. With an enraged white mob outside and harassment of the students inside the school, the students are removed after three hours.

September 24—Eisenhower federalizes the Arkansas national guard and sends federal troops to Little Rock to enforce a court order desegregating Central High.

October 4—The Soviet Union launches the first artificial earth satellite, Sputnik, into orbit.

October 19—The Atomic Energy Commission reports that, according to current estimates, harm to Americans from H-bomb testing appears to be within "tolerable limits."

November 3—The USSR launches Sputnik II.

November 7—In response to the Soviet space launchings, Eisenhower appoints James Killian, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, to manage a program of scientific improvement in the U.S. defense program.

November 7—The Gaither Report, leaked to the press, finds that because of increased Soviet spending, the USSR will achieve missile superiority over the United States by 1959. The group recommends increased military spending and the development of a fallout shelter program to meet the challenge.

November 13—In a nationwide address, Eisenhower proposes a considerable increase in defense appropriations to meet the threat of scientific advances by the USSR. The increase is less than Democrats are demanding.

November 25—Sen. Lyndon Johnson's Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee begins an inquiry into the history, status, and future of the nation's missile and satellite programs.

November 25—Eisenhower suffers a mild stroke.

December 6—America's first attempt to launch a space satellite ends in failure as the Vanguard rocket explodes on its launchpad before a national TV audience.

December 6—AFL-CIO votes overwhelmingly to expel the Teamsters Union for failing to purge itself of corrupt leadership.

December 15—Eisenhower rejects an appeal by Indian prime minister Jawaharlal Nehru for a halt in nuclear weapons tests.

December 16–19—At the Paris NATO meeting, the United States convinces Great Britain, Italy, and Turkey to station U.S. intermediate range missiles on their territory.

December 17—The United States successfully fires the Atlas, its first intercontinental ballistic missile.

December 18—The first commercial nuclear electric generating plant goes into operation at Shippingport, Pennsylvania.

1958

January 5—The Rockefeller Brothers Fund releases a report, prepared by Henry Kissinger, warning of massive Soviet success in improving technology and approaching military weapons parity with the United States. It advocates larger defense expenditures and a buildup of conventional forces.

January 7—Eisenhower requests that Congress appropriate an additional $1.4 billion to speed up and expand missile and air defenses.

January 9—Eisenhower's State of the Union message stresses the need for an accelerated defense effort and the reorganization of the Defense Department to curb interservice rivalry.

January 12—In a letter to Bulganin, Eisenhower urges that "outer space should be used only for peaceful purposes."

January 13—Eisenhower sends his fiscal 1959 budget to Congress. It provides for moderate increases in military spending and cutbacks in other areas.

January 13—Linus Pauling releases a petition signed by 9,235 scientists, including 36 Nobel Prize laureates, calling for an international nuclear test ban.

January 27—Eisenhower urges enactment of an "emergency" four-year program to improve education, especially in mathematics and the sciences.

January 30—Eisenhower requests that Congress extend the reciprocal trade program for five years.

January 31—An army rocket team, led by Dr. Wernher von Braun, sends the first U.S. satellite, Explorer I, into orbit.

February 10—Bernard Schwartz is dismissed as chief counsel of the Special House Committee on Legislative Oversight after he accuses committee members of trying to whitewash the investigation of federal regulatory agencies.

February 22—In a televised address, former president Harry S. Truman charges the Eisenhower administration with bringing on the recession.

February 27—Eisenhower signs a bill temporarily raising the national debt limit from $275 to $285 billion.

March 5—Eisenhower vetoes a bill granting funds for the development of a nuclear-powered airplane.

March 31—The USSR announces a unilateral suspension of nuclear tests.

April 1—Eisenhower signs the emergency housing bill to stimulate housing construction by calling for federal purchase of new home mortgages and providing additional money for federal loans on veterans' housing.

May 1—The coast guard arrests four pacifists attempting to sail their ship into the U.S. atomic testing site in the South Pacific. Protests against nuclear testing increase.

May 3—The United States proposes a treaty providing for demilitarization of the Antarctic.

May 8—Eisenhower orders the removal of federalized national guardsmen from Little Rock's Central High School.

May 15—Nixon returns from a stormy 18-day tour of eight South American republics. During the tour, he was often assailed by anti-American mobs protesting alleged U.S. support of dictators.

May 20—Eisenhower delivers a nationwide radio-TV address stating that an economic upturn is in the making and promising an early decision on proposed tax reductions.

May 26—Eisenhower asks Congress to extend excise and corporation income taxes for one year.

June 4—Eisenhower signs a bill extending unemployment benefits to counter the recession. Under the measure, the federal government grants financial aid to states to enable them to extend coverage for an average of eight weeks.

June 5—The House Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight begins hearings on conflict-of-interest charges involving Sherman Adams.

June 16—In Kent v. Dulles, the Supreme Court rules that the State Department lacked statutory authority to withhold passports to applicants because of their alleged communist beliefs or associations.

June 17—Adams denies before the House Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight that he had interceded with federal agencies on behalf of Bernard Goldfine. Adams acknowledges, however, that he might have “acted more prudently” in inquiring about matters involving Goldfine.

June 30—In NAACP v. Alabama, the Supreme Court holds that the NAACP has the right, by freedom of association, not to divulge its membership list.

July 1—Nuclear scientists representing the Western and Soviet blocs meet in Geneva to convene a “conference of experts to study the possibility of detecting violations of possible agreement on suspension of nuclear weapons tests.”

July 15—Eisenhower orders U.S. Marines to Lebanon in response to a request from President Camille Chamoun for assistance.

July 29—Eisenhower signs a bill creating the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) to direct U.S. nonmilitary space activities.

August 1—New postal rates go into effect: Regular mail rises from 3¢ to 4¢ an ounce, domestic airmail from 6¢ to 7¢.

August 6—Eisenhower signs a bill reorganizing the Defense Department. The measure strengthens the powers of the secretary of defense and creates a directorate of defense research and engineering.

August 12—U.S. Marines begin withdrawing from Lebanon.

August 22—Eisenhower offers to halt U.S. nuclear tests for one year. He also proposes that the nuclear powers meet in Geneva to seek an agreement on suspending nuclear tests and setting up an inspection system.

August 23—Eisenhower signs a bill creating the Federal Aviation Agency to supervise air transportation safety.

August 23—Communist China resumes shelling Quemoy and Matsu.

September 2—Eisenhower signs the National Defense Education Act, providing loans for college students and funds to encourage young people to enter teaching careers, particularly in higher education and the sciences.

September 2—Eisenhower signs the excise tax technical changes bill. The measure is the first important revision of the general excise tax provisions of the Internal Revenue Code since 1932.

September 9—Eisenhower orders federal agencies to cut their employment levels by 2 percent in fiscal 1959 to absorb a pay raise voted by Congress.

September 11—On national TV, Eisenhower reiterates the United States’s commitment to defend Quemoy and Matsu.

September 22—Accused of conflict of interest, Sherman Adams resigns as Eisenhower's chief aide.

September 25—A federal grand jury indicts former Federal Communications Commission member Richard A. Mack and Miami attorney Thurman Whiteside on charges of conspiracy to defraud the United States.

September 27—In a statewide referendum, Arkansas voters reject school desegregation.

September 28—In Cooper v. Aaron, the Supreme Court denies a request from the Little Rock, Arkansas, school board for additional time to implement its desegregation plan.

October 6—Beijing announces a one-week suspension of its bombardment of Quemoy.

October 7—NASA initiates Project Mercury, its first program for manned space flight.

November 4—In midterm elections, the Democrats increase their majorities in both houses of Congress. They control the Senate by 30 seats and the House by 128. Democrats also win 26 gubernatorial races, leaving only 14 Republican governors in office.

November 10—Khrushchev calls on the United States, Great Britain, and France to "give up the remnants of the occupation regime in Berlin" and announces his intention to sign a peace treaty with East Germany. This, he implies, would terminate Allied rights in West Berlin.

November 11–December 18—The United States and USSR hold an inconclusive conference on the Prevention of Surprise Attack in Geneva.

November 22—The United States reaffirms its intention to "maintain the integrity" of West Berlin.

November 27—Khrushchev announced a six-month deadline for a settlement on Berlin.

December—The John Birch Society is founded.

December 14—The United States, Britain, and France formally reject Soviet demands for their withdrawal from West Berlin.

December 20—John Kenneth Galbraith publishes The Affluent Society.

1959

January 1—Fidel Castro's guerrilla forces overthrow the Batista regime in Cuba.

January 2—The USSR achieves the world's first moon shot as Lunik I passes within a few thousand miles of the moon.

January 3—Eisenhower proclaims Alaska the 49th state.

January 5—The White House releases a statement by its science advisory committee questioning the reliability of techniques for detecting underground nuclear tests.

February 2—Eisenhower outlines to Congress a 10-year space program to launch a satellite or space probe vehicle each month starting in mid-1959.

February 5—In a special message to Congress, Eisenhower submits a seven-point civil rights program that includes support for school integration.

March 23—The peacetime draft is extended until July 1, 1963.

March 30—In Abbate v. U.S. and Bartkus v. Illinois, the Supreme Court rules that a person may be tried for the same offense in federal and state courts without infringing on the freedom from double jeopardy.

April 4—In an address at Gettysburg College, Eisenhower makes his first commitment to maintain South Vietnam as a separate national state.

April 9—NASA selects seven astronauts for Project Mercury.

April 13—Eisenhower proposes a ban on atmospheric nuclear testing.

April 15—Suffering from terminal cancer, Dulles resigns as secretary of state.

April 15–28—Castro visits the United States.

April 18—Christian Herter is named secretary of state.

April 25—The St. Lawrence Seaway opens.

May 11—The foreign ministers of the United States, Great Britain, France, and the USSR meet in Geneva to begin talks on the problems of Berlin, German reunification, an all-German peace treaty, and European security.

May 24—Dulles dies of cancer.

May 27—Soviet ultimatum on Berlin expires without incident.

June 8—In Barenblatt v. U.S., the Supreme Court upholds the conviction for contempt of Congress of a witness who had refused to testify before HUAC about his beliefs or his membership in a communist organizations.

June 8—Eisenhower asks Congress to abolish the interest ceiling on U.S. savings and treasury bonds and to raise the public debt limit to $295 billion.

June 11—Postmaster General Arthur Summerfield bans a new unexpurgated edition of D. H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover from the mails.

June 19—The Senate refuses to confirm Lewis Strauss as secretary of commerce.

June 27—The United States denounces Cuba before the Organization of American States for contributing to Caribbean tensions and for its slanderous attacks upon the United States.

June 29—In Kingsley International Pictures v. Regents, the Supreme Court unanimously strikes down a ban by the Regents of the University of the State of New York on showing the film version of D. H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover. The Court leaves the general question of obscenity unclear.

June 30—The public debt limit is raised temporarily to $295 billion. The permanent cap is raised to $285 billion.

July 7–September 10—The House Armed Services Committee holds hearings on the employment of retired military officers by industry.

July 15—Despite Eisenhower's call for further negotiations, 500,000 steelworkers go on strike against the 28 companies that normally produce 85 percent to 90 percent of America's steel.

July 24—Nixon and Khrushchev engage in a political debate at a preview of the U.S. exhibition in Moscow. The discussion, held in the kitchen of a so-called typical American home, becomes known as the "kitchen debate."

August 1—In a radio-TV address from Moscow, Nixon tells the Soviet people that they will continue to live in an era of fear, suspicion, and tension if Khrushchev tries to promote the communization of countries outside the USSR.

August 12—Four Little Rock public high schools, closed since 1958 to avoid integration, reopen.

August 21—Hawaii is officially proclaimed the 50th state.

August 26—Eisenhower vetoes an omnibus public works bill.

August 31—The Joint Atomic Energy Committee's Special Subcommittee on Radiation issues a report concluding that further nuclear tests could be hazardous and urging the establishment of a national civil defense system.

September 8—The Civil Rights Commission issues its first report on voting rights. It finds that only 25 percent of eligible black voters are registered in 10 southern states and outlines a dozen specific legislative measures to assure African Americans their full voting rights.

September 10—Congress overrides Eisenhower's veto of the omnibus public works bill.

September 14—Eisenhower signs a bill exempting TV and radio news from having to provide equal time to all competing political candidates in cases where one has appeared in a newscast or interview.

September 14—Eisenhower signs the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act (Landrum-Griffin Act) designed to crack down on corruption in unions. It also includes provisions protecting members from unfair actions by their unions and revises the ban on secondary boycotts.

September 15—Soviet premier Khrushchev arrives in the United States on a goodwill visit.

September 15–27—Agreements made during congenial talks between Khrushchev and Eisenhower at Camp David, Maryland, prepare the way for a summit meeting the following year.

October 1—Federal taxes on gasoline are increased by 1¢ per gallon to finance the national highway program.

October 12—The United States places an embargo on all exports to Cuba, except medical supplies and food.

October 19—The U.S. Development Loan Fund releases a major policy statement announcing that future loans to underdeveloped countries must be spent on U.S. goods.

October 21—District Judge Herbert Sorg signs an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction ordering the United Steelworkers to halt their 99-day strike.

October 26—Eisenhower announces his firm intention to defend the U.S. naval base at Guantánamo, Cuba.

October 31—Eisenhower's announced moratorium on nuclear testing expires, but Eisenhower asks for no new tests.

November 3—Panamanian nationalists riot over U.S. domination of the Panama Canal Zone.

November 6—The Senate Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight concludes hearings on rigged TV quiz shows. No indictments are handed down, although several contestants, including Charles Van Doren, testified that they were coached on answers and told when to lose.

November 7—The Supreme Court upholds the 80-day injunction, issued under the Taft-Hartley Act, halting the 116-day steel strike.

December 1—The United States, USSR, and 10 other nations sign the Antarctic Treaty, establishing a nuclear-free zone around the Antarctic ice mass and setting up inspection and enforcement procedures.

December 3—Eisenhower embarks on an 11-nation goodwill tour of Europe, Asia, and North Africa.

December 30—The navy commissions the S.S. George Washington, the first nuclear-powered submarine designed to fire Polaris missiles.

December 30—Sen. Hubert Humphrey begins his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1960.

1960

January 2—Kennedy announces his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination.

January 4—Negotiators for the United Steelworkers and 11 major steel producers reach an agreement on a new contract.

January 9—Nixon announces his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination.

January 19—The United States and Japan sign the Mutual Security Treaty, under which both countries pledge to maintain and develop their capacities to resist armed attacks.

January 26—Formally restating U.S. policy, Eisenhower reaffirms that there will be no reprisals against Cuba or intervention in its internal affairs.

February 1—Black students peacefully sit in at segregated lunch counters in Greensboro, North Carolina.

February 22–March 7—Eisenhower undertakes a four-nation goodwill tour of Latin America.

March 8—Kennedy wins the New Hampshire Democratic primary with a record 42,969 votes.

March 10—Federal Communications Commission chairman John Charles Doerfer resigns effective March 14, as a result of conflict-of-interest charges raised by the Special House Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight.

March 15—The 10-Nation Disarmament Conference begins in Geneva.

March 15—Eisenhower meets with West German chancellor Konrad Adenauer at the White House, assuring him of U.S. support in maintaining the freedom of West Berlin.

March 16—Eisenhower endorses Nixon as his successor.

March 17—Eisenhower formally approves a CIA plan to train Cuban emigrés for an invasion of the island.

March 31—The House Ways and Means Committee kills the Forand plan to provide hospital and nursing home care for the elderly, financed through Social Security.

April 1—The United States launches Tiros I, the first weather satellite, which will provide televised pictures of cloud cover over the earth's surface.

April 3—Daniel Bell's The End of Ideology: On the Exhaustion of Political Ideas in the Fifties is published.

April 8—The Senate, by a vote of 71-18, passes a civil rights bill that gives increased authority to the federal courts and Civil Rights Commission to prevent the disenfranchisement of black voters in the South.

April 22—In a television speech, Castro charges that the United States is plotting to overthrow his government.

April 26—Kennedy wins the Pennsylvania Democratic presidential primary.

May 1—Francis Gary Powers, on a U-2 reconnaissance flight for the CIA, is shot down over the USSR by a surface-to-air missile.

May 2—Caryl Chessman is executed for first-degree rape at San Quentin prison in California, despite worldwide protests.

May 3—A spokesman for NASA announces that a U-2 "research airplane," gathering weather data for NASA and the Air Force Weather Service, has apparently crashed in Turkey.

May 5—Khrushchev reveals that an American aircraft has been shot down over Soviet air space and angrily declares it an act of "aggressive provocation." Two days later, he produces Powers and the remnants of the U-2 plane.

May 6—Eisenhower signs the Civil Rights Act of 1960.

May 7—Eisenhower announces that the United States will resume underground nuclear testing as part of research on detecting such blasts.

May 7—The State Department admits that the U-2 plane was "probably" endeavouring to obtain intelligence information.

May 9—Secretary of State Christian Herter strongly defends the need for the aerial intelligence program to counter the USSR's ability to prepare secretly for a surprise attack.

May 9—The Federal Drug Administration approves Enovid, an oral contraceptive for women, for public sale.

May 10—Kennedy defeats Humphrey in the West Virginia Democratic primary by 77,305 votes. Humphrey withdraws from the presidential race.

May 11—In his first public comment on the U-2 incident, Eisenhower accepts personal responsibility for the U-2 flights.

May 16—After three hours, the Paris summit meeting collapses when Khrushchev vehemently demands that Eisenhower apologize for the U-2 flights, punish the culprits responsible, and ban future flights. He also revokes his invitation to Eisenhower to visit the USSR later in the spring.

May 27—Eisenhower announces the termination of U.S. economic aid to Cuba.

May 31—In U.S. v. States of La., Tex., Miss., Ala., and Fla., the Supreme Court upholds the Submerged Lands Act of 1953 by which the United States granted oil rights in submerged lands to coastal states up to three miles offshore.

June 2—The Federal Reserve Board authorizes a reduction in the discount rate from 4 percent to 3 ½ percent.

June 7—A surgeon general's report on the mission of the Public Health Service underscores the growing danger of environmental health factors.

June 8—Eisenhower signs legislation directing the surgeon general to make a study of the effects of motor vehicle exhaust fumes on the public health.

June 12—Eisenhower leaves on a two-week goodwill tour of 12 Far Eastern countries.

June 16—Thousands of Japanese riot against the U.S.-Japanese security treaty. Eisenhower cancels his visit to Japan.

June 20—In Hannab v. Larche, the Supreme Court upholds the right of the Civil Rights Commission to hold hearings in which the identity of those submitting complaints remains confidential.

June 27—In Elkins v. U.S., the Supreme Court rules that evidence obtained by state officers during an illegal search is inadmissible in federal courts.

June 27—The 10-Nation Disarmament Conference ends with no movement on either side.

July 1—Congress overrides Eisenhower's veto of a bill providing pay increases for federal employees.

July 6—In retaliation for the seizure of millions of dollars worth of American property, the United States cuts Cuba's sugar import quota by 700,000 tons.

July 9—Eisenhower asserts that the United States will never permit the establishment of a communist regime in the Western Hemisphere.

July 13—Kennedy wins the Democratic presidential nomination on the first ballot at the Los Angeles convention. Johnson is chosen vice presidential candidate at the following session.

July 22—Eisenhower orders a 3 percent reduction in the number of federal employees.

July 22–23—In a meeting with New York's governor, Nelson Rockefeller, Nixon agrees to a stronger platform on civil rights, defense, and foreign policy in exchange for Rockefeller's support for the presidential nomination. The press dubs the meeting the "Treaty of Fifth Avenue."

July 25—Nixon easily wins the Republican presidential nomination on the first ballot in Chicago.

August 7—Castro announces "forcible expropriation" of all U.S.-owned companies.

August 19—A Soviet military tribunal sentences Powers to 10 years in prison for espionage.

August 20—The United States joins other members of the Organization of American States in voting to sever diplomatic relations with the Dominican Republic as well as to impose economic sanctions and a complete arms embargo on it for its "acts of aggression” in participating in a plot to overthrow the Venezuelan government.

August 24—In response to a reporter’s query for an example of a major idea Nixon has contributed to the administration, Eisenhower replies, “If you give me a week, I might think of one. I don’t remember.”

September 11—The Inter-American Economic Conference adopts the “Act of Bogota,” an extensive social and economic aid program for Latin America.

September 13—Eisenhower signs a bill making the fixing of TV quiz shows a federal crime and giving the Federal Communications Commission power to tighten restrictions on deceptive broadcasting practices.

September 13—Eisenhower signs amendments to Social Security that provide federal aid to states to establish programs providing medical care for poor and low-income elderly.

September 22—Eisenhower addresses the UN General Assembly, proposing national self-determination for African colonies and a five-point program of economic and educational assistance to be administered through the UN.

September 26—Kennedy and Nixon hold the first of four televised debates between the presidential candidates.

October 17—National variety store chains: Woolworth, Kresge, W.T. Grant, and McCrory-McLellan announce that lunch counters in their stores have been integrated in more than 100 southern cities.

October 19—The United States prohibits export to Cuba of all goods except food and medical supplies.

October 24—U.S. church membership for 1959 is reported to have risen to a record 112,226,905 at year’s end.

October 28—The United States requests the Organization of American States to investigate reports that Cuba is receiving large shipments of arms from the Soviet bloc.

November 1—Eisenhower announces that the United States would take “whatever steps” necessary to maintain the U.S. naval base at Guantánamo, Cuba.

November 8—Kennedy defeats Nixon in the presidential election by 113,057 votes and receives 303 of the 537 electoral votes. The Democrats retain control of both the House and the Senate.

November 14—Rioting accompanies the desegregation of two elementary schools in New Orleans.

November 17—The CIA briefs Kennedy on its involvement in training Cuban exiles in Guatemala to overthrow Castro.

November 18—Eisenhower orders U.S. naval units to patrol Central American waters to prevent communist-led invasions of either Guatemala or Nicaragua.

November 19—Eisenhower’s science advisory committee urges the federal government and all other elements of the national community to assume a greater role in supporting, strengthening, and expanding basic scientific research and graduate education in science.

November 27—Eisenhower’s Commission on National Goals issues a report calling for “extraordinary personal responsibility” and sustained “effort and sacrifice” from “every American” in the 1960s to help the United States achieve “high and difficult goals” in the period of “grave danger” ahead.

December 5—In Boynton v. Virginia, the Supreme Court rules that racial discrimination in bus terminal facilities serving interstate passengers violates the Interstate Commerce Act.

December 7—Kefauver’s Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee begins an investigation of pricing in the prescription drug industry.

December 7—The Office of Education announces that a record 3.6 million students are pursuing college degrees.

December 14—Western European nations, the United States, and Canada sign an agreement in Paris creating an Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

1961

January 3—Eisenhower breaks diplomatic relations with Cuba.

January 17—Eisenhower delivers an eloquent farewell address to the nation, in which he warns that America “must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex.”

PRINCIPAL U.S. GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS OF THE EISENHOWER YEARS

SUPREME COURT

Fred M. Vinson, Chief Justice 1946–53
Earl Warren, Chief Justice 1953–69
Hugo L. Black 1937–71
William J. Brennan, Jr. 1956–90
Harold H. Burton 1945–58
Tom C. Clark 1949–67
William O. Douglas 1939–75

Felix Frankfurter 1939–62
John Marshall Harlan 1955–71
Robert H. Jackson 1941–54
Sherman Minton 1949–56
Stanley F. Reed 1938–57
Potter Stewart 1958–81
Charles E. Whittaker 1957–62

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Department of Agriculture

Secretary of Agriculture

Ezra Taft Benson, 1953–61

Undersecretary

True D. Morse, 1953–61

Assistant Secretaries

J. Earl Coke, 1953–54
John H. Davis, 1953–54
Ross Rizley, 1953–54
Ervin L. Peterson, 1954–60
Earl L. Butz, 1954–57
James A. McConnell, 1955
Marvin L. McLain, 1956–60
Don Paarlberg, 1957–58
Clarence L. Miller, 1958–61

Administrative Assistant Secretary

Ralph S. Roberts, 1953–61

Department of Commerce

Secretary of Commerce

Sinclair Weeks, 1953–58
Lewis L. Strauss, (acting) 1958–59
Frederick H. Mueller, 1959–61

Undersecretary

Walter Williams, 1953–58
Frederick H. Mueller, 1958–59
Philip A. Ray, 1959–61

Undersecretary for Transportation

Robert B. Murray, Jr. 1953–55
Louis S. Rothschild, 1955–58
John J. Allen, Jr., 1959–61

Assistant Secretary for Administration

James C. Worthy, 1954–55

George T. Moore, 1955–61

Assistant Secretary for International Affairs

Samuel W. Anderson, 1953–55

Harold C. McClellan, 1955–57

Henry Kearns, 1957–60

Bradley Fisk, 1960–61

Assistant Secretary for Domestic Affairs

Craig R. Sheaffer, 1953

Lothair Teetor, 1953–55

Frederick H. Mueller, 1955–58

Carl F. Oechsle, 1958–61

Department of Defense*Secretary of Defense*

Charles E. Wilson, 1953–57

Neil H. McElroy, 1957–59

Thomas S. Gates, Jr., 1959–61

Deputy Secretary of Defense

Roger M. Kyes, 1953–54

Robert B. Anderson, 1954–55

Reuben B. Robertson, Jr., 1955–57

Donald A. Quarles, 1957–59

Thomas S. Gates, Jr., 1959

James H. Douglas, Jr., 1959–61

Secretary of the Air Force

Harold Talbott, 1953–55

Donald A. Quarles, 1955–57

James H. Douglas, Jr., 1957–59

Dudley C. Sharp, 1959–61

Secretary of the Army

Robert T. Stevens, 1953–55

Wilbur M. Brucker, 1955–61

Secretary of the Navy

Robert B. Anderson, 1953–54

Charles S. Thomas, 1954–57

Thomas S. Gates, Jr., 1957–59

William B. Franke, 1959–61

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Comptroller)

Wilfred J. McNeil, 1949–59

Franklin B. Lincoln, 1959–61

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Engineering)

Frank D. Newbury, 1953–57

* Reorganized under Assistant Secretary (Research and Engineering), 1957

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Health and Medical)

Dr. Melvin A. Casberg, 1953–54

Dr. Frank B. Berry, 1954–61

* Reorganized under Assistant Secretary (Manpower) 1961

Assistant Secretary of Defense (International Security Affairs)

Frank C. Nash, 1953–54

H. Struve Hensel, 1954–55

Gordon Gray, 1955–57

Mansfield D. Sprague, 1957–58

John N. Irwin, II, 1958–61

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Legislative and Public Affairs)

Frederick A. Seaton, 1953–55

Robert Tripp Ross, 1955–57

* Reorganized under Assistant Secretary (Public Affairs), 1957

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Manpower)

John A. Hannah, 1953–54

Carter L. Burgess, 1954–57

William H. Francis, Jr., 1957–58

Charles C. Finucane, 1958–61

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Public Affairs)

Murray Snyder, 1957–61

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Properties and Installations)

Franklin G. Floete, 1953–56

Floyd S. Bryant, 1956–61

* Reorganized under Assistant Secretary (Installations and Logistics), 1961

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Research and Development)

Donald A. Quarles, 1953–55

Dr. Clifford C. Furnas, 1955–57

* Reorganized under Assistant Secretary (Research and Engineering), 1957

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Research and Engineering)

Frank D. Newbury, 1957

Paul D. Foote, 1957–58

* Reorganized under Directorate of Defense Research and Engineering, 1958

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Supply and Logistics)

Charles S. Thomas, 1953–54

Thomas P. Pike, 1954–56

E. Perkins McGuire, 1956–61

* Reorganized under Assistant Secretary (Installations and Logistics), 1961

*Director of Defense Research and Engineering

Herbert F. York, 1958–61

* Created from the Assistant Secretariat of Defense (Research and Engineering), 1958

Joint Chiefs of Staff

Chairman

Gen. of the Army Omar N. Bradley, U.S. Army, 1949–53

Adm. Arthur W. Radford, U.S. Navy, 1953–57

Gen. Nathan F. Twining, U.S. Air Force, 1957–60

Gen. Lyman L. Lemnitzer, U.S. Army, 1960–62

Chief of Staff, U.S. Army

Gen. J. Lawton Collins, 1949–53

Gen. Matthew B. Ridgeway, 1953–55

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, 1955–59

Gen. Lyman L. Lemnitzer, 1959–60

Gen. George H. Decker, 1960–62

Chief of Naval Operations

Adm. William M. Fechteler, 1951–53

Adm. Robert B. Carney, 1953–55

Adm. Arleigh A. Burke, 1955–61

Chief of Staff, U.S. Air Force

Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, 1948–53

Gen. Nathan F. Twining, 1953–57

Gen. Thomas D. White, 1957–61

Commandant of the Marine Corps

Gen. Lemuel C. Shepherd, 1952–55

Gen. Randolph McC. Pate, 1956–59

Gen. David M. Shoup, 1960–63

Department of Health, Education and Welfare

Secretary

Oveta Gulp Hobby, 1953–55

Marion B. Folsom, 1955–58

Arthur S. Flemming, 1958–61

Undersecretary

Nelson A. Rockefeller, 1953–54

Harold C. Hunt, 1955–57

John A. Perkins, 1957–58

Bertha S. Adkins, 1958–61

Assistant Secretary

Russell R. Larmon, 1953–55

Bradshaw Mintener, 1955–57

Edward Foss Wilson, 1957–60

Assistant Secretary for Program Analysis

Roswell B. Perkins, 1954–57

Assistant Secretary for Legislation

Elliot L. Richardson, 1957–59

Robert A. Forsythe, 1960–61

Department of the Interior

Secretary of the Interior

Douglas McKay, 1953–56

Frederick A. Seaton, 1956–61

Undersecretary

Ralph A. Tudor, 1953–54

Clarence A. Davis, 1954–57

Olin H. Chilson, 1957–58

Elmer F. Bennett, 1958–61

Assistant Secretary—Fish and Wildlife

Ross L. Leffler, 1957–61

Assistant Secretary—Mineral Resources

Felix E. Wormser, 1953–57

Royce A. Hardy, 1957–61

Assistant Secretary—Public Land Management

Orme Lewis, 1953–55

Wesley A. D'Ewart, 1955–56

Olin H. Chilson, 1956–57

Roger C. Ernst, 1957–60

George W. Abbott, 1960–61

Assistant Secretary—Water and Power Development

Fred G. Aandahl, 1953–61

Administrative Assistant Secretary

D. Otis Beasley, 1952–65

Department of Justice*Attorney General*

Herbert Brownell, Jr., 1953–57
William P. Rogers, 1957–61

Deputy Attorney General

William P. Rogers, 1953–57
Lawrence E. Walsh, 1957–60

Solicitor General

Simon E. Sobeloff, 1954–55
J. Lee Rankin, 1956–61

Assistant Attorney General/Administration

S. A. Andretta, 1950–65

Assistant Attorney General/Antitrust Division

Stanley N. Barnes, 1953–56
Victor R. Hansen, 1956–59
Robert A. Bicks, (acting) 1960–61

Assistant Attorney General/Civil Division

Warren E. Burger, 1953–56
George Cochran Doub, 1956–60

Assistant Attorney General/Civil Rights Division

W. Wilson White, 1957–59
Joseph M. F. Ryan, Jr., (acting) 1959–60
Harold R. Tyler, Jr., 1960–61

Assistant Attorney General/Criminal Division

Warren Olney, III, 1953–57
Malcolm Anderson, 1958–59
Malcolm R. Wilkey, 1959–61

Assistant Attorney General/Internal Security Division

William F. Tompkins, 1954–58
J. Walter Yeahley, 1959–70

Assistant Attorney General/Lands Division

Perry W. Morton, 1953–61

Assistant Attorney General/Office of Alien Property

Dallas S. Townsend, 1953–60

Assistant Attorney General/Office of Legal Counsel

J. Lee Rankin, 1953–56
Malcolm R. Wilkey, 1958–59
Robert Kramer, 1959–61

Assistant Attorney General/Tax Division

H. Brian Holland, 1953–56
Charles K. Rice, 1956–61

Department of Labor*Secretary of Labor*

Maurice J. Tobin, 1948–53
Martin P. Durkin, 1953
Lloyd A. Mashburn, (acting) 1953
James P. Mitchell, 1953–61

Undersecretary

Michael J. Galvin, 1949–53
Lloyd A. Mashburn, 1953
Arthur Larson, 1954–56
James T. O'Connell, 1957–61

Deputy Undersecretary

Millard Cass, 1955–71

Assistant Secretary for Labor-Management Relations

John J. Gilhooley, 1957–61

Assistant Secretary for Employment and Manpower

Rocco C. Siciliano, 1953–57
Newell Brown, 1957–60
Walter C. Wallace, 1960–61
Jerry R. Holleman, 1961–62

Assistant Secretary for International Labor Affairs

Philip M. Kaiser, 1949–53
Spencer Miller, Jr., 1953–54
J. Ernest Wilkins, 1954–58
George C. Lodge, 1958–61
George L. P. Weaver, 1961–69

Assistant Secretary for Standards and Statistics

Harrison C. Hobart, 1953–54

Post Office Department*Postmaster General*

Arthur E. Summerfield, 1947–61

Deputy Postmaster General

Charles R. Hook, Jr., 1953–55
Maurice H. Stans, 1955–57
Edson O. Sessions, 1957–59
John M. McKibbin, 1959–61

Assistant Postmaster General/Bureau of Operations

Norman R. Abrams, 1953–57
John M. McKibbin, 1957–59
Bert B. Barnes, 1959–61

Assistant Postmaster General/Bureau of Transportation

John C. Allen, 1953–54
E. George Siedle, 1954–59
George M. Moore, 1959–61

Assistant Postmaster General/Bureau of Finance

Albert J. Robertson, 1953–56
Hyde Gillette, 1957–61

Assistant Postmaster General/Bureau of Facilities

Ormonde A. Kieb, 1953–59
Rollin D. Barnard, 1959–61

Assistant Postmaster General/Bureau of Personnel

Eugene J. Lyons, 1953–59
Frank E. Barr, 1960–61

State Department

Secretary of State

John Foster Dulles, 1953–59
Christian A. Herter, 1959–61

Undersecretary

Walter B. Smith, 1953–54
Herbert Hoover, Jr., 1954–57
Christian A. Herter, 1957–59
C. Douglas Dillon, 1959–61

Undersecretary for Administration

Donald B. Lourie, 1953–54
Charles E. Saltzman, 1954

Undersecretary for Economic Affairs

C. Douglas Dillon, 1958–59

Undersecretary for Political Affairs

Robert D. Murphy, 1959
Livingston T. Merchant, 1959–61

Deputy Undersecretary

H. Freeman Matthews, 1950–53

Deputy Undersecretary for Administration

Carlisle H. Humelsine, 1950–53
Loy W. Henderson, 1955–61

Deputy Undersecretary for Economic Affairs

Samuel C. Waugh, 1955
Herbert V. Prochnow, 1955–56
C. Douglas Dillon, 1957–58

Deputy Undersecretary for Political Affairs

Robert D. Murphy, 1953–59
Livingston T. Merchant, 1959
Raymond A. Hare, 1960–61

Assistant Secretary for Administration

Edward T. Wailes, 1953–54
Isaac W. Carpenter, Jr., 1954–55, 1957
Walter K. Scott, 1958–59
Lane Dwinell, 1959–61

Assistant Secretary for African Affairs

Joseph C. Satterthwaite, 1958–61

Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations

Thruston B. Morton, 1953–56
Robert C. Hill, 1956–57
William B. Macomber, Jr., 1957–61

Assistant Secretary for Controller

Isaac W. Carpenter, Jr., 1955–57

Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs

Harold F. Linder, 1952–53
Samuel C. Waugh, 1953–55
Thorsten V. Kalijarvi, 1957
Thomas C. Mann, 1957–60
Edwin M. Martin, 1960–62

Assistant Secretary for European Affairs

Livingston T. Merchant, 1953–56, 1958–59
C. Burke Elbrick, 1957–58
Foy D. Kohler, 1959–62

Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs

John M. Allison, 1952–53
Walter S. Robertson, 1953–59
J. Graham Parsons, 1959–61

Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs

John M. Cabot, 1953–54
Henry F. Holland, 1954–56
Roy R. Rubottom, Jr., 1957–60
Thomas C. Mann, 1960–61

Assistant Secretary for International Organization Affairs

David McK. Key, 1954–55
Francis O. Wilcox, 1955–61

Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern, South Asian & African Affairs

Henry A. Byroade, 1952–55

George V. Allen, 1955–56
William M. Rountree, 1956–59

* Reorganized as Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, 1958 G. Lewis Jones, 1959–61

Assistant Secretary for Policy Planning

Robert R. Bowie, 1955–57
Gerard C. Smith, 1957–61

Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs

Carl W. McCardle, 1953–57
Andrew H. Berding, 1957–61

Assistant Secretary for United Nations Affairs

John D. Hickerson, 1949–53
Robert D. Murphy, 1953
David McK. Key, 1953–54

* Reorganized as International Organization Affairs, 1954

Department of the Treasury

Secretary of the Treasury

George M. Humphrey, 1953–57
Robert B. Anderson, 1957–61

Undersecretary

Marion B. Folsom, 1953–55
W. Randolph Burgess, 1955–57
Fred C. Scribner, Jr., 1957–61

Undersecretary for Monetary Affairs

W. Randolph Burgess, 1954–55
H. Chapman Rose, 1955–56
Julian B. Baird, 1957–61

Assistant Secretaries

H. Chapman Rose, 1953–55
Andrew N. Overby, 1952–57
Laurence B. Robbins, 1954–61
David W. Kendall, 1955–57
A. Gilmore Flues, 1958–61
Tom B. Coughran, 1957–58
T. Graydon Upton, 1958–60

Assistant Secretary for Fiscal Affairs

Edward F. Bartelt, 1945–55
William T. Heffelfinger, 1955–62

Administrative Assistant Secretary

William W. Parsons, 1950–59
A. E. Weatherbee, 1959–70

REGULATORY COMMISSIONS AND INDEPENDENT AGENCIES

Atomic Energy Commission

Joseph Campbell, 1953–54
Gordon E. Dean, 1949–53; Chairman, 1950–53
John F. Floberg, 1957–60
John S. Graham, 1957–62
W. F. Libby, 1954–59
John A. McCone, 1958–61; Chairman, 1958–61
Thomas E. Murray, 1950–57
Loren K. Olson, 1960–62
Henry D. Smyth, 1949–54
Lewis L. Strauss, 1946–50; Chairman, 1953–58
Harold S. Vance, 1955–59
John Von Neumann, 1955–57
John H. Williams, 1959–60
Robert E. Wilson, 1960–64
Eugene M. Zuckert, 1952–54

Civil Aeronautics Board

Joseph P. Adams, 1951–56
Alan S. Boyd, 1959–65; Chairman, 1961–65
Harmar D. Denny, 1953–59
James R. Durfee, Chairman, 1956–60
Whitney Gilliland, 1959–76
Chan Gurney, 1951–65; Chairman, 1954
Louis J. Hector, 1957–59
Josh Lee, 1945–55
G. Joseph Minetti, 1956–74
Ross Rizley, 1955–56; Chairman, 1955–56
Oswald Ryan, 1945–54; Chairman, 1953

Federal Communications Commission

Robert T. Bartley, 1952–72
T. A. M. Craven, 1956–63

John S. Cross, 1958–62
John C. Doerfer, 1953–60; Chairman, 1957–60
Frederick W. Ford, 1957–65; Chairman, 1960–61
Frieda B. Hennock, 1948–55
Rosel H. Hyde, 1946–69; Chairman, 1953–54, 1966–69
Robert E. Lee, 1953
Richard A. Mack, 1955–58
George C. McConaughy, 1954–57;
Chairman, 1954–57
Eugene H. Merrill, 1952–53
George E. Sterling, 1948–54
Paul A. Walker, 1945–53; Chairman, 1952–53
Edward M. Webster, 1947–56

Federal Power Commission

Thomas C. Buchanan, 1948–53; Chairman, 1952–53
William R. Connole, 1955–60
Seaborn L. Digby, 1953–58
Dale E. Doty, 1952–54
Claude L. Draper, 1945–56
John B. Hussey, 1958–60
Arthur Kline, 1956–61
Jerome K. Kuykendall, 1953–61; Chairman,
1953–61
Nelson Lee Smith, 1945–55; Chairman, 1947–50
Frederick Stueck, 1954–61
Paul A. Sweeny, 1960–61
Harrington Wimberly, 1945–53

Federal Reserve Board

C. Canby Balderston, 1954–66
Rudolph M. Evans, 1945–54
G. H. King, Jr., 1959–63
William McC. Martin, Jr., 1951–70; Chairman, 1951–70
Paul E. Miller, 1954

A. L. Mills, Jr., 1952–65
J. L. Robertson, 1952–73
Charles N. Shepardson, 1955–67
M. S. Szymczak, 1945–61
James K. Vardaman, Jr., 1946–58

Federal Trade Commission

Sigurd Anderson, 1955–64
Albert A. Carretta, 1952–54
John Carson, 1949–53
John W. Gwynne, 1953–59; Chairman, 1955–
59
Edward F. Howrey, 1953–55; Chairman,
1953–55
William C. Kern, 1955–62
Earl W. Kintner, 1959–61; Chairman, 1959–61
Lowell B. Mason, 1945–56; Chairman, 1949–50
James M. Mead, 1949–55; Chairman, 1950–53
Edward K. Mills, Jr., 1960–61
Robert T. Secrest, 1954–61
Stephen J. Spingarn, 1950–53
Edward T. Tait, 1956–60

Securities and Exchange Commission

Clarence H. Adams, 1952–56
J. Sinclair Armstrong, 1953–57; Chairman,
1955–57
Donald C. Cook, 1949–53; Chairman, 1952–53
Ralph H. Demmler, 1953–55; Chairman,
1953–55
Edward N. Gadsby, 1957–61; Chairman,
1957–61
A. Jackson Goodwin, Jr., 1953–55
Earl Freeman Hastings, 1956–61
Richard B. McEntire, 1946–53
Andrew Downey Orrick, 1955–60
Harold C. Patterson, 1955–60
Paul R. Rowen, 1948–55
James C. Sargent, 1956–60
Byron D. Woodside, 1960–67

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Alabama

George W. Andrews (D) 1944–71
Laurie C. Battle (D) 1947–55

Frank W. Boykin (D) 1935–63
Carl Elliott (D) 1949–65
George M. Grant (D) 1938–65

George Huddleston, Jr. (D) 1955–65
 Robert E. Jones (D) 1947–77
 Albert Rains (D) 1945–65
 Kenneth A. Roberts (D) 1951–65
 Armistead I. Selden, Jr. (D) 1953–69

Alaska

Ralph J. Rivers (D) 1959–67

Arizona

Harold A. Patten (D) 1949–55
 Stewart L. Udall (D) 1955–61
 John J. Rhodes (R) 1953–83

Arkansas

Dale Alford (D) 1959–63
 E. C. Gathings (D) 1939–69
 Oren Harris (D) 1941–66
 Brooks Hays (D) 1943–59
 Wilbur D. Mills (D) 1939–77
 W. F. Norrell (D) 1939–61
 James W. Trimble (D) 1945–67

California

Jeffery Cohelan (D) 1959–71
 Robert L. Condon (D) 1953–55
 Clyde Doyle (D) 1945–47; 1949–63
 Clair Engle (D) 1943–59
 Harlan D. Hagen (D) 1953–67
 Chet Holifield (D) 1943–75
 Harold T. Johnson (D) 1959–81
 George A. Kasem (D) 1959–61
 Cecil R. King (D) 1942–69
 John J. McFall (D) 1957–78
 Clem Miller (D) 1959–62
 George P. Miller (D) 1945–73
 John E. Moss (D) 1953–78
 James Roosevelt (D) 1955–65
 D. S. Saund (D) 1957–63
 John F. Shelley (D) 1949–64
 Harry R. Sheppard (D) 1937–65
 B. F. Sisk (D) 1955–79
 Samuel W. Yorty (D) 1951–55
 John J. Allen, Jr. (R) 1947–59
 John F. Baldwin (R) 1955–66
 Ernest K. Bramblett (R) 1947–55
 Charles S. Gubser (R) 1953–75
 Edgar W. Hiestand (R) 1953–63

Patrick J. Hillings (R) 1951–59
 Carl Hinshaw (R) 1939–56
 Joseph F. Holt, III (R) 1953–61
 Craig Hosmer (R) 1953–75
 Allan O. Hunter (R) 1951–55
 Donald L. Jackson (R) 1947–61
 J. Leroy Johnson (R) 1943–57
 Glenard P. Lipscomb (R) 1953–70
 Gordon L. McDonough (R) 1945–63
 William S. Mailliard (R) 1953–74
 John Phillips (R) 1943–57
 Norris Poulson (R) 1943–45; 1947–53
 Hubert B. Scudder (R) 1949–59
 H. Allen Smith (R) 1957–73
 Charles M. Teague (R) 1955–74
 James B. Utt (R) 1953–70
 Bob Wilson (R) 1953–81
 J. Arthur Younger (R) 1953–67

Colorado

Wayne N. Aspinall (D) 1949–73
 Byron L. Johnson (D) 1959–61
 Byron G. Rogers (D) 1951–71
 J. Edgar Chenoweth (R) 1941–49; 1951–65
 William S. Hill (R) 1941–59

Connecticut

Chester Bowles (D) 1959–61
 Emilio Q. Daddario (D) 1959–71
 Thomas J. Dodd (D) 1953–57
 Robert N. Giaimo (D) 1959–81
 Donald J. Irwin (D) 1959–61; 1965–69
 Frank Kowalski (D) 1959–63
 John S. Monagan (D) 1959–73
 Albert W. Cretella (R) 1953–59
 Edwin H. May, Jr. (R) 1957–59
 Albert P. Morano (R) 1951–59
 James T. Patterson (R) 1947–59
 Antoni N. Sadlak (R) 1947–59
 Horace Seely-Brown, Jr. (R) 1947–49; 1951–59;
 1961–63

Delaware

Harris B. McDowell, Jr. (D) 1955–57; 1959–67
 Harry Haskell, Jr. (R) 1957–59
 Herbert B. Warburton (R) 1953–55

Florida

Charles E. Bennett (D) 1949–93

Courtney W. Campbell (D) 1953–55
Dante B. Fascell (D) 1955–93
James A. Haley (D) 1953–77
A. Sydney Herlong, Jr. (D) 1949–69
William C. Lantaff (D) 1951–55
Chester B. McMullen (D) 1951–53
D. R. (Billy) Matthews (D) 1953–67
Dwight L. Rogers (D) 1945–54
Paul G. Rogers (D) 1955–79
Robert L. F. Sikes (D) 1941–44; 1945–79
William C. Cramer (R) 1955–71

Georgia

Iris F. Blitch (D) 1955–63
Paul Brown (D) 1933–61
A. Sidney Camp (D) 1939–54
James C. Davis (D) 1947–63
John J. Flynt, Jr. (D) 1954–79
E. L. Forrester (D) 1951–65
Phil M. Landrum (D) 1953–77
Henderson Lanham (D) 1947–57
Erwin Mitchell (D) 1958–61
J. L. Pilcher (D) 1953–65
Prince H. Preston, Jr. (D) 1947–61
Carl Vinson (D) 1914–65
W. M. Wheeler (D) 1947–55

Hawaii

Daniel K. Inouye (D) 1959–63

Idaho

Gracie Pfost (D) 1953–63
Hamer H. Budge (R) 1951–61

Illinois

James B. Bowler (D) 1953–57
Charles A. Boyle (D) 1955–59
William L. Dawson (D) 1943–70
Thomas S. Gordon (D) 1943–59
Kenneth J. Gray (D) 1955–75
John C. Kluczynski (D) 1951–75
Roland V. Libonati (D) 1957–65
Peter F. Mack, Jr. (D) 1949–63
William T. Murphy (D) 1959–71
James C. Murray (D) 1955–57
Thomas J. O'Brien (D) 1933–39; 1943–64
Barratt O'Hara (D) 1949–51; 1953–69

Melvin Price (D) 1945–88
Roman C. Pucinski (D) 1959–73
Dan Rostenkowski (D) 1959–95
George E. Shipley (D) 1959–79
Sidney R. Yates (D) 1949–63; 1965–99
Leo E. Allen (R) 1933–61
Leslie C. Arends (R) 1935–75
C. W. (Runt) Bishop (R) 1941–55
Fred E. Busbey (R) 1943–45; 1947–49; 1951–55
Emmet F. Byrne (R) 1957–59
Robert B. Chiperfield (R) 1939–63
Marguerite Stitt Church (R) 1951–63
Harold R. Collier (R) 1957–75
Edward J. Derwinski (R) 1959–83
Elmer J. Hoffman (R) 1959–65
Richard W. Hoffman (R) 1949–57
Edgar A. Jonas (R) 1949–55
Russell W. Keeney (R) 1957–58
William E. McVey (R) 1951–58
Noah M. Mason (R) 1937–63
Robert H. Michel (R) 1957–95
Chauncey W. Reed (R) 1935–56
Timothy P. Sheehan (R) 1951–59
Edna Oakes Simpson (R) 1959–61
Sid Simpson (R) 1943–58
William L. Springer (R) 1951–73
Harold H. Velde (R) 1949–57
Charles W. Vursell (R) 1943–59

Indiana

Joseph W. Barr (D) 1959–61
John Brademas (D) 1959–81
Winfield K. Denton (D) 1949–53; 1955–67
Randall S. Harmon (D) 1959–61
Earl Hogan (D) 1959–61
Ray J. Madden (D) 1943–77
J. Edward Roush (D) 1959–69; 1971–77
Fred Wampler (D) 1959–61
E. Ross Adair (R) 1951–71
John V. Beamer (R) 1951–59
William G. Bray (R) 1951–75
Charles R. Brownson (R) 1951–59
Shepard J. Crumpacker, Jr. (R) 1951–57
Charles A. Halleck (R) 1935–69
Cecil M. Harden (R) 1949–59
Ralph Harvey (R) 1947–59; 1961–66
D. Bailey Merrill (R) 1953–55

F. Jay Nimtz (R) 1957–59
Earl Wilson (R) 1941–59; 1961–65

Iowa

Steven V. Carter (D) 1959
Merwin Coad (D) 1957–63
Neal Smith (D) 1959–95
Leonard G. Wolf (D) 1959–61
Paul Cunningham (R) 1941–59
James I. Dolliver (R) 1945–57
H. R. Gross (R) 1949–75
Charles B. Hoeven (R) 1943–65
Ben F. Jensen (R) 1939–65
John H. Kyl (R) 1959–65; 1967–73
Karl M. LeCompte (R) 1939–59
Thomas E. Martin (R) 1939–55
Fred Schwengel (R) 1955–65; 1967–73
Henry O. Talle (R) 1939–59

Kansas

J. Floyd Breeding (D) 1957–63
Newell A. George (D) 1959–61
Denver D. Hargis (D) 1959–61
Howard S. Miller (D) 1953–55
William H. Avery (R) 1955–65
Myron V. George (R) 1950–59
Clifford R. Hope (R) 1927–57
Edward H. Rees (R) 1937–61
Errett P. Scrivner (R) 1943–59
Wint Smith (R) 1947–61

Kentucky

Frank W. Bruke (D) 1959–63
Frank Chelf (D) 1945–67
Noble J. Gregory (D) 1937–59
William H. Natcher (D) 1953–94
Carl D. Perkins (D) 1949–84
Brent Spence (D) 1931–63
Frank A. Stubblefield (D) 1959–75
John C. Watts (D) 1951–71
Garrett L. Withers (D) 1952–53
James S. Golden (R) 1949–55
John M. Robsion, Jr. (R) 1953–59
Eugene Siler (R) 1955–65

Louisiana

Hale Boggs (D) 1941–43; 1947–72

Overton Brooks (D) 1937–61
F. Edward Hebert (D) 1941–77
George S. Long (D) 1953–58
Harold B. McSween (D) 1959–63
James H. Morrison (D) 1943–67
Otto E. Passman (D) 1947–77
T. Ashton Thompson (D) 1953–65
Edwin E. Willis (D) 1949–69

Maine

Frank M. Coffin (D) 1957–61
James C. Oliver (D) 1937–43; 1959–61
Robert Hale (R) 1943–59
Clifford G. McIntire (R) 1952–65
Charles P. Nelson (R) 1949–57

Maryland

Daniel B. Brewster (D) 1959–62
George H. Fallon (D) 1945–71
John R. Foley (D) 1959–61
Samuel N. Friedel (D) 1953–71
Edward A. Garmatz (D) 1947–73
Thomas F. Johnson (D) 1959–63
Richard E. Lankford (D) 1955–65
James P. S. Devereux (R) 1951–59
DeWitt S. Hyde (R) 1953–59
Edward T. Miller (R) 1947–59
Frank Small, Jr. (R) 1953–55

Massachusetts

Edward P. Boland (D) 1953–89
James A. Burke (D) 1959–79
Harold D. Donohue (D) 1947–75
Thomas J. Lane (D) 1941–63
John W. McCormack (D) 1928–71
Torbert H. Macdonald (D) 1955–76
Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill, Jr. (D) 1953–87
Philip J. Philbin (D) 1943–71
William H. Bates (R) 1950–69
Silvio O. Conte (R) 1959–91
Laurence Curtis (R) 1953–63
Angier L. Goodwin (R) 1943–55
John W. Heselton (R) 1945–59
Hastings Keith (R) 1959–73
Joseph W. Martin, Jr. (R) 1925–67
Donald W. Nicholson (R) 1947–59
Edith Nourse Rogers (R) 1925–60
Richard B. Wigglesworth (R) 1928–59

Michigan

Charles C. Diggs, Jr. (D) 1955–80
John D. Dingell (D) 1933–55
John D. Dingell, Jr. (D) 1955–
Martha W. Griffiths (D) 1955–74
Donald Hayworth (D) 1955–57
John Lesinski, Jr. (D) 1951–65
Thaddeus M. Machrowicz (D) 1951–61
George D. O'Brien (D) 1937–39; 1941–47; 1949–55
James G. O'Hara (D) 1959–77
Louis C. Rabaut (D) 1935–47; 1949–61
John B. Bennett (R) 1943–45; 1947–64
Alvin M. Bentley (R) 1953–61
William S. Broomfield (R) 1957–93
Elford A. Cederberg (R) 1953–78
Charles E. Chamberlain (R) 1957–74
Kit Francis Clardy (R) 1953–55
George A. Dondero (R) 1933–57
Gerald R. Ford (R) 1949–73
Robert P. Griffin (R) 1957–66
Clare E. Hoffman (R) 1935–63
August E. Johansen (R) 1955–65
Victor A. Knox (R) 1953–65
Robert J. McIntosh (R) 1957–59
George Meader (R) 1951–65
Charles G. Oakman (R) 1953–55
Paul W. Shafer (R) 1937–54
Ruth Thompson (R) 1951–57
Jesse P. Wolcott (R) 1931–57

Minnesota

John A. Blatnik (D) 1947–74
Joseph E. Karth (D) 1959–77
Coya Knutson (D) 1955–59
Eugene J. McCarthy (D) 1949–59
Fred Marshall (D) 1949–63
Roy W. Wier (D) 1949–61
H. Carl Andersen (R) 1939–63
August H. Andresen (R) 1925–33; 1935–58
Harold C. Hagen (FL) 1943–45; (R) 1945–55
Walter H. Judd (R) 1943–63
Odin Langen (R) 1959–71
Ancher Nelsen (R) 1959–75
Joseph P. O'Hara (R) 1941–59
Albert H. Quie (R) 1958–79

Mississippi

Thomas G. Abernethy (D) 1943–73
William M. Colmer (D) 1933–73

Frank E. Smith (D) 1951–62
Jamie L. Whitten (D) 1941–95
John Bell Williams (D) 1947–68
W. Arthur Winstead (D) 1943–65

Missouri

Richard Bollin (D) 1949–83
Charles H. Brown (D) 1957–61
Clarence Cannon (D) 1923–64
A. S. J. Carnahan (D) 1945–47; 1949–61
George H. Christopher (D) 1949–51; 1955–59
W. R. Hull, Jr. (D) 1955–73
Paul C. Jones (D) 1948–69
Frank M. Karsten (D) 1947–69
Morgan M. Moulder (D) 1949–63
William J. Randall (D) 1959–77
Leonor K. Sullivan (D) 1953–77
William C. Cole (R) 1943–49; 1953–55
Thomas B. Curtis (R) 1951–69
Jeffrey P. Hillelson (R) 1953–55
Dewey Short (R) 1929–31; 1935–57

Montana

LeRoy H. Anderson (D) 1957–61
Lee Metcalf (D) 1953–61
Wesley A. D'Ewart (R) 1945–55
Orvin B. Fjare (R) 1955–57

Nebraska

Lawrence Brock (D) 1959–61
Donald F. McGinley (D) 1959–61
Jackson B. Chase (R) 1955–57
Glenn Cunningham (R) 1957–71
Carl T. Curtis (R) 1939–54
Robert D. Harrison (R) 1951–59
Roman L. Hruska (R) 1953–54
A. L. Miller (R) 1943–59
Phil Weaver (R) 1955–63

Nevada

Walter S. Baring (D) 1949–53; 1957–73
C. Clifton Young (R) 1953–57

New Hampshire

Perkins Bass (R) 1955–63
Norris Cotton (R) 1947–54
Chester E. Merrow (R) 1943–63

New Jersey

Hugh J. Addonizio (D) 1949–62
 Dominick V. Daniels (D) 1959–77
 Cornelius E. Gallagher (D) 1959–73
 Edward J. Hart (D) 1935–55
 Charles R. Howell (D) 1949–55
 Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D) 1949–89
 Alfred D. Sieminski (D) 1951–59
 Frank Thompson, Jr. (D) 1955–80
 T. James Tumulty (D) 1955–57
 Harrison A. Williams (R) 1953–57
 James C. Auchincloss (R) 1943–65
 William T. Cahill (R) 1959–70
 Gordon Canfield (R) 1941–61
 Clifford P. Case (R) 1945–53
 Vincent J. Dellore (R) 1957–58; (D) 1958–59
 Florence P. Dwyer (R) 1957–73
 Peter H. B. Frelinghuysen, Jr. (R) 1953–75
 Milton W. Glenn (R) 1957–65
 T. Millet Hand (R) 1945–56
 Robert W. Kean (R) 1939–59
 Frank C. Osmer, Jr. (R) 1939–43; 1951–65
 George M. Wallhauser (R) 1959–65
 William B. Widnall (R) 1950–74
 Charles A. Wolvertson (R) 1927–59

New Mexico

John J. Dempsey (D) 1935–41; 1951–58
 Antonio M. Fernandez (D) 1943–56
 Joseph M. Montoya (D) 1957–64
 Thomas G. Morris (D) 1959–69

New York

Victor L. Anfuso (D) 1951–53; 1955–63
 Charles A. Buckley (D) 1935–65
 Emanuel Celler (D) 1923–73
 Irwin D. Davidson (D) 1955–56
 James J. Delaney (D) 1945–47; 1949–78
 Isidore Dollinger (D) 1949–60
 James G. Donovan (D) 1951–57
 Thaddeus J. Dulski (D) 1959–75
 Leonard Farbstein (D) 1957–71
 Sidney A. Fine (D) 1951–56
 Jacob H. Gilbert (D) 1960–71
 James C. Healey (D) 1956–65
 Louis B. Heller (D) 1949–54
 Lester Holtzman (D) 1953–61
 Edna F. Kelly (D) 1949–69
 Eugene J. Keogh (D) 1937–67

Arthur G. Klein (D) 1941–45; 1946–56
 Abraham J. Multer (D) 1947–67
 Leo W. O'Brien (D) 1952–67
 Adam C. Powell, Jr. (D) 1945–67; 1969–71
 John J. Rooney (D) 1944–74
 Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. (L) 1949–51; (D) 1951–55
 Alfred E. Santangelo (D) 1957–63
 Samuel S. Stratton (D) 1959–89
 Ludwig Teller (D) 1957–61
 Herbert Zelenko (D) 1955–63
 Robert R. Barry (R) 1959–65
 Frank J. Becker (R) 1953–65
 Albert H. Bosch (R) 1953–60
 W. Sterling Cole (R) 1935–57
 Frederic R. Coudert, Jr. (R) 1947–59
 Steven B. Derounian (R) 1953–65
 Edwin B. Dooley (R) 1957–63
 Francis E. Dorn (R) 1953–61
 Paul A. Fino (R) 1953–68
 Ralph A. Gamble (R) 1937–57
 Charles E. Goodell (R) 1959–68
 Ralph W. Gwinn (R) 1945–59
 Seymour Halpern (R) 1959–73
 Jacob K. Javits (R) 1947–54
 Bernard W. (Pat) Kearney (R) 1943–59
 Kenneth B. Keating (R) 1947–59
 Clarence Kilburn (R) 1940–65
 Henry J. Latham (R) 1945–58
 John V. Lindsay (R) 1959–65
 William E. Miller (R) 1951–65
 Harold C. Ostertag (R) 1951–65
 John R. Pillion (R) 1953–65
 Alexander Pirnie (R) 1959–73
 Edmund P. Radwan (R) 1951–59
 John H. Ray (R) 1953–63
 Daniel A. Reed (R) 1919–59
 R. Walter Riehlman (R) 1947–65
 Howard W. Robison (R) 1958–75
 Katharine St. George (R) 1947–65
 John Taber (R) 1923–63
 Dean P. Taylor (R) 1943–61
 Stuyvesant Wainwright (R) 1953–61
 Jessica McC. Weis (R) 1959–63
 J. Ernest Wharton (R) 1951–65
 William R. Williams (R) 1951–59

North Carolina

Hugh Alexander (D) 1953–63
 Graham A. Barden (D) 1935–61

Herbert C. Bonner (D) 1940–65
Frank E. Carlyle (D) 1949–57
Richard Thurmond Chatham (D) 1949–57
Harold D. Cooley (D) 1934–67
Charles B. Deane (D) 1947–57
Carl T. Durham (D) 1939–61
L. H. Fountain (D) 1953–83
David M. Hall (D) 1959–60
Woodrow W. Jones (D) 1950–57
A. Paul Kitchin (D) 1957–63
Alton Lennon (D) 1957–73
Ralph J. Scott (D) 1957–67
George A. Shuford (D) 1953–59
Roy A. Taylor (D) 1960–77
Basil L. Whitener (D) 1957–69
Charles R. Jonas (R) 1953–73

North Dakota

Quentin N. Burdick (D) 1959–60
Usher L. Burdick (R) 1935–45; 1949–59
Otto Krueger (H) 1953–59
Don L. Short (R) 1959–65

Ohio

Thomas L. Ashley (D) 1955–81
Robert E. Cook (D) 1959–63
Robert Crosser (D) 1913–19; 1923–55
Michael A. Feighan (D) 1943–71
Wayne L. Hays (D) 1949–76
Michael J. Kirwan (D) 1937–70
Robert W. Levering (D) 1959–61
Walter H. Moeller (D) 1959–63; 1965–67
James G. Polk (D) 1931–41; 1949–59
Robert T. Secrest (D) 1933–42; 1949–54; 1963–66
Charles A. Vanik (D) 1955–81
William H. Ayres (R) 1951–71
A. D. Baumhart, Jr. (R) 1941–42; 1955–61
George H. Bender (R) 1939–49; 1951–54
Jackson E. Betts (R) 1951–73
Frances P. Bolton (R) 1940–69
Oliver P. Bolton (R) 1953–57; 1963–65
Frank T. Bow (R) 1951–72
Clarence J. Brown (R) 1939–65
Cliff Clevenger (R) 1939–59
David Dennison (R) 1957–59
Samuel L. Devine (R) 1959–81
John E. Henderson (R) 1955–61

William E. Hess (R) 1929–37; 1939–49; 1951–61
Thomas A. Jenkins (R) 1925–59
Delbert L. Latta (R) 1959–89
William M. McCulloch (R) 1947–73
J. Harry McGregor (R) 1940–58
Ward M. Miller (R) 1960–61
William E. Minshall (R) 1955–75
Paul F. Schenck (R) 1951–65
Gordon H. Scherer (R) 1953–63
John M. Vorys (R) 1939–59
Alvin F. Weichel (R) 1943–55
H. Frazier Reams (Ind.) 1951–55

Oklahoma

Carl Albert (D) 1947–77
Ed Edmondson (D) 1953–73
John Jarman (D) 1951–75; (R) 1975–77
Toby Morris (D) 1947–53; 1957–61
Tom Steed (D) 1949–81
Victor Wickersham (D) 1941–47; 1949–57; 1961–65
Page Belcher (R) 1951–73

Oregon

Edith Green (D) 1955–74
Charles O. Porter (D) 1957–61
Al Ullman (D) 1957–81
Homer D. Angell (R) 1939–55
Sam Coon (R) 1953–57
M. Harris Ellsworth (R) 1943–57
A. Walter Norblad (R) 1946–64

Pennsylvania

William A. Barrett (D) 1945–47; 1949–76
Vera D. Buchanan (D) 1951–55
James A. Byrne (D) 1953–73
Earl Chudoff (D) 1949–58
Frank M. Clark (D) 1955–74
John H. Dent (D) 1958–79
Herman P. Eberharter (D) 1937–58
Daniel J. Flood (D) 1945–47; 1949–53; 1955–80
Kathryn E. Granahan (D) 1956–63
William T. Granahan (D) 1945–47; 1949–56
William J. Green, Jr. (D) 1945–47; 1949–63
Elmer J. Holland (D) 1942–43; 1956–68
Augustine B. Kelley (D) 1941–57
William S. Moorhead (D) 1959–81
Thomas E. Morgan (D) 1945–77

Robert N. C. Nix (D) 1958–79
 Stanley A. Prokop (D) 1959–61
 James M. Quigley (D) 1955–57; 1959–61
 George M. Rhodes (D) 1949–69
 Herman Toll (D) 1959–67
 Francis E. Walter (D) 1933–63
 Edward J. Bonin (R) 1953–55
 Alvin R. Bush (R) 1951–59
 Joseph L. Carrigg (R) 1951–59
 Robert J. Corbett (R) 1939–41; 1945–71
 Willard S. Curtin (R) 1957–67
 Paul B. Dague (R) 1947–67
 Douglas H. Elliott (R) 1960
 Ivor D. Fenton (R) 1939–63
 James G. Fulton (R) 1945–71
 Leon H. Gavin (R) 1943–63
 Louis E. Graham (R) 1939–55
 Benjamin F. James (R) 1949–59
 Carroll D. Kearns (R) 1947–63
 Karl C. King (R) 1951–57
 John A. Lafore, Jr. (R) 1957–61
 Samuel K. McConnell, Jr. (R) 1944–57
 William H. Milliken, Jr. (R) 1959–65
 Walter M. Mumma (R) 1951–61
 John P. Saylor (R) 1949–73
 Herman T. Schneebeli (R) 1960–77
 Hugh Scott (R) 1941–45; 1947–59
 Richard M. Simpson (R) 1937–60
 S. Walter Stauffer (R) 1953–55; 1957–59
 James E. Van Zandt (R) 1939–43; 1947–63
 J. Irving Whalley (R) 1960–73

Rhode Island

John E. Fogarty (D) 1941–44; 1945–67
 Aime J. Forand (D) 1937–39; 1941–61

South Carolina

Robert T. Ashmore (D) 1953–69
 Joseph R. Bryson (D) 1939–53
 W. J. Bryan Dorn (D) 1947–49; 1951–75
 Robert W. Hemphill (D) 1957–64
 John L. McMillan (D) 1939–73
 James P. Richards (D) 1933–57
 John J. Riley (D) 1945–49; 1951–62
 L. Mendel Rivers (D) 1941–70

South Dakota

George S. McGovern (D) 1957–61

E. Y. Berry (R) 1951–71
 Harold O. Lovre (R) 1949–57

Tennessee

Ross Bass (D) 1955–64
 Jere Cooper (D) 1929–57
 Clifford Davis (D) 1940–65
 Robert A. Everett (D) 1958–69
 Joe L. Evins (D) 1947–77
 James B. Frazier, Jr. (D) 1949–63
 J. Carlton Loser (D) 1957–63
 Tom Murray (D) 1943–67
 J. Percy Priest (D) 1941–56
 Pat Sutton (D) 1949–55
 Howard H. Baker (R) 1951–64
 B. Carroll Reece (R) 1921–31; 1933–47; 1951–61

Texas

Lindley Beckworth (D) 1939–53; 1957–67
 John J. Bell (D) 1955–57
 Lloyd M. Bentsen, Jr. (D) 1948–55
 Jack Brooks (D) 1953–95
 Omar Burleson (D) 1947–78
 Bob Casey (D) 1959–76
 Martin Dies, Jr. (D) 1931–45; 1953–59
 John Dowdy (D) 1952–73
 O. C. Fisher (D) 1943–75
 Brady Gentry (D) 1953–57
 Frank Ikard (D) 1951–61
 Paul J. Kilday (D) 1939–61
 Joe M. Kilgore (D) 1955–65
 Wingate H. Lucas (D) 1947–55
 John E. Lyle (D) 1945–55
 George H. Mahon (D) 1935–79
 Wright Patman (D) 1929–76
 W. R. Poage (D) 1937–78
 Sam Rayburn (D) 1913–61
 Kenneth Began (D) 1947–55
 Walter Rogers (D) 1951–67
 J. T. Rutherford (D) 1955–63
 Olin E. Teague (D) 1946–78
 Albert Thomas (D) 1937–66
 Clark W. Thompson (D) 1933–35; 1947–66
 W. Homer Thornberry (D) 1949–63
 J. Franklin Wilson (D) 1947–55
 James C. Wright (D) 1955–89
 John Young (D) 1957–79
 Bruce Alger (R) 1955–65

Utah

David S. King (D) 1959–63; 1965–67
William A. Dawson (R) 1947–49; 1953–59
Henry Aldous Dixon (R) 1955–61
Douglas R. Stringfellow (R) 1953–55

Vermont

William H. Meyer (D) 1959–61
Winston L. Prouty (R) 1951–59

Virginia

Watkins M. Abbitt (D) 1948–73
Thomas N. Downing (D) 1959–77
J. Vaughan Gary (D) 1945–65
Porter J. Hardy (D) 1947–69
Burr P. Harrison (D) 1946–63
W. Pat Jennings (D) 1955–67
Edward J. Robeson, Jr. (D) 1950–59
Howard W. Smith (D) 1931–67
Thomas B. Stanley (D) 1946–53
William M. Tuck (D) 1953–69
Joel T. Broyhill (R) 1953–74
Richard H. Poff (R) 1953–72
William C. Wampler (R) 1953–55; 1967–83

Washington

Julia B. Hansen (D) 1960–74
Don Magnuson (D) 1953–63
Hal Holmes (R) 1943–59
Walt Horan (R) 1943–65
Russell V. Mack (R) 1947–60
Catherine May (R) 1959–71
Thomas M. Pelly (R) 1953–73
Thor C. Tollefson (R) 1947–65
Jack Westland (R) 1953–65

West Virginia

Cleveland M. Bailey (D) 1945–47; 1949–63
M. G. Burnside (D) 1949–53; 1955–57
Robert C. Byrd (D) 1953–59
Ken Hechler (D) 1959–77
M. Elizabeth Kee (D) 1951–65
Robert H. Mollohan (D) 1953–57; 1969–83
John M. Slack, Jr. (D) 1959–80
Harley O. Staggers (D) 1949–81
Arch A. Moore, Jr. (R) 1957–69
Will E. Neal (R) 1953–55; 1957–59

Wisconsin

Gerald T. Flynn (D) 1959–61
Lester R. Johnson (D) 1953–65
Robert W. Kastenmeier (D) 1959–91
Henry S. Reuss (D) 1955–83
Clement J. Zablocki (D) 1949–83
John W. Byrnes (R) 1945–73
Glenn R. Davis (R) 1947–57; 1965–74
Merlin Hull (R) 1929–31; (Prog.) 1935–47; (R) 1947–53
Charles J. Kersten (R) 1947–49; 1951–55
Melvin R. Laird (R) 1953–69
Alvin E. O’Konski (R) 1943–73
Lawrence H. Smith (R) 1941–58
Donald E. Tewes (R) 1957–59
William K. Van Pelt (R) 1951–65
Gardner R. Withrow (R) 1931–35; (Prog.) 1935–39; (R) 1949–61

Wyoming

William H. Harrison (R) 1951–55; 1961–65; 1967–69
E. Keith Thomson (R) 1955–60

SENATE

Alabama

Lister Hill (D) 1938–69
John J. Sparkman (D) 1946–79

Alaska

E. L. Bartlett (D) 1959–69
Ernest Gruening (D) 1959–69

Arizona

Carl Hayden (D) 1927–69
Barry M. Goldwater (R) 1953–65; 1969–87

Arkansas

J. William Fulbright (D) 1945–75
John L. McClellan (D) 1943–77

California

Clair Engle (D) 1959–64
 William F. Knowland (R) 1945–59
 Thomas H. Kuchel (R) 1953–69

Colorado

John A. Carroll (D) 1957–63
 Edwin C. Johnson (D) 1937–55
 Gordon Allott (R) 1955–73
 Eugene D. Millikin (R) 1941–57

Connecticut

Thomas J. Dodd (D) 1959–71
 Prescott Bush (R) 1953–63
 William A. Purtell (R) 1952–59

Delaware

J. Allen Frear, Jr. (D) 1949–61
 John J. Williams (R) 1947–71

Florida

Spessard L. Holland (D) 1946–71
 George P. Smathers (D) 1951–69

Georgia

Walter F. George (D) 1923–57
 Richard B. Russell (D) 1933–71
 Herman E. Talmadge (D) 1957–81

Hawaii

Oren E. Long (D) 1959–63
 Hiram Fong (R) 1959–77

Idaho

Frank Church (D) 1957–81
 Henry C. Dworshak (R) 1947–49; 1949–62
 Herman Welker (R) 1951–57

Illinois

Paul H. Douglas (D) 1949–67
 Everett M. Dirksen (R) 1951–69

Indiana

Vance Hartke (D) 1959–77
 Homer E. Capehart (R) 1945–63
 William E. Jenner (R) 1944–45; 1947–59

Iowa

Guy M. Gillette (D) 1936–45; 1949–55
 Bourke B. Hickenlooper (R) 1945–69
 Thomas E. Martin (R) 1955–61

Kansas

Frank Carlson (R) 1951–69
 Andrew F. Schoeppel (R) 1949–62

Kentucky

Alben W. Barkley (D) 1927–49; 1955–56
 Earle C. Clements (D) 1950–57
 Robert Humphreys 1956–57
 John Sherman Cooper (R) 1946–49; 1952–55;
 1956–73
 Thruston B. Morton (R) 1957–69

Louisiana

Allen J. Ellender (D) 1937–72
 Russell B. Long (D) 1948–87

Maine

Edmund S. Muskie (D) 1959–80
 Frederick G. Payne (R) 1953–59
 Margeret Chase Smith (R) 1949–73

Maryland

J. Glenn Beall (R) 1953–65
 John Marshall Butler (R) 1951–63

Massachusetts

John F. Kennedy (D) 1953–60
 Leverett Saltonstall (R) 1945–67

Michigan

Philip A. Hart (D) 1959–76
 Pat V. McNamara (D) 1955–66
 Homer Ferguson (R) 1943–55
 Charles E. Potter (R) 1953–59

Minnesota

Hubert H. Humphrey (D) 1949–64; 1971–78
 Eugene J. McCarthy (D) 1959–71
 Edward J. Thye (R) 1947–59

Mississippi

James O. Eastland (D) 1941; 1943–78
John C. Stennis (D) 1947–89

Missouri

Thomas C. Hennings, Jr. (D) 1951–60
Stuart Symington (D) 1953–77

Montana

Mike Mansfield (D) 1953–77
James E. Murray (D) 1934–61

Nebraska

Hazel H. Abel (R) 1954
Eva K. Bowring (R) 1954
Hugh A. Butler (R) 1941–54
Carl T. Curtis (R) 1935–79
Dwight P. Griswold (R) 1952–54
Roman L. Hruska (R) 1954–77
Sam W. Reynolds (R) 1954

Nevada

Alan Bible (D) 1954–75
Howard W. Cannon (D) 1959–83
Pat McCarran (D) 1933–54
Ernest S. Brown (R) 1954
George W. Malone (R) 1947–59

New Hampshire

H. Styles Bridges (R) 1937–61
Norris Cotton (R) 1954–75
Charles W. Tobey (R) 1939–53
Robert W. Upton (R) 1953–54

New Jersey

Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D) 1959–82
Clifford P. Case (R) 1955–79
Robert C. Hendrickson (R) 1949–55
H. Alexander Smith (R) 1944–59

New Mexico

Clinton P. Anderson (D) 1949–73
Dennis Chavez (D) 1935–62

New York

Herbert H. Lehman (D) 1949–57
Irving M. Ives (R) 1947–59

Jacob K. Javits (R) 1957–81
Kenneth B. Keating (R) 1959–65

North Carolina

Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D) 1954–75
Clyde R. Hoey (D) 1945–54
B. Everett Jordan (D) 1958–73
Alton Lennon (D) 1953–54
W. Kerr Scott (D) 1954–58
Willis Smith (D) 1950–53

North Dakota

Quentin N. Burdick (D) 1960–92
C. Norman Brunsdale (R) 1960
William Langer (R) 1941–59
Milton R. Young (R) 1945–81

Ohio

Thomas A. Burke (D) 1954
Frank J. Lausche (D) 1957–69
Stephen M. Young (D) 1959–71
George H. Bender (R) 1954–57
John W. Bricker (R) 1947–59
Robert A. Taft (R) 1939–53

Oklahoma

Robert S. Kerr (D) 1949–63
A. S. Mike Monroney (D) 1951–69

Oregon

Richard L. Neuberger (D) 1955–60
Guy Cordon (R) 1944–55
Wayne Morse (R) 1945–52; (Ind.) 1952–55; (D) 1955–69

Pennsylvania

Joseph S. Clark (D) 1957–69
James H. Duff (R) 1951–57
Edward Martin (R) 1947–59
Hugh Scott (R) 1959–77

Rhode Island

Theodore Francis Green (D) 1937–61
John O. Pastore (D) 1950–77

South Carolina

Charles E. Daniel (D) 1954
Olin D. Johnston (D) 1945–65

Burnet R. Maybank (D) 1941–54
Strom Thurmond (D) 1954–56, 1956–64; (R)
1964–
Thomas A. Wofford (D) 1956

South Dakota

Francis Case (R) 1951–62
Karl E. Mundt (R) 1948–73

Tennessee

Albert Gore (D) 1953–71
Estes Kefauver (D) 1949–63

Texas

William A. Blakley (D) 1957
Price Daniel (D) 1953–57
Lyndon B. Johnson (D) 1949–61
Ralph W. Yarborough (D) 1957–71

Utah

Frank E. Moss (D) 1959–77
Wallace F. Bennett (R) 1951–75
Arthur V. Watkins (R) 1947–59

Vermont

George D. Aiken (R) 1941–75
Ralph E. Flanders (R) 1946–59
Winston L. Prouty (R) 1959–71

Virginia

Harry Flood Byrd (D) 1933–65
A. Willis Robertson (D) 1946–66

Washington

Henry M. Jackson (D) 1953–83
Warren G. Magnuson (D) 1944–81

West Virginia

Robert C. Byrd (D) 1959–
Harley M. Kilgore (D) 1941–56
William R. Laird, III (D) 1956
Matthew M. Neely (D) 1923–29; 1931–41; 1949–
58
Jennings, Randolph (D) 1958–85
John D. Hoblitzell, Jr. (R) 1958
Chapman Revercomb (R) 1943–49; 1956–59

Wisconsin

William Proxmire (D) 1957–89
Joseph R. McCarthy (R) 1947–57
Alexander Wiley (R) 1939–63

Wyoming

Lester C. Hunt (D) 1949–54
Gale W. McGee (D) 1959–77
Joseph C. O'Mahoney (D) 1934–53; 1954–61
Edward D. Crippa (R) 1954
Frank A. Barrett (R) 1953–59

GOVERNORS

Alabama

James E. Folsom (D) 1947–51; 1955–59
Gordon Persons (D) 1951–55
John Patterson (D) 1959–63

Alaska

William A. Egan (D) 1959–67

Arizona

Howard Pyle (R) 1951–55
Ernest W. McFarland (D) 1955–59
Paul Fannin (R) 1959–65

Arkansas

Francis Cherry (D) 1953–55
Orval E. Faubus (D) 1955–67

California

Earl Warren (R) 1943–53
Goodwin J. Knight (R) 1953–59
Edmund G. Brown (D) 1959–67

Colorado

Dan Thornton (R) 1951–55
Ed. C. Johnson (D) 1955–57
Stephen L. McNichols (D) 1957–63

Connecticut

John Davis Lodge (R) 1951–55
Abraham A. Ribicoff (D) 1955–61

Delaware

J. Cabel Boggs (R) 1953–60

Florida

Dan McCarty (D) 1953
Charley E. Johns (D) (acting) 1953–55
LeRoy Collins (D) 1955–61

Georgia

Herman Talmadge (D) 1948–55
Marvin Griffin (D) 1955–59
Ernest Vandiver (D) 1959–63

Hawaii

William F. Quinn (R) 1959–63

Idaho

Len B. Jordan (R) 1951–55
Robert E. Smylie (D) 1955–67

Illinois

William G. Stratton (R) 1953–61

Indiana

George N. Craig (R) 1953–57
Harold W. Handley (R) 1957–61

Iowa

William S. Beardsley (R) 1949–54
Leo A. Hoegh (R) 1954–57
Herschel C. Loveless (D) 1957–61

Kansas

Edward F. Arn (R) 1951–55
Fred Hall (R) 1955–57
George Docking (D) 1957–61

Kentucky

Lawrence W. Wetherby (D) 1950–56
Albert B. Chandler (D) 1956–59
Bert T. Combs (D) 1959–63

Louisiana

Robert F. Kennon (D) 1952–56
Earl K. Long (D) 1956–60
Jimmie H. Davis (D) 1960–64

Maine

Burton M. Cross (R) 1953–55
Edmund S. Muskie (D) 1955–59
Clinton A. Clauson (D) 1959
John H. Reed (R) 1960–67

Maryland

Theodore R. McKeldin, Jr. (R) 1951–59
J. Millard Tawes (D) 1959–67

Massachusetts

Christian A. Herter (R) 1953–57
Foster Furcolo (D) 1957–61

Michigan

G. Mennen Williams (D) 1949–61

Minnesota

C. Elmer Anderson (R) 1951–55
Orville L. Freeman (D) (FL) 1955–61

Mississippi

Hugh White (D) 1952–56
James P. Coleman (D) 1956–60
Ross R. Barnett (D) 1960–64

Missouri

Phil M. Donnelly (D) 1953–57
James T. Blair, Jr. (D) 1957–61

Montana

J. Hugo Aronson (R) 1953–61

Nebraska

Robert B. Crosby (R) 1953–55
Victor E. Anderson (R) 1955–59
Ralph G. Brooks (D) 1959–60

Nevada

Charles H. Russell (R) 1951–59
Grant Sawyer (D) 1959–67

New Hampshire

Hugh Gregg (R) 1953–55
 Lane Dwinell (R) 1955–59
 Wesley Powell (R) 1959–63

New Jersey

Alfred E. Driscoll (R) 1947–54
 Robert B. Meyner (D) 1954–62

New Mexico

Edwin L. Mechem (R) 1951–55; 1957–59; 1961–62
 John F. Simms, Jr. (D) 1955–57
 John Burroughs (D) 1959–61

New York

Thomas E. Dewey (R) 1943–55
 Averell Harriman (D) 1955–59

North Carolina

William B. Umstead (D) 1953–54
 Luther H. Hodges (D) 1955–61

North Dakota

C. Norman Brunsdale (R) 1951–57
 John E. Davis (R) 1957–61

Ohio

Frank J. Lausche (D) 1945–47; 1949–57
 C. William O'Neill (R) 1957–59
 Michael V. DiSalle (D) 1959–63

Oklahoma

Johnston Murray (D) 1951–55
 Raymond Gary (D) 1955–59
 J. Howard Edmondson (D) 1959–63

Oregon

Paul L. Patterson (R) 1952–56
 Robert D. Holmes (D) 1957–59
 Mark O. Hatfield (R) 1959–67

Pennsylvania

John S. Fine (R) 1951–55
 George M. Leader (D) 1955–59
 David L. Lawrence (D) 1959–63

Rhode Island

Dennis J. Roberts (D) 1951–59
 Christopher Del Sesto (R) 1959–61

South Carolina

James F. Byrnes (D) 1951–55
 George B. Timmerman, Jr. (D) 1955–59
 Ernest F. Hollings (D) 1959–63

South Dakota

Sigurd Anderson (R) 1951–55
 Joe J. Foss (R) 1955–59
 Ralph Herseth (D) 1959–61

Tennessee

Frank G. Clement (D) 1953–59
 Buford Ellington (D) 1959–63

Texas

Allan Shivers (D) (R) 1949–57
 Price Daniel (D) 1957–63

Utah

J. Bracken Lee (R) 1949–57
 George D. Clyde (R) 1957–65

Vermont

Lee E. Emerson (R) 1951–55
 Joseph B. Johnson (R) 1955–59
 Robert T. Stafford (R) 1959–61

Virginia

John S. Battle (D) 1950–54
 Thomas B. Stanley (D) 1954–58
 J. Lindsay Almond, Jr. (D) 1958–62

Washington

Arthur B. Langlie (R) 1949–57
 Albert Rossellini (D) 1957–65

West Virginia

William C. Marland (D) 1953–57
 Cecil H. Underwood (R) 1957–61

Wisconsin

Walter J. Kohler (R) 1951–57
Vernon W. Thomson (R) 1957–59
Gaylord A. Nelson (D) 1959–63

Wyoming

Frank A. Barrett (R) 1951–53
C. J. Rogers (R) 1953–55
Milward L. Simpson (R) 1955–59
J. J. Hickey (D) 1959–61

SELECTED PRIMARY DOCUMENTS

1. First Inaugural Address, January 20, 1953
2. “Open Skies” Address, July 21, 1955
3. Eisenhower Doctrine, January 5, 1957
4. Speech Concerning Little Rock, September 24, 1957
5. Address to the American People on Science in National Security, November 7, 1957
6. “Military-Industrial Complex” Address, January 17, 1961

All documents were taken from the Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Dwight D. Eisenhower 1953–1961. The Presidency Project. Available online. URL: <http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/>.

1. First Inaugural Address, January 20, 1953

My friends, before I begin the expression of those thoughts that I deem appropriate to this moment, would you permit me the privilege of uttering a little private prayer of my own.

And I ask that you bow your heads.

Almighty God, as we stand here at this moment my future associates in the executive branch of government join me in beseeching that Thou will make full and complete our dedication to the service of the people in this throng, and their fellow citizens everywhere.

Give us, we pray, the power to discern clearly right from wrong, and allow all our words and actions to be governed thereby, and by the laws of this land. Especially we pray that our concern shall be for all the people regardless of station, race, or calling.

May cooperation be permitted and be the mutual aim of those who, under the concepts of our Constitution, hold to differing political faiths; so that all may work for the good of our beloved country and Thy glory. Amen.

My fellow citizens:

The world and we have passed the midway point of a century of continuing challenge. We sense with all our faculties that forces of good and evil are massed and armed and opposed as rarely before in history.

This fact defines the meaning of this day. We are summoned by this honored and historic ceremony to witness more than the act of one citizen swearing his oath of service, in the presence of God. We are called as a people to give testimony in the sight of the world to our faith that the future shall belong to the free.

Since this century's beginning, a time of tempest has seemed to come upon the continents of the earth. Masses of Asia have awakened to strike off shackles of the past. Great nations of Europe have fought their bloodiest wars. Thrones have toppled and their vast empires have disappeared. New nations have been born.

For our own country, it has been a time of recurring trial. We have grown in power and in responsibility. We have passed through the anxieties of depression and of war to a summit unmatched in man's history. Seeking to secure peace in the world, we have had to fight through the forests of the Argonne, to the shores of Iwo Jima, and to the cold mountains of Korea.

In the swift rush of great events, we find ourselves groping to know the full sense and meaning of these times in which we live. In our quest of understanding, we beseech God's guidance. We summon all our knowledge of the past and we scan all signs of the future. We bring all our wit and all our will to meet the question:

How far have we come in man's long pilgrimage from darkness toward light? Are we nearing the light—a day of freedom and of peace for all mankind? Or are the shadows of another night closing in upon us?

Great as are the preoccupations absorbing us at home, concerned as we are with matters that deeply affect our livelihood today and our vision of the future, each of these domestic problems is dwarfed by, and often even created by, this question that involves all human kind.

This trial comes at a moment when man's power to achieve good or to inflict evil surpasses the brightest hopes and the sharpest fears of all ages. We can turn rivers in their courses, level mountains to the plains. Oceans and land and sky are avenues for our colossal commerce. Disease diminishes and life lengthens.

Yet the promise of this life is imperiled by the very genius that has made it possible. Nations amass wealth. Labor sweats to create—and turns out devices to level not only mountains but also cities. Science seems ready to confer upon us, as its final gift, the power to erase human life from this planet.

At such a time in history, we who are free must proclaim anew our faith.

This faith is the abiding creed of our fathers. It is our faith in the deathless dignity of man, governed by eternal moral and natural laws.

This faith defines our full view of life. It establishes, beyond debate, those gifts of the Creator that are man's inalienable rights, and that make all men equal in His sight.

In the light of this equality, we know that the virtues most cherished by free people—love of truth, pride of work, devotion to country—all are treasures equally precious in the lives of the most humble and of the most exalted. The men who mine coal and fire furnaces and balance ledgers and turn lathes and pick cotton and heal the sick and plant corn—all serve as proudly, and as profitably, for America as the statesmen who draft treaties and the legislators who enact laws.

This faith rules our whole way of life. It decrees that we, the people, elect leaders not to rule but to serve. It asserts that we have the right to choice of our own work and to the reward of our own toil. It inspires the initiative that makes our productivity the wonder of the world. And it warns that any man who seeks to deny equality among all his brothers betrays the spirit of the free and invites the mockery of the tyrant.

It is because we, all of us, hold to these principles that the political changes accomplished this day do not imply turbulence, upheaval or disorder. Rather this change expresses a purpose of strengthening our dedication and devotion to the precepts of our founding documents, a conscious renewal of faith in our country and in the watchfulness of a Divine Providence.

The enemies of this faith know no god but force, no devotion but its use. They tutor men in treason. They feed upon the hunger of others. Whatever defies them, they torture, especially the truth.

Here, then, is joined no argument between slightly differing philosophies. This conflict strikes directly at the faith of our fathers and the lives of our sons. No principle or treasure that we hold, from the spiritual knowledge of our free schools and churches to the creative magic of free labor and capital, nothing lies safely beyond the reach of this struggle.

Freedom is pitted against slavery; lightness against the dark.

The faith we hold belongs not to us alone but to the free of all the world. This common bond binds the grower of rice in Burma and the planter of wheat in Iowa, the shepherd in southern Italy and the mountaineer in the Andes. It confers a common dignity upon the French soldier who dies in Indo-China, the British soldier killed in Malaya, the American life given in Korea.

We know, beyond this, that we are linked to all free peoples not merely by a noble idea but by a simple need. No free people can for long cling to any privilege or enjoy any safety in economic solitude. For all our own material might, even we need markets in the world for the surpluses of our farms and our factories. Equally, we need for these same farms and factories vital materials and products of distant lands. This basic law of interdependence, so manifest in the commerce of peace, applies with thousand-fold intensity in the event of war.

So we are persuaded by necessity and by belief that the strength of all free peoples lies in unity; their danger, in discord.

To produce this unity, to meet the challenge of our time, destiny has laid upon our country the responsibility of the free world's leadership.

So it is proper that we assure our friends once again that, in the discharge of this responsibility, we Americans know and we observe the difference between world leadership and imperialism; between firmness and truculence; between a thoughtfully calculated goal and spasmodic reaction to the stimulus of emergencies.

We wish our friends the world over to know this above all: we face the threat—not with dread and confusion—but with confidence and conviction.

We feel this moral strength because we know that we are not helpless prisoners of history. We are free men. We shall remain free, never to be proven guilty of the one capital offense against freedom, a lack of stanch faith.

In pleading our just cause before the bar of history and in pressing our labor for world peace, we shall be guided by certain fixed principles.

These principles are:

(1) Abhorring war as a chosen way to balk the purposes of those who threaten us, we hold it to be the first task of statesmanship to develop the strength that will deter the forces of aggression and promote the conditions of peace. For, as it must be the supreme purpose of all free men, so it must be the dedication of their leaders, to save humanity from preying upon itself.

In the light of this principle, we stand ready to engage with any and all others in joint effort to remove the causes of mutual fear and distrust among nations, so as to make possible drastic reduction of armaments. The sole requisites for undertaking such effort are that—in their purpose—they be aimed logically and honestly toward secure peace for all; and that—in their result—they provide methods by which every participating nation will prove good faith in carrying out its pledge.

(2) Realizing that common sense and common decency alike dictate the futility of appeasement, we shall never try to placate an aggressor by the false and wicked bargain of trading honor for security. Americans, indeed all free men, remember that in the final choice a soldier's pack is not so heavy a burden as a prisoner's chains.

(3) Knowing that only a United States that is strong and immensely productive can help defend freedom in our world, we view our Nation's strength and security as a trust upon which rests the hope of free men everywhere. It is the firm duty of each of our free citizens and of every free citizen everywhere to place the cause of his country before the comfort, the convenience of himself.

(4) Honoring the identity and the special heritage of each nation in the world, we shall never use our strength to try to impress upon another people our own cherished political and economic institutions.

(5) Assessing realistically the needs and capacities of proven friends of freedom, we shall strive to help them to achieve their own security and well-being. Likewise, we shall count upon them to assume, within the limits of their resources, their full and just burdens in the common defense of freedom.

(6) Recognizing economic health as an indispensable basis of military strength and the free world's peace, we shall strive to foster everywhere, and to practice ourselves, policies that encourage productivity and profitable trade. For the impoverishment of any single people in the world means danger to the well-being of all other peoples.

(7) Appreciating that economic need, military security and political wisdom combine to suggest regional groupings of free peoples, we hope, within the framework of the United Nations, to help strengthen such special bonds the world over. The nature of these ties must vary with the different problems of different areas.

In the Western Hemisphere, we enthusiastically join with all our neighbors in the work of perfecting a community of fraternal trust and common purpose.

In Europe, we ask that enlightened and inspired leaders of the Western nations strive with renewed vigor to make the unity of their peoples a reality. Only as free Europe unitedly marshals its strength can it effectively safeguard, even with our help, its spiritual and cultural heritage.

(8) Conceiving the defense of freedom, like freedom itself, to be one and indivisible, we hold all continents and peoples in equal regard and honor. We reject any insinuation that one race or another, one people or another, is in any sense inferior or expendable.

(9) Respecting the United Nations as the living sign of all people's hope for peace, we shall strive to make it not merely an eloquent symbol but an effective force. And in our quest for an honorable peace, we shall neither compromise, nor tire, nor ever cease.

By these rules of conduct, we hope to be known to all peoples.

By their observance, an earth of peace may become not a vision but a fact.

This hope—this supreme aspiration—must rule the way we live.

We must be ready to dare all for our country. For history does not long entrust the care of freedom to the weak or the timid. We must acquire proficiency in defense and display stamina in purpose.

We must be willing, individually and as a Nation, to accept whatever sacrifices may be required of us. A people that values its privileges above its principles soon loses both.

These basic precepts are not lofty abstractions, far removed from matters of daily living. They are laws of spiritual strength that generate and define our material strength.

Patriotism means equipped forces and a prepared citizenry. Moral stamina means more energy and more productivity, on the farm and in the factory. Love of liberty means the guarding of every resource that makes freedom possible—from the sanctity of our families and the wealth of our soil to the genius of our scientists.

And so each citizen plays an indispensable role. The productivity of our heads, our hands, and our hearts is the source of all the strength we can command, for both the enrichment of our lives and the winning of the peace.

No person, no home, no community can be beyond the reach of this call. We are summoned to act in wisdom and in conscience, to work with industry, to teach with persuasion, to preach with conviction, to weigh our every deed with care and with compassion. For this truth must be clear before us: whatever America hopes to bring to pass in the world must first come to pass in the heart of America.

The peace we seek, then, is nothing less than the practice and fulfillment of our whole faith among ourselves and in our dealings with others. This signifies more than the stilling of guns, easing the sorrow of war. More than escape from death, it is a way of life. More than a haven for the weary, it is a hope for the brave.

This is the hope that beckons us onward in this century of trial. This is the work that awaits us all, to be done with bravery, with charity, and with prayer to Almighty God.

2. "Open Skies" Address, July 21, 1955

Mr. Chairman, Gentlemen:

Disarmament is one of the most important subjects on our agenda. It is also extremely difficult. In recent years the scientists have discovered methods of making weapons many, many times more destructive of opposing armed forces—but also of homes, and industries and lives—than ever known or even imagined before. These same scientific discoveries have made much more complex the problems of limitation and control and reduction of armament.

After our victory as Allies in World War II, my country rapidly disarmed. Within a few years our armament was at a very low level. Then events occurred beyond our borders which caused us to realize that we had disarmed too much. For our own security and to safeguard peace we needed greater strength. Therefore we proceeded to rearm and to associate with others in a partnership for peace and for mutual security.

The American people are determined to maintain and if necessary increase this armed strength for as long a period as is necessary to safeguard peace and to maintain our security.

But we know that a mutually dependable system for less armament on the part of all nations would be a better way to safeguard peace and to maintain our security.

It would ease the fears of war in the anxious hearts of people everywhere. It would lighten the burdens upon the backs of the people. It would make it possible for every nation, great and small, developed and less developed, to advance the standards of living of its people, to attain better food, and clothing, and shelter, more of education and larger enjoyment of life.

Therefore the United States government is prepared to enter into a sound and reliable agreement making possible the reduction of armament. I have directed that an intensive and thorough study of this subject be made within our own government. From these studies, which are continuing, a very important principle is emerging to which I referred in my opening statement on Monday.

No sound and reliable agreement can be made unless it is completely covered by an inspection and reporting system adequate to support every portion of the agreement.

The lessons of history teach us that disarmament agreements without adequate reciprocal inspection increase the dangers of war and do not brighten the prospects of peace.

Thus it is my view that the priority attention of our combined study of disarmament should be upon the subject of inspection and reporting.

Questions suggest themselves.

How effective an inspection system can be designed which would be mutually and reciprocally acceptable within our countries and the other nations of the world? How would such a system operate? What could it accomplish?

Is certainty against surprise aggression attainable by inspection? Could violations be discovered promptly and effectively counteracted?

We have not as yet been able to discover any scientific or other inspection method which would make certain of the elimination of nuclear weapons. So far as we are aware no other nation has made such a discovery. Our study of this problem is continuing. We have not as yet been able to discover any accounting or other inspection method of being certain of the true budgetary facts of total expenditures for armament. Our study of this problem is continuing. We by no means exclude the possibility of finding useful checks in these fields.

As you can see from these statements, it is our impression that many past proposals of disarmament are more sweeping than can be insured by effective inspection.

Gentlemen, since I have been working on this memorandum to present to this Conference, I have been searching my heart and mind for something that I could say here that could convince everyone of the great sincerity of the United States in approaching this problem of disarmament.

I should address myself for a moment principally to the Delegates from the Soviet Union, because our two great countries admittedly possess new and terrible weapons in quantities which do give rise in other parts of the world, or reciprocally, to the fears and dangers of surprise attack.

I propose, therefore, that we take a practical step, that we begin an arrangement, very quickly, as between ourselves—immediately. These steps would include:

To give to each other a complete blueprint of our military establishments, from beginning to end, from one end of our countries to the other; lay out the establishments and provide the blueprints to each other.

Next, to provide within our countries facilities for aerial photography to the other country—we to provide you the facilities within our country, ample facilities for aerial reconnaissance, where you can make all the pictures you choose and take them to your own country to study, you to provide exactly the same facilities for us and we to make these examinations, and by this step to convince the world that we are providing as between ourselves against the possibility of great surprise attack, thus lessening danger and relaxing tension. Likewise we will make more easily attainable a comprehensive and effective system of inspection and disarmament, because what I propose, I assure you, would be but a beginning.

Now from my statements I believe you will anticipate my suggestion. It is that we instruct our representatives in the Subcommittee on Disarmament in discharge of their mandate from the United Nations to give priority effort to the study of inspection and reporting. Such a study could well include a step by step testing of inspection and reporting methods.

The United States is ready to proceed in the study and testing of a reliable system of inspections and reporting, and when that system is proved, then to reduce armaments with all others to the extent that the system will provide assured results.

The successful working out of such a system would do much to develop the mutual confidence which will open wide the avenues of progress for all our peoples.

The quest for peace is the statesman's most exacting duty. Security of the nation entrusted to his care is his greatest responsibility. Practical progress to lasting peace is his fondest hope. Yet in pursuit of his hope he must not betray the trust placed in him as guardian of the people's security. A sound place—with security, justice, well-being, and freedom for the people of the world—can be achieved, but only by patiently and thoughtfully following a hard and sure and tested road.

3. Eisenhower Doctrine, January 5, 1957

To the Congress of the United States:

First may I express to you my deep appreciation of your courtesy in giving me, at some inconvenience to yourselves, this early opportunity of addressing you on a matter I deem to be of grave importance to our country.

In my forthcoming State of the Union Message, I shall review the international situation generally. There are worldwide hopes which we can reasonably entertain, and there are worldwide responsibilities which we must carry to make certain that freedom—including our own—may be secure.

There is, however, a special situation in the Middle East which I feel I should, even now, lay before you.

Before doing so it is well to remind ourselves that our basic national objective in international affairs remains peace—a world peace based on justice. Such a peace must include all areas, all peoples of the world if it is to be enduring. There is no nation, great or small, with which we would refuse to negotiate, in mutual good faith, with patience and in the determination to secure a better understanding between us. Out of such understandings must, and eventually will, grow confidence and trust, indispensable ingredients to a program of peace and to plans for lifting from us all the burdens of expensive armaments. To promote these objectives, our government works tirelessly, day by day, month by month, year by year. But until a degree of success crowns our efforts that will assure to all nations peaceful existence, we must, in the interests of peace itself, remain vigilant, alert and strong.

I.

The Middle East has abruptly reached a new and critical stage in its long and important history. In past decades many of the countries in that area were not fully self-governing. Other nations exercised considerable authority in the area and the security of the region was largely built around their power. But since the First World War there has been a steady evolution toward self-government and independence. This development the United States has welcomed and has encouraged. Our country supports without reservation the full sovereignty and independence of each and every nation of the Middle East.

The evolution to independence has in the main been a peaceful process. But the area has been often troubled. Persistent cross-currents of distrust and fear with raids back and forth across national boundaries have brought about a high degree of instability in much of the Mid East. Just recently there have been hostilities involving Western European nations that once exercised much influence in the area. Also the relatively large attack by Israel in October has intensified the basic differences between that nation and its Arab neighbors. All this instability has been heightened and, at times, manipulated by International Communism.

II.

Russia's rulers have long sought to dominate the Middle East. That was true of the Czars and it is true of the Bolsheviks. The reasons are not hard to find. They do not affect Russia's security, for no one plans to use the Middle East as a base for aggression against Russia. Never for a moment has the United States entertained such a thought.

The Soviet Union has nothing whatsoever to fear from the United States in the Middle East, or anywhere else in the world, so long as its rulers do not themselves first resort to aggression.

That statement I make solemnly and emphatically.

Neither does Russia's desire to dominate the Middle East spring from its own economic interest in the area. Russia does not appreciably use or depend upon the Suez Canal. In 1955 Soviet traffic through the Canal represented only about three fourths of 1% of the total. The Soviets have no need for, and could provide no market for, the petroleum resources which constitute the principal natural wealth of the area. Indeed, the Soviet Union is a substantial exporter of petroleum products.

The reason for Russia's interest in the Middle East is solely that of power politics. Considering her announced purpose of Communizing the world, it is easy to understand her hope of dominating the Middle East.

This region has always been the crossroads of the continents of the Eastern Hemisphere. The Suez Canal enables the nations of Asia and Europe to carry on the commerce that is essential if these countries are to maintain well-rounded and prosperous economies. The Middle East provides a gateway between Eurasia and Africa.

It contains about two thirds of the presently known oil deposits of the world and it normally supplies the petroleum needs of many nations of Europe, Asia and Africa. The nations of Europe are peculiarly dependent upon this supply, and this dependency relates to transportation as well as to production! This has been vividly demonstrated since the closing of the Suez Canal and some of the pipelines. Alternate ways of transportation and, indeed, alternate sources of power can, if necessary, be developed. But these cannot be considered as early prospects.

These things stress the immense importance of the Middle East. If the nations of that area should lose their independence, if they were dominated by alien forces hostile to freedom, that would be both a tragedy for the area and for many other free nations whose economic life would be subject to near strangulation. Western Europe would be endangered just as though there had been no Marshall Plan, no North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The free nations of Asia and Africa, too, would be placed in serious jeopardy. And the countries of the Middle East would lose the markets upon which their economies depend. All this would have the most adverse, if not disastrous, effect upon our own nation's economic life and political prospects.

Then there are other factors which transcend the material. The Middle East is the birthplace of three great religions—Moslem, Christian and Hebrew. Mecca and Jerusalem are more than places on the map. They symbolize religions which teach that the spirit has supremacy over matter and that the individual has a dignity and rights of which no despotic government can rightfully deprive him. It would be intolerable if the holy places of the Middle East should be subjected to a rule that glorifies atheistic materialism.

International Communism, of course, seeks to mask its purposes of domination by expressions of good will and by superficially attractive offers of political, economic and military aid. But any free nation, which is the subject of Soviet enticement, ought, in elementary wisdom, to look behind the mask.

Remember Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania! In 1939 the Soviet Union entered into mutual assistance pacts with these then independent countries; and the Soviet Foreign Minister, addressing the Extraordinary Fifth Session of the Supreme Soviet in October 1939, solemnly and publicly declared that "we stand for the scrupulous and punctilious observance of the pacts on the basis of complete reciprocity, and we declare that all the nonsensical talk about the Sovietization of the Baltic countries is only to the interest of our common enemies and of all anti-Soviet provocateurs." Yet in 1940, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania were forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union.

Soviet control of the satellite nations of Eastern Europe has been forcibly maintained in spite of solemn promises of a contrary intent, made during World War II.

Stalin's death brought hope that this pattern would change. And we read the pledge of the Warsaw Treaty of 1955 that the Soviet Union would follow in satellite countries "the principles of mutual respect for their independence and sovereignty and non-interference in domestic affairs." But we have just seen the subjugation of Hungary by naked armed force. In the aftermath of this Hungarian tragedy, world respect for and belief in Soviet promises have sunk to a new low. International Communism needs and seeks a recognizable success.

Thus, we have these simple and indisputable facts:

1. The Middle East, which has always been coveted by Russia, would today be prized more than ever by International Communism.
2. The Soviet rulers continue to show that they do not scruple to use any means to gain their ends.
3. The free nations of the Mid East need, and for the most part want, added strength to assure their continued independence.

III.

Our thoughts naturally turn to the United Nations as a protector of small nations. Its charter gives it primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. Our country has given the United Nations its full support in relation to the hostilities in Hungary and in Egypt. The United Nations was able to bring about a cease-fire and withdrawal of hostile forces from Egypt because it was dealing with governments and peoples who had a decent respect for the opinions of mankind as reflected in the United Nations General Assembly. But in the case of Hungary, the situation was different. The Soviet Union vetoed action by the Security Council to require the withdrawal of Soviet armed forces from Hungary. And it has shown callous indifference to the recommendations, even the censure, of the General Assembly. The United Nations can always be helpful, but it cannot be a wholly dependable protector of freedom when the ambitions of the Soviet Union are involved.

IV.

Under all the circumstances I have laid before you, a greater responsibility now devolves upon the United States. We have shown, so that none can doubt, our dedication to the principle that force shall not be used internationally for any aggressive purpose and that the integrity and independence of the nations of the Middle East should be inviolate. Seldom in history has a nation's dedication to principle been tested as severely as ours during recent weeks.

There is general recognition in the Middle East, as elsewhere, that the United States does not seek either political or economic domination over any other people. Our desire is a world environment of freedom, not servitude. On the other hand many, if not all, of the nations of the Middle East are aware of the danger that stems from International Communism and welcome closer cooperation with the United States to realize for themselves the United Nations goals of independence, economic well-being and spiritual growth.

If the Middle East is to continue its geographic role of uniting rather than separating East and West; if its vast economic resources are to serve the well-being of the peoples there, as well as that of others; and if its cultures and religions and their shrines are to be preserved for the uplifting of the spirits of the peoples, then the United States must make more evident its willingness to support the independence of the freedom-loving nations of the area.

V.

Under these circumstances I deem it necessary to seek the cooperation of the Congress. Only with that cooperation can we give the reassurance needed to deter aggression, to give courage and confidence to those who are dedicated to freedom and thus prevent a chain of events which would gravely endanger all of the free world.

There have been several Executive declarations made by the United States in relation to the Middle East. There is the Tripartite Declaration of May 25, 1950, followed by the Presidential assurance of October 31, 1950, to the King of Saudi Arabia. There is the Presidential declaration of April 9, 1956, that the United States will within constitutional means oppose any aggression in the area. There is our Declaration of November 29, 1956, that a threat to the territorial integrity or political independence of Iran, Iraq, Pakistan, or Turkey would be viewed by the United States with the utmost gravity.

Nevertheless, weaknesses in the present situation and the increased danger from International Communism, convince me that basic United States policy should now find expression in joint action by the Congress and the Executive. Furthermore, our joint resolve should be so couched as to make it apparent that if need be our words will be backed by action.

VI.

It is nothing new for the President and the Congress to join to recognize that the national integrity of other free nations is directly related to our own security.

We have joined to create and support the security system of the United Nations. We have reinforced the collective security system of the United Nations by a series of collective defense arrangements. Today we have security treaties with 42 other nations which recognize that our peace and security are intertwined. We have joined to take decisive action in relation to Greece and Turkey and in relation to Taiwan.

Thus, the United States through the joint action of the President and the Congress, or, in the case of treaties, the Senate, has manifested in many endangered areas its purpose to support free and independent governments—and peace—against external menace, notably the menace of International Communism. Thereby we have helped to maintain peace and security during a period of great danger. It is now essential that the United States should manifest through joint action of the President and the Congress our determination to assist those nations of the Mid East area, which desire that assistance.

The action which I propose would have the following features.

It would, first of all, authorize the United States to cooperate with and assist any nation or group of nations in the general area of the Middle East in the development of economic strength dedicated to the maintenance of national independence.

It would, in the second place, authorize the Executive to undertake in the same region programs of military assistance and cooperation with any nation or group of nations which desires such aid.

It would, in the third place, authorize such assistance and cooperation to include the employment of the armed forces of the United States to secure and protect the territorial integrity and political independence of such nations, requesting such aid, against overt armed aggression from any nation controlled by International Communism.

These measures would have to be consonant with the treaty obligations of the United States, including the Charter of the United Nations and with any action or recommendations of the United Nations. They would also, if armed attack occurs, be subject to the overriding authority of the United Nations Security Council in accordance with the Charter.

The present proposal would, in the fourth place, authorize the President to employ, for economic and defensive military purposes, sums available under the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, without regard to existing limitations.

The legislation now requested should not include the authorization or appropriation of funds because I believe that, under the conditions I suggest, presently appropriated funds will be adequate for the balance of the present fiscal year ending June 30. I shall, however, seek in subsequent legislation the authorization of $200,000,000 to be available during each of the fiscal years 1958 and 1959 for discretionary use in the area, in addition to the other mutual security programs for the area hereafter provided for by the Congress.

VII.

This program will not solve all the problems of the Middle East. Neither does it represent the totality of our policies for the area. There are the problems of Palestine and relations between Israel and the Arab States, and the future of the Arab refugees. There is the problem of the future status of the Suez Canal. These difficulties are aggravated by International Communism, but they would exist quite apart from that threat. It is not the purpose of the legislation I propose to deal directly with these problems. The United Nations is actively concerning itself with all these matters, and we are supporting the United Nations. The United States has made clear, notably by Secretary Dulles' address of August 26, 1955, that we are willing to do much to assist the United Nations in solving the basic problems of Palestine.

The proposed legislation is primarily designed to deal with the possibility of Communist aggression, direct and indirect. There is imperative need that any lack of power in the area should be made good, not by external or alien force, but by the increased vigor and security of the independent nations of the area.

Experience shows that indirect aggression rarely if ever succeeds where there is reasonable security against direct aggression; where the government disposes of loyal security forces, and where economic conditions are such as not to make Communism seem an attractive alternative. The program I suggest deals with all three aspects of this matter and thus with the problem of indirect aggression.

It is my hope and belief that if our purpose be proclaimed, as proposed by the requested legislation, that very fact will serve to halt any contemplated aggression. We shall have heartened the patriots who are dedicated to the independence of their nations. They will not feel that they stand alone, under the menace of great power. And I should add that patriotism is, throughout this area, a powerful sentiment. It is true that fear sometimes perverts true patriotism into fanaticism and to the acceptance of dangerous enticements from without. But if that fear can be allayed, then the climate will be more favorable to the attainment of worthy national ambitions.

And as I have indicated, it will also be necessary for us to contribute economically to strengthen those countries, or groups of countries, which have governments manifestly dedicated to the preservation of independence and resistance to subversion. Such measures will provide the greatest insurance against Communist inroads. Words alone are not enough.

VIII.

Let me refer again to the requested authority to employ the armed forces of the United States to assist to defend the territorial integrity and the political independence of any nation in the area against Communist armed aggression. Such authority would not be exercised except at the desire of the nation attacked. Beyond this it is my profound hope that this authority would never have to be exercised at all.

Nothing is more necessary to assure this than that our policy with respect to the defense of the area be promptly and clearly determined and declared. Thus the United Nations and all friendly governments, and indeed governments which are not friendly, will know where we stand.

If, contrary to my hope and expectation, a situation arose which called for the military application of the policy which I ask the Congress to join me in proclaiming, I would of course maintain hour-by-hour contact with the Congress if it were in session. And if the Congress were not in session, and if the situation had grave implications, I would, of course, at once call the Congress into special session.

In the situation now existing, the greatest risk, as is often the case, is that ambitious despots may miscalculate. If power-hungry Communists should either falsely or correctly estimate that the Middle East is inadequately defended, they might be tempted to use open measures of armed attack. If so, that would start a chain of circumstances which would almost surely involve the United States in military action. I am convinced that the best insurance against this dangerous contingency is to make clear now our readiness to cooperate fully and freely with our friends of the Middle East in ways consonant with the purposes and principles of the United Nations. I intend promptly to send a special mission to the Middle East to explain the cooperation we are prepared to give.

IX.

The policy which I outline involves certain burdens and indeed risks for the United States. Those who covet the area will not like what is proposed. Already, they are grossly distorting our purpose. However, before this Americans have seen our nation's vital interests and human freedom in jeopardy, and their fortitude and resolution have been equal to the crisis, regardless of hostile distortion of our words, motives and actions.

Indeed, the sacrifices of the American people in the cause of freedom have, even since the close of World War II, been measured in many billions of dollars and in thousands of the precious lives of our youth. These sacrifices, by which great areas of the world have been preserved to freedom, must not be thrown away.

In those momentous periods of the past, the President and the Congress have united, without partisanship, to serve the vital interests of the United States and of the free world.

The occasion has come for us to manifest again our national unity in support of freedom and to show our deep respect for the rights and independence of every nation—however great, however small. We seek not violence, but peace. To this purpose we must now devote our energies, our determination, ourselves.

4. Speech Concerning Little Rock, September 24, 1957

Good Evening, My Fellow Citizens:

For a few minutes this evening I want to speak to you about the serious situation that has arisen in Little Rock. To make this talk I have come to the President's office in the White House. I could have spoken from Rhode Island, where I have been staying recently, but I felt that, in speaking from the house of Lincoln, of Jackson and of Wilson, my words would better convey both the sadness I feel in the action I was compelled today to take and the firmness with which I intend to pursue this course until the orders of the Federal Court at Little Rock can be executed without unlawful interference.

In that city, under the leadership of demagogic extremists, disorderly mobs have deliberately prevented the carrying out of proper orders from a Federal Court. Local authorities have not eliminated that violent opposition and, under the law, I yesterday issued a Proclamation calling upon the mob to disperse.

This morning the mob again gathered in front of the Central High School of Little Rock, obviously for the purpose of again preventing the carrying out of the Court's order relating to the admission of Negro children to that school.

Whenever normal agencies prove inadequate to the task and it becomes necessary for the Executive Branch of the Federal Government to use its powers and authority to uphold Federal Courts, the President's responsibility is inescapable.

In accordance with that responsibility, I have today issued an Executive Order directing the use of troops under Federal authority to aid in the execution of Federal law at Little Rock, Arkansas. This became necessary when my Proclamation of yesterday was not observed, and the obstruction of justice still continues.

It is important that the reasons for my action be understood by all our citizens.

As you know, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that separate public educational facilities for the races are inherently unequal and therefore compulsory school segregation laws are unconstitutional.

Our personal opinions about the decision have no bearing on the matter of enforcement; the responsibility and authority of the Supreme Court to interpret the Constitution are very clear. Local Federal Courts were instructed by the Supreme Court to issue such orders and decrees as might be necessary to achieve admission to public schools without regard to race—and with all deliberate speed.

During the past several years, many communities in our Southern States have instituted public school plans for gradual progress in the enrollment and attendance of school children of all races in order to bring themselves into compliance with the law of the land.

They thus demonstrated to the world that we are a nation in which laws, not men, are supreme.

I regret to say that this truth—the cornerstone of our liberties—was not observed in this instance.

It was my hope that this localized situation would be brought under control by city and State authorities. If the use of local police powers had been sufficient, our traditional method of leaving the problems in those hands would have been pursued. But when large gatherings of obstructionists made it impossible for the decrees of the Court to be carried out, both the law and the national interest demanded that the President take action.

Here is the sequence of events in the development of the Little Rock school case.

In May of 1955, the Little Rock School Board approved a moderate plan for the gradual desegregation of the public schools in that city. It provided that a start toward integration would be made at the present term in the high school, and that the plan would be in full operation by 1963. Here I might say that in a number of communities in Arkansas integration in the schools has already started and without violence of any kind. Now this Little Rock plan was challenged in the courts by some who believed that the period of time as proposed in the plan was too long.

The United States Court at Little Rock, which has supervisory responsibility under the law for the plan of desegregation in the public schools, dismissed the challenge, thus approving a gradual rather than an abrupt change from the existing system. The court found that the school board had acted in good faith in planning for a public school system free from racial discrimination.

Since that time, the court has on three separate occasions issued orders directing that the plan be carried out. All persons were instructed to refrain from interfering with the efforts of the school board to comply with the law.

Proper and sensible observance of the law then demanded the respectful obedience which the nation has a right to expect from all its people. This, unfortunately, has not been the case at Little Rock. Certain misguided persons, many of them imported into Little Rock by agitators, have insisted upon defying the law and have sought to bring it into disrepute. The orders of the court have thus been frustrated.

The very basis of our individual rights and freedoms rests upon the certainty that the President and the Executive Branch of Government will support and insure the carrying out of the decisions of the Federal Courts, even, when necessary with all the means at the President's command.

Unless the President did so, anarchy would result.

There would be no security for any except that which each one of us could provide for himself.

The interest of the nation in the proper fulfillment of the law's requirements cannot yield to opposition and demonstrations by some few persons.

Mob rule cannot be allowed to override the decisions of our courts.

Now, let me make it very clear that Federal troops are not being used to relieve local and state authorities of their primary duty to preserve the peace and order of the community. Nor are the troops there for the purpose of taking over the responsibility of the School Board and the other responsible local officials in running Central High School. The running of our school system and the maintenance of peace and order in each of our States are strictly local affairs and the Federal Government does not interfere except in a very few special cases and when requested by one of the several States. In the present case the troops are there, pursuant to law, solely for the purpose of preventing interference with the orders of the Court.

The proper use of the powers of the Executive Branch to enforce the orders of a Federal Court is limited to extraordinary and compelling circumstances. Manifestly, such an extreme situation has been created in Little Rock. This challenge must be met and with such measures as will preserve to the people as a whole their lawfully-protected rights in a climate permitting their free and fair exercise.

The overwhelming majority of our people in every section of the country are united in their respect for observance of the law—even in those cases where they may disagree with that law.

They deplore the call of extremists to violence.

The decision of the Supreme Court concerning school integration, of course, affects the South more seriously than it does other sections of the country. In that region I have many warm friends, some of them in the city of Little Rock. I have deemed it a great personal privilege to spend in our Southland tours of duty while in the military service and enjoyable recreational periods since that time.

So from intimate personal knowledge, I know that the overwhelming majority of the people in the South—including those of Arkansas and of Little Rock—are of good will, united in their efforts to preserve and respect the law even when they disagree with it.

They do not sympathize with mob rule. They, like the rest of our nation, have proved in two great wars their readiness to sacrifice for America.

A foundation of our American way of life is our national respect for law.

In the South, as elsewhere, citizens are keenly aware of the tremendous disservice that has been done to the people of Arkansas in the eyes of the nation, and that has been done to the nation in the eyes of the world.

At a time when we face grave situations abroad because of the hatred that Communism bears toward a system of government based on human rights, it would be difficult to exaggerate the harm that is being done to the prestige and influence, and indeed to the safety, of our nation and the world.

Our enemies are gloating over this incident and using it everywhere to misrepresent our whole nation. We are portrayed as a violator of those standards of conduct which the peoples of the world united to proclaim in the Charter of the United Nations. There they affirmed “faith in fundamental human rights” and “in the dignity and worth of the human person” and they did so “without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.”

And so, with deep confidence, I call upon the citizens of the State of Arkansas to assist in bringing to an immediate end all interference with the law and its processes. If resistance to the Federal Court orders ceases at once, the further presence of Federal troops will be unnecessary and the City of Little Rock will return to its normal habits of peace and order and a blot upon the fair name and high honor of our nation in the world will be removed.

Thus will be restored the image of America and of all its parts as one nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

Good night, and thank you very much.

5. Address to the American People on Science in National Security, November 7, 1957

My subject tonight is Science in National Security.

Originally this talk was to be part of one I intend to make in Oklahoma City next week. However, I found that I could not possibly deal with this subject in just one address. So tonight I shall concentrate on the most immediate aspects of this question of the relationship of science to the defense of our country.

Let me tell you plainly what I am going to do in this talk and those to follow.

I am going to lay the facts before you—the rough with the smooth. Some of these security facts are reassuring; others are not—they are sternly demanding. Some require that we resolutely continue lines of action now well begun. Others require new action, and still others new dimensions of effort. After putting these facts and requirements before you, I shall propose a program of action—a program that will demand the energetic support of not just the government but every American, if we are to make it successful.

I

First: some facts about our present security posture. It is one of great strength—but by no means should this assurance satisfy any of us. Our defenses must be adequate not just today, but tomorrow and in all the years to come, until under the safety of these defenses, we shall have secured a durable and just peace for all the world.

As of now, the United States is strong. Our nation has today, and has had for some years, enough power in its strategic retaliatory forces to bring near annihilation to the war-making capabilities of any other country.

This position of present strength did not come about by accident. The Korean War had the effect of greatly expanding our peacetime defense forces. As we began the partial demobilization of these forces we undertook also an accelerated program of modernization.

As a first step, scientific surveys were instituted soon after the Korean Armistice. The result was a decision to give a “New Look” to the defense establishment, depending for increased efficiency more upon modern science and less upon mere numbers of men.

In succeeding years there has been an across-the-board program to bring all units of our defense into line with the possibilities of modern technology. There has been, also, a high level of expenditure on research and development for defense—now running in the aggregate at something over $5 billion a year.

Later, scientific surveys focused attention and emphasis on long range ballistic missiles. Development on this item got into high gear more than two years ago. We have since been spending a billion dollars a year on this item alone.

Before discussing some of the things we urgently need to do, I would like to give you a few samples of the things that have been done in recent years by our military forces, scientists and engineers to put current scientific discovery at the service of your defense.

In our diversified family of missiles, we have weapons adapted to every kind of distance, launching and use. There are now thirty-eight different types either in operation or under development.

All combat vessels of the Navy built since 1955 have guided missiles in place of, or to supplement, guns. The Navy has in both oceans, submarines which can rise to the surface and launch, in a matter of minutes, a missile carrying a nuclear warhead, and submerge immediately—while the missile is guided to a target hundreds of miles away.

The Navy possesses an atomic depth bomb.

Since Korea, both the Army's and Navy's anti-aircraft guns have been largely replaced by surface-to-air missiles. All of our new interceptor aircraft are armed with air-to-air missiles.

Many of the traditional functions of the Army's artillery and support aircraft have been taken over by guided missiles. For example, we have already produced, in various distance ranges, hundreds of Matador, Honest John and Corporal missiles. To give you some idea of what this means in terms of explosive power: Four battalions of Corporal missiles alone are equivalent in fire power to all the artillery used in World War II.

Some of these missiles have their own built-in mechanisms for seeking out and destroying a target many miles away. Thus, the other day, a Bomarc missile, by itself, sought out a fast-moving, unmanned airplane 45 miles at sea and actually met it head-on.

Except for a dwindling number of B-36s, there is hardly an airplane in the combat units of the Air Force that was in them even as late as the Korean conflict. The B-52 jet bomber, supported by its jet tankers, is standard in our Strategic Air Command. Again, to show you what this means in terms of power: One B-52 can carry as much destructive capacity as was delivered by all the bombers in all the years of World War II combined. But the B-52 will, in turn, be succeeded by the B-58, a supersonic bomber.

Atomic submarines have been developed. One ran almost sixteen days without surfacing; another cruised under the polar ice cap for over five days.

A number of huge naval carriers are in operation, supplied with the most powerful nuclear weapons and bombers of great range to deliver them. Construction has started which will produce a carrier to be driven by atomic power.

Since 1956 we have developed nuclear explosives with radioactive fall-out of less than 4 percent of the fall-out of previous large weapons. This has obvious importance in developing nuclear defenses for use over our own territory.

In numbers, our stock of nuclear weapons is so large and so rapidly growing that we are able safely to disperse it to positions assuring its instant availability against attack, and still keep strong reserves. Our scientists assure me that we are well ahead of the Soviets in the nuclear field, both in quantity and in quality. We intend to stay ahead.

We have already shown that we can, with the precision to make it a useful military weapon, fire a large ballistic missile well over a thousand miles. Our ballistic test missiles have had successful flights to as much as 3,500 miles. An intercontinental missile is required, and we have some of them in an advanced state of development. But, because of our many forward positions, for us an intermediate range missile is for some purposes as good as an intercontinental one.

A different kind of missile, the air-breathing Snark, recently travelled over a guided course for 5,000 miles and was accurately placed on target.

We have fired three rockets to heights between 2,000 and 4,000 miles, and have received back much valuable information about outer space.

One difficult obstacle on the way to producing a useful long-range weapon is that of bringing a missile back from outer space without its burning up like a meteor, because of friction with the earth's atmosphere.

Our scientists and engineers have solved that problem. This object here in my office is an experimental missile—a nose cone. It has been hundreds of miles to outer space and back. Here it is, completely intact.

These illustrations—which are of course only a small sample of our scientists' accomplishments—I give you merely to show that our strength is not static but is constantly moving forward with technological improvement.

Long-range ballistic missiles, as they exist today, do not cancel the destructive and deterrent power of our Strategic Air Force.

The Soviet launching of earth satellites is an achievement of the first importance, and the scientists who brought it about deserve full credit and recognition. Already, useful new facts on outer space have been produced, and more are on the way, as new satellites with added instruments are launched.

Earth satellites, in themselves, have no direct present effect upon the nation's security. However, there is real military significance to these launchings, which I have previously mentioned publicly. Their current military significance lies in the advanced techniques and the competence in military technology they imply, evidenced, for example, by the powerful propulsion equipment necessarily used.

But in the main, the Soviets continue to concentrate on the development of war-making weapons and supporting industries. This, as well as their political attitude in all international affairs, serves to warn us that Soviet expansionist aims have not changed. The world has not forgotten the Soviet military invasions of such countries as Finland and Poland, their support of the war in Korea, or their use of force in their ruthless suppression of Hungarian freedom.

Eternal vigilance and increased free world military power, backed by our combined economic and spiritual strength, provide the only answer to this threat until the Soviet leaders themselves cease to consume their resources in warlike and expansionist purposes and turn them to the well-being of their own peoples.

We frankly recognize that the Soviets are building up types of power that could, if we were attacked, damage us seriously. This is because no defensive system today can possibly be air-tight in preventing all break-throughs of planes and weapons.

To aid in protecting against this, we, in partnership with Canada, have long been constructing a continental defense system reaching from far out in the Pacific around the northern edge of this continent and across the Atlantic approaches. This is a complex system of early warning radars, communication lines, electronic computers, supersonic aircraft, and ground-to-air missiles, some with atomic warheads. This organization and equipment is under constant improvement; emphasis on this improvement must be increased.

In addition to retaliatory and continental defense forces, we and our allies maintain strong ground and naval units in strategic areas of the world. In the strength and readiness of all these varied kinds of power—retaliatory, defensive and local—properly distributed and supported, lies the real deterrent to the outbreak of war. This fact brings home to all of us the tremendous importance to this country of our Allies. Not only do they maintain large military forces as part of our combined security, but they provide vital bases and areas that permit the effective deployment of all our forces for defense.

It is my conviction, supported by trusted scientific and military advisers, that, although the Soviets are quite likely ahead in some missile and special areas, and are obviously ahead of us in satellite development, as of today the over-all military strength of the free world is distinctly greater than that of the communist countries.

We must see to it that whatever advantages they have, are temporary only.

II

The next question is: How about the future?

I must say to you, in all gravity, that in spite of both the present over-all strength and the forward momentum of our defense, it is entirely possible that in the years ahead we could fall behind. I repeat: we could fall behind—unless we now face up to certain pressing requirements and set out to meet them at once.

I address myself to this problem knowing that for every American it surmounts any division among us of whatever kind. It reminds us once again that we are not partisans of any kind, we are Americans! We will close ranks as Americans, and get on with the job to be done.

According to my scientific friends, one of our greatest, and most glaring, deficiencies is the failure of us in this country to give high enough priority to scientific education and to the place of science in our national life.

Of course, these scientists properly assume that we shall continue to acquire the most modern weapons in adequate numbers as fast as they are produced; but their conviction does expose one great future danger that no amount of money or resources currently devoted to it can meet. Education requires time, incentive and skilled teachers.

They believe that a second critical need is that of giving higher priority, both public and private, to basic research.

As to these long range requirements, I shall have something to say next week.

Tonight I shall discuss two other factors, on which prompt action is possible.

The first is the tragic failure to secure the great benefits that would flow from mutual sharing of appropriate scientific information and effort among friendly countries.

Most great scientific advances of the world have been the product of free international exchange of ideas. There is hardly a nation that has not made some significant contribution to modern science.

There instantly comes to mind the contribution of Britain to jet propulsion, radar, and infra-red rays; Germany to rocketry, x-rays, and sulfa drugs; Italy to wireless telegraphy; France to radio activity; and Japan to magnetics.

In the free world, we all have a lot to give and a lot to gain in security through the pooling of scientific effort. Why should we deny to our friends information that we are sure the Soviets already have?—information our friends could use toward our mutual security.

Why, for want of the fullest practicable sharing, should we waste American research funds and talent struggling with technological problems already mastered by our friends?

Here is a way in which, at no cost, we can dramatically and quickly magnify the scientific resources at the disposal of the free world.

The second immediate requirement is that of greater concentration of effort and improved arrangements within the government in the fields of science, technology and missiles—including the continuing requirement for the closest kind of Executive-Legislative cooperation.

III

As to action: I report the following items to you tonight.

The first thing I have done is to make sure that the very best thought and advice that the scientific community can supply, heretofore provided to me on an informal basis, is now fully organized and formalized so that no gap can occur. The purpose is to make it possible for me, personally, whenever there appears to be any unnecessary delay in our development system, to act promptly and decisively.

To that end, I have created the office of Special Assistant to the President for Science and Technology. This man, who will be aided by a staff of scientists and a strong Advisory Group of outstanding experts reporting to him and to me, will have the active responsibility of helping me follow through on the program that I am partially outlining tonight and next week.

I am glad to be able to tell you that this position has been accepted by Dr. James R. Killfan, President of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He is a man who enjoys my confidence, and the confidence of his colleagues in the scientific and engineering world, and in the government.

Through him, I intend to be assured that the entire program is carried forward in closely-integrated fashion, and that such things as alleged inter-service competition or insufficient use of overtime shall not be allowed to create even the suspicion of harm to our scientific and development program. Moreover, Dr. Killfan will see to it that those projects which experts judge have the highest potential shall advance with the utmost possible speed. He will make sure that our best talent and the full necessary resources are applied on certain high-priority top-secret items that, for security reasons, I know you will not expect me to enumerate.

In looking to Dr. Killfan to discharge these responsibilities, I expect him to draw upon the full abilities of the scientists and engineers of our country.

Second: In the Defense Department is an official, directly responsible to the Secretary, in charge of missile development. I have directed that the Secretary make certain that the Guided Missile Director is clothed with all the authority that the Secretary himself possesses in this field, so that no administrative or inter-service block can occur. Dr. Killfan will, of course, work intimately with this official.

Third: The Secretary of Defense and I have agreed that any new missile or related program hereafter originated will, whenever practicable, be put under a single manager and administered without regard to the separate services.

Fourth: There will be laid before the Congress proposed legislation to remove legal barriers to the exchange of appropriate technological information with friendly countries.

Fifth: If the necessary authority is granted, I shall support, along the lines of the agreement reached with Prime Minister Macmillan, a Scientific Committee organized within NATO to carry out an enlarged Atlantic effort in research. Similar action in SEATO and comparable organizations will be studied. And, to help carry out these measures of mutual effort, the Secretary of State will appoint a Science Adviser to himself and Science Attaches in appropriate places abroad.

At any point in any of these actions where additional legal authority proves necessary, that authority will be asked of Congress at the outset of its next session. These matters will be discussed in my forthcoming bipartisan meeting with the leaders of Congress. They will be requested to consider every feasible step to hasten needed legislative action.

These, my friends, are the most immediate steps that are under way in scientific areas as they bear upon security.

Even in two talks I cannot, by any means, cover the entire subject of defense, but only selected questions of pressing and current importance. Accordingly, I am not at this time even alluding to a number of key items bearing strongly on defense, such as mutual aid, and Civil Defense. Likewise I have not dwelt upon the urgent need for greater dispersal in the Strategic Air Command, or for providing all the means that will enable airplanes to take off in the shortest possible time after receipt of warning.

In this whole effort it is important to see that nothing is wasted on non-essentials. Defense today is expensive, and growing more so. We cannot afford waste.

It misses the whole point to say that we must now increase our expenditures of all kinds on military hardware and defense—as, for example, to heed demands recently made that we restore all personnel cuts made in the armed forces.

Certainly, we need to feel a high sense of urgency. But this does not mean that we should mount our charger and try to ride off in all directions at once.

We must clearly identify the exact and critical needs that have to be met. We must then apply our resources at that point as fully as the need demands. This means selectivity in national expenditures of all kinds. We cannot, on an unlimited scale, have both what we must have and what we would like to have.

We can have both a sound defense, and the sound economy on which it rests—if we set our priorities and stick to them and if each of us is ready to carry his own share of the burden.

In conclusion: Although for tonight's purposes I stress the influence of science on defense, I am not forgetting that there is much more to science than its function in strengthening our defense, and much more to our defense than the part played by science. The peaceful contributions of science—to healing, to enriching life, to freeing the spirit—these are the most important products of the conquest of nature's secrets. And the spiritual powers of a nation—its underlying religious faith, its self-reliance, its capacity for intelligent sacrifice—these are the most important stones in any defense structure.

Above all, let me say for all to hear that, so far as we are concerned, the amassing of military might never has been—and never will be—devoted to any other end than defense and the preservation of a just peace.

What the world needs today even more than a giant leap into outer space, is a giant step toward peace. Time and again we have demonstrated our eagerness to take such a step. As a start in this direction, I urge the Soviets now to align themselves with the practical and workable disarmament proposals, approved yesterday by a large majority in the United Nations.

Never shall we cease to hope and work for the coming of the day when enduring peace will take these military burdens from the back of mankind, and when the scientist can give his full attention, not to human destruction, but to human happiness and fulfillment.

Thank you—and good night.

6. "Military-Industrial Complex" Address, January 17, 1961

My fellow Americans:

Three days from now, after half a century in the service of our country, I shall lay down the responsibilities of office as, in traditional and solemn ceremony, the authority of the Presidency is vested in my successor.

This evening I come to you with a message of leave-taking and farewell, and to share a few final thoughts with you, my countrymen.

Like every other citizen, I wish the new President, and all who will labor with him, Godspeed. I pray that the coming years will be blessed with peace and prosperity for all.

Our people expect their President and the Congress to find essential agreement on issues of great moment, the wise resolution of which will better shape the future of the Nation.

My own relations with the Congress, which began on a remote and tenuous basis when, long ago, a member of the Senate appointed me to West Point, have since ranged to the intimate during the war and immediate post-war period, and, finally, to the mutually interdependent during these past eight years.

In this final relationship, the Congress and the Administration have, on most vital issues, cooperated well, to serve the national good rather than mere partisanship, and so have assured that the business of the Nation should go forward. So, my official relationship with the Congress ends in a feeling, on my part, of gratitude that we have been able to do so much together.

II.

We now stand ten years past the midpoint of a century that has witnessed four major wars among great nations. Three of these involved our own country. Despite these holocausts America is today the strongest, the most influential and most productive nation in the world. Understandably proud of this pre-eminence, we yet realize that America's leadership and prestige depend, not merely upon our unmatched material progress, riches and military strength, but on how we use our power in the interests of world peace and human betterment.

III.

Throughout America's adventure in free government, our basic purposes have been to keep the peace; to foster progress in human achievement, and to enhance liberty, dignity and integrity among people and among nations. To strive for less would be unworthy of a free and religious people. Any failure traceable to arrogance, or our lack of comprehension or readiness to sacrifice would inflict upon us grievous hurt both at home and abroad.

Progress toward these noble goals is persistently threatened by the conflict now engulfing the world. It commands our whole attention, absorbs our very beings. We face a hostile ideology—global in scope, atheistic in character, ruthless in purpose, and insidious in method. Unhappily the danger it poses promises to be of indefinite duration. To meet it successfully, there is called for, not so much the emotional and transitory sacrifices of crisis, but rather those which enable us to carry forward steadily, surely, and without complaint the burdens of a prolonged and complex struggle—with liberty the stake. Only thus shall we remain, despite every provocation, on our chartered course toward permanent peace and human betterment.

Crises there will continue to be. In meeting them, whether foreign or domestic, great or small, there is a recurring temptation to feel that some spectacular and costly action could become the miraculous solution to all current difficulties. A huge increase in newer elements of our defense; development of unrealistic programs to cure every ill in agriculture; a dramatic expansion in basic and applied research—these and many other possibilities, each possibly promising in itself, may be suggested as the only way to the road we wish to travel.

But each proposal must be weighed in the light of a broader consideration: the need to maintain balance in and among national programs—balance between the private and the public economy, balance between cost and hoped for advantage—balance between the clearly necessary and the comfortably desirable; balance between our essential requirements as a nation and the duties imposed by the nation upon the individual; balance between actions of the moment and the national welfare of the future. Good judgment seeks balance and progress; lack of it eventually finds imbalance and frustration.

The record of many decades stands as proof that our people and their government have, in the main, understood these truths and have responded to them well, in the face of stress and threat. But threats, new in kind or degree, constantly arise. I mention two only.

IV.

A vital element in keeping the peace is our military establishment. Our arms must be mighty, ready for instant action, so that no potential aggressor may be tempted to risk his own destruction.

Our military organization today bears little relation to that known by any of my predecessors in peacetime, or indeed by the fighting men of World War II or Korea.

Until the latest of our world conflicts, the United States had no armaments industry. American makers of plowshares could, with time and as required, make swords as well. But now we can no longer risk emergency improvisation of national defense; we have been compelled to create a permanent armaments industry of vast proportions. Added to this, three and a half million men and women are directly engaged in the defense establishment. We annually spend on military security more than the net income of all United States corporations.

This conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry is new in the American experience. The total influence—economic, political, even spiritual—is felt in every city, every State house, every office of the Federal government. We recognize the imperative need for this development. Yet we must not fail to comprehend its grave implications. Our toil, resources and livelihood are all involved; so is the very structure of our society.

In the councils of government, we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex. The potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will persist.

We must never let the weight of this combination endanger our liberties or democratic processes. We should take nothing for granted. Only an alert and knowledgeable citizenry can compel the proper meshing of the huge industrial and military machinery of defense with our peaceful methods and goals, so that security and liberty may prosper together.

Akin to, and largely responsible for the sweeping changes in our industrial-military posture, has been the technological revolution during recent decades.

In this revolution, research has become central; it also becomes more formalized, complex, and costly. A steadily increasing share is conducted for, by, or at the direction of, the Federal government.

Today, the solitary inventor, tinkering in his shop, has been over-shadowed by task forces of scientists in laboratories and testing fields. In the same fashion, the free university, historically the fountainhead of free ideas and scientific discovery, has experienced a revolution in the conduct of research. Partly because of the huge costs involved, a government contract becomes virtually a substitute for intellectual curiosity. For every old blackboard there are now hundreds of new electronic computers.

The prospect of domination of the nation's scholars by Federal employment, project allocations, and the power of money is ever present—and is gravely to be regarded.

Yet, in holding scientific research and discovery in respect, as we should, we must also be alert to the equal and opposite danger that public policy could itself become the captive of a scientific-technological elite.

It is the task of statesmanship to mold, to balance, and to integrate these and other forces, new and old, within the principles of our democratic system—ever aiming toward the supreme goals of our free society.

V.

Another factor in maintaining balance involves the element of time. As we peer into society's future, we—you and I, and our government—must avoid the impulse to live only for today, plundering, for our own ease and convenience, the precious resources of tomorrow. We cannot mortgage the material assets of our grandchildren without risking the loss also of their political and spiritual heritage. We want democracy to survive for all generations to come, not to become the insolvent phantom of tomorrow.

VI.

Down the long lane of the history yet to be written America knows that this world of ours, ever growing smaller, must avoid becoming a community of dreadful fear and hate, and be instead, a proud confederation of mutual trust and respect.

Such a confederation must be one of equals. The weakest must come to the conference table with the same confidence as do we, protected as we are by our moral, economic, and military strength. That table, though scarred by many past frustrations, cannot be abandoned for the certain agony of the battlefield.

Disarmament, with mutual honor and confidence, is a continuing imperative. Together we must learn how to compose differences, not with arms, but with intellect and decent purpose. Because this need is so sharp and apparent I confess that I lay down my official responsibilities in this field with a definite sense of disappointment. As one who has witnessed the horror and the lingering sadness of war—as one who knows that another war could utterly destroy this civilization which has been so slowly and painfully built over thousands of years—I wish I could say tonight that a lasting peace is in sight.

Happily, I can say that war has been avoided. Steady progress toward our ultimate goal has been made. But, so much remains to be done. As a private citizen, I shall never cease to do what little I can to help the world advance along that road.

VII.

So—in this my last good night to you as your President—I thank you for the many opportunities you have given me for public service in war and peace. I trust that in that service you find some things worthy; as for the rest of it, I know you will find ways to improve performance in the future.

You and I—my fellow citizens—need to be strong in our faith that all nations, under God, will reach the goal of peace with justice. May we be ever unswerving in devotion to principle, confident but humble with power, diligent in pursuit of the Nation's great goals.

To all the peoples of the world, I once more give expression to America's prayerful and continuing aspiration:

We pray that peoples of all faiths, all races, all nations, may have their great human needs satisfied; that those now denied opportunity shall come to enjoy it to the full; that all who yearn for freedom may experience its spiritual blessings; that those who have freedom will understand, also, its heavy responsibilities; that all who are insensitive to the needs of others will learn charity; that the scourges of poverty, disease and ignorance will be made to disappear from the earth, and that, in the goodness of time, all peoples will come to live together in a peace guaranteed by the binding force of mutual respect and love.

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY

General Studies of the 1950s

Diggins, John Patrick. The Proud Decades: America in War and Peace, 1941–1960. New York: Norton & Co., 1988.

Donaldson, Gary. Abundance and Anxiety: America, 1945–1960. Westport, Conn.: Praeger Books, 1997.

Goldman, Eric. The Crucial Decade. New York: Vintage Books, 1961.

Halberstam, David. The Fifties. New York: Villard Books, 1993.

Jezer, Mark. The Dark Ages: Life in the United States, 1946–1960. Boston: South End Press, 1982.

Kallen, Stuart. The 1950s. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

Mayer, Michael S. (ed.). The Eisenhower Presidency and the 1950s. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1998.

Oakley, J. Ronald. God's Country: America in the Fifties. New York: Dembner Books, 1986.

O'Neill, William. American High: The Years of Confidence 1945–1960. New York: Free Press, 1986.

Reichard, Gary. Politics as Usual: The Age of Truman and Eisenhower. Arlington Heights, Ill.: Harlan Davidson, 1988.

Young, William and Nancy. The 1950s. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2004.

Dwight D. Eisenhower and the Eisenhower Administration

Adams, Sherman. First Hand Report: The Story of the Eisenhower Administration. New York: Harper, 1961.

Alexander, Charles C. Holding the Line: The Eisenhower Era, 1952–1961. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1975.

Ambrose, Stephen. Eisenhower: Soldier and President. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1983.

———. Eisenhower: The President. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984.

Bischoff, Gunter, and Stephen Ambrose (eds.). Eisenhower: A Centenary Assessment. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995.

Burk, Robert. Dwight D. Eisenhower: Hero and Politician. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1986.

Cook, Blanche. The Declassified Eisenhower. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1981.

Damms, Richard V. The Eisenhower Presidency, 1955–1961. London: Longman, 2002.

Eisenhower, Dwight D. Mandate For Change. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1963.

———. Waging Peace. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1965.

Ewald, William Bragg, Jr. Eisenhower the President: Crucial Days: 1951–1960. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1981.

Ferrell, Robert H. (ed.). The Eisenhower Diaries. New York: W. W. Norton & Co., 1981.

Greenstein, Fred I. The Hidden-Hand Presidency: Eisenhower as Leader. New York: Basic Books, 1982.

Griffith, Robert W. (ed.). Ike's Letters to a Friend, 1941–1958. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1984.

Kinnard, Douglas. Eisenhower: Soldier-Statesman of the American Century. Washington, D.C.: Potomac Books, 2002.

- Krieg, Joann. Dwight D. Eisenhower: Soldier, President, Statesman. New York: Greenwood Press, 1987.
- Larson, Arthur. Eisenhower: The President That Nobody Knows. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1968.
- Lee, R. Alton. Dwight D. Eisenhower: Soldier and Statesman. Chicago: Burnham Publishing, 1981.
- Mayer, Michael S. (ed.). The Eisenhower Presidency and the 1950s. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1998.
- Murray, Charles. Losing Ground: American Social Policy, 1950–1980. New York: Basic Books, 1984.
- Neal, Steve. The Eisenhowers. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1984.
- Pach, Chester, and Elmo Richardson. The Presidency of Dwight D. Eisenhower. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1991.
- Parment, Herbert. Eisenhower and the American Crusades. New York: Macmillan, 1972.
- Pickett, William B. Dwight David Eisenhower and American Power. Wheeling, Ill.: Harlan Davidson, 1995.
- Warshaw, Shirley Anne. Reexamining the Eisenhower Presidency. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993.
- Politics
- Bartley, E. R. The Tidelands Oil Controversy. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1953.
- Bean, Louis H. Influences in the 1954 Mid-Term Elections. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Institute, 1954.
- Dallek, Robert. Lone Star Rising: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, 1908–1960. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Eulau, Heinz. Class and Party in the Eisenhower Years: Class Roles in Perspective in the 1952 and 1956 Elections. New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1962.
- Harris, Louis. Is There a Republican Majority? New York: Harper, 1954.
- Johnson, Walter (ed.). The Papers of Adlai E. Stevenson. Boston: Little, Brown, 1972.
- . How We Drafted Stevenson. New York: Knopf, 1955.
- Lodge, Henry Cabot. As It Was: An Inside View of Politics and Power in the '50s and '60s. New York: Norton, 1976.
- Lubell, Samuel. Revolt of the Moderates. New York: Harper, 1956.
- Martin, Joe. My First Fifty Years in Politics. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1960.
- Matthews, Donald R. U.S. Senators and Their World. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1960.
- Morgan, Iwan W. Eisenhower versus "The Spenders": The Eisenhower Administration, the Democrats, and the Budget, 1953–60. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990.
- Redding, Jack. Inside the Democratic Party. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1958.
- Reichard, Gary. The Reaffirmation of Republicanism: Eisenhower and the 83rd Congress. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1985.
- Richardson, Elmo. Dams, Parks, and Politics: Resource Development and Preservation in the Truman-Eisenhower Era. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1973.
- Rovere, Richard. The American Establishment and Other Reports, Opinions, and Speculations. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1962.
- Soth, Lauren. Farm Trouble. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1957.
- Stone, I. F. The Haunted Fifties. New York: Random House, 1963.
- Theoharis, Athan. The Yalta Myths: An Issue in U.S. Politics, 1945–1955. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1970.
- Thomson, C. A. H., and F. N. Shattuck. The 1956 Presidential Campaign. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institute, 1960.
- Tillet, Paul (ed.). Inside Politics: The National Conventions, 1960. Dobbs Ferry, N.Y.: Oceana Publications, 1962.
- Weinstein, Allen, and Alexander Vassilev. The Haunted Wood: Soviet Espionage in America—The Stalin Era. New York: Random House, 1999.
- Wildavsky, Aaron. Dixon-Yates: A Study in Power Politics. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1962.
- Willoughby, William B. The St. Lawrence Waterway: A Study in Politics and Diplomacy. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1961.
- Wills, Garry. Nixon Agonistes: The Crisis of the Self-Made Man. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1970.

Congress

- Bass, Jack, and Marilyn W. Thompson. Strom: The Complicated Personal and Political Life of Strom Thurmond. New York: Public Affairs, 2005.
- Bolling, Richard. House Out of Order. New York: Dutton, 1965.
- Bowles, Chester. Promises to Keep. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.
- Clark, Joseph S. The Senate Establishment. New York: Hill & Wang, 1963.
- Douglas, Paul H. In the Fullness of Time. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1972.
- Evans, Rowland, and Robert Novak. Lyndon B. Johnson: The Exercise of Power. New York: New American Library, 1966.
- Flanders, Ralph E. Senator from Vermont. Boston: Little, Brown, 1961.
- Fontenay, Charles L. Estes Kefauver. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1980.
- Gorman, Joseph B. Kefauver: A Political Biography. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Gruening, Ernest H. Many Battles. New York: Liveright, 1973.
- Huitt, Ralph K., and Robert L. Peabody (eds.). Congress: Two Decades of Analysis. New York: Harper & Row, 1969.
- Humphrey, Hubert H. The Education of a Public Man: My Life and Politics. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1976.
- Johnson, Haynes, and Bernard M. Gwertzman. Fulbright: The Dissenter. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1968.
- Manley, John F. The Politics of Finance: The House Ways and Means Committee. Boston: Little, Brown, 1970.
- Martin, Joseph. My First Fifty Years in Politics. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1973.
- McAdams, Alan K. Power and Politics in Labor Legislation. New York: Columbia University Press, 1964.
- McNeil, Neil. Dirksen: Portrait of a Public Man. New York: World Publishing Co., 1970.
- Montgomery, Gayle B., and James W. Johnson. One Step from the White House: The Rise and Fall of Senator William F. Knowland. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Nevins, Allan. Herbert Lehman and His Era. New York: Scribner, 1963.
- Ognibene, Peter I. Scoop: The Life and Politics of Henry M. Jackson. New York: Stein & Day, 1975.
- Patterson, James. Mr. Republican: A Biography of Robert A. Taft. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1972.
- Pearson, Drew, and Jack Anderson. The Case against Congress. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1967.
- Potter, Charles. Days of Shame. New York: Coward-McCann, 1965.
- Powell, Adam Clayton. Adam by Adam. New York: Dial Press, 1971.
- Robertson, David. Sly and Able: A Political Biography of James F. Byrnes. New York: Norton, 1994.
- Schapsmeier, Edward L., and Frederick H. Schapsmeier. Dirksen of Illinois. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1985.
- Sheele, Henry Z. Charlie Halleck. New York: Exposition Press, 1966.
- Smith, A. Robert. The Tiger in the Senate: The Biography of Wayne Morse. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1962.
- Smith, Margaret Chase. Declaration of Conscience. New York: Doubleday, 1972.
- Steinberg, Alfred. Sam Rayburn. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1975.
- Sykes, Jay G. Proxmire. Washington, D.C.: R. B. Luce, 1972.
- Wellman, Paul I. Stuart Symington: Portrait of a Man with a Mission. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1960.
- White, William S. Citadel: The Story of the United States Senate. New York: Harper, 1957.
- . The Taft Story. New York: Harper, 1954.

Red Scare

- Adams, John G. Without Precedent: The Story of the Death of McCarthyism. New York: Norton, 1983.
- Anderson, Jack, and Ronald May. McCarthy: The Man, the Senator and the "ism." Boston: Beacon Press, 1952.
- Bayley, Edwin R. Joe McCarthy and the Press. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981.
- Brown, Ralph S., Jr. Loyalty and Security: Employment Tests in the U.S. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1958.
- Buckley, William F., Jr., and L. Brent Bozell. McCarthy and His Enemies: The Record and Meaning. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954.

- Caute, David. The Great Fear: The Anti-Communist Purge under Truman and Eisenhower. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1978.
- Chambers, Whittaker. Odyssey of a Friend: Whittaker Chambers' Letters to William F. Buckley Jr. 1954–61. New York: National Review, 1969.
- Cohn, Roy. McCarthy. New York: New American Library, 1968.
- Cook, Fred J. The Nightmare Decade: The Life and Times of Sen. Joseph McCarthy. New York: Random House, 1971.
- Eden, Anthony. The Suez Crisis of 1956. Boston: Beacon Press, 1966.
- Ewald, William Bragg. McCarthyism and Consensus. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1986.
- . Who Killed Joe McCarthy? New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984.
- Freeland, Richard. The Truman Doctrine and the Origins of McCarthyism. New York: Knopf, 1972.
- Fried, Albert. McCarthyism: The Great American Red Scare: A Documentary History. New York: Oxford Press, 1997.
- Fried, Richard M. Men against McCarthy. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.
- . Nightmare in Red: The McCarthy Era in Perspective. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Goodman, Walter. The Committee. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1968.
- Griffith, Robert. The Politics of Fear: Joseph McCarthy and the Senate. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1970.
- Griffith, Robert, and Athan Theoharis (eds.). The Specter: Original Essays on the Cold War and McCarthyism. New York: New Viewpoints, 1974.
- Haynes, John. Red Scare or Red Menace. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1996.
- Klehr, Harvey, and John Earl Haynes. The American Communist Movement: Storming Heaven Itself. New York: Twayne Publishing, 1992.
- Klehr, Harvey, John Earl Haynes, and Fredrikh Igorevich Firsov. The Secret World of American Communism. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1995.
- Latham, Earl. The Communist Controversy in Washington. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1966.
- Matusow, Harvey. False Witness. New York: Cameron & Kahn, 1955.
- Morgan, Ted. Reds: McCarthyism in Twentieth-Century America. New York: Random House, 2003.
- O'Brien, Michael. McCarthy and McCarthyism in Wisconsin. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1980.
- O'Reilly, Kenneth. Hoover and the Un-Americans: The FBI, HUAC, and the Red Menace. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1983.
- Oshinsky, David. A Conspiracy So Immense: The World of Joe McCarthy. New York: Free Press, 1983.
- Powers, Richard Gidd. Secrecy and Power: The Life of J. Edgar Hoover. New York: Free Press, 1987.
- Reeves, Thomas. The Life and Times of Joe McCarthy. New York: Stein & Day, 1982.
- Rogin, Michael Paul. The Intellectuals and McCarthy. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967.
- Rovere, Richard. Senator Joe McCarthy. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1959.
- Schrecker, Ellen. The Age of McCarthyism: A Brief History With Documents. Boston: Bedford Books of St. Martin's Press, 1994.
- . Many Are the Crimes: McCarthyism in America. Boston: Little, Brown, 1998.
- . No Ivory Tower: McCarthyism and the Universities. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Theoharis, Athan. Seeds of Repression. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1971.
- Watkins, Arthur. Enough Rope. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1969.
- Weinstein, Allen. Perjury: The Hiss-Chambers Case. New York: Random House, 1978.
- Weinstein, Allen, and Alexander Vassiliev. The Haunted Wood. New York: Random House, 1999.
- Ybarra, Michael J. Washington Gone Crazy: Senator Pat McCarran and the Great American Communist Hunt. Hanover, N.H.: Steerforth Press, 2004.

Foreign Policy

- Alteras, Isaac. Eisenhower and Israel: U.S.-Israeli Relations, 1953–1960. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1993.
- Ambrose, Stephen. Rise to Globalism: American Foreign Policy since 1938. New York: Penguin Books, 1988.

- Anderson, David. Trapped by Success: The Eisenhower Administration and Vietnam, 1953–1961. New York: Columbia University Press, 1991.
- Arnold, James R. The First Domino: Eisenhower, the Military, and America's Intervention in Vietnam. New York: W. Morrow, 1991.
- Baldwin, David. Economic Development and American Foreign Policy, 1943–1962. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.
- Bandle, Robert E. Geneva: 1954. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1969.
- Berding, Andrew H. Dulles on Diplomacy. Princeton: Van Nostrand, 1965.
- Beschloss, Michael. Mayday: Eisenhower, Khrushchev, and the U-2 Affair. New York: Harper & Row, 1986.
- Bill, James A. The Eagle and the Lion: The Tragedy of American-Iranian Relations. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1983.
- Bill, James A., and William Roger Louis. Musaddiq: Iranian Nationalism and Oil. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988.
- Billings-Yun, Melanie. Decision against War: Eisenhower and Dien Bien Phu, 1954. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Bonsal, Phillip W. Cuba, Castro, and the United States. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1971.
- Bowie, Robert R., and Richard W. Immermann. Waging Peace: How Eisenhower Shaped an Enduring Cold War Strategy. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Bowles, Chester. Africa's Challenge to the Americans. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1957.
- Boyle, Peter (ed.). The Churchill-Eisenhower Correspondence. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.
- Campbell, John C. Defense of the Middle East. New York: Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1960.
- Clayton, Lawrence. Peru and the United States: The Condor and the Eagle. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1999.
- Cook, Blauche Wiesen. The Declassified Eisenhower. New York: Penguin, 1984.
- Deshpande, Javashri. Indonesia: The Impossible Dream: The United States and the 1958 Rebellion. New Delhi: Prachi Prakashan, 1981.
- Devillers, Phillip, and Jean Lacoutre. End of a War: Indo-China, 1954. New York: Praeger, 1969.
- Divine, Robert. Eisenhower and the Cold War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.
- Dockrill, Saki. Eisenhower's New-Look National Security Policy, 1953–61. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996.
- Draper, Theodore. Castro's Revolution. New York: Praeger, 1962.
- Drummond, Roscoe, and Gaston Coblentz. Duel at the Brink: John Foster Dulles' Command of American Power. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1960.
- Dulles, Eleanor Lansing. John Foster Dulles: The Last Year. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1963.
- Dulles, Foster Rhea. American Policy toward Communist China, 1949–1969. New York: Crowell, 1972.
- Dunn, Frederick S. Peacemaking and the Settlement with Japan. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1963.
- Eisenhower, Milton. The Wine Is Bitter. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1963.
- Elliot, William Y., et al. The Political Economy of American Foreign Policy. New York: Holt, 1955.
- Fall, Bernard B. The Two Viet-Nams: A Political and Military Analysis. New York: Praeger, 1963.
- Fernea, Robert, et al. The Iraqi Revolution of 1958: The Old Social Classes Revisited. New York: I. B. Tauris, 1991.
- Finer, Herman. Dulles over Suez. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1964.
- Finletter, Thomas K. Foreign Policy: The Next Phase. New York: Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1958.
- . Power and Policy: U.S. Foreign Policy and Military Power in the Hydrogen Age. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1954.
- Foot, Rosemary. A Substitute for Victory: The Politics of Peacemaking at the Korean Armistice Talks. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1990.
- Gardner, Lloyd. Approaching Vietnam: From World War II through Dienbienphu, 1941–1954. New York: W. W. Norton & Co., 1988.
- Garthoff, Raymond. Assessing the Adversary: Estimates by the Eisenhower Administration of Soviet

- Intentions and Capabilities*. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institute, 1991.
- Gasiorowski, Mark J., and Malcolm Byrne (eds.). Mohammad Mosaddeq and the 1953 Coup in Iran. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2004.
- Gelber, Lionel. America in Britain's Place: The Leadership of the West and Anglo-American Unity. New York: Praeger, 1961.
- Gembone, Michael D. Eisenhower, Somoza, and the Cold War in Nicaragua, 1953–1961. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1999.
- Gleijeses, Piero. Shattered Hopes: The Guatemala Revolution and the United States, 1944–1955. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Gray, William Glenn. Germany's Cold War: The Global Campaign to Isolate East Germany, 1949–1969. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003.
- Gukin, Michael. John Foster Dulles: A Statesman and His Times. New York: Columbia University Press, 1972.
- Gurtov, Melvin. The First Vietnam Crisis: Chinese Communist Strategy and United States Involvement, 1953–1954. New York: Columbia University Press, 1967.
- Hahn, Peter. Caught in the Middle East: U.S. Policy toward the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1945–1961. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.
- . The United States, Great Britain, and Egypt, 1945–1956: Strategy and Diplomacy in the Early Cold War. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.
- Halberstam, David. The Best and the Brightest. New York: Random House, 1972.
- . The Making of a Quagmire. New York: Random House, 1965.
- Heiss, Mary Ann. Empire and Nationhood: The United States, Great Britain, and Iranian Oil, 1950–1954. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Henderson, John W. The United States Information Agency. New York: Praeger, 1969.
- Higgins, Trumbull. The Perfect Failure: Kennedy, Eisenhower, and the C. I. A. at the Bay of Pigs. New York: Norton, 1987.
- Hoopes, Townsend. The Devil and John Foster Dulles. Boston: Little, Brown, 1973.
- Hughes, Emmett J. America the Vincible. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1959.
- Immerman, Richard (ed.). The C. I. A. and Guatemala: The Foreign Policy of Intervention. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1982.
- . John Foster Dulles and the Diplomacy of the Cold War. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1990.
- . John Foster Dulles: Piety, Pragmatism and Power in U.S. Foreign Policy. Wilmington, Del.: Scholarly Resources, 1999.
- Iriye, Akira, and Warren Cohen. The Great Powers in East Asia, 1953–1960. New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.
- Jones, Howard P. Indonesia: The Possible Dream. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971.
- Kahin, George, and John W. Lewis. The United States in Vietnam. New York: Dial Press, 1969.
- Kalicki, J. H. The Pattern of Sino-American Crises: Political-Military Interactions in the 1950s. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1975.
- Kaufman, Burton. Trade and Aid: Eisenhower's Economic Foreign Policy, 1953–1961. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982.
- Kennan, George F. Realities of American Foreign Policy. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1954.
- Kingseed, Cole C. Eisenhower and the Suez Crisis of 1956. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995.
- Kissinger, Henry A. Nuclear Weapons and Foreign Policy. New York: Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1957.
- Knorr, Klaus (ed.). NATO and American Security. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1959.
- Krebs, Ronald R. Dueling Visions: U.S. Strategy towards Eastern Europe under Eisenhower. College Station, Tex.: A&M University Press, 2001.
- Krenn, Michael. The Chains of Interdependence: U.S. Policy toward Central America, 1945–1954. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1996.
- Kunz, Diane B. The Economic Diplomacy of the Suez Crisis. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.
- Lansdale, Edward G. In the Midst of Wars: An American's Mission to Southeast Asia. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

- Lesch, David. Syria and the United States: Eisenhower's Cold War in the Middle East. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1997.
- Lewis, Gordon K. Puerto Rico: Freedom and Power in the Caribbean. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1963.
- Lieberman, Robert. The Strangest Dream: Communism, Anticommunism, and the U.S. Peace Movement, 1945–1963. New York: Syracuse University Press, 2000.
- McAllister, James. No Exit: America and the German Problem, 1943–1954. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- McClellan, Grant S. (ed.). U.S. Policy in Latin America. New York: H. W. Wilson Co., 1963.
- Melanson, Richard, and David Mayers. Reevaluating Eisenhower: American Foreign Policy in the 1950s. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.
- Mezerik, A. G. Cuba and the United States. New York: International Review, 1960.
- Nash, Philip. The Other Missiles of October: Eisenhower, Kennedy and the Jupiters, 1957–1963. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
- Neff, Donald. Warriors at Suez: Eisenhower Takes America into the Middle East. New York: Linden Press/Simon & Schuster, 1981.
- Osgood, Kenneth. Total Cold War: Eisenhower's Secret Propaganda Battle at Home and Abroad. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 2002.
- Osgood, Robert E. NATO: The Entangling Alliance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962.
- Planek, Charles R. The Changing Status of German Reunification in Western Diplomacy, 1955–1966. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1967.
- Rabe, Stephen. Eisenhower and Latin America: The Foreign Policy of Anticommunism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Ridgway, Matthew B. The Korean War: How We Met the Challenge: How All-out Asian War Was Averted: Why MacArthur Was Dismissed: Why Today's War Objectives Must Be Limited. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1967.
- Roosevelt, Kermit. Countercoup: The Struggle for Control in Iran. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1979.
- Rosenberg, Victor. Soviet-American Relations, 1953–1960: Diplomacy and Cultural Exchange during the Eisenhower Presidency. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Co., 2005.
- Ross, Robert, and Jiang Changbin. Reexamining the Cold War: U.S.-China Diplomacy, 1954–1973. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- Ruane, Kevin. The Rise and Fall of the European Defense Community. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Rubin, Barry. Paved with Good Intentions: The American Experience and Iran. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Schick, Jack M. The Berlin Crisis, 1958–1962. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1971.
- Schlesinger, Stephen, and Stephen Kinzer. Bitter Fruit: The Untold Story of the American Coup in Guatemala. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1982.
- Smith, Jean E. The Defense of Berlin. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1963.
- Smith, Merriman. A President's Odyssey. New York: Harper, 1961.
- Stevenson, Charles A. The End of Nowhere, American Policy toward Laos since 1954. Boston: Beacon Press, 1972.
- Tananbaum, Duane. The Bricker Amendment: A Test of Eisenhower's Vertical Leadership. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1988.
- Theoharis, Athan G. The Yalta Myths. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1970.
- Vigneras, Marcel. Rearming the French. Washington, D.C.: Office of the Chief of Military History, Dept. of the Army, 1957.
- Weissman, Stephen R. American Foreign Policy in the Congo: 1960–1964. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1974.
- Welch, Jr., Richard E. Response to Revolution: The United States and the Cuban Revolution, 1959–1961. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1985.
- Westad, Odd Arne. Brothers in Arms: The Rise and Fall of the Sino-Soviet Alliance, 1945–1963. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1998.
- Williams, William Appleman. The U.S., Cuba, and Castro: An Essay on Revolution and the Dissolution of Empire. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1962.
- Winand, Pascaline. Eisenhower, Kennedy, and the United States of Europe. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.

- Wittner, Lawrence S. Rebels against War: The American Peace Movement 1941–1960. New York: Columbia University Press, 1969.
- Yagulo, Selim. Containing Arab Nationalism: The Eisenhower Doctrine and the Middle East. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2004.
- Yergin, Daniel. The Prize: The Epic Quest for Oil, Money, and Power. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1991.

Disarmament

- Dean, Arthur H. Test Ban and Disarmament: The Path of Negotiation. New York: Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper & Row, 1966.
- Levine, Robert A. The Arms Debate. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1963.
- National Lawyer's Guild. A Summary of Disarmament Documents, 1945–1962. San Francisco: National Lawyers Guild, International Law Committee, Subcommittee on Disarmament, 1963.
- Roberts, Chalmers M. The Nuclear Years: The Arms Race and Arms Control, 1945–1970. New York: Praeger, 1970.
- Schelling, Thomas C., and Morton H. Halperin. Strategy and Arms Control. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1961.
- Spanier, John W., and Joseph L. Nogee. The Politics of Disarmament: A Study in Soviet-American Gamesmanship. New York: F. A. Praeger, 1962.
- Powers, Francis Gary, and Curt Gentry. Operation Overflight. New York: Rinehart & Winston, 1970.
- Sanders, Frances Stonor. The Cultural Cold War: The CIA and the World of Arts and Letters. New York: W. W. Norton & Co., 1999.
- Srodes, James. Allen Dulles: Master of Spies. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1999.
- Taubman, Philip. Secret Empire: Eisenhower, the CIA, and the Hidden Story of America's Space Espionage. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2003.
- Theoharis, Athan. Beyond the Hiss Case: The FBI, Congress, and the Cold War. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1982.
- . Chasing Spies: How the FBI Failed in Counterintelligence, but Promoted the Politics of McCarthyism in the Cold War Years. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2002.
- U.S. Commission on CIA Activities within the United States. Report to the President by the Commission on CIA Activities within the United States. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1975.
- U.S. Senate, Select Committee on Intelligence Activities. Alleged Assassination Plots Involving Foreign Leaders. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1975.
- U.S. Senate, Select Committee on Intelligence Activities. Intelligence Activities and the Rights of Americans. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1976.
- Weinstein, Allan, and Alexander Vassiliev. The Haunted Wood: Soviet Espionage in America—the Stalin Era. New York: Random House, 1999.

Intelligence and Espionage

- Agee, Philip. Inside the Company: CIA Diary. New York: Stonehill, 1975.
- Ambrose, Stephen, and Richard H. Immerman. Ike's Spies: Eisenhower and the Espionage Establishment. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1981.
- Dulles, Allen W. The Craft of Intelligence. New York: Harper & Row, 1963.
- Garber, Marjorie, and Rebecca Walkowitz. Secret Agents: The Rosenberg Case, McCarthyism, and Fifties America. New York: Routledge, 1995.
- Grose, Peter. Gentleman Spy: The Life of Allen Dulles. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994.
- May, Gary. Un-American Activities: The Trials of William Remington. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Defense Policy

- Alian, Richard. American Defense Policy from Eisenhower to Kennedy, 1957–1961. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1975.
- Aron, Raymond. The Great Debate: Theories of Nuclear Strategy. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1965.
- Baldwin, Hanson W. The Great Arms Race: A Comparison in U.S. and Soviet Power Today. New York: Praeger, 1958.
- Beard, Edmund. Developing the ICBM: A Study in Bureaucratic Politics. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.

- Bechhoefer, G. Postwar Negotiations for Arms Control. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institute, 1961.
- Bottomo, Edgar M. The Missile Gap: A Study of the Formation of Political and Military Policy. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1971.
- Brodie, Bernard. Strategy in the Missile Age. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1959.
- Caralay, Demetrios. The Politics of Military Unification. New York: Columbia University Press, 1966.
- Craig, C. Destroy the Village: Eisenhower and Thermonuclear War. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.
- Dietchman, Seymour. Limited War and American Defense Policy. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1964.
- Divine, Robert A. Blowing on the Wind: The Nuclear Test Ban Debate. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Dornberger, Walter. V-2. New York: Viking Press, 1954.
- Gavin, James. War and Peace in the Space Age. New York: Harper, 1958.
- Geelhoed, E. Bruce. Charles E. Wilson and the Controversy at the Pentagon, 1953–1957. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1979.
- Gilpin, Robert. American Scientists and Nuclear Weapons Policy. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1962.
- Halperin, Morton H. Limited War in the Nuclear Age. New York: Wiley, 1963.
- Huntington, Samuel P. Changing Patterns of Military Politics. New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1962.
- . The Common Defense: Strategic Programs in National Politics. New York: Columbia University Press, 1961.
- Kahn, Herman. On Thermonuclear War. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1960.
- Kaufmann, William W. The Requirements of Deterrence, Memorandum No. 7. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1954.
- Kissinger, Henry H. Nuclear Weapons and Foreign Policy. Washington, D.C.: Harper, 1957.
- Kolodziej, Edward A. The Common Defense and Congress, 1945–1963. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1966.
- Lider, Julian. Towards a Nuclear Doctrine: The 1950s. Stockholm: Swedish Institute of International Affairs, 1981.
- Miksche, F. O. The Failure of Atomic Strategy and a New Proposal for the Defense of the West. New York: Praeger, 1958.
- Morgenstern, Oskar. The Question of National Defense. New York: Random House, 1959.
- Murray, Joseph P. From Yalta to Disarmament: Cold War Debate. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1961.
- Osgood, Robert E. Limited War: The Challenge to American Security. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957.
- Schilling, Warner, et al. Strategy, Politics, and Defense Budget. New York: Columbia University Press, 1962.
- Schwiebert, Ernest G. A History of Air Force Ballistic Missiles. New York: F. A. Praeger, 1965.
- Smith, Bruce L. R. The Rand Corporation: Case Study of a Nonprofit Advisory Agency. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1966.
- Snead, David L. The Gaither Committee, Eisenhower, and the Cold War. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1998.
- Snyder, Glenn H. Deterrence and Defense: Toward a Strategy of National Security. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1961.
- Taylor, Maxwell. Swords and Plowshares. New York: W. W. Norton, 1972.
- Theoharis, Athan, and John Stuart Cox. The Boss: J. Edgar Hoover and the Great American Inquisition. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1988.
- Turner, Gordon G., and Richard D. Challener. (eds.). National Security in the Nuclear Age: Basic Facts and Theories. New York: Praeger, 1960.
- Wang, Jessica. American Science in an Age of Anxiety: Scientists, Anticommunism, and the Cold War. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.
- Waskow, Arthur I. (ed.). The Debate over Thermonuclear Strategy. Boston: Heath, 1965.

Space

- Bates, David R. (ed.). Space Research and Exploration. New York: W. Sloane Associates, 1958.
- Bergaust, Erik. Reaching for the Stars. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1960.
- Boyd, Robert Lewis. Space Research by Rocket and Satellite. New York: Harper, 1960.

- Cox, Donald. The Space Race: From Sputnik to Apollo. Philadelphia: Chilton Books, 1962.
- Dickson, Paul. Sputnik: The Shock of the Century. New York: Walker Publishing, 2001.
- Divine, Robert. The Sputnik Challenge: Eisenhower's Response to the Soviet Satellite. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Green, Constance McLaughlin, and Milton Lomask. Vanguard: A History. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1971.
- McDougall, Walter A. The Heavens and Earth: A Political History of the Space Age. New York: Basic Books, 1985.
- Rosholt, Robert L. An Administrative History of NASA, 1958–1963. Washington, D.C.: Scientific and Technical Information Division, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, 1963.
- Schwiebert, Ernest G., et al. A History of the US Air Force Ballistic Missiles. New York: F. A. Praeger, 1965.
- Shelton, William. American Space Exploration: The First Decade. Boston: Little, Brown, 1967.
- Sobel, Lester A. Space: From Sputnik to Gemini. New York: Facts On File, 1965.
- Swenson, Lloyd S., Jr., et al. The New Ocean: A History of Project Mercury. Washington, D.C.: Scientific and Technical Division, Office of Technology Utilization, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, 1966.
- Witkin, Richard (ed.). The Challenge of Sputnik. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Books, 1958.
- Wolfe, Tom. The Right Stuff. New York: Farrar, Straus, Giroux, 1979.
- Fairclough, Adam. To Redeem the Soul of America: The Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Martin Luther King, Jr. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1987.
- Freyer, Tony. The Little Rock Crisis: A Constitutional Interpretation. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1984.
- Friedman, Leon (ed.). Argument: The Oral Argument before the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 1952–1955. New York: Chelsea House Publishers, 1969.
- Garcia, Mario. Mexican Americans: Leadership, Ideology, and Identity, 1930–1960. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Garrow, David. Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: W. Morrow, 1986.
- Gates, Robbins L. The Making of Massive Resistance. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1962.
- Hays, Brooks. A Southern Moderate Speaks. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1959.
- Hickey, Neil, and Edwin Hickey (eds.). Adam Clayton Powell and the Politics of Race. New York: Fleet Publishing Corp., 1966.
- Howard-Pitney, David. Martin Luther King, Malcolm X, and the Civil Rights Struggle of the 1950s and 1960s. New York: Bedford/St. Martin's, 2004.
- Jackson, Walter. Gunnar Myrdal and America's Conscience: Social Engineering and Racial Liberalism, 1938–1987. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.
- King, Martin Luther, Jr. Stride toward Freedom: The Montgomery Boycott. New York: Harper, 1958.
- Lawson, Steven. Black Ballots: Voting Rights in the South, 1944–1969. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.
- Lewis, Anthony. Portrait of a Decade. New York: Random House, 1964.
- Lewis, David L. King: A Critical Biography. New York: Praeger, 1970.
- Lincoln, C. Eric (ed.). Martin Luther King, Jr.: A Profile. New York: Hill & Wang, 1970.
- Malcolm X. Autobiography of Malcolm X. New York: Grove Press, 1965.
- McMillen, Neil. The Citizens' Council: Organized Resistance to the Second Reconstruction, 1954–1964. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1964.

Civil Rights and Minorities

- Bartley, Numan. The Rise of Massive Resistance: Race and Politics in the South during the 1950s. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1969.
- Bates, Daisy. The Long Shadow of Little Rock. New York: David McKay Co., 1962.
- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–1963. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- Burk, Robert. The Eisenhower Administration and Black Civil Rights. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1984.
- Ely, James W. The Crisis of Conservative Virginia. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1976.

- Meier, August, and Elliot Rudwick. CORE: A Study in the Civil Rights Movement, 1942–1968. New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.
- Morris, Aldon. The Origins of the Civil Rights Movement: Black Communities Organizing for Change. New York: Free Press, 1984.
- Muse, Benjamin. Ten Years of Prelude: The Story of Integration since the Supreme Court's 1954 Decision. New York: Viking Press, 1961.
- . Virginia's Massive Resistance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1961.
- Newby, I. A. Challenge to the Court: Social Scientists and the Defense of Segregation, 1954–1966. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1969.
- Nichols, David A. A Matter of Justice: Eisenhower and the Beginning of the Civil Rights Revolution. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2007.
- Oates, Stephen B. Let The Trumpet Sound: The Life of Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Harper & Row, 1982.
- Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr. Adam by Adam. New York: Dial Press, 1971.
- Robinson, Jo Ann. The Montgomery Bus Boycott and the Women Who Started It. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1987.
- Sarrat, Reed. The Ordeal of Desegregation: The First Decade. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.
- Silverman, Corinne. The Little Rock Story. University, Ala.: Published for the IPC by Bobbs-Merrill, 1959.
- Smith, Bob. They Closed Their Schools: Prince Edward County, Virginia, 1951–1964. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1965.
- Smith, J. Douglas. Managing White Supremacy: Race, Politics, and Citizenship in Jim Crow Virginia. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.
- Webb, Clive (ed.). Massive Resistance. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Wilhoit, Francis M. The Politics of Massive Resistance. New York: G. Braziller, 1973.
- Wolters, Raymond. The Burden of Brown. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1984.
- Woodward, C. Vann. The Strange Career of Jim Crow. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.
- Workman, William D., Jr. The Case for the South. New York: Devin-Adair Co., 1960.

Social

- Barmash, Isadore. More Than They Bargained for: The Rise and Fall of Korvettes. New York: Lebhar-Friedman/Chain Store Publishing Co., 1981.
- Bernard, Richard M., and Bradley R. Rice. Sunbelt Cities: Politics and Growth since World War II. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1983.
- Bremner, Robert H., and Gary W. Reichard. Reshaping American Society and Institutions, 1945–1960. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1982.
- Clark, Alison J. Tupperware: The Promise of Plastic in 1950's America. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1999.
- Conant, James B. The American High School Today. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1959.
- Gans, Herbert J. The Levittowners: Ways of Life and Politics in a New Suburban Community. New York: Pantheon Books, 1967.
- Gelfand, Mark. A Nation of Cities: The Federal Government and Urban America, 1933–1965. New York: Oxford University Press, 1975.
- Gilbert, James. A Cycle of Outrage: America's Reaction to the Juvenile Delinquent in the 1950's. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Hayden, Dolores. Building Suburbia: Green Fields and Urban Growth, 1820–2000. New York: Pantheon Books, 2003.
- Hirsch, Arnold. Making the Second Ghetto: Race and Housing in Chicago, 1940–1960. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Jackson, Kenneth T. Crabgrass Frontier: The Suburbanization of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Jacobs, Jane. The Death and Life of Great American Cities. New York: Random House, 1961.
- Jones, James H. Alfred C. Kinsey: A Public/Private Life. New York: W. W. Norton, 1997.
- Jones, Landon. Great Expectations: America and the Baby Boom Generation. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1980.
- Keats, John. Crack the Picture Window. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1957.
- Love, John. McDonalds: Behind the Arches. New York: Bantam Books, 1986.
- Miller, Zane. Suburb: Neighborhood and Community in Forest Park, Ohio, 1935–1976. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1981.

- Muller, Peter. Contemporary Sub/Urban America. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1981.
- Packard, Vance Oakley. The Status Seekers. New York: D. McKay Co., 1959.
- Palladino, Grace. Teenagers: An American History. New York: Basic Books, 1996.
- Reed, James. The Birth Control Movement and American Society: From Private Vice to Public Virtue. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- Schulman, Bruce. From Cotton Belt to Sunbelt: Federal Policy, Economic Development, and the Transformation of the South, 1938–1980. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Szatmary, David P. Rockin' in Time: A Social History of Rock-and-Roll. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1991.
- Teaford, John. The Twentieth-Century American City: Problem, Promise, and Reality. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986.
- Culture
- Appy, Christian G. Cold War Constructions: The Political Culture of United States Imperialism, 1945–1966. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2000.
- Bestor, Arthur. Educational Wastelands. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1953.
- Biskind, Peter. Seeing Is Believing: How Hollywood Taught Us to Stop Worrying and Love the Fifties. New York: Pantheon Books, 1983.
- Booker, M. Keith. The Post-Utopian Imagination: American Culture in the Long 1950s. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2002.
- Boyer, Paul. By the Bomb's Early Light: American Thought and Culture at the Dawn of the Atomic Age. New York: Pantheon, 1985.
- Carter, Paul. Another Part of the Fifties. New York: Columbia University Press, 1983.
- Cook, Bruce. The Beat Generation. New York: Scribner, 1971.
- Foreman, Joel (ed.). The Other Fifties. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1997.
- Fox, Stephen. The Mirror Makers. New York: Morrow, 1984.
- Gilbert, James. A Cycle of Outrage: America's Reaction to the Juvenile Delinquents of the 1950s. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- . Men in the Middle: Searching for Masculinity in the 1950s. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2005.
- Gillette, Charles. The Sound of the City: The Rise of Rock and Roll. New York: Pantheon Books, 1984.
- Guralnick, Peter. Last Train to Memphis: The Rise of Elvis Presley. Boston: Little, Brown, 1994.
- Henriksen, Margot A. Dr. Strangelove's America: Society and Culture in the Atomic Age. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Hine, Thomas. Populuxe. New York: Knopf, 1986.
- Kuznick, Peter J., and James Gilbert. Rethinking Cold War Culture. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 2001.
- Lhamon, W. T. Deliberate Speed: The Origins of a Cultural Style in the American 1950s. Washington D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1990.
- Lipsitz, George. Class and Culture in Cold War America: A Rainbow at Midnight. New York: Praeger, 1981.
- May, Larry (ed.). Recasting America: Culture and Politics in the Age of the Cold War. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- McNally, Dennis. Desolate Angel: Jack Kerouac, the Beat Generation, and America. New York: Random House, 1979.
- Miles, Barry. Ginsburg: A Biography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Nicosia, Gerald. Memory Babe: A Critical Biography of Jack Kerouac. New York: Grove Press, 1983.
- Potter, David. People of Plenty: Economic Abundance and the American Character. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954.
- Schudson, Michael. Advertising, the Uneasy Persuasion. New York: Basic Books, 1984.
- Szatmary, David. Rockin' in Time: A Social History of Rock-and-Roll. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1991.
- Wakefield, Dan. New York in the Fifties. Boston: Houghton Mifflin/Seymour Lawrence, 1992.
- Walker, Jeff. The Ayn Rand Cult. Chicago: Open Court, 1999.
- Ward, Ed, et al. Rock of Ages: The Rolling Stone History of Rock and Roll. New York: Rolling Stone Press: Summit Books: Distributed by Simon & Schuster, 1986.

- Werner, Craig A. Change Is Gonna Come: Music, Race and the Soul of America. New York: Plume, 1998.
- Whitfield, Stephen. The Culture of the Cold War. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996.
- Whyte, William. The Organization Man. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1956.
- Wright, Bradford W. Comic Book Nation: The Transformation of Youth Culture in America. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.

Intellectual

- Arendt, Hannah. The Origins of Totalitarianism. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1951.
- Bell, Daniel. The End of Ideology: On the Exhaustion of Political Ideas in the 1950s. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1960.
- Bloom, Alexander. Prodigal Sons: The New York Intellectuals and Their World. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Brewer, John D. C. Wright Mills and the Ending of Violence. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Buckley, William F., Jr. God and Man at Yale. Chicago: Regnery, 1951.
- Charters, Ann. Kerouac. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994.
- Diggins, John P. Up from Communism: Conservative Odysseys in American Intellectual History. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.
- East, John P. The American Conservative Movement: The Philosophical Founders. Chicago: Regnery Books, 1986.
- Fielder, Leslie. An End to Innocence. Boston: Beacon Press, 1955.
- Fox, Richard. Reinhold Niebuhr. New York: Pantheon Books, 1985.
- Gormon, Paul R. Left Intellectuals and Popular Culture in Twentieth-Century America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Gotfried, Paul. The Conservative Movement. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1993.
- Halliwell, Martin. The Constant Dialogue: Reinhold Niebuhr and American Intellectual Culture. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, 2005.
- Horowitz, Irving Louis. C. Wright Mills: An American Utopian. New York: Free Press, 1983.
- Kateb, George. Hannah Arendt: Politics, Conscience, Evil. Totowa, N.J.: Rowman & Allanheld, 1984.
- King, Richard H. Race, Culture, and the Intellectuals, 1940–1970. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2004.
- Macdonald, Dwight. Discriminations. New York: Grossman Publishers, 1974.
- . Politics Past: Essays in Political Criticism. New York: Viking Press, 1957.
- Mattson, Kevin. Intellectuals in Action: The Origins of the New Left and Radical Liberalism, 1945–1970. University Park: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2002.
- McAllister, Ted V. Revolt against Modernity: Leo Strauss, Eric Voegelin, and the Search for a Postliberal Order. Lawrence: Kansas University Press, 1996.
- McDonald, W. Wesley. Russell Kirk and the Age of Ideology. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2004.
- Mills, C. Wright. The Power Elite. New York: Oxford University Press, 1956.
- . White Collar. New York: Oxford University Press, 1951.
- Nash, George H. The Conservative Intellectual Movement in America since 1945. New York: Basic Books, 1976.
- Pells, Richard. The Liberal Mind in a Conservative Age: American Intellectuals in the 1940s and 1950s. New York: Harper & Row, 1985.
- Potter, David M. People of Plenty. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954.
- Tar, Zoltan. The Frankfurt School: The Critical Theories of Max Horkheimer and Theodor W. Adorno. New York: Wiley, 1977.
- Tilman, Rick. C. Wright Mills: A Native Radical and His American Intellectual Roots. University Park: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1984.
- Whitfield, Stephen. A Critical American: The Politics of Dwight Macdonald. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1984.
- Whyte, William H., Jr. The Organization Man. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1956.
- Young-Bruehl, Elizabeth. Hannah Arendt: For the Love of the World. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2004.

Religion

- Anker, Roy. Self-help and Popular Religion in Modern American Culture. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.
- Boyer, Paul. When Time Shall Be No More: Prophecy and Belief in Modern American Culture. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Fox, Richard. Reinhold Niebuhr. New York: Pantheon Books, 1985.
- George, Carol. God's Salesman: Norman Vincent Peale and the Power of Positive Thinking. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Gilbert, James. Redeeming Culture: American Religion in an Age of Science. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Hart, D. G. Deconstructing Evangelicalism: Conservative Protestantism in the Age of Billy Graham. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Baker Academic, 2004.
- Herberg, Will. Protestant, Catholic, Jew: An Essay in American Religious Sociology. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1955.
- Hunter, James Davidson. Culture Wars: The Struggle to Define America. New York: Basic Books, 1991.
- Martin, William. A Prophet with Honor: The Billy Graham Story. New York: Quill, 1991.
- May, Henry. Ideas, Faiths, and Feelings: Essays on American Intellectual and Religious History, 1952–1982. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- McLoughlin, William. Billy Graham: Revivalist in a Secular Age. New York: Ronald Press, 1960.
- Ribuffo, Leo. The Old Christian Right: The Protestant Far Right from the Depression to the Cold War. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1983.
- Wuthnow, Robert. The Restructuring of American Religion: Society and Faith since World War II. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988.

Education

- Cremin, Lawrence. American Education: The Metropolitan Experience, 1876–1980. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.
- Hampel, Robert. The Last Little Citadel: American High Schools since 1940. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1986.

- Ravitch, Diane. The Troubled Crusade: American Education, 1945–1980. New York: Basic Books, 1983.
- Silberman, Charles. Crisis in the Classroom: The Remaking of American Education. New York: Random House, 1970.

Media

- Abell, Tyler (ed.). Drew Pearson Diaries, 1949–1959. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1974.
- Allen, Craig. Eisenhower and the Mass Media: Peace, Prosperity, & Prime-Time TV. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.
- Alsop, Joseph, and Stewart Alsop. The Reporter's Trade. New York: Reynal, 1958.
- Anderson, Kent. The History and Implications of the Quiz Show Scandals. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1978.
- Aronson, James. The Press and the Cold War. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1970.
- Barnouw, Erik. Tube of Plenty: The Evolution of American Television. New York: Oxford University Press, 1975.
- Baughman, James. The Republic of Mass Culture: Journalism, Filmmaking, and Broadcasting in America since 1941. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992.
- Bliss, Edward (ed.). In Search of Light: The Broadcasts of Edward R. Murrow, 1938–1961. New York: Knopf, 1967.
- Booker, M. Keith. Monsters, Mushroom Clouds, and the Cold War: American Science Fiction and the Roots of Postmodernism, 1946–1964. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001.
- Cloud, Stanley, and Lynne Olson. The Murrow Boys. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1996.
- Davies, Richard. America's Obsession: Sports and Society since 1945. Ft. Worth, Tex.: Harcourt Brace College Publishers, 1994.
- Diamond, Edwin, and Stephen Bates. The Spot: The Rise of Political Advertising on Television. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- Dougherty, Thomas Patrick. Cold War, Cool Medium: Television, McCarthyism, and American Culture. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.
- Krock, Arthur. In The Nation 1932–1966. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1966.

- . Memoirs: Sixty Years on the Firing Line. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1968.
- Marling, Karal Ann. As Seen on TV: The Visual Culture of Everyday Life in the 1950s. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Metz, Robert. CBS: Reflections in a Bloodshot Eye. Chicago: Playboy Press, 1975.
- Michie, Allan A. Voices through the Iron Curtain: The Radio Free Europe Story. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1963.
- Reston, James. Sketches in the Sand. New York: Knopf, 1967.
- Rojecki, Andrew. Silencing the Opposition: Antinuclear Movements and the Media in the Cold War. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999.
- Sayre, Nora. Running Time: Films of the Cold War. New York: Dial Press, 1982.
- Sulzberger, C. L. A Long Row of Candles: Memoirs and Diaries, 1934–1954. New York: Macmillan, 1969.
- Swanberg, W. A. Luce and His Empire. New York: Scribner, 1972.
- Thomson, Charles A. Television and Presidential "Politics": The Experience in 1952 and the Problems Ahead. Washington: Brookings Institute, 1956.
- Watson, Mary Ann. Defining Visions: Television and the American Experience since 1945. Fort Worth, Tex.: Harcourt Brace College Publishers, 1998.

Women

- Breines, Wini. Young, White, and Miserable: Growing Up Female in the Fifties. Boston: Beacon Press, 1992.
- D'Emilio, John. Sexual Politics, Sexual Communities: The Making of a Homosexual Minority in the United States, 1940–1970. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1983.
- Harrison, Cynthia. On Account of Sex: The Politics of Women's Issues, 1945–1968. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.
- Kaledin, Eugenia. Mothers and More: American Women in the 1950s. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1984.
- Lynn, Susan. Progressive Women in Conservative Times: Racial Justice, Peace, and Feminism, 1945 to the 1960s. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1987.
- May, Elaine Tyler. Homeward Bound: American Families in the Cold War Era. New York: Basic Books, 1988.
- Meyerowitz, Joanne J. Not June Cleaver: Women and Gender in Postwar America, 1945–1960. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1994.
- Rupp, Leila J., and Verta Taylor. Survival in the Doldrums: The American Women's Rights Movement, 1945 to the 1960s. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Solinger, Ricky. Wake Up, Little Susie: Single Pregnancy and Race before Roe v. Wade. New York: Routledge, 1992.

Courts

- Barrow, Deborah J., and Thomas G. Walker. A Court Divided: The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals and the Politics of Judicial Reform. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988.
- Bickel, Alexander. Politics and the Warren Court. New York: Harper & Row, 1965.
- Cox, Archibald. The Warren Court: Constitutional Decisions as an Instrument of Reform. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1968.
- Dunne, Gerald. Hugo Black and the Judicial Revolution. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1977.
- Freyer, Tony (ed.). Justice Hugo Black and Modern America. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1990.
- de Grazia, Edward. Girls Lean Back Everywhere: The Law of Obscenity and the Assault on Genius. New York: Random House, 1992.
- Horwitz, Morton J. The Warren Court and the Pursuit of Justice. New York: Hill & Wang, 1998.
- Kluger, Richard. Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Knopf, 1976.
- Lytle, Clifford M. The Warren Court and Its Critics. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1968.
- Murphy, Paul. The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Murphy, Terrence J. Censorship: Government and Obscenity. Baltimore: Helicon, 1963.
- Paul, James C. N., and Murray L. Schwartz. Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the Mail. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1961.

- Peltason, J. W. Fifty-Eight Lonely Men: Southern Federal Judges and School Desegregation. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1961.
- Pritchett, C. Herman. Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954.
- . Congress versus the Supreme Court, 1957 to 1960. New York: Da Capo Press, 1961.
- . The Political Offender and the Warren Court. Boston: Boston University Press, 1958.
- Read, Frank T., and Lucy S. McGough. Let Them Be Judged: The Judicial Integration of the Deep South. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1978.
- Rembar, Charles. The End of Obscenity. New York: Random House, 1968.
- Sabin, Arthur J. In Calmer Times: The Supreme Court and Red Monday. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Sayler, Richard H., et al. (eds.). The Warren Court: A Critical Analysis. New York: Chelsea House, 1969.
- Schwartz, Bernard, and Stephen Leshner. Inside the Warren Court, 1953–1969. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983.
- Schwartz, Bernard. Super Chief: Earl Warren and His Supreme Court—A Judicial Biography. New York: New York University Press, 1983.
- Silverstein, Mark. Constitutional Faiths: Felix Frankfurter, Hugo Black, and the Process of Judicial Decision Making. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1984.
- Simon, James F. The Antagonists: Hugo Black, Felix Frankfurter, and Civil Liberties in Modern America. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Tushnet, Mark (ed.). The Warren Court in Historical and Political Perspective. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1993.
- Vestal, Theodore M. The Eisenhower Court and Civil Liberties. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2002.
- Weaver, James D. Warren: The Man, the Court, the Era. Boston: Little, Brown, 1967.
- Wilkinson, J. Harvie. From Brown to Bakke: The Supreme Court and School Integration, 1954–1978. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Berle, Adolf A. The American Economic Republic. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1963.
- Blough, Roger. The Washington Embrace of Business. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.
- Bremner, Robert. Chairman of the Fed: William McChesney Martin, Jr., and the Creation of the American Financial System. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2004.
- Brody, David. Workers in Industrial America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Chinoy, Eli. Automobile Workers and the American Dream. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1955.
- Cray, Ed. Chrome Colossus: General Motors and Its Times. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1980.
- Duffy, Gavan. Demons and Democrats: 1950s Labor at the Crossroads. North Melbourne, Vic., Australia: Freedom Publishing Co., 2002.
- Dulles, Foster Rhea, and Melvyn Dubofsky. Labor in America, a History. New York: Crowell, 1960.
- Fones-Wolf, Elizabeth A. Selling Free Enterprise: The Business Assault on Labor and Liberalism, 1945–1960. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1994.
- Galbraith, John Kenneth. The Affluent Society. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1958.
- . American Capitalism: The Concept of Countervailing Power. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1952.
- Gerstle, Gary. Working-Class Americanism: The Politics of Labor in an Industrial City, 1914–1960. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Goulden, Joseph C. Meany: The Unchallenged Strongman of American Labor. New York: Atheneum, 1972.
- Hession, Charles H. John Kenneth Galbraith and His Critics. New York: New American Library, 1972.
- Himmelberg, Robert. Antitrust and Business Regulation in the Postwar Era, 1946–1954. New York: Garland Publishing, 1994.
- Holmans, A. E. United States Fiscal Policy, 1945–1959. New York: Oxford University Press, 1961.
- James, Ralph C., and Estelle James. James Hoffa and the Teamsters: A Study of Union Power. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1965.
- Kaplan, A. D. H. Big Enterprise in a Competitive System. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institute, 1964.

Business, Labor, and the Economy

- Baldwin, Daniel A. Economic Development and American Foreign Policy, 1943–1962. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.

- Kendrick, John. Productivity Trends in the United States. New York: Arno Press, 1961.
- Kovaleff, Phillip. Business and Government during the Eisenhower Administration: A Study of the Antitrust Policy of the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1980.
- Larrowe, Charles P. Harry Bridges: The Rise and Fall of Radical Labor in the United States. New York: L. Hill, 1972.
- Lee, R. Alton. Eisenhower and Landrum-Griffin: A Study in Labor Management Politics. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1990.
- Lewis, Wilfred, Jr. Federal Fiscal Policy in the Postwar Recessions. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institute, 1962.
- Lilienthal, David E. Big Business: A New Era. New York: Harper, 1953.
- Mighell, Ronald L. American Agriculture: Its Structure and Place in the Economy. New York: Wiley, 1955.
- Minchin, Timothy. Fighting against the Odds: A History of Southern Labor since World War II. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2005.
- Morgan, Iwan. Eisenhower versus "The Spenders": The Eisenhower Administration, the Democrats, and the Budget, 1953–1960. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990.
- Radosh, Ronald. American Labor and the United States Foreign Policy. New York: Random House, 1969.
- Reagan, Michael. The Managed Economy. New York: Oxford University Press, 1963.
- Reuther, Victor G. The Brothers Reuther. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1976.
- Russell, Thaddeus. Out of the Jungle: Jimmy Hoffa and the Remaking of the American Working Class. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2003.
- Saulnier, Raymond. Constructive Years: The U.S. Economy under Eisenhower. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1991.
- Sloan, John. Eisenhower and the Management of Prosperity. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1991.
- Sobel, Robert. The Age of Giant Corporations: A Microeconomic History of American Business, 1914–1970. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1972.
- Triflin, Robert. Gold and the Dollar Crisis. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1961.
- Vatter, Harold G. The U.S. Economy in the 1950s. New York: Norton, 1963.
- Warner, W. Lloyd, and James Abegglen. Big Business Leaders in America. New York: Harper, 1955.
- White, Lawrence J. The Automobile Industry since 1945. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1971.
- Ziegler, Robert. American Workers, American Unions, 1920–1985. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986.

Biographies

- Abernathy, Ralph. And the Walls Came Tumbling Down: An Autobiography. New York: Harper & Row, 1989.
- Abramson, Rudy. Spanning the Century: The Life of William Averell Harriman, 1891–1986. New York: W. Morrow, 1992.
- Acheson, Dean. Morning and Noon. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1965.
- . Present at the Creation: My Years in the State Department. New York: Norton, 1969.
- Aczel, Amir D. God's Equation: Einstein, Relativity, and the Expanding Universe. New York: Four Walls Eight Windows, 1999.
- Adams, John Gibbon. Without Precedent: The Story of the Death of McCarthyism. New York: W. W. Norton, 1983.
- Adams, Sherman. Firsthand Report: The Story of the Eisenhower Administration. New York: Harper, 1961.
- Aiken, George D., and Samuel B. Hand. The Essential Aiken: A Life in Public Service. Burlington: University of Vermont Press, 2004.
- Albert, Carl Bert, and Danney Goble. Little Giant: The Life and Times of Speaker Carl Albert. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1990.
- Allison, John M. Ambassador from the Prairie: Or, Allison Wonderland. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1973.
- Almquist, Leann Grabavoy. Joseph Alsop and American Foreign Policy: The Journalist as Advocate. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1993.
- Alsop, Joseph W. I've Seen the Best of It: Memoirs. New York: Norton, 1992.
- Alsop, Stewart O. Stay of Execution: A Sort of Memoir. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1973.

- Ambrose, Stephen E. Eisenhower: Soldier, General of the Army, President-elect, 1890–1952. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1983.
- . Eisenhower: The President. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984.
- . Milton S. Eisenhower, Educational Statesman. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983.
- . Nixon: Ruin and Recovery, 1973–1990. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1991.
- . Nixon: The Education of a Politician, 1913–1967. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987.
- . Nixon: The Triumph of a Politician, 1962–1972. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Anderson, Jervis. A. Philip Randolph: A Biographical Portrait. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973.
- . Bayard Rustin: Troubles I've Seen: A Biography. New York: HarperCollins Publishers, 1997.
- Anderson, John F. The Kefauver Story. New York: Dial Press, 1956.
- Ashby, LeRoy. Fighting the Odds: The Life of Senator Frank Church. Seattle: Washington State University Press, 1994.
- Ashmore, Harry S. Unseasonable Truths: The Life of Robert Maynard Hutchins. Boston: Little, Brown, 1989.
- August, Jack L. Vision in the Desert: Carl Hayden and Hydropolitics in the American Southwest. Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press, 1999.
- Ausmus, Harry J. Will Herberg: From Right to Right. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1987.
- Baker, James T. Eleanor Roosevelt. Fort Worth, Tex.: Harcourt Brace, 1999.
- . Eric Hoffer. Boston: Twayne, 1982.
- . Brooks Hays. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1989.
- Baker, Liva. Felix Frankfurter. New York: Coward-McCann, 1969.
- Baker, Richard A. Conservation Politics: The Senate Career of Clinton P. Anderson. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1985.
- Ball, Howard. A Defiant Life: Thurgood Marshall and the Persistence of Racism in America. New York: Crown Publishers, 1998.
- . Hugo L. Black: Cold Steel Warrior. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- . Of Power and Right: Hugo Black, William O. Douglas and America's Constitutional Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Barnard, John. Walter Reuther and the Rise of the Auto Workers. Boston: Little, Brown, 1983.
- Barnouw, Dagmar. Visible Spaces: Hannah Arendt and the German-Jewish Experience. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990.
- Bartlett, Donald. Empire: The Life, Legend and Madness of Howard Hughes. New York: Norton, 1979.
- Bartlett, Paul D. James Bryant Conant, 1893–1978: A Biographical Memoir. Washington, D.C.: National Academy Press, 1983.
- Bass, Jack, and Marilyn W. Thompson. Strom: The Complicated Personal and Political Life of Strom Thurmond. New York: Public Affairs, 2005.
- Bass, Jack. Ol' Strom: An Unauthorized Biography of Strom Thurmond. Atlanta: Longstreet, 1998.
- . Taming the Storm: The Life and Times of Judge Frank M. Johnson and the South's Fight over Civil Rights. New York: Doubleday, 1993.
- Bates, Daisy. The Long Shadow of Little Rock: A Memoir. New York: David McKay Co., 1962.
- Beal, John Robinson. John Foster Dulles: A Biography. New York: Harper, 1957.
- Beatty, Jack. The World According to Peter Drucker: The Life and Work of the World's Greatest Management Thinker. New York: Free Press, 1998.
- Becker, William. The Governor's Office under Edmund G. Brown, Sr. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1981.
- Bennett, Lerone. What Manner of Man: A Biography of Martin Luther King, Jr. Chicago: Johnson Publishing Co., 1968.
- Bergen, Bernard J. The Banality of Evil: Hannah Arendt and "The Final Solution." Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, 1998.
- Bernstein, Jeremy. Hans Bethe: Prophet of Energy. New York: Basic Books, 1980.
- . Oppenheimer: Portrait of an Enigma. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2005.
- Berthelot, Helen W. Win Some, Lose Some: G. Menen Williams and the New Democrats. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1995.
- Biggs, Bradley. Gavin. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1980.

- Bilby, Kenneth W. The General: David Sarnoff and the Rise of the Communications Industry. New York: Harper & Row, 1986.
- Biles, Roger. Crusading Liberal: Paul H. Douglas of Illinois. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 2002.
- . Richard J. Daley: Politics, Race, and the Governing of Chicago. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1995.
- Bingham, June. Courage to Change: An Introduction to the Life and Thought of Reinhold Niebuhr. New York: Scribner, 1961.
- Bird, Kai, and Martin J. Sherwin. American Prometheus: The Triumph and Tragedy of J. Robert Oppenheimer. New York: Knopf, 2005.
- Bird, Kai. The Chairman: John J. McCoy, The Making of the American Establishment. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1992.
- Bissell, Richard M., and Jonathan Lewis. Reflections of a Cold Warrior: From Yalta to the Bay of Pigs. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996.
- Bitner, William C. Frank J. Lausche: A Political Biography. New York: Studia Slovenica, 1976.
- Bixby, Roland. Standing Tall: The Life of Senator Norris Cotton. Crawfordsville, Ind.: Lakeside Press, 1988.
- Black, Hugo. A Constitutional Faith. New York: Knopf, 1968.
- Blackburn, Julia. Daisy Bates in the Desert. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.
- Blossom, Virgil T. It Has Happened Here. New York: Harper, 1959.
- Blumberg, Stanley A. Edward Teller: Giant of the Golden Age of Physics: A Biography. New York: Scribner's, 1990.
- . Energy and Conflict: The Life and Times of Edward Teller. New York: Putnam, 1976.
- Blumenson, Martin. Mark Clark. New York: Congdon & Weed/St. Martin's Press, 1984.
- Bohlen, Charles. Witness to History, 1929–1969. New York: Norton, 1973.
- Booth, T. Michael. Paratrooper: The Life of General James M. Gavin. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994.
- Bortz, Arn. John J. Rooney: Democratic Representative from New York. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- Boulard, Garry. The Big Lie: Hale Boggs, Lucille May Grace, and Leander Perez in 1951. Gretna, La.: Pelican Publishing Co., 2001.
- Bowles, Chester. Promises to Keep: My Years in Public Life, 1941–1969. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.
- Boyle, Peter G. Eisenhower. Harlow, England: Longman/Pearson, 2005.
- Brackenridge, R. Douglas. Eugene Carson Blake, Prophet with Portfolio. New York: Seabury Press, 1978.
- Braden, Spruille. Diplomats and Demagogues: The Memoirs of Spruille Braden. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1971.
- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–1963. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- Branden, Barbara. The Passion of Ayn Rand. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1986.
- Brazelton, W. Robert. Designing US Economic Policy: An Analytical Biography of Leon Keyserling. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Bremner, Robert. Chairman of the Fed: William McChesney Martin, Jr., and the Creation of the Modern American Financial System. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2004.
- Bridge, William. John J. Sparkman: Democratic Senator from Alabama. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- Brinkley, Douglas. Rosa Parks. New York: Viking, 2000.
- Broadwater, Jeff. Adlai Stevenson and American Politics. New York: Twayne, 1994.
- Brown, David. Richard Hofstadter: An Intellectual Biography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2006.
- Brown, Stuart Gerry. Conscience in Politics: Adlai E. Stevenson in the 1950s. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1961.
- Brown, Winthrop G. Postmark Asia: Letters of an American Diplomat to His Family from India, Laos, and Korea, 1957–1966. New York: Brown, 1990.
- Brownell, Herbert, and John P. Burke. Advising Ike: The Memoirs of Attorney General Herbert Brownell. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1993.

- Buckley, Thomas C. Lauris Norstad: From Red Wing to Paris. Red Wing, Minn.: Goodhue County Historical Society, 1990.
- Burke, Bob. Bryce Harlow: Mr. Integrity. Oklahoma City: Oklahoma Heritage Association, 2000.
- Burke, Robert F. Dwight D. Eisenhower: Hero and Politician. Boston: Twayne, 1986.
- Burner, David. Herbert Hoover: A Public Life. New York: Knopf, 1979.
- . John F. Kennedy and a New Generation. New York: Pearson/Longman, 2005.
- Bush, Vannevar. Pieces of the Action. New York: Morrow, 1970.
- Byer, Barry K. Thomas E. Dewey: A Study in Political Leadership. New York: Taylor & Francis, 1979.
- Byrd, Harry Flood. Defying the Odds: An Independent Senator's Historic Campaign. Harrisonburg, Va.: R. R. Donnelley & Sons Co., 1998.
- Byrd, Robert C. Robert C. Byrd: Child of the Appalachian Coalfields. Morgantown: West Virginia University Press, 2005.
- Caldwell, Bruce. Hayek's Challenge: An Intellectual Biography of F. A. Hayek. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Cannon, Elaine. Boy of the Land, Man of the Lord. Salt Lake City: Bookcraft, 1989.
- Cannon, James M. Time and Chance: Gerald Ford's Appointment with History. New York: HarperCollins, 1994.
- Cantor, Milton. Max Eastman. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1970.
- Caro, Robert A. The Years of Lyndon Johnson: Means of Ascent. New York: Knopf, 1990.
- . The Years of Lyndon Johnson: The Path to Power. New York: Knopf, 1982.
- Carter, Barbara. The Road to City Hall: How John V. Lindsay Became Mayor. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: PrenticeHall, 1967.
- Celler, Emanuel. You Never Leave Brooklyn: The Autobiography of Emanuel Celler. New York: J. Day Co., 1953.
- Chambers, Whittaker, and William F. Buckley, Jr. Odyssey of a Friend: Whittaker Chambers' Letters to William F. Buckley, Jr., 1954–1961. New York: Putnam, 1970.
- Chambers, Whittaker. Witness. Chicago: Regnery Gateway, 1984.
- Chandler, Happy. Heroes, Plain Folks, and Skunks. Chicago: Bonus Books, 1989.
- Charters, Ann. Kerouac. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1974.
- Chase, James. Acheson: The Secretary of State Who Created the American World. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.
- Chessman, Caryl. Cell 2455: Death Row. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1954.
- . The Face of Justice. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1958.
- Childs, Marquis, and James Reston, eds. Walter Lippman and His Times. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1959.
- Christenson, Cornelia V. Kinsey: A Biography. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1971.
- Church, F. Forrester. Father and Son: A Personal Biography of Senator Frank Church of Idaho. New York: Harper & Row, 1985.
- Clancy, Paul R. Just a Country Lawyer: A Biography of Senator Sam Ervin. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1974.
- Clark, Hunter R. Justice Brennan: The Great Conciliator. Secaucus, N.J.: Carol Publishing Group, 1995.
- Clark, Mark W. From the Danube to the Yalu. London: George G. Harrap & Co., 1954.
- Clark, Ronald William. Einstein: The Life and Times. New York: World Publishing Co., 1971.
- Cleveland, Martha. Charles Percy: Strong New Voice from Illinois: A Biography. Jacksonville, Ill.: Harris-Wolfe, 1968.
- Cochran, Bert. Adlai Stevenson: Patrician among Politicians. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1969.
- Coffey, Thomas M. Iron Eagle: The Turbulent Life of General Curtis LeMay. New York: Crown Publishers, 1986.
- Coffin, Tristram. Senator Fulbright: Portrait of a Public Philosopher. New York: Dutton, 1966.
- Cohen, Adam, and Elizabeth Taylor. American Pharaoh: Mayor Richard J. Daley: His Battle for Chicago and the Nation. Boston: Little, Brown, 2000.
- Cohn, Roy, and Sidney Zion. The Autobiography of Roy Cohn. Secaucus, N.J.: Lyle Stuart, 1988.
- Cohodas, Nadine. Strom Thurmond and the Politics of Southern Change. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.

- Colburn, Don. Chet Holifield: Democratic Representative from California. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- Collier, Peter. The Fords: An American Epic. New York: Summit Books, 1987.
- Collins, J. Lawton. Lightning Joe: An Autobiography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1979.
- Conkin, Paul Keith. Big Daddy from the Pedernales: Lyndon Baines Johnson. Boston: Twayne, 1986.
- Conrad, Glenn R. Creed of a Congressman: F. Edward Hebert of Louisiana. Lafayette, La.: USL History Series, University of Southwestern Louisiana, 1971.
- Cook, Gay. F. Edward Hébert, Democratic Representative from Louisiana. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- . John C. Stennis, Democratic Senator from Mississippi. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- Cook, James F. Carl Vinson: Patriarch of the Armed Forces. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 2004.
- Cooney, John. The American Pope: The Life and Times of Francis Cardinal Spellman. New York: Times Books, 1984.
- Cooper, Richard J. Politics of Progress: How Governor George M. Leader Modernized Pennsylvania State Government. Harrisburg: Pennsylvania Valley Publishers, 1982.
- Cormier, Frank, and William J. Eaton. Reuther. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1970.
- Cotton, Norris. In the Senate: Amidst the Conflict and the Turmoil. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1978.
- Cottrell, Robert C. Izzy: A Biography of I. F. Stone. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1992.
- Cousins, Norman. Human Options. New York: Norton, 1983.
- Cox, Patrick. Ralph W. Yarborough: The People's Senator. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2001.
- Cremin, Lawrence Arthur. Richard Hofstadter (1916–1970): A Biographical Memoir. Syracuse, N.Y.: National Academy of Education, 1972.
- Crispell, Brian Lewis. Testing the Limits: George Armistead Smathers and Cold War America. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1999.
- Crosswell, D. K. The Chief of Staff: The Military Career of General Walter Bedell Smith. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991.
- Cunningham, Barry. Mr. District Attorney: The Story of Frank S. Hogan and the Manhattan D.A.'s Office. New York: Mason/Charter, 1977.
- Currey, Cecil B. Edward Lansdale: The Unquiet American. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1988.
- Dallek, Robert. An Unfinished Life: John F. Kennedy, 1917–1963. Boston: Little, Brown, 2003.
- . Flawed Giant: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, 1961–1973. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- . Lone Star Rising: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, 1908–1960. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Danish, Max D. The World of David Dubinsky. Cleveland: World Publishing Co., 1957.
- Dauer, Richard P. A North-South Mind in an East-West World: Chester Bowles and the Making of the Cold War. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2005.
- Davies, Richard O. Defender of the Old Guard: John Bricker and American Politics. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1993.
- Davis, Daniel S. Mr. Black Labor: The Story of A. Philip Randolph, Father of the Civil Rights Movement. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1972.
- D'Emilio, John. Lost Prophet: The Life and Times of Bayard Rustin. New York: Free Press, 2003.
- Depoe, Stephen P. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and the Ideological History of American Liberalism. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1994.
- Desmond, James. Nelson Rockefeller: A Political Biography. New York: Macmillan, 1964.
- Dew, Sheri L. Ezra Taft Benson: A Biography. Salt Lake City: Deseret Book Co., 1987.
- Diggins, John P. The Liberal Persuasion: Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., and the Challenge of the American Past. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Dirksen, Everett McKinley. The Education of a Senator. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1998.
- DiSalle, Michael V. Second Choice. New York: Hawthorne Books, 1966.
- Dobbs, Ricky F. Yellow Dogs and Republicans: Allan Shivers and Texas Two-Party Politics. Dallas: Texas A&M University Press, 2005.

- Donovan, Robert J. Conflict and Crisis: The Presidency of Harry S. Truman, 1945–1948. New York: Norton, 1977.
- . Eisenhower: The Inside Story. New York: Harper, 1956.
- . Tumultuous Years: The Presidency of Harry S. Truman, 1949–1953. New York: Norton, 1982.
- Dorough, C. Dwight. Mr. Sam. New York: Random House, 1962.
- Douglas, Paul H. In the Fullness of Time. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971.
- Douglas, William O. The Court Years, 1939–1975: The Autobiography of William O. Douglas. New York: Random House, 1980.
- Draper, Hal. The Mind of Clark Kerr: His View of the University Factory & the “New Slavery.” Boston: New England Free Press, 1964.
- Dreher, Carl. Sarnoff: An American Success. New York: Quadrangle Books, 1977.
- Drosnin, Michael. Citizen Hughes. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1985.
- Drucker, Peter F. Adventures of a Bystander. New York: Harper & Row, 1979.
- Drukman, Mason. Wayne Morse: A Political Biography. Portland: Oregon Historical Society Press, 1997.
- Dryden, Hugh L. Hugh L. Dryden’s Career in Aviation and Space. Washington, D.C.: NASA, 1996.
- Duberman, Martin B. Paul Robeson. New York: Knopf, 1998.
- Dubinsky, David. David Dubinsky: A Life with Labor. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1977.
- Dubovsky, Melvyn, and Warren Van Tine. John L. Lewis: A Biography. New York: Quadrangle Books, 1977.
- Dulles, Allen. The Craft of Intelligence. New York: Harper & Row, 1963.
- Duncan, Anne Shipley. The Making of an Anti-Communist Crusader: A Political Biography of Walter H. Judd. South Hadley, Mass.: Mount Holyoke College, 1982.
- Duncan, Francis. Rickover and the Nuclear Navy: The Discipline of Technology. Annapolis: Naval Institute Press, 1990.
- Dunne, Gerald T. Hugo Black and the Judicial Revolution. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1977.
- Durden-Smith, Jo. 100 Most Infamous Criminals. New York: MetroBooks, 2004.
- Dyckman, Martin A. Floridian of His Century: The Courage of Governor LeRoy Collins. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2006.
- Dyke, Richard Wayne. Chet Holifield: Master Legislator and Nuclear Statesman. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1996.
- Dzuback, May Ann. Robert M. Hutchins: Portrait of an Educator. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Edwards, Bob. Edward R. Murrow and the Birth of Broadcast Journalism. Hoboken, N.J.: Wiley, 2004.
- Edwards, Lee. Goldwater: The Man Who Made a Revolution. Washington, D.C.: Regnery Publishing Co., 1995.
- . Missionary for Freedom: The Life and Times of Walter Judd. New York: Paragon House, 1990.
- Eggler, Bruce. The Life and Career of Hale Boggs. New Orleans: New Orleans States-Item, 1973.
- Eisenhower, Dwight D. At Ease: Stories I Tell to Friends. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1967.
- . The White House Years. 2 vols. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1963–65.
- Eisenhower, Milton S. The President Is Calling. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974.
- Eisler, Kim Isaac. A Justice for All: William J. Brennan, Jr., and the Decisions That Transformed America. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.
- Elliot, Gary. Senator Alan Bible and the Politics of the New West. Reno: University of Nevada Press, 1994.
- Emmet, John Hughes. The Ordeal of Power: A Political Memoir of the Eisenhower Years. New York: Atheneum, 1963.
- Ervin, Sam J. Preserving the Constitution: The Autobiography of Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. Charlottesville, Va.: Michie Co., 1984.
- Ettinger, Elzbieta. Hannah Arendt/Martin Heidegger. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1995.
- Evans, Rowland, and Robert Novak. Lyndon B. Johnson: The Exercise of Power. New York: Signet, 1966.
- Fallows, James M. Warren G. Magnuson, Democratic Senator from Washington. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- Fassett, John D. New Deal Justice: The Life of Stanley Reed of Kentucky. New York: Vantage Press, 1994.

- Fast, Howard. Being Red. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1990.
- Ferrell, Robert (ed.). The Eisenhower Diaries. New York: Norton, 1981.
- Ferrell, Robert H. Harry S. Truman and the Modern American Presidency. Boston: Little, Brown, 1983.
- Fleischman, Harry. Norman Thomas—A Biography: 1884–1968. New York: Norton, 1969.
- Flemming, Bernice. Arthur Flemming: Crusader at Large. Washington, D.C.: Caring Publishing, 1991.
- Folsing, Albrecht. Einstein: A Life in Science. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Fontenay, Charles L. Estes Kefauver: A Biography. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1980.
- Ford, Gerald R. A Time to Heal: The Autobiography of Gerald Ford. New York: Harper & Row, 1979.
- Fox, Richard Wightman. Reinhold Niebuhr: A Biography. New York: Pantheon Books, 1985.
- Fraday, Marshall. Billy Graham: A Parable of American Righteousness. Boston: Little, Brown, 1979.
- Frank, John P. Clement Haynsworth, the Senate, and the Supreme Court. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1991.
- Frankfurter, Felix. Felix Frankfurter Reminisces. New York: Reynal, 1960.
- Frasca, Dom. Vito Genovese: King of Crime. New York: Avon Books, 1963.
- Freyer, Tony. Hugo L. Black and the Dilemma of American Liberalism. Glenview, Ill.: Little, Brown, 1990.
- Fried, Richard M. Men against McCarthy. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.
- Galbraith, John Kenneth. A Life in Our Time: Memoirs. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1981.
- Gamble, Andrew. Hayek: The Iron Cage of Liberty. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1996.
- Gannon, Robert I. The Cardinal Spellman Story. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1962.
- Garber, Marjorie B. Secret Agents: The Rosenberg Case, McCarthyism, and Fifties America. New York: Routledge, 1995.
- Gardner, Trevor. My First Eighty Years. Edinburgh: Pentland Press, 1998.
- Garraty, John Arthur. Henry Cabot Lodge: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1953.
- Garrow, David J. Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr. and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: W. Morrow, 1986.
- Geelan, Agnes. The Dakota Maverick: The Political Life of William Langer, Also Known as "Wild Bill" Langer. Fargo, N.D.: Geelan, 1975.
- Gelman, Irwin F. The Contender: Richard Nixon, The Congress Years, 1946–1952. New York: Free Press, 1999.
- Gentry, Curt. J. Edgar Hoover: The Man and His Secrets. New York: Norton, 1991.
- George, Carol. God's Salesman: Norman Vincent Peale & the Power of Positive Thinking. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Gerhardt, Uta. Talcott Parsons: An Intellectual Biography. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Gerhart, Eugene C. America's Advocate: Robert H. Jackson. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1958.
- Gibbons, Francis M. Ezra Taft Benson: Statesman, Patriot, Prophet of God. Salt Lake City: Deseret Book Co., 1996.
- Gibson, M. Allen. Beautiful upon the Mountains: A Portrait of Cyrus Eaton. Hantsport, N.S.: Lancelot Press, 1977.
- Gill, Kenny. Jimmy Davis: More Than Sunshine. Many, La.: Sweet Dreams Publishing Co., 2000.
- Gilliam, Dorothy Butler. Paul Robeson: All-American. Washington, D.C.: New Republic Book Co., 1976.
- Ginsberg, Allen. Journals: Early Fifties, Early Sixties. New York: Random House, 1977.
- . Journals: Mid-Fifties, 1954–1958. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
- Gleisser, Marcus. The World of Cyrus Eaton. New York: A. S. Barnes, 1965.
- Goertzel, Ted. Linus Pauling: A Life in Science and Politics. New York: Basic Books, 1995.
- Gold, Ben. Memoirs. New York: W. Howard, 1984.
- Goldberg, Robert Alan. Barry Goldwater. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1995.
- Goldman, Roger, and David Gallen. Justice William J. Brennan, Jr.: Freedom First. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1994.
- Goldwater, Barry M. Goldwater. New York: Doubleday, 1988.
- Goodchild, Peter. J. Robert Oppenheimer: Shatterer of Worlds. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1981.

- Goodwin, Doris Kearns. Lyndon Johnson and the American Dream. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.
- Goold-Adams, Richard. The Time of Power: A Reappraisal of John Foster Dulles. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1962.
- Gordon, Arthur. One Man's Way: The Story and Message of Norman Vincent Peale. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: PrenticeHall, 1972.
- Gore, Albert. Let the Glory Out: My South and Its Politics. New York: Viking Press, 1972.
- Gorman, Joseph Bruce. Kefauver: A Political Biography. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Gottfried, Martin. Arthur Miller: His Life and Work. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Goulden, Joseph C. Meany. New York: Atheneum, 1972.
- Grafton, Carl. Big Mules and Branchbeads: James E. Folsom and Political Power in Alabama. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1985.
- Graham, Billy. Just as I Am: The Autobiography of Billy Graham. San Francisco: Harper, 1997.
- Graubard, Stephen R. Kissinger: Portrait of a Mind. New York: Norton, 1973.
- Green, George N. The Establishment in Texas Politics: The Primitive Years, 1938–1945. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1984.
- Greene, Lee Seifert. Lead Me On: Frank Goad Clement and Tennessee Politics. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1982.
- Griffin, Winthrop. Humphrey: A Candid Biography. New York: Morrow, 1965.
- Griffith, Robert. The Politics of Fear: Joseph R. McCarthy and the Senate. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1970.
- Grose, Peter. Gentleman Spy: The Life of Allen Dulles. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994.
- Gruening, Ernest. Many Battles: The Autobiography of Ernest Gruening. New York: Liveright, 1973.
- Gugin, Linda and James E. St. Clair. Sherman Minton: New Deal Senator, Cold War Justice. Indianapolis: Indiana Historical Society, 1997.
- Guhin, Michael A. John Foster Dulles: A Statesman and His Times. New York: Columbia University Press, 1972.
- Haas, Edward F. DeLesseps S. Morrison and the Image of Reform: New Orleans Politics, 1946–1961. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1974.
- . The Age of the Longs: Louisiana, 1928–1960. Lafayette: University of Louisiana at Lafayette, 2001.
- Haberman, Aaron L. Andrew J. Goodpaster Papers, 1930–1997. New York: Marshall George Research, 2000.
- Hack, Richard. Hughes: The Private Diaries, Memos and Letters: The Definitive Biography of the First American Billionaire. Beverly Hills: New Millennium Press, 2001.
- Hager, Thomas. Force of Nature: The Life of Linus Pauling. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1995.
- Hall, Bill. Frank Church: D.C. & Me. Pullman: Washington State University Press, 1995.
- Hamilton, Charles. Adam Clayton Powell, Jr.: The Political Biography of an American Dilemma. New York: Atheneum, 1991.
- Hamilton, Nigel. JFK: Reckless Youth. New York: Random House, 1992.
- Hamilton, Virginia. Lister Hill: Statesman from the South. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.
- Hannah, John A. A Memoir. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1980.
- Harbaugh, William Henry. Lawyer's Lawyer: The Life of John W. Davis. New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.
- Hardeman, D. B., and Donald C. Bacon. Rayburn: A Biography. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1987.
- Harris, T. George. Romney's Way: A Man and an Idea. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1967.
- Hartley, Robert E. Charles H. Percy: A Political Perspective. Chicago: Rand McNally, 1975.
- Hass, Eric. Dave Beck Labor Merchant: The Case History of a Labor Leader. New York: New York Labor News, 1955.
- Hatch, Alden. Ambassador Extraordinary: Clare Boothe Luce. New York: Holt, 1956.
- Haygood, Will. King of the Cats: The Life and Times of Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1993.
- Heidepriem, Scott. A Fair Chance for a Free People: Biography of Karl E. Mundt, United States Senator. Madison, S.D.: Leader Print Co., 1988.
- Heinemann, Ronald L. Harry Byrd of Virginia. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1996.

- Henault, Marie. Peter Viereck. New York: Twayne, 1969.
- Henry, Charles P. Ralph Bunche: Model Negro or American Other? New York: New York University Press, 1999.
- Hentoff, Nat. Peace Agitator: The Story of A. J. Muste. New York: Macmillan, 1982.
- . A Political Life: The Education of John V. Lindsay. New York: Knopf, 1969.
- Herken, Gregg. Brotherhood of the Bomb: The Tangled Lives and Loyalties of Robert Oppenheimer. New York: Henry Holt and Co., 2002.
- Hershberg, James G. James B. Conant: Harvard to Hiroshima and the Making of the Nuclear Age. New York: Knopf, 1993.
- Herskowitz, Mickey. Duty, Honor, Country: The Life and Legacy of Prescott Bush. Nashville: Rutledge Hill Press, 2003.
- Hession, Charles H. John Kenneth Galbraith and His Critics. New York: New American Library, 1972.
- Heymann, C. David. RFK: A Candid Biography. New York: Dutton, 1998.
- Hickey, Neil. Adam Clayton Powell and the Politics of Race. New York: Fleet Publishing Corp., 1965.
- Hirsch, H. N. The Enigma of Felix Frankfurter. New York: Basic Books, 1981.
- Hodges, Luther H. Businessman in the Statehouse: Six Years as Governor of North Carolina. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1962.
- Hoff, Joan. Herbert Hoover: Forgotten Progressive. Boston: Little, Brown, 1975.
- . Without Precedent: The Life and Career of Eleanor Roosevelt. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984.
- Hoffa, James R. Hoffa: The Real Story. New York: Stein & Day, 1975.
- Hoffecker, Carol E. Honest John Williams: U.S. Senator from Delaware. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2000.
- Hoffman, Banesh, and Helen Dukas. Albert Einstein, Creator and Rebel. New York: New American Library, 1972.
- Holmes, Sven Erik. Gordon Allot: Republican Senator from Colorado. Washington: Grossman Publishers, 1972.
- Holmwood, John. Talcott Parsons. Aldershot, England: Ashgate, 2006.
- Hook, Sidney. Out of Step: An Unquiet Life in the 20th Century. New York: Harper & Row, 1987.
- Hoopes, Townsend. The Devil and John Foster Dulles. Boston: Little, Brown, 1973.
- Hoover, Herbert. Memoirs. New York: Macmillan, 1952.
- Hope, Cliff. Quiet Courage: Kansas Congressman Clifford R. Hope. Manhattan, Kans.: Sunflower University Press, 1997.
- Horowitz, Daniel. Vance Packard & American Social Criticism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
- Horowitz, Irving Louis. C. Wright Mills: An American Utopian. New York: Free Press, 1983.
- Hughes, Emmet John. The Ordeal of Power. New York: Atheneum, 1963.
- Hulsey, Byron C. Everett Dirksen and His Presidents: How a Senate Giant Shaped American Politics. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.
- Humphrey, Hubert H. The Education of a Public Man: My Life and Politics. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1976.
- Huthmacher, J. Joseph. Senator Robert F. Wagner and the Rise of Urban Liberalism. New York: Atheneum, 1968.
- Hyman, Sidney. The Lives of William Benton. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.
- Ingalls, Robert P. Herbert H. Lehman and New York's Little New Deal. New York: New York University Press, 1975.
- Isaacson, Walter. Kissinger: A Biography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1992.
- Iverson, Peter. Barry Goldwater: Native Arizonan. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1997.
- Ivey, Pete. Luther H. Hodges, Practical Idealist. Minneapolis: Denison, 1968.
- James, Ralph C. Hoffa and Teamsters: A Study in Union Power. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1965.
- Javits, Jacob K. Javits: The Autobiography of a Public Man. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1981.
- Jeanonne, Glen. Gerald L. K. Smith, Minister of Hate. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988.
- Johnpoll, Bernard. Pacifist's Progress: Norman Thomas and the Decline of American Socialism. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1970.
- Johnson, Haynes Bonner. Fulbright: The Dissenter. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1968.

- Johnson, Lyndon Baines. The Vantage Point. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1971.
- Jones, James H. Alfred C. Kinsey: A Public/ Private Life. New York: W. W. Norton, 1997.
- Jones, Ken, and Hubert Kelly. Admiral Arleigh (31-Knot) Burke: The Story of a Fighting Sailor. Annapolis, Md.: Naval Institute Press, 2001.
- Jordan, Robert S. Norstad: Cold War NATO Supreme Commander: Airman, Strategist, Diplomat. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Judis, John. William F. Buckley, Jr.: Patron Saint of the Conservatives. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- Kahn, E. J. The China Hands: America's Foreign Service Officers and What Befell Them. New York: Viking Press, 1975.
- Kalb, Marvin. Kissinger. Boston: Little, Brown, 1974.
- Kaplan, Gisela T., and Clive S. Kessler. Hannah Arendt: Thinking, Judging, Freedom. Sydney: Allen & Unwin, 1989.
- Katcher, Leo. Earl Warren: A Political Biography. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1967.
- Kateb, George. Hannah Arendt: Politics, Conscience, Evil. Totowa, N.J.: Rowman & Allanheld, 1984.
- Katz, Leonard. Uncle Frank: The Biography of Frank Costello. New York: Drake Publishers, 1973.
- Kaufman, Robert Gordon. Henry M. Jackson: A Life in Politics. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 2000.
- Keeley, Joseph Charles. The China Lobby Man: The Story of Alfred Kohlberg. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1969.
- Kelly, Daniel. James Burnham and the Struggle for the World. Wilmington, Del.: ISI Books, 2002.
- Kelly, George Edward. Man of Steel: The Story of David J. McDonald. New York: North American Book Co., 1954.
- Kemper, Donald J. Decade of Fear: Senator Hennings and Civil Liberties. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1965.
- Kendrick, Alexander. Prime Time: The Life of Edward R. Murrow. Boston: Little, Brown, 1969.
- Kennan, George Frost. Memoirs, 1950–1963, George F. Kennan. London: Hutchinson, 1973.
- Kennedy, Eugene C. Himself: The Life and Times of Mayor Richard J. Daley. New York: Viking Press, 1978.
- Kennedy, Robert Francis, Jr. Judge Frank M. Johnson, Jr.: A Biography. New York: Putnam, 1978.
- Kerouac, Jack. Windblown World: The Journals of Jack Kerouac, 1947–1954. New York: Viking Press, 2004.
- Kerr, Clark. The Gold and the Blue: A Personal Memoir of the University of California, 1949–1967. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.
- Khedouri, F. N. Carl T. Curtis: Republican Senator from Nebraska. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- Kiepper, James J. Styles Bridges: Yankee Senator. Sugar Hill, N.H.: Phoenix Publishing, 2001.
- Killian, James Rhyne. Sputnik, Scientists, and Eisenhower: A Memoir of the First Special Assistant to the President for Science and Technology. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1977.
- Kinch, Sam. Allan Shivers: The Pied Piper of Texas Politics. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1974.
- King, Martin Luther, Jr. Stride toward Freedom: The Montgomery Story. New York: Harper, 1958.
- . The Autobiography of Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Warner Books, 1998.
- Kinthead, Gwen. J. Caleb Boggs: Republican Senator from Delaware. Washington, D.C.: Grossman Publishers, 1972.
- Kirk, Russell. The Sword of Imagination: Memoirs of a Half-Century of Literary Conflict. Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdmans Publishing, 1995.
- Kistiakowsky, George B. A Scientist at the White House. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1976.
- Klitzman, Stephen. Sam J. Ervin, Jr.: Democratic Senator from North Carolina. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- Kluger, Jeffrey. Splendid Solution: Jonas Salk and the Conquest of Polio. New York: G.P. Putnam's Sons, 2004.
- Klurfeld, Herman. Behind the Lines: The World of Drew Pearson. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1968.
- Koerner, James D. Hoffer's America. La Salle, Ill.: Library Press, 1973.
- Kohl, Robert, and Cynthia Stokes Brown. She Would Not Be Moved: How We Tell the Story of Rosa Parks and the Montgomery Bus Boycott. New York: W. W. Norton, 2005.

- Kramer, Joe. Allen Ginsberg in America. New York: Random House, 1969.
- Krock, Arthur. In the Nation. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1966.
- Kurtz, Michael L. Earl K. Long: The Saga of Uncle Earl and Louisiana Politics. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990.
- Lachicotte, Alberta Morel. Rebel Senator: Strom Thurmond of South Carolina. New York: Devin-Adair Co., 1966.
- Lankford, Nelson D. The Last American Aristocrat: The Biography of David K. E. Bruce, 1898–1977. Boston: Little, Brown, 1996.
- Lansdale, Edward G. In the Midst of Wars: An American's Mission to Southeast Asia. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Larowe, Charles P. Harry Bridges: The Rise and Fall of Radical Labor in the United States. New York: L. Hill, 1972.
- Larson, Arthur. Eisenhower: The President Nobody Knew. New York: Scribner, 1968.
- . A Twentieth-Century Life: The Memoirs of Arthur Larson. Sioux Falls, S.D.: Center for Western Studies, 1997.
- Lash, Joseph P. Eleanor: The Years Alone. New York: Norton, 1972.
- Lasky, Victor. Arthur J. Goldberg: The Old and the New. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1970.
- . Never Complain, Never Explain: The Story of Henry Ford II. New York: R. Marek Publishers, 1981.
- LeMay, Curtis, with McKinley Kantor. Mission with LeMay: My Story. New York: Doubleday, 1965.
- Leonard, Rodney E. Freeman: The Governor Years, 1955–1960. Minneapolis: Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs, 2003.
- Levine, Daniel. Bayard Rustin and the Civil Rights Movement. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2000.
- Levine, Erwin L. Theodore Francis Green: The Washington Years, 1937–1960. Providence, R.I.: Brown University Press, 1971.
- Lewis, David L. King: A Critical Biography. New York: Praeger, 1970.
- Lewis, Tom. Empire of the Air: The Men Who Made Radio. New York: E. Burlingame Books, 1991.
- Lichtenstein, Nelson. The Most Dangerous Man in Detroit: Walter Reuther and the Fate of American Labor. New York: Basic Books, 1995.
- Liebling, A. J. The Earl of Louisiana. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1961.
- Liebman, Marvin. Coming Out Conservative: An Autobiography. San Francisco: Chronicle Books, 1992.
- Lindsay, John V. Journey into Politics. New York: H. W. Wilson Co., 1967.
- Livingston, Jeffery C. Swallowed by Globalism: John M. Vorys and American Foreign Policy. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 2001.
- Lodge, Henry Cabot. As It Was: An Inside View of Politics and Power in the '50s and '60s. New York: Norton, 1976.
- . The Storm Has Many Eyes. New York: Norton, 1973.
- Longley, Kyle. Senator Albert Gore, Sr.: Tennessee Maverick. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2004.
- Loth, David Goldsmith. A Long Way Forward: The Biography of a Congresswoman Frances P. Bolton. New York: Longmans, Green, 1957.
- Ludwick, Jim. Mansfield: The Senator from Montana. Missoula, Mont.: The Missoulian, 1988.
- Lule, Jack. Radical Rules: I. F. Stone's Ethical Perspective. New York: HarperBusiness, 1992.
- Lyon, Peter. Eisenhower: Portrait of the Hero. Boston: Little, Brown, 1974.
- Lyons, Eugene. David Sarnoff: A Biography. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.
- . Herbert Hoover: A Biography. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1964.
- Lythgoe, Dennis L. Let 'em Holler: A Political Biography of J. Bracken Lee. Salt Lake City: Utah State Historical Society, 1982.
- MacArthur, Douglas. Reminiscences. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1964.
- MacKown, Craig. Jacob K. Javits: Republican Senator from New York. Washington, D.C.: Grossman Publishers, 1972.
- MacNeil, Neil. Dirksen: Portrait of a Public Man. New York: World Publishing Co., 1970.
- MacPherson, Myra. All Governments Lie: The Life and Times of Rebel Journalist I. F. Stone. New York: Scribner, 2006.

- Mahoney, Tom. The Story of George Romney: Builder, Statesman, Crusader. New York: Harper, 1960.
- Manchester, William Raymond. American Caesar: Douglas MacArthur, 1880–1964. Boston: Little, Brown, 1978.
- Maney, Kevin. The Maverick and His Machine: Thomas Watson and the Making of IBM. New York: J. Wiley & Sons, 2003.
- Manis, Andrew Michael. A Fire You Can't Put Out: The Civil Rights Life of Birmingham's Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1999.
- Mann, Peggy. Ralph Bunche: UN Peacemaker. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1975.
- Mann, Robert. Legacy to Power: Senator Russell Long of Louisiana. New York: Paragon House, 1992.
- Markmann, Charles L. The Buckleys: A Family Examined. New York: W. Morrow, 1973.
- Martin, John Bartlow. Adlai Stevenson and the World. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1977.
- . Adlai Stevenson of Illinois: The Life of Adlai E. Stevenson. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1976.
- Martin, Joseph W. My First Fifty Years in Politics. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1960.
- Mason, Lowell B. Senator Saltonstall Hits a Home Run. New York: Rand McNally, 1956.
- Matteson, Robert Eliot. Harold Stassen: His Career, The Man, and the 1957 London Arms Control Negotiations. Minneapolis: Desk Top Ink, 1993.
- Matthews, Christopher. Kennedy & Nixon: The Rivalry That Shaped Postwar America. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.
- Matthews, Thomas G. Luis Munoz Marin. New York: American R.D.M. Corp., 1967.
- May, Gary. China Scapegoat: The Diplomatic Ordeal of John Carter Vincent. Washington, D.C.: New Republic Books, 1979.
- Mayer, Milton Sanford. Robert Maynard Hutchins: A Memoir. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Mayers, David Allan. George Kennan and the Dilemmas of US Foreign Policy. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Mazo, Earl. Richard Nixon: A Political and Personal Biography. New York: Harper, 1959.
- McAdams, Alan K. Power and Politics in Labor Legislation. New York: Columbia University Press, 1964.
- McCallum, John Dennis. Dave Beck. Mercer Island, Wash.: Writing Works, 1978.
- McCarthy, Eugene J. Parting Shots from My Brittle Bow: Reflections on American Politics and Life. Golden, Colo.: Fulcrum Publishing, 2004.
- McCullough, David G. Truman. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1992.
- McDonald, David J. Union Man. New York: Dutton, 1969.
- McFarland, Linda. Cold War Strategist: Stuart Symington and the Search for National Security. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001.
- McKeever, Porter. Adlai Stevenson: His Life and Legacy. New York: Morrow, 1989.
- McLellan, David S. Dean Acheson: The State Department Years. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co., 1976.
- McMillan, Priscilla. The Ruin of J. Robert Oppenheimer and the Birth of the Modern Arms Race. New York: Viking, 2005.
- McNally, Dennis. Desolate Angel: Jack Kerouac, the Beat Generation, and America. New York: Random House, 1979.
- McNaughton, Frank. Mennen Williams of Michigan, Fighter for Progress. New York: Oceana Publications, 1960.
- Meilinger, Phillip. S. Hoyt S. Vandenberg: The Life of a General. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Mendelson, Wallace (ed.). Felix Frankfurter: The Judge. New York: Reynal, 1964.
- Merkley, Paul. Reinhold Niebuhr: A Political Account. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1975.
- Merry, Robert. Taking on the World: Joseph and Stewart Alsop—Guardians of the American Century. New York: Viking, 1996.
- Metress, Christopher. The Lynching of Emmett Till: A Documentary Narrative. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2002.
- Michelman, Frank I. Brennan and Democracy. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999.
- Miles, Barry. Ginsberg: A Biography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.

- Miller, Arthur Selwyn. A Capacity for Outrage: The Judicial Odyssey of J. Skelly Wright. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1984.
- Miller, Arthur. Timebends: A Life. New York: Grove Press, 1987.
- Miller, Richard Lawrence. Whittaker: Struggles of a Supreme Court Justice. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2002.
- Miller, William J. Henry Cabot Lodge: A Biography. New York: Heineman, 1967.
- Millet, Anna L., and John A. Millet. Blatnik: Democratic Representative from Minnesota. Washington, D.C.: Grossman Publishers, 1972.
- Mitchell, William C. Sociological Analysis and Politics: The Theories of Talcott Parsons. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1967.
- Mollenhoff, Clark R. George Romney, Mormon in Politics. New York: Meredith Press, 1968.
- Montgomery, Gayle B., and James Johnson. One Step from the White House: The Rise and Fall of Senator William F. Knowland. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Morgan, Anne Hodges. Robert S. Kerr: The Senate Years. Oklahoma City: University of Oklahoma Press, 1977.
- Morgan, Ted. A Covert Life: Jay Lovestone, Communist, Anticommunist, and Spymaster. New York: Random House, 1999.
- Morganthau, Ruth S. Pride without Prejudice: The Life of John Pastore. Providence, R.I.: Rhode Island Historical Society, 1989.
- Morris, Joe Alex. The Richardson Dilworth Story. Philadelphia: Mercury Books, 1962.
- Morris, Roger. Richard Milhous Nixon: The Rise of an American Politician. New York: Holt, 1990.
- Morris, Sylvia Jukes. Rage for Fame: The Ascent of Clare Boothe Luce. New York: Random House, 1997.
- Morrow, E. Frederic. Black Man in the White House. New York: Coward-McCann, 1963.
- . Forty Years a Guinea Pig. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1980.
- Moscow, Warren. The Last of the Big-Time Bosses: The Life and Times of Carmine DeSapio and the Rise and Fall of Tammany Hall. New York: Stein & Day, 1971.
- Moss, Leonard. Arthur Miller. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1967.
- Murph, Dan. Texas Giant: The Life of Price Daniel. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2001.
- Murphy, Bruce Allen. Wild Bill: The Legend and Life of William O. Douglas. New York: Random House, 2003.
- Murphy, Robert D. Diplomat among Warriors. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1964.
- Nashel, Jonathan. Edward Lansdale's Cold War. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2005.
- Naske, Claus M. Ernest Gruening: Alaska's Greatest Governor. Fairbanks: University of Alaska Press, 2004.
- Nevins, Allan. Herbert H. Lehman and His Era. New York: Scribner, 1963.
- Newman, Roger K. Hugo Black: A Biography. New York: Fordham University Press, 1997.
- Niehoff, Richard O. John A. Hannab: Versatile Administrator and Distinguished Public Servant. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1989.
- Nixon, Richard M. Six Crises. New York: Doubleday, 1962.
- . RN: The Memoirs of Richard Nixon. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1978.
- Noer, Thomas J. Soapy: A Biography of G. Mennen Williams. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2005.
- Noonan, D. P. The Passion of Fulton Sheen. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Oates, Stephen. Let the Trumpet Sound: The Life of Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Harper & Row, 1982.
- Oberdorfer, Don. Senator Mansfield: The Extraordinary Life of a Great Statesman and Diplomat. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Books, 2003.
- O'Brien, F. William. Justice Reed and the First Amendment. Washington: Georgetown University Press, 1958.
- O'Brien, Michael. Philip Hart: The Conscience of the Senate. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1995.
- O'Connor, Len. Clout: Mayor Daly and His City. Chicago: H. Regnery Co., 1975.
- Odenkirk, James E. Frank J. Lausche: Ohio's Great Political Maverick. Wilmington, Ohio: Orange Frazer Press, 2005.
- Ognibene, Peter J. Scoop: The Life and Politics of Henry M. Jackson. New York: Stein & Day, 1975.

- Ohnson, Robert David. Ernest Gruening and the American Dissenting Tradition. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Olson, James. Stuart Symington: A Life. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2003.
- O'Neill, William J. The Last Romantic: A Life of Max Eastman. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Oshinsky, David M. A Conspiracy So Immense: The World of Joe McCarthy. New York: Free Press, 1983.
- Parker, Joseph B. The Morrison Era: Reform Politics in New Orleans. Gretna, La.: Pelican Publishing Co., 1974.
- Parker, Richard. John Kenneth Galbraith: His Life, His Politics, His Economics. New York: Farrar, Straus, & Giroux, 2005.
- Parks, Rosa. My Story. New York: Dial Books, 1992.
- Parmet, Herbert S. Eisenhower and the American Crusade. New York: Macmillan, 1972.
- . Jack: The Struggles of John F. Kennedy. New York: Dial Press, 1980.
- . JFK: The Presidency of John F. Kennedy. New York: Dial Press, 1983.
- . Richard Nixon and His America. Boston: Little, Brown, 1990.
- Parmet, Robert D. The Master of Seventh Avenue: David Dubinsky and the American Labor Movement. New York: New York University Press, 2005.
- Parrish, Michael E. Felix Frankfurter and His Times. New York: Free Press, 1982.
- Parthenakis, Thomas. George M. Humphrey: Secretary of the Treasury, 1953–1957: A Political Biography. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1986.
- Patner, Andrew. I. F. Stone: A Portrait. New York: Pantheon Books, 1988.
- Patterson, James T. Mr. Republican: A Biography of Robert A. Taft. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1972.
- Patterson, Lillie. A. Philip Randolph: Messenger for the Masses. New York: Facts On File, 1996.
- Peale, Norman Vincent. The True Joy of Positive Living: An Autobiography. New York: Morrow, 1984.
- Pearson, Drew. Diaries, 1949–1959. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1974.
- Perlstein, Rick. Before the Storm: Barry Goldwater and the Unmaking of the American Consensus. New York: Hill & Wang, 2001.
- Perret, Geoffrey. Eisenhower. New York: Random House, 1999.
- . Jack. New York: Random House, 2002.
- . Old Soldiers Never Die: The Life of Douglas MacArthur. New York: Random House, 1996.
- Persico, Joseph E. The Imperial Rockefeller: A Biography of Nelson A. Rockefeller. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982.
- Petkas, Peter J. Lee Metcalf Democratic Senator from Montana. Washington, D.C.: Grossman Publishers, 1972.
- Pfau, Richard. No Sacrifice Too Great: The Life of Lewis L. Strauss. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1984.
- Pfeffer, Paula F. A. Philip Randolph: Pioneer of the Civil Rights Movement. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990.
- Phillips, William. Yarborough of Texas. Washington, D.C.: Acropolis Books, 1969.
- Pickett, William B. Dwight David Eisenhower and American Power. Wheeling, Ill.: Harlan Davidson, 1995.
- . Homer E. Capehart: A Senator's Life, 1897–1979. Indianapolis: Indiana Historical Society, 1990.
- Pilat, Oliver. Drew Pearson: An Unauthorized Biography. New York: Harper's Magazine Press, 1973.
- Piskiewicz, Dennis. Werner von Braun: The Man Who Sold the Moon. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1998.
- Pollock, John Charles. Billy Graham, Evangelist to the World: An Authorized Biography of the Decisive Years. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1979.
- Polmar, Norman. Rickover. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982.
- Pomeroy, Wardell Baxter. Dr. Kinsey and the Institute for Sex Research. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Potter, Charles E. Days of Shame. New York: Coward-McCann, 1965.
- Potter, E. B. Admiral Arleigh Burke. New York: Random House, 1990.
- Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr. Adam by Adam: The Autobiography of Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. New York: Dial Press, 1971.

- Powers, Francis Gary, with Curt Gentry. Operation Overflight: The U-2 Spy Pilot Tells His Story for the First Time. New York: Rinehart & Winston, 1970.
- Powers, Richard Gid. Secrecy and Power: The Life of J. Edgar Hoover. New York: Collier Macmillan, 1987.
- Press, Howard. C. Wright Mills. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1978.
- Prochnau, William W. A Certain Democrat: Senator Henry M. Jackson: A Political Biography. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1972.
- Pruessen, Ronald W. John Foster Dulles: The Road to Power. New York: Free Press, 1982.
- Pullen, Dale. George H. Mahon: Democratic Representative from Texas. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- Puryear, Elmer L. Graham A. Barden: Conservative Carolina Congressman. Buie's Creek, N.C.: Campbell University Press, 1979.
- Quiring, Virginia M. The Milton S. Eisenhower Years at Kansas State University. Manhattan: Kansas State University Press, 1986.
- Radcliff, William Franklin. Sherman Minton: Indiana's Supreme Court Justice. Indianapolis: Guild Press of Indiana, 1996.
- Radford, Arthur William. From Pearl Harbor to Vietnam: The Memoirs of Admiral Arthur W. Radford. Stanford: Hoover Institution Press, 1980.
- Radosh, Ronald, and Joyce Milton. The Rosenberg File. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1983.
- Rakove, Milton L. Don't Make No Waves—Don't Back No Losers: An Insider's Analysis of the Daley Machine. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1975.
- Rankin, Karl. China Assignment. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1964.
- Ranville, Michael. To Strike a King: The Turning Point in the McCarthy Witch Hunts. Troy, Mich.: Momentum Books, 1997.
- Raucher, Alan. Paul G. Hoffman: Architect of Foreign Aid. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1985.
- Reed, Roy. Faubus: The Life and Times of an American Prodigal. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1997.
- Reeves, Andre E. Congressional Committee Chairmen: Three Who Made an Evolution. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1993.
- Reeves, Thomas. America's Bishop: The Life and Times of Fulton J. Sheen. San Francisco: Encounter Books, 2001.
- . The Life and Times of Joe McCarthy: A Biography. New York: Stein & Day, 1982.
- Reich, Cary. The Life of Nelson A Rockefeller: Worlds to Conquer, 1908–1958. New York: Doubleday, 1996.
- Reis, Ronald A. Jonas Salk: Microbiologist. New York: Ferguson, 2006.
- Reston, James. Deadline: A Memoir. New York: Random House, 1991.
- Reuther, Victor G. The Brothers Reuther and the Story of the UAW: A Memoir. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1976.
- Rice, Ross R. Carl Hayden: Builder of the American West. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1994.
- Richards, Robert D. Uninhibited, Robust, and Wide Open: Mr. Justice Brennan's Legacy to the First Amendment. Boone, N.C.: Parkway Publishers, 1994.
- Rivers, Margaret Middleton. Mendel: Slices of Life with an American Statesman. Charleston: Quin Press, 2000.
- Rivlin, Benjamin. Ralph Bunche: The Man and His Times. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1990.
- Roberts, George C. Paul M. Butler: Hoosier Politician and National Political Leader. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1987.
- Robertson, David. Sly and Able: A Political Biography of James F. Byrnes. New York: Norton, 1994.
- Robinson, Archie. George Meany and His Times: A Biography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1981.
- Robinson, Jo Ann. Abraham Went Out: A Biography of A. J. Muste. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1981.
- Robinson, Paul A. The Modernization of Sex. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.
- Rockwell, Theodore. The Rickover Effect: How One Man Made a Difference. Annapolis: Naval Institute Press, 1992.
- Rodgers, William. Think: A Biography of the Watsons and IBM. New York: Stein & Day, 1969.

- Roosevelt, Kermit. Countercoup: The Struggle for the Control of Iran. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1979.
- Rosenkranz, E. Joshua, and Bernard Schwartz. Reason and Passion: Justice Brennan's Enduring Influence. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Rovere, Richard H. Arrivals and Departures: A Journalist's Memoirs. New York: Macmillan, 1976.
- . Final Reports: Personal Reflections on Politics and History in Our Time. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1984.
- . Senator Joe McCarthy. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1959.
- Rowan, Carl Thomas. Dream Makers, Dream Breakers: The World of Justice Thurgood Marshall. Boston: Little, Brown, 1993.
- Rowe, James N. Five Years to Freedom. Boston: Little, Brown, 1971.
- Royko, Mike. Boss: Richard J. Daley of Chicago. New York: Dutton, 1971.
- Ruddy, Michael T. The Cautious Diplomat: Charles E. Bohlen and the Soviet Union, 1929–1969. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1986.
- Rusk, Dean. As I Saw It. New York: Norton, 1990.
- Russell, George B. J. Bracken Lee: The Taxpayer's Champion. New York: R. Speller, 1961.
- Russell, Thaddeus. Out of the Jungle: Jimmy Hoffa and the Remaking of the Working Class. New York: Knopf, 2001.
- Rustin, Bayard. Down the Line. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1971.
- Salisbury, Harrison E. A Journey for Our Times: A Memoir. New York: Harper & Row, 1983.
- Salter, Elizabeth. Daisy Bates. New York: McCann & Geoghegan, 1972.
- Saltonstall, Leverett. Salty: Recollections of a Yankee in Politics. Boston: Boston Globe, 1976.
- Sandbrook, Dominic. Eugene McCarthy: The Rise and Fall of Postwar American Liberalism. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004.
- Scates, Shelby. Warren G. Magnuson and the Shaping of Twentieth-Century America. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1997.
- Schaffer, Howard B. Chester Bowles: New Dealer in the Cold War. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- Schapsmeier, Edward L., and Frederick H. Schapsmeier. Ezra Taft Benson and the Politics of Agriculture: The Eisenhower Years, 1953–1961. Danville, Ill.: Interstate Printers & Publishers, 1975.
- . Dirksen of Illinois: Senatorial Statesman. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1998.
- Schechter, Barbara R. Clarence J. Brown: Republican Representative from Ohio. Washington, D.C.: Grossman Publishers, 1972.
- Scheele, Henry Z. Charlie Halleck: A Political Biography. New York: Exposition Press, 1966.
- Schlesinger, Arthur M. A Life in the Twentieth Century. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2000.
- . Robert Kennedy and His Times. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1978.
- Schneir, Walter, and Miriam Schneir. Invitation to an Inquest: A New Look at the Rosenberg-Sobell Case. New York: Dell Publishing Co., 1968.
- Schoenbaum, Thomas J. Waging Peace and War: Dean Rusk in the Truman, Kennedy, and Johnson Years. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- Schriftgiesser, Karl. The Gentleman from Massachusetts: Henry Cabot Lodge. Boston: Little, Brown, 1944.
- Schumacher, Michael. Dharma Lion: A Critical Biography of Allen Ginsberg. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
- Schwartz, Bernard. Super Chief: Earl Warren and His Supreme Court: A Judicial Biography. New York: New York University Press, 1983.
- . The Professor and the Commissions. New York: Knopf, 1959.
- Schweber, S. S. In the Shadow of the Bomb: Bethe, Oppenheimer, and the Moral Responsibility of the Scientist. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2000.
- Scimecca, Joseph A. The Sociological Theory of C. Wright Mills. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1977.
- Scott, Nathan. Reinhold Niebuhr. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1963.
- Seaborg, Glenn. A Chemist in the White House: From the Manhattan Project to the End of the Cold War. Washington, D.C.: American Chemical Society, 1998.
- . Adventures in the Atomic Age: From Watts to Washington. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2001.
- Serafini, Anthony. Linus Pauling: A Man and His Science. New York: Paragon House, 1989.

- Service, John S. State Department Duty in China: The McCarthy Era and After, 1933–1977. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1981.
- Shadegg, Stephen. Clare Boothe Luce: A Biography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1970.
- Sheed, Wilfrid. Clare Boothe Luce. New York: Dutton, 1982.
- Sheen, Fulton J. Treasure in Clay: The Autobiography of Fulton J. Sheen. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1980.
- Sheridan, Walter. The Rise and Fall of Jimmy Hoffa. New York: Saturday Review Press, 1972.
- Sherman, Janann. No Place for a Woman: A Life of Senator Margaret Chase Smith. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2000.
- Sherman, Michael. The Political Legacy of George D. Aiken: Wise Old Owl of the Senate. Montpelier: Vermont Historical Society, Countryman Press, 1995.
- Shire, Al. Oveta Culp Hobby. Houston: Western Lithograph, 1997.
- Shuman, Charles B. Reminiscences. Sullivan, Ill.: C. B. Shuman, 1998.
- Sikora, Frank. The Judge: The Life and Opinions of Alabama's Frank M. Johnson, Jr. Montgomery: Black Belt Press, 1992.
- Silverstein, Mark. Constitutional Faiths: Felix Frankfurter, Hugo Black, and the Process of Judicial Decision Making. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1984.
- Simon, James F. Independent Journey: The Life of William O. Douglas. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.
- . The Antagonists: Hugo Black, Felix Frankfurter and Civil Liberties in Modern America. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Sims, George. The Little Man's Big Friend: James E. Folsom in Alabama Politics, 1946–1958. University: University of Alabama, 1985.
- Sloane, Arthur. Hoffa. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1991.
- Smant, Kevin J. How Great the Triumph: James Burnham, Anticommunism, and the Conservative Movement. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1992.
- Smiley, Sara Judith. The Political Career of Thruston B. Morton: The Senate Years, 1956–1968. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1975.
- Smith, Arthur Robert. The Tiger in the Senate: The Biography of Wayne Morse. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1962.
- Smith, Craig Alan. Failing Justice: Charles Evans Whittaker on the Supreme Court. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Co., 2005.
- Smith, Glenn H. Langer of North Dakota: A Study in Isolationism, 1940–1959. New York: Garland Publishing, 1979.
- Smith, Jean Edward. Lucius D. Clay: An American Life. New York: Holt, 1990.
- Smith, Margaret Chase. Declaration of Conscience. New York: Doubleday, 1972.
- Smith, Richard Norton. Thomas E. Dewey and His Times. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982.
- Smith, Steven B. Reading Leo Strauss: Politics, Philosophy, Judaism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2006.
- Smylie, Robert E. Governor Smylie Remembers. Moscow: University of Idaho Press, 1998.
- Sobell, Morton. Doing Time. New York: Scribner, 1974.
- Solberg, Carl. Hubert Humphrey: A Biography. New York: Norton, 1984.
- Sorensen, Theodore C. Kennedy. New York: Harper & Row, 1965.
- Sperber, A. M. Murrow: His Life and Times. New York: Freundlich Books, 1986.
- Srodes, James. Allen Dulles: Master of Spies. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1999.
- Stacks, John F. Scotty: James B. Reston and the Rise and Fall of American Journalism. Boston: Little, Brown, 2003.
- St. Clair, James E. Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson of Kentucky: A Political Biography. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2002.
- Stebenne, David L. Arthur J. Goldberg: New Deal Liberal. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- . Modern Republican: Arthur Larson and the Eisenhower Years. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2006.
- Steel, Ronald. Walter Lippman and the American Century. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1980.
- Steibel, Warren. Cardinal Spellman: The Man. New York: Appleton-Century, 1966.
- Steinberg, Alfred. Sam Rayburn: A Biography. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1975.

- Stern, Phillip M. The Oppenheimer Case: Security on Trial. New York: Harper & Row, 1969.
- Stockley, Grif. Daisy Bates: Civil Rights Crusader from Arkansas. Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 2005.
- Stone, Ronald H. Reinhold Niebuhr: Prophet to Politicians. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1972.
- Stuhlinger, Ernst. Wernher von Braun, Crusader for Space: A Biographical Memoir. Malabar, Fla.: Krieger Publishing, 1994.
- Sulzberger, C. L. A Long Row of Candles: Memoirs and Diaries, 1934–1954. New York: Macmillan, 1969.
- . Seven Continents and Forty Years: A Concentration of Memoirs. New York: Quadrangle/New York Times Book Co., 1977.
- Sussman, Robert. Wright Patman, Democratic Representative from Texas. Washington, D.C.: Grossman, 1972.
- Swan, Patrick. Alger Hiss, Whittaker Chambers, and the Schism in the American Soul. Wilmington, Del.: ISI Books, 2003.
- Swanberg, W. A. Luce and His Empire. New York: Scribner, 1972.
- . Norman Thomas, the Last Idealist. New York: Scribner, 1976.
- Sykes, Jay G. Proxmire. Washington, D.C.: R. B. Luce, 1972.
- Talbot, Allen R. The Mayor's Game: Richard Lee of New Haven and the Politics of Change. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.
- Tamadge, Herman E. Talmadge: A Political Legacy, a Politician's Life. Atlanta: Peachtree Publishers, 1987.
- Tanenhaus, Sam. Whittaker Chambers: A Biography. New York: Random House, 1997.
- Tanguay, Daniel. Leo Strauss: An Intellectual Biography. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2006.
- Tarrant, John J. Drucker: The Man Who Invented the Corporate Society. Boston: Cahnners Books, 1976.
- Taylor, Henry D. Arthur V. Watkins: My Stake President. Salt Lake City: Henry D. Taylor, 1985.
- Taylor, John M. General Maxwell Taylor: The Sword and the Pen. New York: Doubleday, 1989.
- Taylor, Maxwell D. Swords and Plowshares. New York: Norton, 1972.
- Teiser, Ruth. Remembering William F. Knowl-and. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1981.
- Teller, Edward. Memoirs: A Twentieth-Century Journey in Science and Politics. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- Ter Horst, Jerald F. Gerald Ford and the Future of the Presidency. New York: Third Press, 1974.
- Theoharis, Athan G. The Boss: J. Edgar Hoover and the Great American Inquisition. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1988.
- Thomas, Evan. Robert Kennedy and His Times. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1978.
- Thomas, Helen Shirley. Felix Frankfurter, Scholar on the Bench. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1960.
- Tower, Elizabeth A. Alaska's Homegrown Governor: A Biography of William A. Egan. Anchorage: Publication Consultants, 2003.
- Traister, Daniel. Being Read: The Career of Howard Fast. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Libraries, 1994.
- Tushnet, Mark. Making Civil Rights Law: Thurgood Marshall and the Supreme Court, 1931–1961. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Tytell, John. Naked Angels: The Lives and Literature of the Beat Generation. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976.
- Ungar, Sanford J. The FBI. Boston: Little, Brown, 1975.
- Urquhart, Brian. Ralph Bunche: An American Life. New York: W. W. Norton, 1993.
- Vigil, Maurilio E. Parallels in the Careers of Two Hispanic US Senators. El Paso: Chicano Studies, University of Texas, 1985.
- Von Hoffman, Nicholas. Citizen Cohn. New York: Doubleday, 1988.
- Wagy, Tom. Governor LeRoy Collins of Florida: Spokesman of the New South. University: University of Alabama Press, 1985.
- Walker, Jeff. The Ayn Rand Cult. Chicago: Open Court, 1998.
- Wallace, Patricia Ward. Politics of Conscience: A Biography of Margaret Chase Smith. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1995.
- Walsh, George. Public Enemies: The Mayor, the Mob, and the Crime That Was. New York: Norton, 1980.

- Walters, Helen B. Wernher von Braun, Rocket Engineer. New York: Macmillan, 1964.
- Wanock, Alvin Timothy. Associate Justice Tom C. Clark: Advocate of Judicial Reform. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1973.
- Warren, Earl. The Memoirs of Earl Warren. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1977.
- Watson, Denton. Lion in the Lobby: Clarence Mitchell, Jr.'s Struggle for the Passage of Civil Rights Laws. New York: Morrow, 1990.
- Watson, Thomas J. Father, Son & Co.: My Life at IBM and Beyond. New York: Bantam Books, 1990.
- Weaver, John D. Warren: The Man, the Court, the Era. Boston: Little, Brown, 1967.
- Weeks, Stuart B. The Lord of Cat Bow. Brookline, N.H.: Hobbleshush Books, 2003.
- Weill, Gus. You Are My Sunshine: The Jimmie Davis Story: An Affectionate Biography. Waco, Tex.: Word Books, 1977.
- Weintraub, Stanley. MacArthur's War: Korea and the Undoing of an American Hero. New York: Free Press, 2000.
- Wellman, Paul Iselin. Stuart Symington: Portrait of a Man with a Mission. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1960.
- White, Edward G. Earl Warren: A Public Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- White, Marjorie Longenecker. Birmingham Revolutionaries: The Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth and the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 2000.
- White, William Smith. The Taft Story. New York: Harper, 1954.
- Whitfield, Stephen J. The Critical American: The Politics of Dwight Macdonald. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1984.
- Wicker, Tom. One of Us: Richard Nixon and the American Dream. New York: Random House, 1991.
- Wickman, Patricia R. The Uncommon Man: George Smathers of Florida. New York: Wickman, 1993.
- Wides, Louise DeCosta. Edith Green: Democratic Representative from Oregon. Washington, D.C.: Grossman Publishers, 1972.
- Wilder, Phillip. Meade Alcorn and the 1958 Election. New York: Holt, 1959.
- Wilkins, Roy. Reminiscences. New York: Columbia University Press, 1972.
- . Standing Fast: The Autobiography of Roy Wilkins. New York: Viking Press, 1982.
- Wilkinson, J. Harvey III. Harry Bird and the Changing Face of Virginia Politics, 1945–1966. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1968.
- Williams, Juan. Thurgood Marshall: American Revolutionary. New York: Times Books, 1998.
- Wilson, Augusta E. Liberal Leader in the House: Frank Thompson, Jr. Washington, D.C.: Acropolis Books, 1968.
- Wilson, Sloan. What Shall We Wear to This Party?: The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit Twenty Years Before and After. New York: Arbor House, 1976.
- Winchell, Mark Royden. Too Good to Be True: The Life and Work of Leslie Fiedler. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2002.
- Winters, Susan Cramer. Enlightened Citizen: Frances Payne Bolton and the Nursing Profession. New York: University of Virginia, 1997.
- Wisoff, Marilyn. H. R. Gross: Republican Representative from Iowa. Washington, D.C.: Grossman Publishers, 1972.
- Witfield, Stephen J. A Death in the Delta: The Story of Emmett Till. New York: Free Press, 1988.
- Wolf, George, and Joseph DiMona. Frank Costello: Prime Minister of the Underworld. New York: Morrow, 1974.
- Woods, Randall Bennett. Fulbright: A Biography. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Wreszin, Michael. A Rebel in Defense of Tradition. New York: Basic Books, 1994.
- Yarbrough, Tinsley. John Marshall Harlan: Great Dissenter of the Warren Court. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- . Judge Frank Johnson and Human Rights in Alabama. University: University of Alabama Press, 1981.
- Yoder, Edwin. Joe Alsop's Cold War: A Study of Journalistic Influence and Intrigue. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.
- York, Herbert F. Arms and the Physicist. Woodbury, N.Y.: American Institute of Physics, 1995.
- Young, Nancy Beck. Wright Patman: Populism, Liberalism, & the American Dream. Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 2000.

- Young-Bruehl, Elisabeth. Hannah Arendt: For The Love of the World. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1982.
- Youngs, J. William T. Eleanor Roosevelt: A Personal and Public Life. New York: Pearson/Longman, 2006.
- Zachary, G. Pascal. Endless Frontier: Vannevar Bush, Engineer of the American Century. New York: Free Press, 1997.
- Zeiler, Thomas W. Dean Rusk: Defending the American Mission Abroad. Wilmington, Del.: Scholarly Resources, 2000.
- Zieger, Robert H. John L. Lewis: Labor Leader. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1988.
- Zimmerman, Carroll L. Insider at SAC: Operations Analysis under General LeMay. Manhattan, Kans.: Sunflower University Press, 1988.
- Zimmerman, Richard G. Call Me Mike: A Political Biography of Michael V. DiSalle. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2003.

INDEX

Boldface page numbers indicate main headings; italic page numbers indicate illustrations.

- A
- Abel, Rudolf I. 64, 327
- Abernathy, Ralph D(avid) 1–2, 388, 559, 574, 674
- Abner, Willoughby 141
- abortion, as issue 465, 606
- ABSCAM 764–765, 827
- Acheson, Dean G(ooderham) 2–3, 68, 126, 170, 342, 369–370, 477, 679, 694, 744, 752, 821
- Acheson-Lilenthal report 567
- ACLU. See American Civil Liberties Union
- Act of Bogotá (1960) 148, 459
- Adams, John G(ibbons) 4, 295, 482, 684
- Adams, Sherman 4–7
- appointment as chief of staff 189
- Bohlen (Charles) nomination and 501
- on Brownell (Herbert) 72
- on Burns (Arthur) 86–87
- as chief of staff 5–7
- and civil rights 532
- and defense budget 426
- and desegregation of military 20
- on Durkin (Martin) 177
- and Eisenhower campaign 5
- and Eisenhower ethical standards 6
- and election of 1952 188, 556
- ethics scandal 6–7, 10, 129, 197, 250, 280–281, 529, 592, 598, 689, 829
- and FCC investigation 455
- friends and colleagues 695
- on Humphrey (George) 333
- and McCarthy-Eisenhower conflict 406
- on North American Airlines case 111
- resignation 6–7, 10, 129
- role in administration ix
- Schine (David) case and 684
- and staffing of administration 116, 532, 727, 808
- supporters 99–100, 134, 151
- Adenauer, Konrad xxix, 725
- Administrative Procedures Act of 1946 802
- Adonis, Joe 128, 317
- Advanced Research Projects Agency (ARPA) 461, 841–842
- AFL. See American Federation of Labor
- AFL-CIO
- chief lobbyist 43
- creation of 31–32, 43, 100, 248, 494, 504, 632–633
- ethics codes 249, 617–618
- expulsion of Teamsters 166, 249, 308, 486, 506, 633, 658
- International Affairs Department 444
- leadership 32, 338
- legal counsel 248–249
- and organized crime 166
- political support of 373
- racial discrimination in 506
- reform efforts 265
- supporters of 347
- targeting of unfriendly politicians 133
- United Auto Workers withdrawal from 633
- views on Medicare 43
- African Americans
- in Chicago 136, 141
- in Congress 601–602
- on Durkin (Martin) 177
- in Eisenhower administration xvii–xviii, 193, 532–533, 808
- in New Orleans 530–531
- in Philadelphia 113
- Republican Party and 533
- and unions 617–618
- Agnew, Spiro 225, 314
- agricultural policy xiii, 34–38
- Conservation Reserve (Soil Bank) xiii, 37, 585, 701, 770
- opposition to 9, 22, 35–36, 38
- overseas sale of surpluses 36, 336
- political considerations 36–38
- price supports xiii, 34–38, 101, 179, 192, 206, 230–231, 267, 328, 336, 383, 413, 550, 579, 586, 606, 701, 769, 827–828, 843
- under Truman 311, 585
- Aiken, George D(avid) 7–8, 218, 328, 409
- Albert, Carl (Bert) 8–9
- Alcorn, (Hugh) Meade (Jr.) 7, 9–10, 311, 536, 593
- Aldrich, Nelson W. 10
- Aldrich, Winthrop W(illiams) 10–11
- Alexander, Charles li, 202, 730
- Allen, George V(enable) 11–12, 656
- Allen, Leo E(lwood) 12
- Allen, Robert S. 590–591
- Alliance for Progress xlviii, 200, 205, 459, 531
- Allison, John M(oore) 13–14, 361
- Allott, Gordon (Llewellyn) 14
- Almond, J(ames) Lindsay, Jr. 14–16, 93, 314, 717
- ALP. See American Labor Party
- Alsop, Joseph W(right), Jr. 16–17, 17–18, 477, 502, 569
- Alsop, Stewart (Johannot) (Oliver) 16–17, 17–18, 477, 502, 569
- Ambrose, Stephen xxviii, xxxvii, lii, 202
- AMC. See American Motors Corporation
- America China Policy Association (ACPA) 403
- America First party 706
- America-Israel Society 500
- American character, works on 598–599, 638–639
- American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) 619, 762, 780
- American Communist Party. See also Communist Control Act of 1954
- members of 211–212, 295, 315, 320, 429, 442, 594–595, 658
- outlawing of 146, 154, 326, 804
- registration requirements 91, 109, 604–605
- split in (1929) 295, 442
- American exceptionalism 442
- American Farm Bureau Foundation (AFBF) 549, 700–701
- American Federation of Labor (AFL) 545. See also AFL-CIO
- associated unions 617
- communists and 247–248, 427, 443
- expulsion of unions 166, 427
- leadership 31, 100, 165, 427, 502, 504
- and organized crime 60, 166, 504

- political support of 342–343
 UBC and 338
 American Labor Party (ALP) 165, 594, 657
 American Legion 143, 211, 340, 720
 American Medical Association xiv, xvi, 192, 301, 304, 519, 678
 American Motors Corporation (AMC) 651, 836
 Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) 165, 336, 503, 518, 526, 547, 552, 621–622, 632–633, 685–686
 American Workers Party (AWP) 320, 545
 Anastasia, Albert 18–19, 128, 244
 Anderson, Clinton P(resba) 19–20, 203, 301, 332
 Anderson, Jack 591–592
 Anderson, Robert B(ernard) 6, 20, 20–22, 21, 226, 286, 682
 Anglo-Iranian Oil Company xxxix, 324–325, 656
 Antarctic Treaty 154, 199, 207, 768 antiballistic missile (ABM) systems 242–243, 348, 458, 495, 827, 842 antilynching bills and laws 290, 301, 310, 640, 669, 715, 749, 771, 776 anti-Semitism 110, 706–707, 779 antitrust investigations 75, 132, 209, 263, 368, 681, 811 antitrust policy 74–75, 88, 104, 115
 A. Philip Randolph Institute 675
 Arab-Israeli conflict xliii, xlv, 21, 80–81, 175, 198, 396, 650, 737, 798
 Arab nationalism xliii, xlv–xlviii, 171, 198
 Arab world, courting of xlv, xlv–xlvii
 Arbenz Guzmán, Jacobo xl–xli, 24, 60, 167, 191, 443, 505
 Arends, Les(lie) C(ornelius) 22
 Arendt, Hannah 22–24, 578 armed forces, desegregation of xviii, 20–21, 54, 141, 193, 522, 617, 670, 674, 776
 Armed Services Committee 670, 672, 680, 699–700, 711, 727, 747, 792
 Armour, Norman 24
 Arms Control and Disarmament Agency 228, 337
 Army, U.S. See also missile programs
 chief of staff 636–637, 756–758
 McCarthy (Joseph) investigation of 4, 102, 150–151, 194–195, 295, 479–480, 482, 537–538, 543, 594–595, 597, 684, 728–729, 815, 846–847
 Army Ballistic Missile Agency (ABMA) 61
 Army-McCarthy hearings xi, 4–6, 77, 118–119, 150–151, 178, 195, 218, 346, 376, 538, 595, 597, 684–685, 729–730, 748, 815–816, 846–847
 Arnall, Ellis G. 755
 Arnold, Harold H. “Hap” 563
 Arnold, Henry 784
 Ashmore, Harry S(cott) 24–25
 Association of Citizens’ Councils 120
 Aswan Dam xliii–xlv, xlv, 45, 175, 246, 655
 Atomic Energy Act of 1946 795–796
 Atomic Energy Act of 1954 300
 Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) 16–17, 43, 98, 124, 153, 192, 194, 318–319, 490, 568–570, 635, 691, 740–741, 759
 Atoms for Peace 345, 490, 741
 AT&T 75
 Austin, Allen V. 814
 Austin, Warren 218
 Austria, neutralization of xxvi, 190–191
 Austrian State Treaty (1955) 765
 Avery, Jacob 730
 Avery, Sewell (Lee) 25–26, 836 aviation policy 216, 528
 Ayers, Eben 779
- B
- Baghdad Pact of 1955 xliii, 171, 175
 Baker, Newton D. 54, 228
 Baker, Robert G. (“Bobby”) 829
Baker v. Carr (1962) 230, 276, 807
 Bakery and Confectionery Workers Union 486, 506
 Bandung Conference 175
 banking, efforts to regulate 582, 606, 643
 Bao Dai (emperor of Vietnam) 174, 190, 416
 Barden, Graham A(rthur) 27–28, 509
Barenblatt v. U.S. (1959) 46, 806, 818
 Barkley, Alben W. 126
 Barnett, Ross 375, 584
 Barr, Joel 659, 713–714
 Baruch, Bernard 168, 643
 Baruch Plan 759
 baseball, desegregation of 106
 Bates, Daisy (Gatson) 28–29
 Batista, Fulgencio xlviii, 199, 298, 443, 704–705
 Battle, John S(tewart) 29
 Bayh, Birch 100
 Bay of Pigs 45, 168, 201, 205, 375, 416, 491, 758
 Bazelon, David L(ionel) 29–30, 82
 Beall, J. Glenn 33
 Beam, Jacob D(yneley) 30–31
 Beat Generation 379
 Bechtel, Stephen 490
 Beck, Dave 31–32, 60, 64, 307, 343, 376, 486, 505–506
 Belafonte, Harry 388
 Bell, Daniel 32–33, 516
 Bell and Howell Corp. 592–594
 Bender, George H. 419
 Ben Gurion, David 81
 Bennett, Wallace F(oster) 33–34
 Benson, Ezra Taft ix, xiii, 7, 34–38, 35, 367, 383, 410–411, 550, 585–586, 701, 724, 769, 843
 Benton, William (Burnett) 39–40, 58, 293, 477–478
 Bentsen, Lloyd, Jr. 840
 Berlin, Soviet blockade of (1948) 775
 Berlin crisis of 1958–1959 xxviii–xxx, xxxi, 162, 176, 198–199, 298
 Bernadotte, Folke 80–81
 Bestor, Arthur E(ugene), Jr. 40–41, 221
 Bethe, Hans A(lbrecht) xxvii, 41–42, 386, 569
 Bible, Alan D. 42
 Biemiller, Andrew J(ohn) 42–43 big government, Eisenhower on xii
 Bilbo, Theodore 725
 Bill of Rights, Reed (Stanley) on 628
 Binh Xuyen 122
 bipartisanship, in cold war era 461
 Birmingham civil rights demonstrations 389–390
 Bissell, Richard M(ervin), Jr. 43–45, 167–168, 602
 Black, Eugene R(obert) 45–46
 Black, Hugo Lafayette xx, 46–47, 63, 160–161, 180, 230, 349 black colleges, loyalty investigations at 773 blacklisting, in entertainment industry 331, 403, 645, 787, 803
 Blackmun, Harry 807
 black nationalism 823
 Black Power movement 675, 823
 Blake, Eugene Carson 47–48
 Blatnik, John A(nton) 48–49
 Bloch, Emanuel 659–660
 Blossom, Virgil T(racey) 49–50, 213
 Blough, Roger M(iles) 50–51
 Boggs, J(ames) Caleb 51–52
 Boggs, T(homas) Hale 52–53, 530
 Bohlen, Charles E(ustis) 53–54 appointment as ambassador 189 opposition to appointment of x, 24, 65, 68, 150, 178, 189, 214, 299, 472, 478, 501, 596, 718, 753, 817, 821
 supporters 170, 218
 Bohr, Niels 759
 Bolton, Chester C. 54
 Bolton, Frances P(ayne) Bingham 54–55
 Bolton, Oliver P. 55
 bomber gap 426, 747, 781–782
 Bonner, Herbert C(ovington) 55–56
 Bonsal, Philip W. 705
 Borden, William L. 568
 Boulware, Lemuel (Ricketts) 56–57
 Boulwarism 56–57, 100–101
 Bowie, Robert R(ichardson) 57–58
 Bowles, Chester 3, 39, 58–59, 216
 Boyle, W. A. “Tony” 428–429
 Bozell, L. Brent 79, 252
 Braden, Spruille 59–60, 458
 Bradenism 59
 Brandeis, Louis D. 2, 638
 Branden, Nathaniel 615
 Brannan, Charles F. 585
 Brannan Plan 585, 776
 Braun, Wernher von 60–62
 Brennan, William J(oseph), Jr. 62–64, 161
 Brewster, Frank W. 64–65
 Brewster, Ralph Owen 214
 Bricker, John William 33, 65–67, 152, 189, 751
 Bricker amendment 65–66, 99, 126, 137, 150, 189, 214, 218, 245, 262, 408, 415, 472, 515, 536, 543–544, 598, 624, 680, 817, 821, 843
 Bridges, Harry (Alfred) (Renton) 67–68, 88
 Bridges, (Henry) Styles 4, 8, 57, 68–69, 129, 151, 170, 250, 364, 478, 500–501, 810
 Broening, William F. 498
 Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers 618
 Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters 617, 771
 Browder, Earl 429
 Brown, Charles H. 700
 Brown, Clarence 69–70
 Brown, Edgar A. 767

- Brown, Edmund G(erald) ("Pat") 70-71, 109, 348, 381, 399, 402, 491, 561
- Brown, John R. 835
- Brown, Prentiss 214
- Brown, Winthrop G(ilman) 71-72, 575
- Brownell, Herbert, Jr. 72-76
and administration staffing 116
as adviser to Eisenhower 345
antitrust investigations 132 appointment as attorney general 188-189 and civil rights xviii, xxi, 119, 194, 197 communists and 72-74, 353, 660, 847
critics of 95-96, 232
and desegregation ix, 699
and election of 1952 556
friends and colleagues 82, 145, 147, 275, 430, 619, 808
and judicial appointments 76
narcotics investigations 224
Peters (John) case and 74, 82
resignation 649
Talbot (Harold) and 754
and Till (Emmett) case 770
on Warren appointment xix and White scandal 72-74, 327, 479, 778, 787
on wiretapping 154
- Brown II* (1955) 715-716
- Brownlee, James 286
- Brown v. Board of Education* (1954) xix, 15, 140-141, 193-194, 229-230, 772, 795, 805.
See also school desegregation
- Eisenhower and xix, xx, 194 implementation of xxi, xxii, 464, 619, 715-717, 772, 780-781, 805, 835, 837-838
as judicial activism 140, 194
Justice Department amicus curiae brief 75-76, 194, 619 opposition to 86, 95 (See also Southern Manifesto)
Reed (Stanley) and 629
- Broz, Josip. See Tito, Marshal
- Bruce, David K(irkpatrick) E(ste) 76-77, 147
- Brucker, Wilber M(arion) 77-78
- Brundage, Percival F(lack) 78, 93
- Buber, Martin 295
- Buchalter, Louis ("Lepke") 18
- Buckley, William F(rank), Jr. 79-80, 85, 106, 182, 380, 393, 614
- budget, federal. See also defense budget for 1958, debate on 78 calls for increases in 197
critics of 282
deficits 196, 458
efforts to balance 21, 155, 189-192, 196-197, 331, 333-335, 515, 626, 683 reduced spending, calls for 93, 96, 101, 121, 196, 246, 252, 267
watchdogs over 652-653, 749-750, 828
- Bulganan, Nikolai xlv, 172, 733
- Bunche, Ralph J(ohnson) 80-82
- Bundy, McGeorge 607
- Burdick, Eugene 417
- Burger, Warren Earl 30, 64, 82-83, 717, 807
- Burgess, Alfred 289
- Burke, Arleigh A(lbert) 83-84, 196
- Burnham, James 79, 84-86, 85-86, 321
- Burns, Arthur F(rank) 86-87, 286, 333-334, 469, 682
- Burroughs, Williams S. 246, 379
- Burton, Harold H(itz) 87-88, 300-301, 520
- Bush, George H. W. 840
- Bush, Prescott S(heldon) 88-90, 634
- Bush, Vannevar 90-91
- Butler, John Marshall 91, 293, 414
- Butler, Paul M(ulholland) 92, 217, 527, 624, 733, 778
- Byrd, Harry C. ("Curley") 499
- Byrd, Harry F(lood) 14-16, 29, 78, 92-93, 95, 257, 473, 721, 767
- Byrd, Robert C(arlyle) 93-94
- Byrnes, James F(rancis) 73, 94-95, 353, 378, 767, 773, 775, 778, 787, 790
- Byrnes, John W(illiam) 96
- C
- cabinet ix, 20, 188-189, 304
- Cabot, John M(oors) 97-98
- Cambodia, independence xlii, 190
- Campbell, Joseph 98
- Camp David conference (1959) xxxix, xxx, 199, 766
- Cannon, Howard W(alter) 98-99
- Capchert, Homer E(arl) 33, 99-100, 238-239
- "The Capitol Parade" (syndicated column) 16
- Capote, Truman 379
- Caracas Declaration of 1954 xlix
- Carey, James B(arron) 56, 100-101, 339
- Carlson, Frank 101-102, 641
- Carmichael, Stokely 823
- Carr, Francis P. 102, 178
- Carroll, John A(lbert) 102-103
- Carswell, G. Harold 285, 522, 594, 622, 690
- Carter, Jimmy 255, 287, 356, 490, 812
- Case, Clifford P(hilip) 103-104, 826
- Case, Francis 280, 485
- Castillo Armas, Carlos xli, 167, 505
- Castro, Fidel xlviii-l, xlix, 44, 168, 199, 298, 416, 443, 540, 559, 686, 705
- Castro, Raul 44
- Caudel, T. Lamar 777
- CBS network 722-723
- CEA. See Council of Economic Advisers
- Celler, Emanuel 6, 104-105, 156, 743
- censorship 285, 746. See also State Department, censorship of libraries
- Central Intelligence Agency. See CIA
- Chambers, (Jay) (Vivian) Whittaker 73, 79, 105-106, 321, 393, 476, 537, 555, 614-615
- Chamoun, Camille xlvii-xlvii, 176, 198, 541, 783
- "The Chance for Peace" (Eisenhower) xxv, 329, 345
- Chandler, A(lbert) B(eniamin) ("Happy") 106-107, 126, 536
- Chaplin, Charlie 322, 331
- Chavez, Dennis 107-108, 287, 663
- Chennault, Claire 16
- Cherry, Francis 28, 108-109, 212
- Chessman, Caryl W(hittier) 71, 109, 381
- Chevalier, Haakon 567, 569
- Chiang Kai-shek (Jiang Jieshi) xxxv-xxxviii, 16, 403, 790 and defense of Taiwan 176, 198, 612-613
Eisenhower on 613
and Korean War 171, 189
supporters 68, 354, 362, 400, 448, 612, 820
U.S. and 3, 138, 352, 410
- Chicago 135-137, 141-142, 157-159
- China
fall to Communists 670, 790-791
critics of 352, 362, 371, 400-401, 403, 472, 476, 752, 776, 791, 797
State Department views on 403, 694, 790-791 land reform in 410
- China, Communist
downing of British airliner xxiii nuclear program xxxvii relations with U.S. 31, 55, 245, 396, 562, 821 threat of nuclear weapons use against 57
UN membership, opposition to 362-363, 401, 429-430, 700, 708, 798
U.S. nonrecognition policy 2, 176, 354, 708, 791-792, 817
U.S. views on 16, 138, 142, 245, 402-404
- China bloc 189, 352, 354, 362, 403, 708, 820
- China lobby xxxv, 362-363, 400-401, 403, 694, 791
- China Mutual Defense Treaty 415
- Chotiner, Murray M. 6, 109-111, 557
- Chou En-lai. see Zhou Enlai
- Church, Frank (Forrester) 111-112, 327, 817
- CIA (Central Intelligence Agency)
critics of 473
Cuba and xlviii, xlix, 199, 705
Cuban assassination plans xlix, 44, 168, 416 directors of 166-168, 712 domestic surveillance by 167
establishment of 166
fronts for 167, 275, 321, 444, 505 intelligence-gathering function 167 investigations of 114, 479
in Laos 71-72
and Lumumba (Patrice) 44 oversight of 384
overthrow of Guatemalan regime (1954) xl-xli, 24, 167, 191, 443, 505 overthrow of Iranian regime (1953) xxxix-xxxx, 167, 171, 191, 656 and plausible denial 167
staff 44
training of Cuban invasion force 1, 44-45, 167-168, 199
- CIO. See Congress of Industrial Organizations
- Citizens' Councils 180, 222, 440, 640-641, 699
- civil defense policy 319, 600
- civil liberties advocates for 312, 679, 717
Church activists and 47-48
supporters of 104
Supreme Court on 115, 160-161, 349-350, 796, 807, 818
World War II and 160

- civil rights. See also civil rights legislation; desegregation accomplishments in xvii–xxii, 193–194, 197–198
Church activists and 47–48
Eisenhower and 532–533, 596, 601, 737
federal judiciary and 355
Goldwater on 253
Gore (Albert A[rmold]) on 257
Hoover (J. Edgar) and 327
Kennedy (John F.) on 373–375
Niebuhr (Reinhold) on 553
Nixon (Richard) and 522, 532–533, 559
Stevenson (Adlai) on 732
Supreme Court on 229–230, 350, 521, 628–629, 795 (See also Brown v. Board of Education)
Civil Rights Act of 1957
efforts to amend 126 evisceration of 112, 126, 159, 197, 208, 359, 368, 373, 536, 549, 559, 580–581, 598, 625, 672, 719, 767, 823, 829 impetus behind 771
opposition to 55, 208, 253, 267, 301, 310, 412, 487, 525, 535, 583, 719, 726, 793 passage of 75–76, 104–105, 180, 194, 197, 260, 262, 337, 358–359, 364, 522, 533, 566, 625, 649, 672, 709, 767–768
provisions of 671–672
supporters 42, 99, 102, 108, 151, 159, 207, 257, 343, 351, 368, 373, 419, 425, 461, 503, 528–529, 536, 549, 559, 580, 606, 624, 653, 690, 809, 823, 840
tests of 355
Civil Rights Act of 1960
efforts to strengthen 112, 409
insufficiency of xxii, 522
opposition to 55, 301, 310, 412, 487, 583, 673, 726, 793, 823
passage of 180, 197, 625
provisions of 355
supporters 42, 94, 102, 267, 351, 368, 419, 461, 503, 528
Civil Rights Act of 1964
authors of 105
opposition to 180, 253, 258, 442, 673, 704, 710
origins of 159
passage of 337, 360, 674–675, 823
provisions of 457, 507, 601
supporters 9, 22, 52, 102, 207, 287, 409, 431, 522, 581, 622, 844
Civil Rights Acts of 1957 52
Civil Rights Acts of 1960 52
Civil Rights Acts of 1965 53
Civil Rights Commission xxi, 29, 75–76, 104, 197, 274–275, 358, 368, 522, 629, 823
Civil Rights Congress 211 civil rights leaders 1–2, 28–29, 386–390, 463–466, 573–575, 578, 601–602, 644–645, 673–675, 701–703. See also NAACP meeting with Eisenhower xvi, 389, 533, 559, 823 civil rights legislation
in New York State 647
opposition to 9, 154, 280, 287, 293, 300–301, 457, 485, 487, 518, 522, 579, 596–597, 640, 670–673, 709, 719, 726–727, 756, 767, 793, 828–829
supporters 12, 14, 75–76, 81, 89, 103, 113, 126, 145, 154, 159, 222, 261, 277, 337, 364–366, 400, 420, 424–425, 431, 499–500, 503, 525, 535, 549, 598, 606, 647, 649–651, 654–655, 690, 711, 737, 764, 766, 769, 821, 825, 840, 843–844
Civil Rights movement
CORE and 545
critics of 296
nonviolent philosophy and 388–389, 674 resistance to 387–388
Till (Emmett) case and 771
Truman (Harry) on 779
Clark, Joseph S(ill), Jr. 112–113, 149, 502, 528
Clark, Mark W(ayne) 114–115, 268, 284, 541
Clark, Tom C(ampbell) 73, 115–116, 520, 778–779, 787
Clark-Darlan Agreement 541
Clay, Lucius D(ubignon) xv, 116–117, 155, 193, 333, 541
Clayton Anti-Trust Act of 1914 263, 366
Clement, Frank G(oad) 117
Clements, Earle 107, 357, 536 clergy, accusations of communist sympathies in 194, 270–271, 346, 470–471, 479, 485, 597, 787, 803
Clifford, Clark 384
Club, Oliver Edmund 138, 403
Coe, Frank 73
Cohen, Hermann 739
Cohn, Roy M(arcus) xi, 117–119
and anti-Semitism 424
and Army-McCarthy hearings 815–816 censorship tour of State Department libraries 118, 194, 375–376, 479, 528, 684 criticism of 218
Eisenhower on 194
Kennedy (Robert) and 375–376
on Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations 478–479, 482, 528, 684
Schine case and 4, 102, 118–119, 195, 346, 376, 481–482, 538, 597, 729, 815, 847
COINTELPRO 327 cold war
bipartisanship in 461
Communist aggression xxviii–xlv, xlviii–l, 97
Eisenhower and xxii, xxiii, xxiv–xxv, 189–191, 909–910 planning staff 646
Soviet expansionism vii, viii, 3, 395–396
Soviet technological advances xxvii–xxviii (See also Sputnik)
Truman (Harry) and 775–776, 778
U.S. views on 172, 234, 696
Coleman, James P(lemon) 119–120, 773
Coleman, John S(trader) 120–121
Coleman, William, Jr. 229
Cole v. Young (1956) 180, 276, 520, 628 collectivism, Rand (Ian) on 614
Collins, J(oseph) Lawton 121–122, 416
Collins, (Thomas) LeRoy 122–124, 584
Collins, Stephen P., Jr. 340
colonialism collapse of xxxviii–xlv, 174–175, 191
Eisenhower on xxxviii, xli, xlii–xliii, xlv
Colorado River Storage Project 14, 287, 515, 809
Commission on Foreign Economic Policy 89, 616, 797
Commission on National Goals 124–125, 263, 380, 572
Commission(s) on Organization of the Executive Branch of Government (Hoover Commissions) 69–70, 114, 319, 323–324, 376
Commission on Public Education (Gray Commission) 15, 721–722
Committee for/of One Million against the Admission of Communist China to the UN 160, 363–364, 429–430, 443–444, 708
Committee on the Present Danger 255, 444 communism, U.S. views on 201, 215–216, 445–446, 448, 552, 697, 763 Communist Control Act of 1954 67, 91, 154, 337, 367, 372–373, 424, 492 communist infiltration in black colleges 773 in Catholic Church 697
in CIA 114
in CIO 110, 247, 427
in nuclear test ban movement 154 views on 85, 130, 179, 182–183, 326–327, 353, 763 communists. See also American Communist Party; loyalty investigations aggression in developing nations xxxviii–xlv, xlviii–l, 97 and American Labor Party 657
in the arts 512, 644–645 blacklisting of 331, 403, 645, 787, 803
in civil rights movement 673 covert operations against xxxix–xli, li (See also CIA) exceptionalism doctrine 442 legal representation 621 in media 179, 452–453 movement toward conservatism 79, 84–85, 105, 181, 296, 320–321, 470
registration requirements 91, 109, 604–605
unions and 67, 74, 100, 110, 131, 165, 247–248, 427, 443–444, 446, 505, 545, 631 computers, development of 811–812
Conant, James B(ryant) x, 124–125, 221, 396, 478, 607
Condon, Edward U. 761
Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). See also AFL-CIO alliance with Democratic Party 631
associated unions 131
communist influence in 110, 247, 427
establishment of 165, 493
expulsion of unions from 67, 100, 247
leadership 427, 632
legal counsel 248
Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) 500, 545, 673–674
Connally, John 138, 840

- Conner, Fox 186, 201
 Connor, T. Eugene ("Bull") 677 conservation movement 509, 537, 548, 819–820
 Conservation Reserve (Soil Bank) xiii, 37, 585, 701, 770
 conservatism 288, 393, 664, 788–789 consumer protection legislation 352, 457, 509, 594 containment policy
 Burnham (James) on 85
 Eisenhower's and xxi, 189, 200 finite containment 41 massive retaliation policy and 57
 Nixon (Richard) on 559, 562
 opposition to 169–170, 369, 448, 789
 supporters 369, 407, 456, 796–797, 820
 Truman (Harry) and xxii, 775
 Conyers, John, Jr. 575
 Coolidge, Calvin 140
 Cooper, (Leon) Jere 125, 518
 Cooper, John S(herman) 125–127, 151, 536
 Cooper-Church amendment 827, 829
 CORE. See Congress of Racial Equality
 Corsi, Edward 127–128, 502, 802
 Costello, Frank 18, 128, 244, 317, 440
 Cotton, Norris 128–129, 250
 Coughlin, Charles 706
 Council of Economic Advisers (CEA) 86–87, 384, 581, 682–683, 776
 Council on Foreign Relations 394–395, 489
 Cousins, Norman 129–130, 763
 Croly, Herbert 432
 Cross, Hugh 130–131
 Crump, Edward Hull 366
Crusade in Europe (Eisenhower) 186
 Cuba
 Castro takeover in 705
 CIA and xlix, l, 44–45, 167–168, 199, 416
 U.S. ambassador to 704–705
 U.S. policy toward xlix, l, 199, 206, 298, 416, 641, 704–705
 U.S. views on xlviii–l, 517, 686
 Cuban missile crisis 3, 234, 365, 375, 449, 564, 734
 Curran, Joseph E(dwain) 131–132
 Curtice, Harlow H(erbert) 132–133
 Curtis, Carl T(homas) 133–134, 538, 633
 Curtis, Thomas B(radford) 134
D
 Daley, Richard J(oseph) 135–137, 390, 635
 Damms, Richard V. xxvii, xxxviii
 Daniel, (Marion) Price 137–138, 699, 839
 Davies, John Paton, Jr. x, 138–139, 170, 401, 403, 479
 Davis, Jimmie H(ouston) 139–140, 531, 838
 Davis, John (William) 140–141
 Davis, Sammy, Jr. 388
 Dawes Commission 168
 Dawson, William L(evi) 141–142
 Dean, Arthur H(obson) 142, 817 death penalty 71, 109, 465, 500
 Declaration of Conscience 7, 343, 476, 708, 710–711 defense budget calls for increase in 21, 84, 108, 112, 225, 240–242, 261, 347, 426, 458, 492, 495, 640, 643, 646–647, 672, 747–748, 758, 778, 781, 784–785, 792 calls for reduction of 150, 178, 334, 600, 682 congress's increase of 782
 critics of 397, 700
 defenders of 761
 reduction of xxiv–xxv, xxvii, xxx–xxxii, 189–190, 241, 830–831, 911–912
 watchdogs over 292–293, 457–458, 828
 Defense Department 254, 485, 496, 700, 792–793, 830 defense policy xxiv, xlvii, 17–18, 77–78, 335, 425–427, 505, 830, 907–912. See also New Look defense policy
 DeLoach, Deke (Cartha) (Dekle) 143
 Democratic Advisory Council (DAC) 217, 231, 624, 733, 778
 Democratic Declaration of 1957 503, 549
 Democratic National Committee 92, 231–232, 526–527
 Democratic Party civil rights platform 105, 146
 on defense cuts xxx–xxxi political machines 366
 Thurmond (Strom) on 768
 and unions 631
 Democratic Study Group 319, 467, 473, 509, 625
Dennis v. U.S. (1951) 46, 161, 350, 520, 628, 794
 Department of Agriculture 7, 35–36, 724
 Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) 219–220, 223–224, 304, 646
 Department of the Interior 692–693
 DeSapio, Carmine G(erald) 143–144, 217, 279, 317, 425, 601, 655, 799, 801 desegregation. See also school desegregation of Alabama State Police 356 of armed forces xviii, 20–21, 54, 141, 193, 522, 617, 670, 674, 776 Eisenhower on xx
 federal judiciary and 313–314, 355–356, 717, 771–772, 780–781, 835, 837–838
 by force, opposition to 708 freedom of choice plan 289
 opposition to 1, 95, 117, 442, 531, 642–643, 698–699, 702–703, 755–756, 770, 773 of public accommodations 1, 47, 314, 355, 378, 387–388, 465, 499, 574–575, 702, 772, 805, 835, 837
 supporters 54, 105, 259, 289, 655
 Supreme Court on 1, 275, 702, 795, 818
 in Texas 698–699
 of Washington, D.C. xviii–xix, 193, 838
 Development Loan Fund (DLF) 21, 148, 320
 Dewey, John 320–321
 Dewey, Thomas E(dmund) 145–146
 advisers to 169, 286
 appointments by 689
 Civil Rights Congress and 211
 corruption allegations against 689
 friends and colleagues 72, 270–272, 275, 316, 648, 745 organized crime investigations 243–244, 316
 political career 150, 186, 342, 436–437, 556, 724, 751, 776, 808
 supporters 273, 619, 727, 754
 Dien Bien Phu xlii, xliii, 3, 173, 190, 373, 448, 612, 712, 726, 750, 783
 Dies, Martin, Jr. 470, 476
 Diggins, John P. 789
 Dillon, C(larence) Douglas 147–149, 148, 459
 Dilworth, Richardson 113, 149, 420
 Dioguardi, John (Johnny Dio) 157–158, 307
 Dirksen, Everett McKinley 149–152 budget reduction efforts 273 and Civil Rights Act of 1957 180
 cooperation with Democrats 461
 and Dixon-Yates contract 414
 Jencks case and 208
 and McCarthy (Joseph) xi, 480–482, 597, 846
 opposition to 364
 and Republican unity 359, 409
 as Senate leader 126
 disability insurance xiv
 DiSalle, Michael V(incent) 65, 152–153
 disarmament 183–184, 586–588, 613, 724, 763, 798–799
 Displaced Persons Act (1948) 472
 Divine, Robert xxviii, xxxvii, xxxix, li
 Dixiecrats. See States' Rights Party
 Dixon, Edgar H. 153, 155, 256, 318, 367, 414, 741, 841
 Dixon-Yates contract 20, 89, 98, 126, 153, 155–156, 192, 233, 256, 301, 318–319, 331–332, 367, 414, 424, 526–527, 566, 581, 740–741, 841
 Dobbs, Farrell 306
 Dodd, Thomas J(oseph) 40, 58–59, 89, 130, 153–155, 183, 592, 727, 763, 768
 Dodge, Joseph M(orrell) 116, 155–156, 256, 318, 367, 414, 741, 841
 Doerfer, John C(harles) 156–157, 280, 592, 688 domestic policy xiii–xxii, 191–195, 200 continuation of New Deal ix, xii, xiii–xiv, 188, 191 and divisions within Republican Party 191 evaluation of li–lii
 Gaither Report on 236–237
 name for xii, 191
 opposition and critics 113, 347, 383, 414, 621, 666, 737, 778, 817
 supporters 343, 624
 Dominican Republic xlix, l, 167, 459
 Donovan, Robert 779
 Donovan, William J. 76
 Doohar, Gerald 281–282
 Doolittle, James 784
 Dorfman, Paul 157–158, 307
 Doria, Anthony 158

- Douglas, Helen Gahagan 110, 555
- Douglas, Paul H(oward) xi, 158–160, 257, 358, 382, 486, 525, 594, 840
- Douglas, William O(rville) xx, 63, 74, 109, 160–162, 180, 230, 327, 407, 660, 795
- Dowling, Walter C(ecil) 162–163
- Downey, Sheridan 110
- Driscoll, Alfred E. 62
- Drucker, Peter F(erdinand) 163–164
- Drummond, David 131
- Dryden, Hugh L(atimer) 164–165
- Dubinsky, David 165–166, 443, 657
- Duff, James 113
- Dulles, Allen W(elsh) xlviii, xlix, 44, 55, 166, 166–168
- Dulles, John Foster xxiii, 168–176
on Acheson (Dean) 3 appointment as secretary of state 116, 170, 188
appointments by 57, 127, 541, 799
and Berlin crisis xxix
Bohlen nomination and 54, 472, 478, 501 and China's admission to UN 401
Clement (Frank) on 117
on Cuba policy 705
death of xxx, 21, 176, 199
on disarmament 724
and Egypt 11, 45, 656
and election of 1948 146
foreign policy goals 171, 369 and French Indochina xli, 612
friends and colleagues 142, 147, 259, 297, 329
and Geneva Conference on Indochina 401 on Guatemalan coup xli
health of 176
and Japan 13, 53, 452
and Korean War xxv, 142 and Lebanon intervention xlvi–xlvii
and loyalty investigations 138, 791
on McCarthy (Joseph) 557
narcotics investigations 224
and New Look policy xxiv, 612 and nuclear weapons xxxi, 57, 725
opposition and critics 183, 329, 433–434, 655
press and 630, 744
relationship with brother (Allen Dulles) 166 relationship with Eisenhower 170 resignation of xxix role of xxii
and SEATO 160
and special election of 1949 424 and State Department investigations 500–501 State Department role of 712 and Suez Crisis xliv
supporters 448, 727
and Taiwan xxxv–xxxviii, 620 on trade policy 36
on Vietnam 122
- DuPont Corp. 263
- Durham rule 30
- Durkin, Martin P(atrick) 177–178, 189, 504–505, 523, 695, 752, 814
- Dworshak, Henry C(larence) 178, 482
- ### E
- Eastland, James O(liver) 67, 75, 105, 179–180, 358, 424, 522
- Eastman, Crystal 181
- Eastman, Max F(orrester) 79, 181–182
- Eaton, Cyrus S(tephen) 182–183, 429
- Eaton, Frederick M(cCurdy) 183–184
- Eccles, Mariner 468
- economic aid
to Egypt xliv
supporters of 262, 548, 559, 724
- Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 360
- economic policies xii–xiii, 616.
See also Council of Economic Advisers
- Burns (Arthur) and 86–87 congressional support of 33
Democratic opposition to 21 under Humphrey (George) 334–335
opposition to 547
success of xii–xiii
- economy
boom in Eisenhower years viii, xiii federal controls over, opposition to 33 recession of 1953–1954 87, 192, 334
recession of 1957–1958 21, 196–197, 683
- Eddington, Arthur Stanley 185
- Eden, Anthony xxiii, xliv, xlv, 171, 541
- education
Bestor (Arthur) on 40 federal aid to as desegregation tool xvii, 28, 141, 154, 193, 304, 522, 529, 601–602, 764, 809, 826
as Eisenhower policy 193
opposition and critics 121, 208, 310, 502, 518, 726–727, 751, 828
supporters 113, 220, 265, 301, 503, 509, 528, 536, 555, 559, 580, 594, 764, 769, 776 loyalty investigations in 353–354, 607–608, 773, 787
New York State university system 647 policy xvii, 910
purging of communist educators 321, 803–804, 818 reform, in Tennessee 117
Rickover (Hyman) on 636 spending cuts, in Utah 421
Sputnik and 40, 196, 220–221, 261, 384–385, 420
state funding for 510
- Egan, William Allen 184
- Egypt. See also Suez Crisis of 1956 and Dulles foreign policy 171, 175
Soviet military aid xliv, 11–12, 175, 656
- Einstein, Albert 185, 569, 659
- Eisenhower, Arthur [brother] 818
- Eisenhower, David Jacob [father] 186
- Eisenhower, Dwight D(avid) viii, ix, xv, xx, xxi, xxiii, xxix, li, 186–202, 187, 371, 418, 445, 554, 609, 716, 761, 804, 813
advisers to 116–117, 204, 236–237, 270–271, 286, 345, 397, 438, 514, 529, 541, 596, 682, 712, 728, 808–809 corruption allegations against 592 death 201
education 186
family and background 186
farewell address 201 heart attack (1955) 69, 195, 205, 254, 558, 649 historians' assessment of vii–ix, xxii–xxiii, li–lii, 200–202, 630, 666 House support for 225 inaugural address 896–899
leadership of ix–x, 5, 407, 418, 433, 467 military career 186, 268, 344, 563, 596, 757
and Milton Eisenhower, relationship with 204
opposition and critics 421, 467–468, 526, 535, 626–627, 666 popularity of li power of presidency and ix
press on 260
second term 196–200
State of the Union addresses 192, 201, 345, 472
stroke (1957) 560, 649
supporters 312, 419, 446, 448, 467, 497, 536, 590, 643, 646, 679–680, 754, 767, 780, 804, 813, 834, 839
Supreme Court appointments xix–xx, 63, 75, 194, 275, 735, 804–805, 818 on White scandal 73–74
on Zwicker (Ralph) 847
- Eisenhower, Edgar [brother] xlvi, 191
- Eisenhower, Ida [mother] 186
- Eisenhower, Lucy [sister-in-law] 191
- Eisenhower, Milton Stover [brother] x, xlvi, 34, 194–195, 199, 202–206, 204–205, 459, 733
- Eisenhower Doctrine xl–xli, 176, 198, 900–905
opposition to 234, 266, 311, 460–461, 673, 797
passage of 255
supporters 55, 262, 290, 351, 374, 536, 653, 718–719, 769
- Eisenhower Library viii, 202
- Eisenhower revisionism 202
- election reform, supporters of 294
- electoral college, efforts to abolish 414, 711
- Elitcher, Max 713–714
- Ellender, Allen J(oseph) 52, 206, 488
- Emergency Civil Rights Mobilization 822
- Employment Act of 1946 492, 581, 585
- employment discrimination, efforts to eliminate xviii, 193
- Encyclopaedia Britannica* 39, 134, 340, 786
- Engel v. Vitale* (1962) 277, 807
- Engle, Clair 109, 206–207, 399, 402, 768
- entertainment industry, HUAC investigation of 787, 802
- environmental legislation 457
- Equal Opportunity Act of 1964 412
- Ervin, Sam(uel) J(ames), Jr. 207–208, 252, 412, 487, 767
- Estes, Billie Sol 487–488, 538, 829
- European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) 76–77, 171

European Defense Community (EDC) xxvi, 76–77, 147, 171, 187
 European Economic Community 77
 European Recovery Program 311
 Ewald, William Bragg lii
 Executive Order 9835 194
 Executive Order 10450 194, 500, 569
Explorer satellite xxviii, 62
 Export-Import Bank 97, 468

F

Fair Deal 776
 opposition to 150, 214, 245, 485, 679, 721, 751
 supporters of 141, 262, 371, 499, 527, 655, 718
 Fair Employment Practices Commission (FEPC) xviii, 105, 342, 521, 601–602, 617, 670, 749, 755, 776
 Fair Housing Act of 1968 522, 622, 768–769
 Fairless, Benjamin F (ranklin) 50, 209–210, 494 fallout shelters xxviii, 237, 319, 647–648, 760
 Family Assistance Plan 562, 829
 Farland, Joseph S (impson) 210
 Farmer-Labor party 230–231, 335–336, 473
 Farrell, James T. 321
 Fast, Howard M (elvin) 211–212
 Faubus, Orval E (ugene) 25, 28, 49–50, 76, 197, 212–214, 264, 290–291, 306, 464, 499, 529
 Fay, Joseph 317
 FBI (Federal Bureau of Investigation)
 ABSCAM investigation 827 congressional oversight of 653 domestic counterintelligence programs 326–327
 leadership 325–327
 loyalty investigations 81, 143, 326–327, 501, 694
 and organized crime 18
 personnel 143, 325–327 public relations 326
 White scandal and 73, 788
 Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 256–257, 287
 Federal Communications Commission (FCC) 156–157, 280, 455, 592, 681, 688–689 federal debt, restructuring of 468
 Federal Highway Act of 1956 xv, 116, 815

federal judiciary desegregation and 313–314, 355–356, 717, 771–772, 780–781, 837–838
 Eisenhower's appointments to xxii, 76, 82, 197–198, 289, 717, 735, 780–781, 818, 835
 Johnson's appointments to 120, 281 judicial activists on 30
 Kennedy's appointments to 375, 465, 838
 Roosevelt's appointments to 520
 Truman's appointments to 837 federal preemption doctrine 294
 Federal Reserve 468–470, 582
 Federal Water Pollution Control Act of 1956 48–49
 Feklisov, Alexander 660, 662
 Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR) 544–545, 673, 762
 Ferguson, Homer 214–215, 502
 Fermi, Enrico 759
 Feucht, Paul E. 130
 Fiedler, Leslie A (ron) 215–216
 Fifth Amendment 47
 Finletter, Thomas K (night) 144, 216–217, 279, 317, 655, 734
 Finletter Group 216–217, 282
Firing Line (TV show) 80
 First Amendment, Supreme Court on 46–47, 63, 83, 160–161, 228, 349, 628, 735, 818
 Fisher, Frederick 482, 816
 Fitzgerald, Albert 74
 flag-salute, compulsory 160, 228–229
 Flanders, Ralph E (dward) 114, 195, 217–219, 233, 293, 354, 401, 424, 481, 483, 528, 708, 809, 847
 Flemming, Arthur S (herwood) xiv, 204, 219–220, 286, 559
 Flesch, Rudolf F (ranz) 220–221
 Folsom, James E (lisha) 221–223, 450
 Folsom, Marion B (ayard) 121, 219, 223, 223–224
 Food for Peace 336
 Ford, Aaron L. 119
 Ford, Edsel 225–226
 Ford, Gerald R. 77, 99, 161, 224–225, 242, 261, 265–266, 274, 278, 287, 562, 615
 Ford, Henry, II 225–227
 Ford Foundation 25, 196, 236–237, 311–312, 340, 802–803
 Ford Motor Co. 225–227
 Foreign Agricultural Service 35

foreign aid. See also Eisenhower Doctrine advocates of 58–59
 cuts in 262
 economic aid xliii, 262, 548, 559, 724
 investigations of 24
 Kissinger (Henry) on 396 to Latin America 199
 military aid 58–59, 225, 262, 320, 548, 655
 opposition and critics 60, 65, 93, 178, 206, 210, 233, 251, 320, 334, 421, 442, 460, 579–580, 673, 749–750, 797, 816, 828 policy revamping 148 studies on 210
 support for 245–246, 256, 290, 351, 580, 624, 797 foreign policy xxii–l, 189–191, 200. See also containment policy; Eisenhower Doctrine
 Acheson (Dean) on 3
 Congress's attempt to control 472
 and divisions within Republican Party 188
 downplaying of conflict xxii, xxiii, li, 200
 Eisenhower's control of 297, 299
 Eisenhower's experience in xxii engagement 188
 evaluation of li in Latin America xlviii–l, xlix–l, 97, 298
 opposition and critics 48, 85, 217, 233–234, 241, 266, 329, 369, 502–503, 535, 630, 655, 718, 726, 732, 737, 744
 supporters 245, 300, 336, 343, 351, 473, 505, 624, 666, 708, 769, 821
 Foreign Relations Committee (Senate) 245, 262, 374, 460, 476, 820–821
 Foreign Service Institute (FSI) 653
 Formosa Resolution of 1955 234, 245, 311, 492, 624, 732, 769, 797
 Forrestal, James V. 490
 Fortas, Abe 266, 807, 837
Fortune magazine 447, 452, 462
 Foster, John W. 166, 168
 Foster, William C (hapman) 227–228
 Foster, William Z. 442
 Fourteenth Amendment
 Black (Hugo) on 46
 incorporation doctrine 230, 276, 628, 794 and segregation 140, 407, 464, 795, 805
 Fourth Amendment 47
 France, and Suez crisis xliv–xlv, 175–176, 195, 198

Frankfurter, Felix xx, 180, 228–230, 260, 276, 638
 Freedom Rides 584, 674, 702
 Freeman, Orville L (orthrop) 230–231, 550
 Free Speech Movement 381
 free trade 34–36, 38, 86, 121, 226, 383, 616, 828
 French Indochina
 Kennedy (John F.) on 373
 supporters of 448
 U.S. advisers in 416
 U.S. policy in 173, 190
 U.S. refusal to intervene in xli–xlii, 173, 190, 612, 637, 712, 726
 Fritchey, Clayton 231–232
 Fuchs, Klaus 326, 476, 659, 713, 777
 Fulbright, J (ames) William 24, 109, 132, 137, 232–234, 262, 370, 459, 483, 809–810
 Fulbright Fellowship program 233
 Full Employment Act of 1946 384, 400, 514
 Fund for the Republic 340, 802–803
 Funston, G (eorge) Keith 234–235
 Furry, Wendell H. 607–608

G

Gaither, H (orace) Rowan, Jr. xxvii, xl, 196, 236–237, 384
 Gaither Report 164, 236–237
 Galbraith, John Kenneth 216, 237–239, 516
 Gambino, Carlo 19
 Gardner, Trevor 239–241
 Garner, John Nance 491, 623
 Gates, Thomas S (overeign), Jr. 241–242
 GATT. See General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade on Tariffs and Trade
 Gavin, James M (aurice) 84, 242–243, 637
 gay activists 430
 General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) 36, 148
 General Electric Co. (GE) 56–57, 100–101, 650
 General Motors Corp. (GM) 75, 132–133, 163, 631, 651, 830
 General Services Administration (GSA) 462–463, 743
 Geneva Accords (1954) xlii, 173, 190, 451
 Geneva Conference on Indochina (1954) xlii, 173, 401, 429–430, 712, 718
 Geneva Conference on the Prevention of Surprise Attacks 227–228
 Geneva Summit of July, 1955 xxvi, li, 69, 99, 172, 191, 245, 254, 508, 646
 Genovese, Vito 19, 128, 243–244

- George, Walter F(ranklin) 55, 66, 99, 244–246, 408, 441, 756, 768
- Geraty, Pierce J. 81
- Germany
- Acheson (Dean) on 3
 - occupation 116, 541
 - rebuilding of 489
 - reunification negotiations 298
 - West, NATO and xxvi, 147, 171, 269, 563–564
 - World War II rocket program 61
- Giancana, Sam 44
- Gideon v. Wainwright* (1963) 619–620, 807
- Ginsberg, Allen 246–247, 379
- Gold, Ben 247–248
- Gold, Harry 659, 713–714
- Goldberg, Arthur J(oseph) 230, 248–249, 658
- Golden Fleece Award 606
- Goldfine, Bernard 6–7, 129, 134, 197, 249–250, 281, 529, 592, 829
- Goldwater, Barry (Morris) 250–254
- advisers to 210, 613
 - opposition and critics 104, 133, 252, 312–313, 409, 418, 690, 713
 - political career 253, 360, 560, 562, 724–725
 - supporters 430, 447, 615, 753, 768
 - on Treaty of Fifth Avenue 560, 647
 - union and 405, 503, 538, 633
- Gompers, Samuel 427, 617
- Goodman, Walter 512, 802–803
- Goodpaster, Andrew J(ackson) I, 189, 254–255
- Gordon, Thomas S(ylvy) 255–256
- Gore, Albert A(rnold) 53, 108, 159, 256–258
- government corruption
- allegations of 156–157, 592, 689, 727
 - in Chicago 135–137, 141–142
 - investigations of 156–157, 280, 317, 455, 462–463, 485, 592, 688–689
 - in Philadelphia 149
 - in Truman administration vii, 6, 188, 499, 556, 718, 731, 777
- government growth, opposition to 95, 191, 251, 253, 333, 643
- Graham, Billy (William) (Franklin) 258–259, 296, 553, 589
- Graham, Philip Leslie 259–260
- Grand Canyon National Park 287
- Granger, Lester B. xvi, 389, 823
- Gray, Gordon 254, 569
- Gray Commission (Commission on Public Education) 15, 721–722
- Great Britain
- and Iranian oil crisis of 1951–1953 xxxix, 324–325
 - and Jordan crisis of 1957 xlvii
 - and Suez crisis xlv–xlv, 175–176, 195, 198
- Green, Edith S(tarrett) 261
- Green, Theodore Francis 261–262
- Green, William 342–343, 504, 617
- Greenewalt, Crawford H(allock) 263
- Greenglass, David 658–659, 661–662
- Greenglass, Ruth 658–659, 661
- Greenstein, Fred ix, xi
- Gressette, L. Marion 95
- Griffin, (Samuel) Marvin 264–265
- Griffin, Robert P. 252, 265–266, 412, 486–487
- Griffin v. Illinois* (1956) 276, 521
- Griffith, Robert xi, 748
- Grissom, Virgil I. 62
- Griswold v. Connecticut* (1965) 47, 161, 277, 807
- Gromyko, Andrei 766
- Grooms, H. Hobart 449–450
- Gross, H(arold) R(oyce) 266–267
- Gruening, Ernest H(enry) 267–268, 535
- Gruenther, Alfred M(aximilian) xxxvi, xlii, 73, 268–269, 401
- Guatemala xl, xl–xli, 24, 60, 167, 191, 443, 505
- Gulf of Tonkin Resolution 268, 535
- H
- Hagerty, James Campbell (“Jim”) ix–x, xx, 66, 111, 131, 147, 270–271, 452, 729, 847
- Hall, Fred 641
- Hall, Leonard W(ood) 10, 111, 271–272, 463, 533, 642
- friends and colleagues 147
- Halleck, Charles A(braham) 96, 225, 266, 272–274, 467, 625
- Hammarskjöld, Dag 81–82, 313, 489
- Hannah, John A(lfred) 274–275
- Harlan, John Marshall 275–277, 276, 414
- Harlow, Bryce N(athaniel) 277–278, 700
- Harriman, W(illiam) Averell 76, 128, 144, 227, 254, 278–280, 317, 343, 633, 646, 657, 731–733, 778
- Harris, Oren 280–281, 455, 688
- Harris, Reed 281–282
- Harris, Seymour E(dwin) 282–283
- Harrison, Byron Patton 179
- Harrison, William K(elly), Jr. 283–284
- Hart, Philip A(loysius) 285, 598
- Hastie, William 229
- Hatch Act 262, 628
- Hauge, Gabriel 147, 285–287, 682
- Hayden, Carl T(rumbull) 287
- Hayden–Cartwright Act of 1934 287
- Hayek, Friedrich August 288–289, 393
- Haynsworth, Clement Furman, Jr. 198, 285, 289–290, 314, 522, 594, 622, 690, 829
- Hays, (Lawrence) Brooks 213, 290–291
- Hays, Wayne L(evere) 291–292
- health care reform 220, 300–301
- health insurance
- efforts to expand xi–xii, xvi, 8, 126–127, 192, 200, 304, 365, 519
 - for elderly, through Social Security 294, 336, 351, 383, 505, 519, 606, 625–626, 727, 826, 828
- Hear It Now* (radio program) 542
- Hearst, William Randolph, Jr. 470
- Hébert, F(ellx) Edward 292–293, 793
- Heller, Louis B. 392
- Hell’s Canyon Dam Project 103, 111–112, 178, 192, 206–207, 286, 347, 359, 497, 503, 534, 548, 566, 643, 713
- Hennings, Thomas (Carey), Jr. 293–294, 477
- Hensel, H(erman) Struve 4, 294–295
- Herald, Henry T. 224
- Herberg, Will 295–297
- Herter, Christian A(rchibald) xxix–xxx, xxxiv, xlix, 6, 21, 54, 297–299, 508, 603, 705, 724, 813
- Hesburgh, Theodore M. 274
- Hickenlooper, Bourke B(lakemore) 240, 299–300
- Highway Revenue Act of 1956 256–257
- Hill, (Joseph) Lister 153, 300–302, 305, 678
- Hill, Robert C(harles) 302–303
- Hiroshima 129, 425, 567, 775, 781
- Hiss, Alger vii, 2, 60, 105–106, 140, 215–216, 326, 424, 476, 537, 555, 591, 731, 777
- Hobby, Oveta Culp xvii, 5, 133, 301, 303, 303–305
- Ho Chi Minh xli, 173–174, 546
- Hodges, Luther H(artwell) 305–306, 499, 584
- Hoffa, James R(iddle) 306–309, 307
- Brewster (Frank) and 64
 - and Conference on Transportation Unity 131
 - disappearance of 658
 - investigations of 157–158, 310, 376, 486, 506
 - and Montgomery Ward ownership battle 26
 - opposition to 824
 - organized crime ties 60, 157–158
 - and plans for international union 68
 - power of 31
 - rise to Teamsters presidency 154
 - union power struggles 65
- Hoffer, Eric 309
- Hoffman, Clare E(ugene) 309–311, 700
- Hoffman, Paul G(ray) 186, 223, 311–313, 333, 798
- Hoffman, Walter E(dward) 313–314
- Hofstadter, Richard 314–316
- Hogan, Frank S(mithwick) 144, 279, 316–318, 649, 786
- Holifield, Chet (Chester) (Earl) 318–319, 625, 663
- Hollister, John B(aker) 319–320
- Hollywood 331, 614
- Holman, Frank E. 66, 191
- Holmes, Robert D. 535
- homosexuality 102, 118, 247, 429–430, 501
- Hook, Sidney 320–322
- Hoover, Herbert (Clark) 109–110, 114, 127, 267, 297, 319, 322–324, 581, 627, 646, 707, 739–740, 750, 824
- Hoover, Herbert, Jr. 6, 302, 324, 324–325
- Hoover, J(ohn) Edgar 18, 73, 143, 325–327, 353, 390, 568, 653, 661, 788, 817
- Hoover Commission(s) (Commission(s) on Organization of the Executive Branch of Government) 69–70, 114, 319, 323–324, 376
- Hope, Clifford R(agsdale) 328
- Hopkins, Harry 278
- Horn, Clayton 247
- House Appropriations Committee 287, 457–458, 579, 651

- House Committee on Un-American Activities. See House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC)
- House Select Committee to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations 291, 392, 669
- House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) FBI and 326
 and Fund for the Republic 340 investigations 105, 211, 470, 568, 607, 645, 761, 787–788, 802–803 media and 591
 members 292, 537, 597
 Nixon (Richard) on 555
 opposition to 104, 318, 346, 350, 381, 460, 512
 supporters of 69
 Supreme Court on 46
 White scandal and 73, 778
- housing bills 218, 336, 719
- Houston, Charles Hamilton 229, 463
- H.R. 8127 xv
- HUAC. See House Un-American Activities Committee
- Hughes, Charles Evans 349, 754
- Hughes, Emmet J(ohn) 328–330, 406, 477
- Hughes, Howard R(obard), Jr. 330–331, 827
- Hughes, Rowland R(oberts) 153, 301, 331–332
- Hull, Cordell 125, 257
- Humphrey, George M(agoffin) 6, 17, 97, 116, 189, 224, 286, 305, 332–335, 333, 383, 494, 646, 682
- Humphrey, Hubert H(oratio) 335–338, 667
 advisers to 548
 critics of 535
 and electoral college 414
 and loyalty investigations 91, 411, 424
 on Niebuhr (Reinhold) 552
 political career 59, 231, 374, 507, 562, 667, 766
 on radioactive fallout 491
 supporters of 230, 473, 667
 as vice president 493
 and Vietnam War 417
- Hungarian revolt of 1956 xxvi–xxvii, xlv, 23, 85, 183, 195, 742
- Hunt, H. L. xii, 291
- Hurley, Patrick J. 107, 138, 694
- Hussein (king of Jordan) xlv, xlvii, 198
- Hutcheson, Maurice A(lbert) 338–339
- Hutchins, Robert M(aynard) 39, 339–341
- hydrogen bomb development of 41, 759, 776
 opposition to 90, 124, 185, 568, 691, 740
 radiation from 13, 741
 supporters of 568, 740, 759, 784
- I
- IBM Corp. 811–812
- “I Have a Dream” speech (King) 390, 674
- IMF. See International Monetary Fund
- Immigration and Naturalization Act of 1952 818, 843
- immigration law 472, 509, 653, 802–803
- Impellitteri, Vincent 144, 799
- income tax, corporate 223–224
- Income Tax Revision Act of 1954 223–224
- Independent Labor League of America (ILLA) 295, 443
- India, U.S. policy in 655
- Indian Claims Commission 500, 811
- individualism, advocates of 288
- Indonesia, U.S. policy in 361–362
- Industrial Workers of the World 67
- Institute for Sex Research 391
- Institute of Pacific Relations (IPR) 403, 472, 817
- Insull, Samuel 158
- Inter-American Development Bank xlviii, 459
- Inter-American Development Institution 148
- Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) 443
- intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs)
 defense contractors 571
 Soviet development of xxvii, 196, 237, 495
 U.S. development of 239–241, 347, 384–385, 397, 426, 495–496, 610, 909
- intermediate range ballistic missiles (IRBMs), U.S.
 development of 61, 240, 384, 495–496, 909
- Internal Security Act of 1950 (Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950) federal courts on 604–605
 opposition to 346, 424
 passage of 471, 537
 provisions of 91, 109, 471, 555
 supporters of 69, 180, 291, 372, 460, 634, 726, 843
 Supreme Court on 180
- International Atomic Energy Agency 741, 799
- International Bank for Reconstruction and Development 45, 488
- International Brotherhood of Teamsters (IBT) 31, 60, 64–65, 131, 157, 166, 249, 252, 306–308, 343, 376, 486, 505–506, 633, 658
- International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) 100, 443–444, 504–505
- International Fur and Leather Workers Union (IFLWU) 247–248
- International Information Administration 281, 750
- International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union (ILGWU) 165, 295, 423, 443
- International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU) 67–68
- International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) 60, 67, 131, 166, 307, 504, 618
- International Monetary Fund (IMF) 73, 148
- “International Security: The Military Aspect” (1958) 395, 646
- International Union of Electrical Workers (IUE) 56–57, 100–101
- interposition doctrine 15, 119–120, 137, 139, 222, 233, 264, 358, 698–699, 721, 767, 773
- Interstate Commerce Commission 130–131
- interstate highway system xiv–xv, xv–xvi, 93, 98, 108, 116, 137, 193, 256–257, 286, 518, 815
- Iran aid to 24
 oil crisis of 1951–1953 xxxix, 324–325, 656
 U.S. overthrow of Mossadeq xxxix–xxxx, 167, 171, 191, 324–325, 656
- Iraq, overthrow of monarchy xlvii, 176, 198
- Irving, Clifford 317
- Israel. See also Arab-Israeli conflict and Suez crisis xlv–xlv, 175–176, 195
 supporters of 348, 364, 500, 653, 655, 675
- Ives, Irving M(cNeil) 218, 279, 342–343, 506, 524
- J
- Jackson, C(charles) D(ouglas) 344–345
- Jackson, Henry M(artin) (“Scoop”) 119, 345–348, 376, 426, 495, 507, 684
- Jackson, Robert H(oughwout) 348–350
- Jacobellis v. Ohio* (1964) 64, 735
- Jacobson, Eddie 774
- Jaffe, Phillip 694
- James, A. A. 107
- Japan
 anti-American riots (1960) 200, 452 atomic bombing of 425, 488, 567
 bombing of 425
 Eisenhower visit to 200, 452
 land reform in 410
 rearmament issue 13, 452
 U.S.-Japanese peace treaty 169
- Japanese-American internment 203, 346, 488, 751, 804
- Japanese Mutual Defense Treaty of 1960 442, 451–452
- Jardine, William M. 202
- Javits, Jacob K(oppel) 264, 350–352, 594, 690, 728, 801
- Jencks, Clinton E. 115
- Jencks case (1957) 63, 115, 208
- Jenkins, Ray 482
- Jenner, William E(zra) 8, 170, 312, 352–354, 477–478, 717–718, 753, 806
- Jessup, Philip C. 233, 708
- Jester, Beauford H. 698
- Jiang Jieshi. see Chiang Kai-shek
- John Birch Society 536, 651, 844
- Johns, Charley E. 122–123
- Johnson, Frank M(inis), Jr. 354–356
- Johnson, George M. 274
- Johnson, John 754
- Johnson, Louis 792
- Johnson, Lyndon B(aines) 356–361, 357
 advisers to 54, 249, 439, 667–668
 appointments by 120, 124, 138, 149, 205, 207, 231, 281, 386, 459, 535, 758, 766, 799, 801
 and Army-McCarthy hearings 482 assumption to presidency 360 and civil rights xxi–xxii, 522
 and Civil Rights Act of 1957 75, 104–105, 112, 180, 194, 197, 358–359, 425, 522, 566, 771 and defense policy 243, 495, 793
 and desegregation 698–699
 domestic policy 360–361
 opposition to 102, 129, 133–134, 180, 267, 487, 536, 673, 768, 844
 supporters of 141–142, 160, 268, 412, 493, 503, 507, 535, 581, 641, 653, 711, 779, 826, 840

- Eisenhower on 201
 FBI and 143
 foreign policy 112, 459, 491
 friends and colleagues 21, 119, 277, 336–337, 382, 419, 458, 671, 673, 703–704
 and Gaither Report 237
 as majority leader 112, 151, 461, 473, 606, 719, 778
 McCarthy (Joseph) and 483–484
 and Oppenheimer (J. Robert) 570
 opposition and critics 25, 34, 92, 99, 113, 217, 257–258, 621–622, 624, 641
 political career 180, 348, 356–360, 374, 474, 507, 561, 622, 624, 626, 658, 667–668 and Senate filibuster rules 99, 112, 359, 549
 and Southern Manifesto 257
 State of the Union addresses 360
 supporters 226–227, 234, 260, 262, 309, 351, 494
 Supreme Court nominations 266, 465, 807
 tax policy 519
 as vice president 152, 360
 and Vietnam War xlii, 417, 439, 668
 Johnson, Paul B., Jr. 120, 179
 Joint Chiefs of Staff 611–613, 753, 758, 782–783
 Jones, Howard P(alfrey) 361–362
 Jones, James H. 392
 Jones, Sam H. 439–440
 Jones, Theodore 141
 Jordan crisis of 1957 xlvii, xlvii, 198
 Judd, Walter H(enry) 189, 362–363, 411 judicial activism 47, 140, 194, 808 judicial restraint 228, 276, 349, 520, 628, 735, 794
 Judiciary Committee (Senate) 104, 414, 471, 821
 Justice Department
 Civil Rights Division xxi, 75–76, 104, 159, 197, 358, 522, 649, 823
 General Intelligence Division 325 reforms at 650
- K
 Kádár, János 183
 Kaiser, Henry J. 330
 Karr, David 591
 Kasavubu, Joseph 81
 Katzentine, A. Frank 455
 Kaufman, Irving 659
 Keating, Kenneth B. 154, 317, 364–365, 377, 690, 728
 Keeshin, John 130
 Kefauver, C(arey) Estes 365–368
 and DAC 778
 and Dixon-Yates contract 153
 and loyalty investigations 337, 424
 organized crime investigations 18, 128, 244, 306–307, 317
 political career 152, 231, 279, 337, 624, 730–733, 777, 825
 and Southern Manifesto 257
 and Till (Emmett) case 771
 Kefauver-Celler Act of 1950 366
 Kefauver-Harris Drug Control Act (1962) 368
 Kelley, A. B. 43
 Kempton, Murray 666
 Kendall, Willmoore 79, 790
 Kennan, George F(rost) 30, 139, 368–370, 433, 552, 775
 Kennedy, Edward 493
 Kennedy, John F(itzgerald) 370–375, 371
 advisers to 54, 59, 87, 117, 142, 220, 239, 243, 249, 282–283, 324, 416, 423, 548
 appointments by 59, 77, 97, 149, 210, 217, 226, 231, 242, 299, 375, 426, 465, 491, 691, 723, 758, 797, 829, 838, 842 and Area Redevelopment Act of 1961 160
 assassination of 375, 570
 Bay of Pigs invasion 45, 168, 201, 205, 375, 416, 491, 758 and Berlin crisis xxx and California politics 71
 civil defense policy 319
 and civil rights 389, 522, 823
 defense policy 793
 domestic policy xiv
 limited success of 374
 opposition to 70, 129, 133–134, 178, 180, 507, 622, 750
 supporters of 108, 141–142, 160, 268, 535, 581, 653, 711, 803, 826
 Eisenhower on 201
 and election of 1952 438
 and election of 1956 152, 367–368, 374, 624
 and election of 1960 43, 59, 92, 120, 136, 152, 337, 347–348, 359–360, 373, 469, 507, 510, 560–561, 622, 626, 634–635, 734, 758 foreign policy 72, 86, 101, 363, 375, 459, 507, 540 (See also Alliance for Progress)
 friends and colleagues 259, 492–493, 634, 812
 health of 371–373
 in House 371–372
 and King (Martin Luther) 389–390, 533 labor reform legislation 249, 506 and Massachusetts politics 373
 McCarthy (Joseph) and 484
 on missile gap 196
 and NATO 564
 and Oppenheimer (J. Robert) 570
 opposition and critics 34, 101, 267, 273–274, 535, 590, 606, 737, 750 relationship with brother (Robert F. Kennedy) 377
 Schlesinger (Arthur) on 687
 in Senate 372–374
 on Stevenson (Adlai) 734
 supporters 113, 231, 260–261, 279, 306, 434, 493–495, 584, 655, 658, 686, 764, 779, 825
 tax policy 519
 and union investigations 32, 252, 373, 633 and union reform efforts 208, 252, 265–266, 343, 373–374, 412, 486–487, 524–525 union support for 249
 and Vietnam War 416
 Kennedy, Robert F(rancis) 375–377
 assassination of 377
 as attorney general 377
 and Freedom Rides 584
 and government corruption investigations 485
 King (Martin Luther) and 389–390, 592
 and loyalty investigations 375–376
 McCarthy (Joseph R.) and 376, 484
 organized crime investigations 18–19, 64, 244, 377
 political career 338, 348, 365, 474
 relationship with brother (John F. Kennedy) 377 Schlesinger (Arthur) and 687 senate career 346
 supporters of 59
 union investigations 133, 157–158, 308, 376, 486, 538
 Kennedy family, Truman on 779
 Kennelly, Martin 141
 Kennon, Robert F(loyd) 377–378, 440–441
 Kerner, Otto G. 594
 Kerouac, Jack 246, 378–380
 Kerr, Clark 380–381
 Kerr, Robert S(amuel) xiv, 381–384, 473, 487, 519
 Kerr-Mills Act (1960) xiv, 383, 519
 Keynes, John Maynard 288
 Keynesianism xii, 86
 Keyserling, Leon H(yman) 384–385
 Khrushchev, Nikita
 and Berlin crisis xxviii–xxx, 162, 176, 198–199, 298 at Camp David xxix, xxx, 199, 766 cold war and xxvi and Cuba 1
 and Eastern Europe xxvi–xxvii, 195 meetings with U.S. leaders 123, 131, 183, 337, 571, 633, 734 and Nixon visit to Soviet Union 558–559 and nuclear arms xxvii, 176 and Paris Summit of 1960 xxxiv–xxxv Soviet Union under 677
 and U-2 incident xxxiv–xxxv, 200, 603
 U.S. visits of 160, 438, 448, 506, 542, 600, 603, 655, 720, 765–766
 views on 3, 23
 Killian, James R(hyne) xxviii, xxxi, 196, 240, 385–386, 397, 842, 911
 King, Martin Luther, Jr. xxi, 386–390
 assassination of 2
 civil rights activism 375
 friends and colleagues 1–2, 674, 702–703
 Hoover (J. Edgar) and 327
 Kennedy (John F.)
 intervention on behalf of 389, 533 and March on Washington 618 meeting with Eisenhower 389, 823
 and Montgomery bus boycott 1, 574, 674
 Nixon (Richard) and 388–389, 533, 559, 674
 sexual infidelities 2 on Sobell (Morton) case 714 surveillance of 390, 592
 Truman (Harry) on 779
 King, Samuel W. 67
 Kinsey, Alfred C(harles) 390–392, 669

- Kirk, Russell (Amos) 79, 392–394, 686
- Kissinger, Henry A(lfred) 196, 210, 370, 394–396, 489, 646, 650
- Kistiakowsky, George B(ogdan) xxxii, 396–398
- kitchen debate 559
- Knight, Goodwin (Jess) 207, 398–399, 402, 408
- Knowland, William F(ife) 399–402, 400
- and California politics 70, 398–399, 408
- and censure of McCarthy (Joseph) 483
- on China xxxv, 55, 189, 245, 700, 708
- foreign policy proposals 126
- and loyalty investigations 129
- as party leader 151, 695
- political career 110, 195, 207, 753
- and Taft-Hartley Act 505, 529
- and Vietnam 122
- Knudsen, William S. 830
- Kohlberg, Alfred 402–404
- Kohler, Herbert (Vollrath) 404–405
- Kohler, Walter, Sr. 405
- Kohler, Walter J(odok), Jr. 329, 404, 405–406, 478, 605
- Kohler Co. 404–405, 538, 633
- Kong Le 71–72, 575–576
- Korean Mutual Defense Treaty of 1954 442, 726
- Korean War 776–777
- ammunition shortages in 571, 711, 728
- armistice 114, 189, 284
- critics of 16, 257, 323, 353, 401, 413, 556, 753, 797, 809
- and defense budget xxiv
- Eisenhower's strategy in 114
- and election of 1952 188
- ending of xxv, 171, 189, 192
- investigation, calls for 797
- naval operations 611
- peace talks 142, 283–284
- pilots downed over China xxxv
- supporters of 147, 666, 668
- threat of nuclear weapons' use 257, 284, 640
- UN commander in 114, 466–467, 637, 671, 777, 784
- U.S. policy 700
- and U.S. rocket program 61
- Krock, Arthur 370, 406–408, 629
- Krupp, Alfred 489
- Kubitschek de Oliveira, Juscelino 458–459
- Kuchel, Thomas H(enry) 151, 408–409
- Ku Klux Klan (KKK) 94–95, 222, 355, 583
- ### L
- Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. See Taft-Hartley Act of 1947
- labor policies. See also Taft-Hartley Act of 1947; unemployment insurance Eisenhower 43, 529 Kennedy 373
- Labor's Non-Partisan League 427–428
- Ladejinsky, Wolf I(saac) 410–411, 724
- La Follette, Robert M. Jr. 267, 470, 475
- La Guardia, Fiorello 127–128, 145, 350
- Landon, Alfred M. 328, 641, 692
- Landrum, Phil(lip) M(itchell) 252, 266, 411–412, 486–487
- Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959 68, 132, 158, 249, 252, 266, 273, 308, 311, 343, 374, 412, 486–487, 506–507, 525
- Landy, Eugene W. 761
- Lane, William Preston, Jr. 91, 499
- Langer, William 412–415
- Lansdale, Edward G(eary) 121, 174, 415–417
- Lansing, Robert 166, 168
- Lansky, Meyer 128
- Laos xlii, 71–72, 190, 575–576
- Larson, Arthur L(ewis) 417–418, 418, 533
- Lash, Joseph 230
- Latin America
- cold war in 199
- Eisenhower (Milton S.) as envoy to xlviii, 199, 204–205, 459
- foreign aid to 199
- Nixon visit to (1958) 199, 459, 558
- private investment in 60
- U.S. involvement in 646
- U.S. policy in xlviii–l, xlix–l, 97, 298
- Lattimore, Owen 118, 401, 403, 472, 591, 604, 716
- Lausche, Frank J(ohn) 152, 418–419
- Lawrence, Ernest O. xxxi, 568, 759
- Lazarsfeld, Paul 722
- Leader, George M(ichael) 419–421, 690
- Lebanon, U.S. intervention in xlv–xlvii, 176, 198, 262, 541–542, 783
- Lecche, Richard W. 439
- Lederer, William J. 417
- Le Duc Tho 396
- Lee, J(oseph) Bracken 421–422, 810
- Lee, Richard C(harles) 422–423
- Lehman, Herbert H(enry) 8, 144–145, 169, 217, 342, 351, 423–425, 655, 801
- LeMay, Curtis E(merson) xxx, 425–427, 747
- Lemke, William 706
- lend-lease program 245
- Lesinski, John 27
- Levitt, Arthur 144
- Lewis, John L(ewellyn) 165, 310, 427–429, 493, 498, 617
- Liberal Party 165–166, 657–658
- liberal political philosophy 85, 106, 182, 216
- Lie, Trygve 80–81
- Liebman, Marvin 429–430
- “Life Is Worth Living” (TV program) 697
- Life* magazine 344, 444–445, 447–449, 474, 493, 837
- Lillenthal, David 318, 740
- Lindbergh, Charles 762
- Lindsay, John V(liet) 166, 430–432, 620, 658, 801
- Lippman, Lois xvii, 193
- Lippmann, Walter 172–173, 370, 432–434
- Lipset, Seymour Martin 434–436, 516
- Liuzzo, Viola 355
- Lodge, Henry Cabot 81, 186, 225, 372, 436–439, 437, 541, 560, 798, 813
- Logan Act of 1799 183
- Log Cabin Republicans 430
- Long, Earl K(emp) 377–378, 439–441, 530
- Long, Huey P. 128, 206, 439, 706
- Long, Russell B(illiu) 377, 441–442, 528
- “Long Telegram” (Kennan) 369
- Longworth, Alice Roosevelt 146
- Louis, Joe 308
- Lovestone, Jay 295, 442–444, 505, 633
- Lovestonites 295, 443
- Lowry, Sumter 123
- loyalty investigations. See also Internal Security Act of 1950; McCarthy, Joseph R(aymond); McCarthyism; Permanent Investigations Subcommittee; Rosenberg, Ethel; Rosenberg, Julius; Senate Internal Security Subcommittee; Sobell, Morton; Subversive Activities Control Board
- by American Legion 143
- Clark (Tom) on 115
- at Department of Agriculture 410–411
- at Department of Health, Education, and Welfare 304
- Eastman (Max) on 181–182
- in educational institutions 353–354, 607–608, 773, 787
- Eisenhower administration and 500–501, 558
- Eisenhower on 194–195
- election of 1952 and 353
- FBI and 81, 143, 326–327, 501, 694
- by FCC 156
- federal courts on 604–605
- Fiedler (Leslie) on 215
- legislation 91
- Loyalty Program (Truman administration) 326, 475–476, 500, 537, 686, 716–717, 777
- of news media 179
- on nuclear test ban movement 154
- Oppenheimer (J. Robert) security clearance 16–17, 20, 41, 90, 98, 124, 141, 185, 194, 568–570, 691, 740, 759–760
- opposition to 67, 90, 104, 124, 126, 185, 346
- origins of 475–476
- of philanthropic foundations 291, 392, 669
- Senate investigation of 294
- supporters of 214, 304, 336–337
- Supreme Court on 63, 88, 103, 115, 276, 349–350, 354, 520, 694, 802, 806–807, 818
- Truman (Harry) on 778
- of UN delegation 81
- of unions 32
- at United States Information Agency 742
- loyalty oaths 380, 398, 527
- Lucas, Scott 476
- Luce, Clare Boothe 232, 444–447, 445, 447
- Luce, Henry R(obinson) 237, 340, 344, 444, 447–449
- Luciano, Charles (“Lucky”) 18, 128, 243, 316
- Lucy, Autherine J(uanita) 222, 449–450, 464
- Lumumba, Patrice 44, 81, 167
- lunch counter sit-ins 389
- lynching 780. See also Till, Emmett L(ouis)
- Lyon, Tom 498
- ### M
- MacArthur, Douglas 13, 155, 186, 353, 401, 410, 466–467, 500, 637, 671, 777, 784, 821
- MacArthur, Douglas, II 451–452

- Macdonald, Dwight 452–454
 Mack, Richard A(lfred) 6, 10, 157, 280, 454–456, 592, 689
 Macmillan, Harold xxix, xxx, xxxiii, xxxv, xlv, xlvii, 10–11, 298, 725
 Mafia 18–19, 244, 327
 Magnuson, Warren G(rant) 456–457
 Magsaysay, Ramon 415
 Mahon, George H(erman) 457–458, 580
 Mailer, Norman 379
Mallory v. U.S. (1957) 103, 208, 229
 Malone, George W. 98–99, 846–847
 management style ix–x
Mandate for Change (Eisenhower) 201
 Mangano, Vincent 18
 Manhattan Project 41, 185, 397, 567, 691, 759, 841
 Manila Pact of 1954 xlii
 Manion, Clarence 252
 Mann, Thomas (Clifton) 458–459
 Mann, Woodrow Wilson 213
 Mansfield, Mike (Michael) (Joseph) 52, 122, 348, 351, 460–461
 Mansure, Edmund F(orsman) 272, 461–463
 Mao Zedong (Mao Tse-tung) vii, xxv, xxxvii, 190, 403, 694, 790
Mapp v. Ohio (1961) 116, 230, 807, 818
 Marcello, Carlos 440
 March Against Fear 823
 March on Washington 618, 673–674, 822–823
 Marshall, George C. appointments 369
 China mission of 790–791
 Eisenhower on 477–478
 friends and colleagues 53, 186, 277, 711
 McCarthy's accusations against 39, 329, 406, 477, 679
 military career 596
 opposition and critics 353, 372, 718
 and women in armed forces 303
 Marshall, Thurgood 140, 180, 449, 463–465, 463–466, 619, 704
 Marshall Plan 2, 53, 150, 775
 Martin, Joseph W(illiam), Jr. 96, 129, 271, 273, 466–468, 625–626
 Martin, William McChesney 383, 468–470, 682
 mass-democracy, Herberg (Will) on 296 massive retaliation policy 57
 “Matter of Fact,” (syndicated column) 16–17
 Matthews, J(oseph) B(rown) 194, 270–271, 470–471, 479, 485, 597
 Maw, Herbert B. 421
 Maybank, Burnet R. 767
 McCabe, Thomas 468
 McCarran, Patrick A(nthony) 42, 53, 118, 403, 471–473, 476, 478, 501, 802. See also Senate Internal Security Subcommittee
 McCarran Act. See Internal Security Act of 1950
 McCarran-Walter Immigration Act of 1952 103, 424, 472, 580, 726, 802–803
 McCarthy, Eugene J(oseph) 231, 239, 338, 361, 473–474, 513, 622, 770
 McCarthy, Joseph R(aymond) x, 474–484, 475. See also Army-McCarthy hearings
 Bohlen (Charles) nomination and 53–54, 718
 on China, fall of 791
 on communist infiltration of CIA 114 debate with McCarthy (Eugene) 473 and Declaration of Conscience 7, 711
 Dulles (John Foster) and 170
 Eisenhower (Milton) and 205, 329
 Eisenhower's dislike of x, 194, 477–478
 Eisenhower's management of x–xi, li, 5–6, 194–195, 345, 406, 477–481, 529, 557, 596
 and election of 1950 39, 91
 and election of 1952 372
 on exports to Soviet satellite nations 320 and FCC loyalty investigations 156
 Fiedler (Leslie) on 216
 on Geneva Summit of 1955 99
 International Information Administration investigation 281–282
 Johnson (Lyndon) and 358
 libel suit against Benton (William) 39 loss of support xi, 151, 271–272
 Morrow (Edward) broadcast on 543
 Nixon and x, 481, 483, 557, 729
 opposition and critics 39, 63, 89, 104, 106, 126, 181, 218, 232–233, 293–294, 296, 312, 315, 322, 336, 343, 346, 366–367, 424, 433, 448, 481–482, 499, 512, 527–528, 534–536, 553, 597, 605, 607, 630, 665–666, 671, 679–680, 686, 710, 718, 737, 748, 763, 821, 840
 on Pauling (Linus) 587
 Peress (Irving) case and xi, 480–481, 594–595
 press and 16, 260, 591, 630, 665–666
 and Republican Right 170
 and Schine case 102, 195, 295, 346, 376, 481–482, 538, 729, 815, 847
 Senate censure of xi, 68–69, 101, 151, 195, 207–208, 214, 218–219, 233, 294, 343, 358, 372–373, 401–402, 424, 483–484, 515, 538, 680, 708, 711, 726, 809–810, 817, 821, 847
 Senate investigations of 287, 476–477 and Sobeloff (Simon) nomination 717 and State Department, accusations against 118, 138, 403, 470, 476, 501, 694, 777, 791
 on Stevenson (Adlai) 732
 Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections investigation 293–294
 supporters 60, 65, 68–69, 79, 85, 150–151, 178, 251, 300, 310, 352–354, 371–373, 401, 403, 405, 408, 414, 421, 435, 470–471, 476, 501, 537, 707, 720, 816, 843 tactics of vii, 477
 Taft (Robert) and 752–753
 Viereck (Peter) on 789
 McCarthyism 24, 32–33, 46, 194, 479, 484, 578, 732
 McClellan, John L(ittle) 32, 111, 157, 249, 252, 265, 307–308, 338–339, 346, 376, 479, 484–488, 663, 847
 McClellan Committee. See Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor Management Field
 McCloy, John J(ay) 488–490
 McCone, John A(lex) 490–491, 569
 McCormack, Edward J., Jr. 493
 McCormack, John W(illiam) 8–9, 372–373, 491–493
 McCormick, Robert 151
 McDonald, David J(ohn) 249, 493–495
 McElroy, Neil H(olsler) 6, 62, 241, 292, 495–496
 McFarland, Ernest W. 251, 356, 478
 McGovern, George 239, 268, 507, 562, 635, 686–687, 842
 McGranery, James P. 118, 526
 McGrath, J. Howard 526, 580, 777
 McKay, Charles 222
 McKay, Douglas 5, 496–498, 692
 McKeithen, John 531
 McKeldin, Theodore Roosevelt 91, 498–500, 715
 McKellar, Kenneth 256
 McLaurin, George 795
McLaurin v. Oklahoma (1950) 464, 521, 628–629, 795
 McLeod, R(obert) W(alter) Scott 127, 170, 500–502
 McNamara, Patrick V(incent) 214–215, 266, 268, 294, 405, 502–503, 826
 McNamara, Robert S. 226, 242, 426, 636, 641, 793
 Mead, Margaret 391
 Meany, George 32, 43, 131, 158, 249, 308, 339, 444, 503–508, 617–618, 632–633
 Medaris, John B. 61–62
 Medicaid, opposition to 719 medical research, support for 301
 Medicare xiv, 9, 43, 300, 336–337, 360, 503, 519, 653, 704, 719
 Meek, Joe x–xi
 Mencken, H. L. 706
 Mercer, Lucy 654
 Merchant, Livingston T(allmadge) 508
 Meredith, James H. 375, 781
 Merton, Robert K. 434
 Metcalf, Lee 508–509, 714
 Meyer, Eugene 260, 787
 Meyer, Frank 790
 Meyer, Katharine 260
 Meyner, Robert B(aumle) 509–510, 826
 middlebrow culture 453–454
 Middle East
 Alsop (Joseph) on 16
 postcolonial power vacuum in xlv
 U.S. policy in xlvii, 171, 175–176, 198, 374, 655
 (See also Eisenhower Doctrine)
 Middle East Resolution xlv–xlvii
 Mikoyan, Anastas 506, 633
 Milam, J. W. 770
 military aid 58–59, 225, 262, 320, 548, 655
 military-industrial complex 292
 Eisenhower on xxv, 201, 912–915
 Taft (Robert) on 753
 military spending. See defense budget military strategy. See defense policy
 Miller, Arthur 511, 511–513, 621
 Miller, John E. 49
 Miller, Merle 779

Miller v. California (1973) 64, 83
 Millikin, Eugene D(onald) 245, 513–515
 Mills, C(charles) W(right) 515–517, 578
 Mills, Wilbur D(aigh) xiv, 96, 383, 517–519
Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940) 160, 228–229 minimum wage xiv, 12, 27, 43, 154 efforts to extend coverage 358, 503, 524
 in New York State 647
 opposition to 233, 251, 266, 280, 310, 358, 625, 709, 727, 768, 828
 supporters of 460, 503, 524, 586, 623, 657–658, 766, 776
 minority set-asides 465
 Minton, Sherman (“Shay”) 63, 519–521
Miranda v. Arizona (1966) 277, 807
 Mise, Ludwig von 288
 missile gap 17, 196, 217, 241, 243, 347, 359, 374, 727, 747–748 missile programs 17, 61–62, 164, 239–242, 386, 397, 490, 495, 610, 782, 842, 908–909, 911
 Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) 618
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada (1938) 463, 628
 Mitchell, Clarence, M., Jr 304, 521–523, 823
 Mitchell, James P(aul) 68, 343, 388, 523–525, 559
 Mitchell, John 111
 Mitchell, Stephen A(rnold) 95, 231, 525–527, 556
 M & M Agreement 68
 Mohammed Reza Pahlavi (shah of Iran) 656
 Mollenhoff, Clark 376 monetary policy 468–469, 682–683
 Monroe, Marilyn 512–513
 Monroney, A(lmer) S(tillwell) Mike 113, 527–528, 623, 734
 Montgomery, Bernard L. 186
 Montgomery bus boycott 1, 48, 355, 387–388, 574, 583, 674, 822
 Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA) 1, 387, 574–575, 702–703
 Montgomery Ward & Co. 25–26, 836
 Morgan, Gerald D(emuth) 177–178, 455, 528–530, 532, 695, 814
 Morgan, Iwan xii
 Morgan, Thomas 569

Morgenthau, Henry 488
 Morrison, deLesseps S(tory) 139, 530–531
 Morrow, E. Frederic xvii, xxi, 193, 531–534, 596–597, 808
 Morse, Wayne (Lyman) 7, 22, 178, 305, 424, 447, 483–484, 534–535, 548, 689, 713, 809–810
 Morton, Rogers C. B. 536
 Morton, Thruston B(allard) 38, 533, 535–537
 Moss, Annie Lee 481, 748
 Mossadeq, Mohammed xxxix, 167, 171, 191, 324–325, 656
 Moulder, Morgan M. 280, 688
 Mundt, Karl E(arl) vii, xi, 129, 133, 150–151, 409, 480, 482, 503, 537–538, 597, 633, 729, 846
 Muñoz Marín, Luis 538–540
 Murder, Incorporated 18
 Murphy, Frank 520, 824
 Murphy, Robert D(aniel) 540–542

Murray, James E. 509
 Murray, Philip 247–248, 493–494
 Murray, Thomas 279, 317
 Murray-Patman Act 581
 Murrow, Edward R(oscoe) 282, 481, 542–544, 544, 722
 Muskie, Edmund 10
 Muste, A(braham) J(hannes) 320, 544–546
 Mutual Security Act of 1951 256, 460, 797, 826
 “My Day” (syndicated column) 654
 My Lai massacre 293
 Myrdal, Gunnar 80

N

NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) anti-NAACP laws 314, 465, 702, 772–773
 in Chicago 141
 and Democratic platform 632–633 focus on voting rights 522
 leadership 28–29, 304, 463–466, 521–523, 532, 822–824
 Legal Defense and Educational Fund 463
 and Montgomery bus boycott 387
 and school desegregation 14–15, 28, 49, 95, 449–450, 619, 771, 837–838
 Spingarn Medal 81, 522, 644
 and Till (Emmett) case 771
 and union discrimination 507
 Nader, Ralph 70–71
 Nagasaki 425, 567, 775, 781
 Nagy, Imre 195

NASA (National Aeronautics and Space Administration) 62, 164–165, 197, 384, 386, 394, 397, 842
 Nasser, Gamal Abdel xliii–xlv, xlvii, 11–12, 171, 175, 195, 656
 Nasserism xliii, xlv, xlvii–xlviii, 198
 Nathan, Robert (Roy) 547–548
 National Aeronautics and Space Administration. See NASA
 National Aeronautics and Space Council (NASC) 397
 National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. See NAACP
 National Association for the Advancement of White People 52, 829
 National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy (SANE) 130, 545, 763
 National Council for Industrial Peace 425
 National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. (NCCC) 47–48
 National Defense Act of 1920 711
 National Defense Education Act of 1958 xvii, 28, 220, 224, 261, 301, 840
 National Defense Research Committee (NDRC) 90, 124, 397
 National Endangered Species List 538
 National Farmers Union (NFU) 549, 585–586, 701
 National Grange 549–550, 701
 National Industrial Recovery Act (NIRA) 384, 427, 488, 627
 National Institutes of Health 456
 Nationalist China. See Taiwan
 National Labor Relations Act of 1935 (Wagner Act) 384
 National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) 248, 405
 National Maritime Union (NMU) 131–132
 National Negro Congress 617 national park system 498, 692–693
 National Recovery Administration 427
National Review (magazine) 79–80, 85–86, 106, 182, 296, 394, 430, 614, 664, 789–790
 National School Lunch Act of 1946 670
 National Science Foundation 90
 National Security Act of 1947 166
 National Security Council 335, 396, 438, 557, 743

Native Americans, policy on 251, 498, 693, 809
 NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) admission of West Germany xxvi, 147, 171, 269
 creation of 2, 775
 Eisenhower as commander of xxii, 186–187, 596
 European commitment to 269
 Hoover (Herbert) on 323
 nuclear arms and 563–564
 opposition and critics 352, 751, 753
 program of 733–734
 Ridgway as commander of 637 and scientific information sharing 490, 911
 staff 254–255
 supporters of 147, 563
 U.S. ambassador to 246
 natural resources policy 19, 192, 456, 693
 NBC network 680–681
 Negro American Labor Council (NALC) 618
Negro and the Schools, The (Ford Foundation) 25
 Nehru, Jawharlal 58, 69
 Nelson, Gaylord 821
 Neuberger, Richard (Lewis) 535, 548–549
 new conservatism 686, 788–789
 New Deal
 Burnham (James) on 85
 continuation of ix, xii, xiii–xiv, 188, 191 expansion of xiv, xvii, li–lii, 200
 Hoover (Herbert) and 323
 opposition and critics 22, 93–94, 140, 214, 244, 310, 319, 323, 407, 433, 466, 471, 642, 699, 709, 750–751, 762, 820
 supporters 141, 165, 262, 520, 527, 565, 623, 655, 794
 Supreme Court and 46
 New Federalism 562
 New Left xxi–xxiii, 322, 327, 516–517, 687, 737
 New Look defense policy xxiv, xlvii, 190 architects of 611–612
 Dulles (John Foster) on 172–173 goals of 394
 Navy role in 241
 opposition and critics 3, 77–78, 84, 174, 196, 233, 242–243, 336, 370, 373, 394–395, 433–434, 612, 637–638, 646, 672, 727, 732, 747–748, 757–758, 781, 792, 830

- supporters 84, 251, 269, 397, 448, 610, 830
 tests of 173–176
 New Republicanism 417–418
 Newsom, Herschel D (avis) 549–550
 New Thought tradition 589
 New York City 431, 820
 New York Committee for Democratic Voters 144, 217, 425
 New York State 423, 504, 647–648
 New York Stock Exchange 234–235, 468
New York Times, The xxxiv, 406, 548, 629–630, 676–677, 703, 744
New York Times v. Sullivan (1964) 584, 703
 Ngo Dinh Diem xlii, 121–122, 167, 174, 411, 416, 449, 461, 576, 720
 Nguyen Van Hinh 122
 Nicaragua, U.S. aid to xli
 Niebuhr, Reinhold 259, 295–296, 387, 392, 550–553, 590, 657, 714
 Nixon, E. D. 387, 574
 Nixon, Richard M (ilhou) 553–563, 554
 advisers to 210, 396, 613, 649–650
 agricultural policy 36, 227
 appointments by 87, 134, 210, 242, 275, 278, 303, 564, 650, 761
 and California politics 71, 398–399, 408
 calls for resignation of 41
 Checkers speech 110, 147, 188, 556–557, 649
 and civil rights 522, 532–533, 559, 771
 Clement (Frank) on 117
 on Cuba I
 and desegregation 519
 domestic policy 562
 economic policies 562
 Eisenhower on 200–201
 enemies list 594
 and Ford vice presidency 225
 foreign policy 348, 444, 562
 friends and colleagues 259, 590, 649
 Hoffa pardon 308
 and Internal Security Act 537, 555
 and King (Martin Luther) 388–389, 533, 559, 674
 Latin American visit (1958) 199, 459, 558 loyalty investigations and 761 and McCarthy (Joseph) x, 481, 483, 557, 729, 810, 846
 opposition and critics 18, 29, 408–409, 420, 431, 467–468, 534, 555, 558, 560, 594, 666, 687, 724–725, 734, 779, 807
 pardon of 225
 political career of 9–10, 38, 69, 72, 87, 110–111, 116, 147, 188, 195, 200–201, 225, 253, 272, 297, 338, 348, 372, 374, 402, 448, 474, 526, 533, 556–557, 560–562, 647, 724–725, 731–732, 768 as president 562
 and Republican Party strategy 593
 resignation 225, 253, 259, 562
 and steelworkers strike 494, 524, 559
 supporters of 507
 Supreme Court nominations 43, 82, 258, 285, 289–290, 522, 622, 807
 and Taft-Hartley Act 178, 814
 and U-2 incident 603
 as vice president 148, 557–561
 and Vietnam War 112, 562, 829
 visit to Soviet Union 558–559
 Watergate 18, 253, 259, 278, 327, 507, 562, 598, 690, 727, 838
 and White House tapes 83
 Nixon-Mundt bill 555
 Nobel Peace Prize 390, 396, 588
 Nobel Prize 42, 81, 185, 289, 586–587, 691
 Nobusuke, Kishi 452
 Non-Partisan League (NPL) 412–413, 415
 Norstad, Lauris 563–564
 North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 775, 827, 843
 North Atlantic Treaty Organization. See NATO nuclear arms
 atomic bombing of Japan 425, 488, 567, 775, 781 debate on, among nuclear scientists 759
 as deterrent xxv, xxxvi–xxxviii, 169, 394–395 (See also New Look defense policy) Eisenhower on xxvi, 908–909
 massive retaliation policy 57, 172
 NATO and 563–564
 radioactive fallout from 319, 587, 760
 Soviets and xxxvii–xxxviii, 776
 supporters of 57, 114, 217
 tactical 564, 568, 783
 nuclear disarmament. See also disarmament advocates of 185, 545–546, 586–588 efforts toward 227–228 nuclear power merchant vessels 55–56
 naval vessels 571, 635–636
 supporters of 318, 581, 586, 760
 nuclear test ban efforts to negotiate xxxi–xxxiii, 183, 199, 228, 257, 298, 386, 725, 741 investigations on impact of 41–42
 opposition to 490, 741, 760
 supporters of 257, 397, 655, 692, 724, 733, 763 nuclear test ban movement, communist infiltration in 154 Nuclear Test Ban Treaty of 1963 348, 442, 758 nuclear testing xxxii–xxxiii, 13, 130, 397, 587, 600, 647, 691–692, 741, 842 nuclear war, realities of, Eisenhower's decision to downplay 345 nullification doctrine 264
 Nuremberg trials 349, 489, 667
- O
- Oberth, Hermann 60
 objectivism 614
 obscenity efforts to combat 720
 in literature 247
 Supreme Court on 63–64, 83, 161, 276, 465, 735–736
 and U.S. mail 746
 Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 827 oceanographic research 456–457
 O'Dwyer, William 18, 128, 799
 OECD (Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development) 148
 Office of Civilian Defense 654
 Office of Scientific Research and Development (OSRD) 90, 124
 Office of Strategic Services (OSS) 76, 166, 415, 488
 O'Hara, Joseph 688
 oil
 Iranian seizure of Anglo-Iranian Oil Company xxxix, 324–325, 656 offshore, state v. federal jurisdiction over 378, 497, 534, 619, 623, 698, 704, 711, 816
 Suez Crisis and xliii–xlv
- oil and gas industry, efforts to deregulate 280
 Oliphant, Charles 777
 O'Mahoney, Joseph C (christopher) 565–566
 O'Neill, C. William 152
 O'Neill, William L. xv
 "On the Right" (syndicated column) 80
 Open Skies initiative xxvi, 21, 191, 602, 646, 724, 899–900
 Operation Ajax 656
 Operation Mongoose 416
 Oppenheimer, J. Robert 566–570
 friends and colleagues 759
 on full disclosure of nuclear war realities 345
 Murray (Edward) interview of 544 security clearance of 16–17, 20, 41, 90, 98, 124, 141, 185, 194, 568–570, 691, 740, 759–760
 supporters of 41, 240, 686
 Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) 148 Organization of American States xlviii, xlix, l, 531 organized crime in Alabama 583
 criminal figures 18–19, 128, 243–244
 Hoover (J. Edgar) and 327
 investigations of 64–65, 243–244, 316–317, 366, 803
 in Louisiana 440
 in New York 59–60, 144, 648
 Tammany Hall and 144
 unions and 64–65, 157–158, 165–166, 208, 306–308, 310, 376, 485–486, 504, 633
 Oswald, Lee Harvey 807, 840
 Oxbow Dam 497
- P
- Pace, Frank, Jr. 571–572
 pacifism 544–546, 551, 673–674, 762
 Packard, Vance (Oakley) 572–573
 Pahlavi, Mohammed Reza. See Mohammed Reza Pahlavi
 Paley, William F. 722
 Palmer, A. Mitchell 325
 Palmer raids 325
 Panama Canal, anti-American riots (1959) 508
 Pan-Arabism xliii
 Paris Accords (1954) xxvi
 Paris Summit of 1960 xxxiii–xxxv, 199–200, 603, 766
 Parker, John J. 771–772, 822
 Parker, Mack 120
 Parks, Rosa 1, 387, 573–575

- Parsons, J(ames) Graham 575–576
 Parsons, Talcott 576–579
 Passman, Otto E(rnest) 579–580
 Pastore, John O(rlando) 319, 580–581
 Pathet Lao 71–72, 575
 Patman, (John) (William) Wright 356, 469, 581–583
 Patterson, Hugh B., Jr. 25
 Patterson, John (Malcolm) 223, 583–584
 Patteson, Okey 94
 Patton, George S. 186
 Patton, James G(eorge) 584–586
 Pauling, Linus C(arl) 154, 167, 569, 586–588
 Paul VI (pope) 720–721
 Payne, Frederick 129, 250
 peace activists 130. See also pacifism
 Peace Corps 337, 655
 Peale, Norman Vincent 296, 588–590
 Pearl Harbor, investigation of 214
 Pearson, Drew (Andrew) (Russell) 156, 590–592, 641, 688, 743
 Peirce, Neal 107
 Pelle, William Dudley 706
 Pendergast, Tom 774
Pennsylvania v. Nelson (1956) 229, 354, 520, 628, 806
 Pepper, Claude 703
 Percy, Charles H(arting) 592–594, 647
 Peress, Irving xi, 479–480, 594–595, 729, 845–847
 Perkins, Francis 131, 534
 Permanent Investigations Subcommittee (Senate). See also Army-McCarthy hearings; McCarthy, Joseph R(aymond)
 Army investigations 4, 102, 150–151, 194–195, 295, 479–480, 482, 537–538, 543, 594–595, 597, 684, 728–729, 815, 846–847 attacks on 232 government corruption investigations 111, 130–131
 loyalty investigations 211, 346, 478–482
 and Matthews (J.B.) accusations against Protestant clergy 194, 270–271, 470–471
 members 102, 117–119, 150–151, 537–538, 597
 organized crime investigations 18–19, 244
 Peress (Irving) case xi, 479–480, 594–595, 729, 845–847
 Schine (David) and 684
 union investigations 32, 64–65, 485–487
 Perón, Juan Domingo 59
 Perrow Commission 15
 Persons, Wilton B(urton) 277, 406, 501, 528, 532–533, 595–597, 596–597, 729
 Peters, John Plunnet 74, 82, 716–717
Peters v. Hobby (1955) 520, 628
 Pfost, Gracie 291
 Phan Huy Quat 122
 Philadelphia 113, 149
 Phillips, William 452
 Phoumi Nosavan 71–72, 575–576
 Pius XII (pope) 720
Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) 795, 805
 Poland, unrest in xxvi, 195
 Polaris missile system 241
 polio vaccine xvii, 301, 304–305, 677–679 political stance of Eisenhower xviii, xii poll taxes 105, 180, 290, 301, 350, 565, 689, 726, 749, 766, 776 pollution, efforts to combat 220
 Poole, De Witt C. 685
 Poor People's Campaign 2, 390
 “Port Huron Statement, The” 517
 Potsdam agreements 262, 358
 Potter, Charles E(dward) 102, 482, 597–598, 846
 Potter, David M(orris) 598–599
 Poulson, Norris 599–600
 Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr. xvii, 601–602
 civil rights activism 690
 cocktails with governor of Alabama 222 corruption allegations against 592 denial of subcommittee chair to 27 and desegregation of armed forces 20
 and school desegregation 28, 141, 154, 193, 304, 522, 529, 601, 764
 Power, Thomas 242
Power of Positive Thinking, The (Peale) 589
 Powers, Francis Gary xxxiii–xxxiv, 602–604, 605
 Prayer Pilgrimage 388
President Is Calling, The (Eisenhower) 205–206
 President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization (PACGO) 204, 646
 President's Committee on Civil Rights 670, 776
 President's Science Advisory Committee (PSAC) xxviii, 41, 386, 397, 691, 841 press communists in 179, 452–453
 FBI leaks to 143
 McCarthy (Joseph) and 477
 Pressman, Lee 248
 Prettyman, E(lijah) Barrett 604–605
 price controls, supporters of 460, 671
 Pritchett, C. Herman 629, 794
 Pritchett, Laurie 389 privatization, in Eisenhower administration 22, 78
 Production and Marketing Administration (PMA) 35
 Profaci, Joseph 19
Profiles in Courage (Kennedy) 373
 Progressive Party 645
 Project Argus 842
 Project Vista 568
 Provenzano, Tony 307
 Proxmire, (Edward) William 258, 406, 605–607 psychological defenses for criminals 30
 Public Buildings Service (PBS) 743 public health policies xvi–xvii, 192–193, 220, 300–301. See also health insurance public housing xvi, 193, 218, 351, 384, 466, 475, 492, 518, 549, 562, 580, 689, 709, 751
 Public Law 480 336
 Public Law 600 539
 public power. See also Dixon-Yates contract; Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA)
 Eisenhower on 192, 497
 opposition to 89, 129, 411, 768, 841
 supporters of 111, 117, 207, 256, 319, 346, 365, 414, 424, 509, 534, 566 public works projects 93, 102–103, 193
 Puerto Rico 538–540
 Pugwash Conferences 183, 587
 Pulitzer, Ralph 406
 Pulitzer Prize 25, 315–316, 370, 373, 407, 511, 676, 685, 687, 790
 Pumpkin Papers 105
 Purcell, Edward 842
 Pusey, Nathan M(arsh) 607–608
- Q
- Quarles, Donald A(ubrey) 240, 609, 609–610
 Quemoy and Matsu islands xxxv–xxxviii, 3, 31, 57, 142, 174, 176, 190, 198, 254, 269, 354, 401, 415, 434, 559, 612–613, 620, 637, 718, 732, 783
 Quimby, Phineas 589
 Quinn, T. Vincent 662
 quiz-show scandal 157, 281, 722–723, 785–786
- R
- Rabb, Maxwell 20, 81, 111, 532
 Rabi, Isidor xxxi race riots, in 1960s 499–500 racial discrimination. See also desegregation; segregation in immigration law 802 pay differentials 463
 reverse discrimination 356
 Roosevelt's ban on, in government employment 617 in unions 339, 506–507, 617–618
 Raddock, Max 338
 Radford, Arthur W(illiam) 57, 172, 174, 611–613, 612, 637, 712, 757, 783
 Radio Free Europe 344–345, 682
 Radulovich, Milo 543
 Rahv, Philip 452
 Rainach, William E. 440
 Rand, Ayn 394, 613–615
 Randall, Clarence B(elden) 615–617
 Randall Commission 89, 616, 797
 Rand Corporation 236
 Randolph, A(sa) Philip xxi, 388–389, 507, 617–618, 673, 823
 Rangel, Charles B. 602
 Rankin, J(ames) Lee xix, 619–620
 Rankin, John E. 365–366, 476
 Rankin, Karl L(ott) 620–621
 Rarick, Donald 494
 Raskin, A. H. 57
 Rauh, Joseph L(ouis) 621–622
 Rayburn, Samuel T(aliaferro) 357, 622–626
 and desegregation 698–699
 and election of 1960 359
 and foreign aid 579–580
 friends and colleagues 21, 52, 277, 280, 356, 491–492, 517, 527
 and House reform 710, 793
 House staffing by 8 and Legislative Oversight committee 134, 156–157, 280, 688 Martin (Joseph) and 467
 on Medicare 43
 opposition and critics 9, 92, 217, 623–624, 778
 and Texas politics 839
 RCA (Radio Corporation of America) 680–682, 754

- Reagan, Ronald W. 225, 265, 348, 381, 396, 409, 430, 474, 606, 615, 692, 753, 809
- Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act 53, 101, 125, 148, 518, 616, 624, 627, 797
- Redlich, Norman 353
- Reece, B. Carroll 291, 669
- Reed, Daniel A(lden) 12, 96, 467, 514, 626–627
- Reed, Stanley F(orman) xx, 260, 627–629, 818
- Refugee Relief Act of 1953 127, 502, 769, 802
- Rehnquist, William H. 83, 606
- Reles, Abe (“Kid Twist”) 18
- Remington, William 118, 621
- Republicanism, modern 10, 417–418, 814, 817
- Republican National Committee 10, 271–272, 593, 596, 641–642, 689, 696, 745, 808–809, 813
- Republican Party and black vote 533
divisions within xxiii–xxiv, 188–189, 191, 194
Eisenhower’s leadership of xi–xii, li factions within 145–146 foreign policy plank in 1952 170 political strategists 109–111 right wing of, Eisenhower on 191
- Reston, James xxvii, 629–631, 653, 830
- Reuther, Walter P. 5, 31–32, 100, 132–133, 167, 376, 404–406, 444, 486, 504, 538, 631–633, 651, 658, 830
- Revolt of the Admirals 84, 611
- Revolutionary Action Movement 824
- Reynolds v. Simms* (1964) 276, 807
- Rhee, Syngman 114, 142, 162, 171, 284, 720
- Ribicoff, Abraham A(lexander) 40, 58, 89, 634–635
- Richards, James P. 55
- Rickover, Hyman G(eorge) 347, 635–636
- Ridgway, Matthew B(unker) 283, 612, 636–638, 672, 757, 832, 846
- rights of defendant, Supreme Court on 115–116, 161, 229, 276–277, 520–521, 735, 780, 807, 818
- right-to-work laws 67, 152, 177–178, 208, 252, 398, 402, 419, 425, 440, 506, 524, 695, 708, 814
- Riseman, David 638–639
- Rivers, L(ucius) Mendel 293, 640–641
- Roberts, Chalmers 173
- Roberts, C(harles) Wesley 641–642
- Robertson, A(bsalom) Willis 642–644
- Robertson, Walter 613
- Robeson, Paul B(ustill) 211, 644–645
- Robinson, Jackie 106, 388
- Robinson, William 186
- Robinson-Patman Act of 1936 581
- Rochester Plan 223
- Rockefeller, Laurence S. 819
- Rockefeller, Nelson A(ldrich) 645–648
Dulles (John Foster) and 170
and education policy 224
friends and colleagues 330
and PACGO 204
political career 253, 279, 431, 500, 560, 593
Rockefeller Brothers Fund grants 395
supporters of 272, 399, 536, 690, 728
as vice president 648
- Rockefeller, Winthrop 212
- Rockefeller Brothers Fund 646–647
- Rockefeller Foundation 391–392, 668–669
- Rogers, William P(ierce) xvi, 28–29, 147, 354, 559, 619, 648–650, 729, 771
- Romney, George W(ilcken) 266, 650–652, 836
- Romney, Mitt 651
- Rooney, John J(ames) 651–652
- Roosevelt, (Anna) Eleanor 3, 144, 217, 327, 425, 544–545, 601, 622, 653–655, 734, 778, 801
- Roosevelt, Franklin D. agricultural policies 700–701
appointments by 58, 219, 278, 356, 534, 627, 646, 704
and civil rights 81, 617 court-packing plan 262, 471, 484, 492, 565, 669, 736, 774, 794 extramarital affair 654 federal judicial appointments 520
friends and colleagues 423
and Japanese-American internment 203 and mass media 296
opposition and critics 445, 642, 669–670, 749, 813
political career 91, 145, 654
secret agreement with Soviet Union 65–66
supporters of 256, 293, 300, 356, 427–428, 457, 520, 527, 670
- Supreme Court
appointments 94, 228, 349, 628, 824 war powers 26
at Yalta vii, x
- Roosevelt, Franklin D., Jr. 55, 144, 279, 351, 787
- Roosevelt, Kermit, Jr. 11, 655–656
- Rose, Alex 165, 656–658
- Roselli, John 44
- Rosenberg, Ethel G(reenglass) vii, 74, 118, 161, 185, 215, 326, 345, 512, 658, 658–661, 661–662, 714, 763, 777, 795–796
- Rosenberg, Julius vii, 74, 118, 161, 185, 215, 326, 345, 512, 658–659, 661–662, 713–714, 763, 777, 795–796
- Ross, Robert Tripp 662–663
- Rossiter, Clinton L(awrence), III 663–665
- Roth v. U.S.* (1957) 63–64, 83, 161, 276
- Rovere, Richard H(alworthy) 489, 665–667, 817
- Rovital, Maurice 422
- Rowe, James H(enry), Jr. 667–668
- Royko, Mike 136
- Rules Committee 273, 623, 625–627, 709–710
- Rural Development Program (RDP) 37
- Rusk, Dean 236, 668–669
- Russell, Bertrand 185, 322
- Russell, Richard B(revard), Jr. 107, 137, 356–357, 527, 603, 669–673, 731, 767–768
- Rustin, Bayard 387–388, 545, 673–675
- Rutledge, Wiley B. 520
- Ryan, Joseph 504
- S
- Sabin, Albert 677–679
- Sacco, Nicola 228
- St. Clair, James 816
- Saint Lawrence Seaway xiv, 193
opposition to 65, 93, 137, 280, 411, 467, 518
supporters of 48, 150, 335, 372, 515, 643, 769, 815
- Salisbury, Harrison E(vans) 676–677
- Salk, Jonas E(dward) 304, 677–679, 678
- Saltonstall, Leverett 679–680, 813
- Samuels, Bernard 149
- SANE. See National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy
- Sarant, Alfred 659, 713–714
- Sarnoff, David 680–682
- satellites
Soviet. See Sputnik
U.S. 62
- Saturday Review* 129–130
- Saulnier, Raymond J(oseph) 682–683
- Schechter Poultry Corp. v. U.S.* (1935) 232, 488, 627
- Schine, G(erard) David 683–685
and anti-Semitism 424
censorship tour of State Department libraries 118, 194, 375–376, 479, 528, 684 criticism of 218
Eisenhower on 194
preferential treatment accusations against xi, 4, 102, 118–119, 178, 195, 294–295, 346, 481–482, 597, 729, 815, 847
- Schlesinger, Arthur M(eier), Jr. 216, 288, 321, 552, 635, 685–687
- school desegregation. See also Brown v. Board of Education busing 82–83, 292, 717
Eisenhower and ix, 213, 418, 450, 905–907 federal aid to schools and xvii, 28, 141, 154, 193, 304, 522, 529, 601–602, 764, 809, 826
federal judiciary and 313–314, 355–356, 717, 771–772, 780–781, 837–838 federal troops, use of 25, 28, 50, 407, 487, 499, 773
Flemming (Arthur) and 220
Goldwater on 253
Jackson (Robert) on 350
in Kentucky 107
King (Martin Luther) on 388
Krock (Arthur) on 407
in Little Rock, Arkansas xxi, 25, 28–29, 49–50, 76, 78, 197, 213–214, 230, 264–265, 290–291, 306, 464–465, 487, 499, 619, 649–650, 773, 905–907 on military bases xviii, 304, 522
opposition to 93, 180, 583, 671, 707, 726
in Alabama 222, 355–356, 449–450, 583–584, 702–703
in Arkansas 25, 28, 50, 197, 212–214, 264, 290–291, 306 in Florida 123
in Georgia 264, 756
in Louisiana 139–140, 378, 440, 837–838
in Mississippi 119–120
in North Carolina 305–306
in South Carolina 95, 773

- in Texas 137–138, 698–699
in Virginia 14–16, 29, 93, 313–314, 721–722
supporters of 606, 737
Supreme Court on 463–465
in Tennessee 117
school segregation, Ford Foundation report on 25
Schriever, Bernard 240
Schuyler, Karl 514
Schwartz, Bernard 111, 156–157, 280, 455, 592, 687–689
Science Advisory Committee 384, 386
SCLC. See Southern Christian Leadership Conference
Scott, Hugh D(oggett) 351, 420, 689–691
Seaborg, Glenn T(theodore) 691–692
SEATO. See Southeast Asia Treaty Organization
Seaton, Frederick A(ndrew) 692–693
Seay, Solomon S. 48
Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) 836
Securities Exchange Act (1954) 89
See It Now (TV program) 542–544, 722 segregation. See also desegregation
Clark (Tom) on 116
Fourteenth Amendment and 140
opposition to 498, 536, 834
Reed (Stanley) on 629
in schools, Ford Foundation report on 25 and states' rights 95, 123
supporters of 179, 208, 233, 246, 264, 292, 530–531, 583–584, 669, 718, 726, 767–768, 772, 839
Selassie, Haile 601
Selective Service Act of 1940 537, 710
Selective Service Act of 1948 12
Selma-to-Montgomery civil rights march 390, 575, 823
Senate
 filibuster rules, efforts to amend 99, 112, 126, 159, 257, 285, 336, 359, 368, 503, 528, 534, 549, 719, 822, 826 seniority system, reform of 357
Senate Appropriations Committee 485, 670, 749–750
Senate Finance Committee 441, 514, 828
Senate Government Operations Committee 211, 346, 375–376, 754
Senate Internal Security Subcommittee investigations into communist influence 60, 73, 131, 155, 179, 281–282, 327, 353–354, 403, 471–472, 545, 587–588, 604, 791 legislation proposed by 154–155
 opposition to 185, 294, 353
Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly 104, 153, 156, 367, 651
Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor Management Field 32, 133, 166, 208, 244, 249, 252, 265, 307–308, 338–339, 343, 376, 405, 412, 486–487, 503, 505–506, 538, 633
Senior Advisory Group on Vietnam 489–490, 638
Service, John S(ewart) 63, 138, 403, 693–695
sex research (Kinsey Report) 391–392
Sexual Behavior in the Human Female (Kinsey) 391–392
Sexual Behavior in the Human Male (Kinsey) 391–392
Shanley, Bernard M(ichael) 177–178, 529, 532, 695–696, 728, 814
Shannon, William V. li, 202
Share Our Wealth movement 706
Sharfman, Herbert 156
Sharp, Dudley C. 48
Sheen, Fulton J(ohn) 296, 446, 589, 696–697
Shelley v. Kraemer (1948) 463, 521, 795
Shepard, Alan B. 62
Shields, Julius 619
Shipstead, Henrik 769
Shivers, Allan 15, 137, 358, 378, 623–624, 698–699, 839
Short, Dewey 699–700
Shuman, Charles B(aker) 700–701
Shuttlesworth, Fred L(ee) 701–703
Sipuel v. Oklahoma State Board of Regents (1948) 463–464, 628
Sirhan, Sirhan 377 sit-ins, for civil rights 389, 677
“Six Pillars of Peace, The” (Dulles) 169
Small Business Administration (SBA) 581
Smathers, George A(rmistead) 124, 703–704
Smelser, Neil 578
Smith, Alfred E. 423
Smith, Clyde Harold 710
Smith, Earl E. T. 704–706
Smith, Gerald L(yman) K(enneth) 706–707
Smith, H. Alexander 707–708
Smith, Howard W(orth) 625, 708–710, 793, 806
Smith, Margaret Chase 7, 414, 476, 534, 708, 710–711
Smith, Merriman 271
Smith, Walter Bedell x, 173–174, 401, 478, 711–713
Smith Act of 1940 63, 74, 88, 115, 154–155, 321, 709 prosecutions under 326, 476, 520, 619
 Supreme Court on 161, 276, 327, 350, 354, 628, 806
Smith-Connally Wartime Labor Disputes Act (1943) 709
Smith v. Allwright (1944) 463, 628–629
Smylie, Robert E. 713
SNCC. See Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee
Snyder, John 468
Sobell, Morton 659, 713–715
Sobeloff, Simon E(rnest) xxii, 74, 82, 89, 198, 289, 314, 499, 566, 643, 715–717, 716
Socialists 32, 43, 165, 247, 282, 288, 432, 434, 442, 452, 545–546, 551–552, 617–618, 631, 762–763, 776
Social Security broadening of xiv, 192, 251, 268, 360, 441, 586, 641, 709, 776 health insurance for elderly through 294, 336, 351, 383, 505, 519, 606, 625–626, 727, 826, 828 reform of 133, 223, 246 social unionism 505 social welfare programs
 House opposition to 12, 70
 in New York State 647–648
 opposition to 33–34, 179, 290, 293, 670, 726–727, 749, 768, 828
 supporters of 154
Soil Bank. See Conservation Reserve
Soil Conservation Service 35
Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty 451
Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO) xlii, 160, 174, 190, 234, 415, 451, 461, 712
Southern bloc, in Senate 12, 70, 89, 120, 279, 368, 442, 670–672. See also civil rights legislation, opposition to; Southern Manifesto
Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) 1–2, 388–390, 674, 702–703
Southern Manifesto 93, 137, 233, 246, 257, 280, 290, 301, 368, 411, 487, 518, 583, 640–641, 643, 671, 709, 719, 726, 767, 793
South Korea 162, 720
South Vietnam xlii, 167, 174, 411, 416, 449, 720
Souvanna Phouma (Lao prince and prime minister) 71–72, 575–576
Soviet Union
 ambassadors to 30–31, 53–54, 369, 712, 765–766, 812 and Berlin crisis of 1958–1959 xxviii–xxx, 162, 176 Cuba and xlviii, l detenté 448, 506, 562 espionage vii, 105, 476, 777 (See also Rosenberg, Ethel; Rosenberg, Julius; Sobell, Morton) expansionism vii, viii, 3, 395–396
 Fast (Howard) popularity in 211–212 in Guatemala xli
 influence in Arab world xlv military aid to Egypt xliii, 11–12, 175, 656 missile programs xxvii, 196, 237, 495
 Nixon visit to 558–559
 nuclear arms and xxxvii–xxxviii, 776 peace offensive (1953) 345 propaganda, success of xxxii
 Roosevelt (Eleanor) in 654–655
 supporters of 206, 644–645
 technological advances, U.S. fears about xxvii–xxviii (See also Sputnik)
 U.S. policy toward, Kennan (George) on 369–370
 U.S. views on 2, 16, 23, 85, 114, 169, 172, 369, 676, 762–763 withdrawal from Iran 775
Spaatz, Carl A. 425
space program 61–62, 99, 197, 386, 760, 841–842
Sparkman, John J(ackson) 110, 448, 501, 556, 717–719, 731
Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight (House) 280–281, 592 speechwriters for Eisenhower 277, 286, 329, 345, 417, 533
 for Roosevelt 384

- Spellman, Francis Cardinal 697, 719–721
- Spong, William B. 644
- Sputnik* xxvii
and criticisms of U.S.
education 40, 196, 220–221, 261, 384–385, 420 impact on defense policy xxvii, 21, 84, 108, 196, 241–242, 426, 458, 495–496, 569, 610, 683, 748, 758
and space program 760
U.S. response to xvii, xxviii, 62, 164, 237, 359, 386, 841, 909–911
- Sputnik II* 196
- Squillante, Jimmy 19
- Stalin, Joseph xxv, 181, 189, 212, 299, 345, 369, 443, 587, 797
- Stanley, Thomas B(ahnsen) 15, 120, 264, 721–722
- Stanton, Frank 543–544, 722–723, 786
- Stark, Lloyd 774
- Stassen, Harold E(dward) 723–725
and administration staffing 177
as adviser to Eisenhower 345
and disarmament xxxi, 799
Dulles (John Foster) and 170
friends and colleagues 14, 82, 769
on McCarthy (Joseph) 478, 557
political career 146, 187, 297
and steel industry task force 209
supporters of 695
- State Department
accusations of communist influence in 24, 60, 85, 105, 138, 170, 401, 403, 470–471, 476, 479, 694, 777, 791 censorship of libraries 118, 194, 375–376, 479, 528, 684
critics of 653
and fall of Cuba 705
investigation of 118, 170, 500–502 purging of disloyal elements 138–139, 170, 403, 791 states' rights 95, 123, 137, 140, 253, 264, 310, 698, 709, 773, 828–829. See also interposition doctrine States' Rights Party (Dixiecrats) 146, 222, 670, 718, 766, 776 steel industry 494, 524, 615–616
Stempel, Herbert 785
- Stennis, John C(ornelius) 120, 137, 663, 725–727
- Stephens, Harold 82
- Stephens, Thomas E(dwain) 452, 727–728
- Stettinius, Edward 730
- Stevens, Robert T(en Broeck) 728–730
and McCarthy Army investigation 4, 102, 150–151, 195, 295, 480, 482, 537–538, 543, 684, 728–729, 815, 846–847 and Peress (Robert) case xi, 480
- Stevenson, Adlai E(wing) 730–734, 731
advisers to 282, 667
attacks on Eisenhower administration 695
and civil rights 425, 601, 771
and DAC 778
friends and colleagues 239, 548, 686
on Kennedy (John F.) 734
on McCarthy (Joseph) 272, 481
opposition and critics 93, 472, 478, 621–622, 822
political career vii, 25, 29, 136, 195, 205, 231–232, 279, 337, 448, 473, 504–505, 526–527, 556–558, 624, 630, 633, 730–732, 777–778, 825
supporters of 92, 137, 216–217, 231, 261, 420, 510, 525–527, 534, 580, 655, 719, 763–764
Truman (Harry) on 779
- Stewart, Potter 734–736
- Stilwell, Joseph 138
- Stimson, Henry 488
- stock market crash of 1929 182
- Stone, Harlan Fiske 325, 349, 794
- Stone, I(sidor) F(einstein) 666, 736–738
- Storer, George 157
- Strategic Air Command (SAC) 237, 426, 911
- Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) 650
- Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty of 1972 348, 396, 562
- Strauss, Leo 738–739
- Strauss, Lewis (Lichtenstein) 739–742, 740
and Dixon-Yates contract 98, 256, 318, 367, 414, 740–741
friends and colleagues 322
and nuclear testing xxxi
Oppenheimer (J. Robert) case and 568–570, 740
opposition and critics 16, 20, 99, 414, 473, 566, 711
- rejection of nomination as commerce secretary 741
supporters 103–104
- Street Life Project 820
- Streibert, Theodore C(uyler) 742–743
- Strobel, Peter A(ndres) 6, 462, 591, 743
- Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) 389–390
- Students for a Democratic Society 454, 517
- student unrest in 1960s 381, 454, 608
- Submerged Lands Act of 1953 192, 497, 534, 619
- Subversive Activities Control Act. See Internal Security Act of 1950
- Subversive Activities Control Board (SACB) 109, 471, 604
- Suez Crisis of 1956 xliii–xlv, 10–11, 175–176, 195, 198, 325, 541, 553, 718
- Sukarno, Achmed 13–14, 361–362
- Sulzberger, Arthur Hayes 629, 743–744
- Sulzberger, Arthur Ochs 744
- Sulzberger, C(yrus) L(eo) 743–745
- Summerfield, Arthur E(llsworth) 557, 642, 745–746, 813
- Sun Myung Moon 22
- Supreme Court
in 1953 xx
on anti-NAACP laws 28
Chessman (Caryl) case 109
chief justices 82–83, 793–796, 803–808 criticisms of 179–180, 772 on defendant rights 115–116, 161, 229, 276–277, 520–521, 735, 780, 807, 818 on desegregation xviii–xix, 1, 275, 702, 795, 818
Eisenhower appointments xix–xx, 63, 75, 194, 275, 735, 804–805, 818 first black law clerk 229
Johnson appointments 266, 465, 807 loyalty cases 229, 276, 714, 717 on loyalty investigations 63, 88, 103, 115, 276, 349–350, 354, 520, 694, 802, 806–807, 818 on natural resources, control of 19
Nixon appointments 43, 82, 258, 285, 289–290, 522, 622, 807 power of, opposition to 180, 806
- Red Monday 63, 694
- Roosevelt appointments 94, 228, 349, 628, 824
- Roosevelt's plan to pack 262, 471, 484, 492, 565, 669, 736, 774, 794
- on Rosenberg (Julius and Ethel) case 660
- Schwartz (Bernard) on 689
- Truman appointments 88, 115, 349, 520, 779, 794
on Truman's steel mills seizures 616, 628
- Vinton Court factions 794
- Warren Court factions 805
- Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers, Europe (SHAPE) 269
- Sweatt, Herman 795
- Sweatt v. Painter* (1950) 464, 521, 795
- Sweezy, Paul M. 806
- Sweezy v. New Hampshire* (1957) 46, 229, 806
- Symington, (William) Stuart 196, 241, 346, 359, 376, 426, 482, 495, 672, 746–748
- Syria, and Suez crisis xlv
- T
- Taber, John 749–750
- Taft, Robert A(lphonso) 750–753
Bohlen (Charles) nomination and 54, 501, 718
and Bricker amendment 66 and budget cuts, support for 334 death of 177, 214, 401, 504–505, 529, 695, 814
on Durkin (Martin) 177
friends and colleagues 319, 322, 514
McCarthy and x
opposition to 436, 690
political career vii, 101, 145–146, 150, 186–187, 333, 353, 436, 438, 499, 813, 834 political influence of 34 and public housing 475
Radford (Arthur) and 611 and Republican Party politics 72, 271
Rovere (Richard) on 666
supporters of 65, 69, 421, 797
and Taft-Hartley Act 342
on Yalta agreements 299, 358
- Taft, William Howard 228
- Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing act 218
- Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 drafting of 310, 528–529 efforts to revise 177–178, 343, 373, 486–487, 504–506, 529, 671, 695, 814

- Eisenhower on 814
 opposition to 94, 177, 255, 319, 336, 413, 456, 460, 492, 502, 504, 509, 534, 623, 657, 718, 764
 passage of 310, 466
 provisions of 308, 751
 revisions of 266, 412
 steel strike and 494, 524
 supporters of 69, 103, 218, 342, 399, 457, 485, 518, 640, 642, 689–690, 710, 749, 821, 843
 Supreme Court on 350, 794
 Truman's veto of 14, 129, 350, 399, 776 union compliance with 248 violations of 32
- Taiwan (Nationalist China)
 expulsion from UN 363
 land reform in 410
 Nixon (Richard) on 559
 supporters of 352, 354, 399, 403, 429, 708, 768, 783
 U.S. aid to 146
 U.S. ambassador to 620–621
 U.S. commitment to defend 174, 176, 415, 434, 620
- Taiwan crisis of 1954–1955
 xxxv–xxxvii, 57, 174, 176, 190, 254, 269, 354, 363, 401, 415, 434, 612–613, 620, 637, 718
- Taiwan crisis of 1958 xxxvii–xxxviii, 31, 176, 198
- Talbott, Harold E. (Istner) 239, 376, 485, 753–755, 785
- Talmadge, Eugene 245, 755
- Talmadge, Herman E. (Eugene) 246, 264, 755–756
- Tammany Hall 128, 143–145, 279, 317, 425, 655, 799–801
- Task Force on Natural Beauty 819–820
- tax cuts
 attempts to pass 159
 Eisenhower's opposition to 191–192, 197, 286
 opposition to 78, 93, 96, 155, 246, 273, 334–335, 441, 469, 624, 626, 828
 supporters of 333–335, 406, 598, 626, 689–690, 817, 827–828
- tax increase, supporters of 580, 812
- tax law 53, 159, 257, 514–515
- tax policy 33, 96, 125, 223–224, 514, 518–519, 626, 828
- Taylor, Maxwell D. (Avenport) 77–78, 84, 196, 242–243, 255, 756–758, 792
- Teamsters. See International Brotherhood of Teamsters
- television
 commercial, development of 681, 722
 quiz-show scandal 157, 281, 722–723, 785–786
- Teller, Edward xxxi, 41, 568–569, 587, 740, 758–760
- 10 Million Americans Mobilizing for Justice 60
- Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) 98, 126, 192, 253, 256, 291, 300, 323, 365, 414, 497, 717, 750, 817. See also Dixon-Yates contract
- Thomas, Charles S. (arks) 760–761, 761
- Thomas, Elbert 33
- Thomas, John Parnell 591, 761
- Thomas, Norman M. (attoon) 77, 321, 327, 545, 762–764
- Thompson, Frank, Jr. 764–765
- Thompson, Llewellyn E., Jr. 54, 765–766
- Thompson, Melvin E. 755
- Thompson, Ruth 265
- Thompson, Vernon 605
- Thompson restaurants case xviii–xix
- Thornberry, Homer 807
- Thornton, Dan 421
- Thurmond, Strom 766–769
 and Alaska statehood 643
 and Civil Rights Act of 1957 672
 opposition to Haynsworth (Clement) 289
 political career 95, 670, 766–767, 773, 776
 presidential candidacy 146, 292, 670, 718, 766, 776
 and Southern Manifesto 137, 233, 671, 767
 supporters of 179, 640, 718
- Thye, Edward J. (ohn) 473, 769–770
- Tidelands Oil Bill of 1946 399–400
- Till, Emmett L. (ouis) 119, 532, 770–771, 809
- Tillich, Paul 551
- Time* magazine 447, 449
- Timmerman, George B. (ell) 95, 771–772, 772
- Timmerman, George Bell, Jr. 772, 772–773
- Tippitt, J. D. 840
- Titanic* (ship) 680
- Tito, Marshal (Josip Broz) 446
- Tives, Richard T. 835
- Tobin, Dan 31, 306
- Tolson, Clyde 143
- “To Secure These Rights” (1947) 776
- Towers, John 611
- Townsend, Francis E. 706
- trade policy 515, 518, 616, 624. See also Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act
- Transportation Act of 1958 704
- treaty-making power, effort to restrict. See Bricker amendment
- Treaty of Fifth Avenue 560, 647
- Treaty of Versailles 169
- Trieste dispute 446, 541, 765
- Trotsky, Leon 181
- Trujillo, Rafael xlix, 167, 210
- Truman, Harry S. 773–779
 advisers to 90, 94–95, 623, 646, 667
 agricultural policy 311, 585
 appointments by 19, 24, 30, 45, 58, 130, 152, 155, 203–204, 216, 219, 227, 332, 468, 712, 747, 765, 784 and atomic bomb 775
 Butler (Paul) and 92
 civil rights legislation 290 coal mine seizures 794–795
 defense policy 611
 domestic policy xvi, 256, 407, 424, 466, 514, 534, 616, 766–767, 775–776 (See also Fair Deal)
 economic policies 384, 775–776
 and FBI surveillance of extremists 326 federal judicial appointments 837
 foreign policy
 Acheson (Dean) and 2 containment policy xxii, 775 (See also containment policy)
 Eisenhower on xxiv
 Kennan (George) and 369
 opposition and critics 150, 169–170, 178, 232–233, 266, 352, 371, 736, 751–752, 827
 supporters of 342, 350, 366, 424, 457, 527, 534, 536, 708, 726, 769, 820, 843
 Truman Doctrine 433, 670, 775
 friends and colleagues 407
 Hoover (Herbert) on 323
 and hydrogen bomb 41, 568, 691, 740, 759, 776
 Loyalty Program 326, 475–476, 500, 537, 686, 716–717, 777 and McCarran immigration bill 103, 580 and Murrow (Edward) 544
 opposition to 310, 353
 political career 382, 526, 775, 777–778
 press on 260
 and Puerto Rico 539
 recall of MacArthur 466–467, 500, 637, 671, 777, 784, 821
 Rovere (Richard) on 666
- as senator 214, 774
 steel mills seizures 50, 116, 140, 520, 616, 628, 642, 795
 on Stevenson (Adlai) 731
 supporters of 165, 350, 382, 623, 718
 Supreme Court
 appointments 88, 115, 349, 520, 779, 794
 Taft-Hartley Act and 129
 temperament 779
 and White scandal 72–73, 327, 353, 479–480, 778, 787–788
- Truman administration failures of vii
 and “loss” of China xli
 scandals and corruption in vii, 6, 188, 499, 556, 718, 731, 777
- Tugwell, Rexford 323, 384, 539
- Tuskegee Institute 54
- Tuttle, Elbert Parr 779–781, 834–835
- Twenty-fourth Amendment 105
- 21-day rule 623, 625
- Twenty-second Amendment 466
- Twenty-third Amendment 365
- Twining, Nathan F. (arragut) 426, 610, 747, 781–783, 782
- Tydings, Millard 39, 91, 293, 476

U

- U-2 incident xxxiii–xxxv, 44, 200, 242, 298, 536, 542, 603–604, 766
- U-2 spy planes xxxiii, 196, 242, 365, 602–603
- Udall, Morris 493
- unemployment insurance 197, 226, 518, 683, 826
- UNESCO. See United Nations
- Education, Scientific and Cultural Organization
- Union Party 706
- unions. See also AFL-CIO; American Federation of Labor (AFL); Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO); International Brotherhood of Teamsters; Landrum-Griffin Act; Taft-Hartley Act; United Auto Workers; United Steel Workers of America academic views on 435, 515
 arbitrators 380
 California's attempt to subject to state regulations 71 common-site picketing rights 27–28, 266

- communist influence in 67, 74, 100, 110, 131, 165, 247–248, 427, 443–444, 446, 505, 545, 631
 Democratic Party and 631 and farmers, efforts to unionize 36 international labor movement 505 investigations of 32, 64–65, 131–133, 157–158, 252, 308, 373, 376, 412, 485–487, 505–506, 538, 633 (See also Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor Management Field) lawyers for 621
 leadership 31–32, 42–43, 100, 157–158, 165–166, 338–339, 493–495, 503–508, 545, 617–618, 631–633, 656–658
 and New York City 431, 800–801
 opposition to 26–28, 56–57, 252, 310, 404–405, 457 organized crime and 64–65, 157–158, 165–166, 208, 306–308, 310, 376, 485–486, 504, 633 political support of 249, 535
 racial discrimination in 339, 506–507, 617–618
 reform efforts 265, 524–525
 and right-to-work laws 67, 152, 177–178, 208, 252, 398, 402, 419, 425, 440, 506, 524, 695, 708, 814
 supporters of 456, 473, 503, 764
 “union label” program 165
 United Arab Republic xlv
 United Auto Workers (UAW) 132–133, 158, 226, 376, 404–405, 443, 486, 503, 538, 631–633, 651, 830
 United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners (UBC) 338–339
 United China Relief 448
 United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers (UE) 74, 100, 747 United Federation of Teachers 431
 United Hatters, Cap and Millinery Workers International Union (UHCMW) 657
 United Mine Workers (UMW) 106, 427–429, 493
 United Nations (UN)
 American employees of 80–82
 Arab-Israeli conflict and xlv–xlv, 80–81 communist China membership 362–363, 401, 429–430, 700, 708, 798 Eisenhower’s “Atoms for Peace” address 345
 expulsion of Taiwan 363
 Fulbright (J. William) on 232
 Guatemala coup and xli
 and Korean War 776–777
 and Lebanon crisis xlvii loyalty investigation of UN delegation 81
 Niebuhr (Reinhold) on 553
 opposition and critics 66, 267, 413
 San Francisco Conference 169, 723
 supporters of 290, 300, 654, 708
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights 654
 U.S. ambassador to 438, 734
 U.S. delegation to 11, 81, 126, 169, 290, 313, 337, 345, 460–461, 650, 654, 798–799
 United Nations Education, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) 39, 204, 337
 United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization 585
 United Nations Genocide Convention 606
 United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) 423
 United States government officials, Eisenhower years 874–894
 United States Information Agency (USIA) 12, 417, 544, 653, 723, 742–743
 United Steelworkers of America (USW) 50, 248–249, 494
 United World Federation 130
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights 654
 University of Alabama, desegregation of 222, 449–450, 464–465 urban flight, failure to address li urban renewal 33, 135–136, 149, 422–423, 500, 530, 549, 600, 653, 776, 826
 Urey, Harold 659, 714
 USIA. See United States Information Agency
 U.S. Steel 50–51, 209–210
- V
- Valachi, Joseph 244, 487
 Vandenberg, Arthur H. 146, 224, 233, 796, 813, 820
 Vandenberg, Hoyt S(anford) 784–785
 Van Doren, Charles L(incoln) 785–786
 Vanzetti, Bartolomeo 228
 Vaughan, Harry 73, 777
 Velde, Harold H(immel) 786–788
 Vichy government 541
 Viereck, Peter (Robert) (Edwin) 788–790
 Vietnam. See also French Indochina
 Alsop (Joseph) on 16
 division of xlii, 173, 190, 712
 Dulles foreign policy and 173 independence xlii, 190
 U.S. ambassador to 438–439
 U.S. special representative in 121–122
 Vietnam War
 advisers on 3, 638, 758
 Eisenhower on 201
 Johnson (Lyndon) and 361
 Kissinger (Henry) and 396
 Nixon and 562
 and nuclear weapons 641
 opposition and critics 25, 48, 104, 113, 127, 183, 234, 239, 249, 258, 261, 268, 352, 370, 390, 426–427, 434, 454, 461, 474, 491, 500, 513, 535, 546, 581, 588, 594, 606, 618, 622, 725, 737, 748, 756, 764, 791, 827, 840, 844
 peace talks 77, 279, 439
 Salisbury (Harrison) on 677
 Schlesinger (Arthur) on 687
 Senior Advisory Group on Vietnam 489–490, 638
 supporters of 17, 22, 34, 43, 86, 99, 117, 125, 129, 154, 292–293, 337, 348, 380, 442, 444, 458, 487, 493, 507, 519, 528, 536, 641, 651, 653, 669, 711, 719–720, 727, 826, 829
 Truman (Harry) on 779
 Vincent, John Carter 138, 170, 403, 790–792
 Vinson, Carl 293, 700, 792–793
 Vinson, Fred(erick) M(oore) 161, 349, 520, 628, 660, 793–796
 Viskinsky, Andrei 799
 Voice of America (VOA) 39, 281, 479, 501, 742
 Voorhis, Jerry 110, 554–555
 Vorys, John M(artin) 796–797
 Vorys Compromise (1951) 797 voting rights 180, 274–275, 522, 753, 770
 Voting Rights Act of 1960 364, 650, 709–710, 768
 Voting Rights Act of 1965 53, 102, 180, 287, 337, 390, 409, 522, 622, 673–675, 704, 823, 844
 Voting Rights Act of 1970 690
- W
- WAACS. See Women’s Auxiliary Army Corps
 Wadsworth, James J(eremiah) 798–799 wage and price controls 191, 251, 286, 333, 683, 749, 814, 817
Waging Peace (Eisenhower) 201
 Wagner, Robert F(erdinand), Jr. 144, 217, 348, 351, 384, 425, 799–801
 Wagner Act (National Labor Relations Act of 1935) 384
 Wallace, George C. 29, 223, 338, 355–356, 426, 562, 583
 Wallace, Henry A. 203, 645, 654, 657, 736, 775
 Walsh, Lawrence 147
 Walter, Francis E(ugene) 48, 127, 340, 472, 801–803
 Wang Ping-nan 31
 war crimes tribunals 475
 Waring, J. Waties 771–772
 War Labor Board 428
 War on Poverty 300, 618
 War Powers Act 461, 594
 War Relocation Authority (WRA) 203
 Warren, Earl xix–xx, xx, 63, 75, 110, 146, 194, 398–399, 408, 414, 556, 629, 803–808, 804
 Warren, Lindsay 55
 Warren Commission 225, 489, 620, 673, 737, 807
 Warsaw Pact xxvi
 Washington, D.C., desegregation of xviii–xix, 193, 838
 Washington, Val(ores) (James) 808–809
Washington Merry-Go-Round (syndicated column) 591–592
 Water Facilities Act of 1954 7
 Watergate 18, 253, 259, 278, 327, 507, 562, 598, 690, 727, 838
 Watkins, Arthur V(ivian) 233, 414, 422, 483–484, 809–811
 Watkins, John T. 619
 Watkins Committee 483–484, 809–810
Watkins v. U.S. (1957) 46, 63, 115, 229, 276, 354, 806
 Watson, Thomas J(ohn), Jr. 811–812
 Ways and Means Committee 52–53, 96, 125, 133–134, 517–519, 626–627, 794

Weeks, Sinclair 116, 177, 523–524, 529, 695, 812–815, 813
 Welch, Joseph N(ye) 4, 119, 178, 482, 538, 730, 815–816
 Welch, Robert 394
 welfare state 562, 812, 829
 Welker, Herman 111–112, 142, 312, 717, 816–817
 Wenzell, Adolphe H. 153, 155–156, 301, 332, 741, 841
 Western Conference of Teamsters 64–65
 West Germany, NATO and xxvi, 147, 171, 269, 563–564
 Westinghouse Electric Co. 75, 650
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943) 160, 229, 349
What's Your Trouble? (TV program) 589
 Wheeler, William M. 161
 White, Harry Dexter 72–74, 327, 353, 479, 591, 778, 787–788
 White, Walter 521, 822
 White House
 chief of staff 5–7, 189, 596 management of ix, 189
 special council 695
 staff 254–255, 270–271, 532–533, 695–696, 727–728
 White Paper on China (1949) 403

Whiteside, Thurman 455
 Whittaker, Charles E(vans) 817–819
 Whyte, William H(ollingsworth), Jr. 819–820
 Wickard, Claude R. 203
 Wiesner, Jerome 397
 Wiley, Alexander 475, 820–822
 Wilkie, Wendell L. 145, 428, 445, 448, 754
 Wilkins, J. Ernest xviii, 808
 Wilkins, Roy xxi, 388–389, 655, 822–824
 Williams, G(erhard) Mennen (“Soapy”) 132, 285, 632, 824–825
 Williams, Harrison A(rlington), Jr. 825–827
 Williams, John J(ames) 8, 514, 717, 827–829
 Willis, Charles 111
 Wills, Gary 615
 Wilson, Charles E(rwin) 829–832, 830
 appointment as secretary of defense 189 business career 56, 132, 830
 critics of 332, 347
 and defense budget 672, 747, 785
 Defense Department censorship 662 on defense policy xxiv, 240

 friends and colleagues 219, 692, 754
 resignation 6, 495
 Wilson, Leonard 450
 Wilson, Orlando W. 136
 Wilson, Sloan 832–834
 Wilson, Woodrow 623
 Winant, John J. 30
The Wine Is Bitter (Eisenhower) 205
 Wisdom, John Minor 378, 834–835
 Wolcott, Jesse P. 669
 Wolfson, Louis E(lwood) 26, 651, 835–837
 Woman's Armed Services Integration Act of 1948 710
 women
 in Congress 261, 710–711
 in Eisenhower administration 303–305, 444–446
 Women's Auxiliary Army Corps (WAACS) 303 women's rights, supporters of 54–55, 654
 Wood, Lloyd H. 420
 Workers Party 545
 World Court 232
 World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) 443
 Wright, J(ames) Skelly 30, 139–140, 531, 780, 837–838

Y

Yalta agreements 53–54, 68, 170, 189, 214, 262, 299, 358, 372
 Yarborough, Ralph W(ebster) 698, 839–840
 Yates, Eugene A(dams) 153, 155, 256, 318, 367, 414, 741, 840–841
Yates v. U.S. (1957) 63, 115, 154, 161, 276, 354
 York, Herbert F(rank) 841–842
 Young, Milton R(uben) 843–844
Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer (1952) 116, 140, 520, 628, 795
 Young Turks 266
 Yugoslavia, U.S. aid to 302

Z

Zachman, Sam 158
 Zhou Enlai (Chou En-lai) xxxvii, xxxviii, 174, 190, 210, 401, 790, 792
 Zimmerman, Fred 478
 Zioncheck, Marion 456
 Zorin, Valerian A. 183
 Zwicker, Ralph W(ise) xi, 68, 195, 218–219, 271, 480–481, 483, 594–595, 597, 729, 810, 845–848
 Zworykin, Vladimir 681